An examination of the authorities in this and other jurisdictions convinces us that the position of the respondents is correct when they state that, if it be admitted that the testimony shows Mr. Rickey's love for the contestants and his hatred and distrust of the proponents of the will, and that the trial court erred in every ruling in excluding and striking out such testimony, nevertheless, in the absence of any evidence showing undue influence directly operating upon the testamentary act at the time the will was executed, such testimony concerning the testator's feelings and all such rulings concerning such testimony would become immaterial. Estate of McDevitt, supra; Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252; Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. 700, 198 Pac. 407; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467, 485, 117 Pac. 539.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARRIS et al. v. UNION TRANSFER CO. of LONG BEACH and LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 4351.)

1. Appeal and error §1064(2)—Charge on facts ordinarily necessitates new trial.

Though a charge on matters of fact in violation of Const. art. 6, may not in itself warrant reversal where the fact charged is either admitted or uncontroverted, or where no other conclusion could be reached, in the absence of some such qualification such charge will necessitate a new trial.

2. Trial §194(16)—Instruction as to deceased's failure to look before going into the path of an automobile held erroneous as charge on facts.

In an action for the death of one killed by an automobile, an instruction, that the evidence is "she did not look and did not see it [the automobile]," and that "I am not going to tell you whether the plaintiff was guilty of negligence because she did not look or not," and that no one "can proceed without taking care and looking to see where they are going," held prejudicially erroneous as a charge on the facts where the fact of deceased's failure to look was not uncontroverted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by John S. Harris and others, by their guardian ad litem, John S. Harris, against the Union Transfer Company of Long Beach and Los Angeles and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Harry J. McClean and Frank P. Doherty, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment on a verdict in favor of the defendant in an action for damages brought by a guardian of minor children whose mother, Marion Harris, was killed in an automobile accident.

It appears that Mrs. Harris had been standing on the sidewalk near the intersection of two streets, at which point it was her intention to board a street car. As the street car approached Mrs. Harris left the sidewalk and walked near the rails of the street car track. As she did so a man with whom she had been conversing on the street corner called out to her that she could ride with him. At just about that time Mrs. Harris turned, gave a scream, and either walked very rapidly or ran toward the curb, and in doing so was struck and run over by an automobile truck owned and operated by defendant, and which truck had been following the street car, and which was passing the street car at that time. The evidence further shows that at the time the accident occurred it was a clear day, and that there was nothing to obstruct the view of either the driver of the truck or that of Mrs. Harris as to any of the immediate surroundings; but the evidence is conflicting as to the position of the truck with relation to either the street car or to Mrs. Harris at the time the street car stopped for the purpose of taking on passengers. The evidence is also conflicting as to the position occupied by Mrs. Harris with relation to the street car just before she attempted to return to the sidewalk, as well as to the position of Mrs. Harris and the truck with relation to the curb, at the time the truck struck Mrs. Harris.

Appellants contend that there are several reasons why a new trial should be granted; but for the purposes of this appeal it is deemed necessary that but one of them should be considered by this court. It has to do with one of the instructions given by the court to the jury as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that every person has the right to presume that every other person will perform his duty and obey the law, and, in the absence of reasonable ground to think otherwise, it is not negligence to assume that he is not exposed to danger which can come to him only from violation of law or duty by such other person. That, however, does not mean or go to the extent of saying that anybody can proceed without taking care and looking to see where they are going. It is for you absolutely in this case to say—I am not going to tell you whether the plaintiff [plaintiffs' decedent] was guilty of negligence because she didn't look for the approaching automobile or not—it is for you to determine that. I say because she didn't, because the evidence is that she did not look and did not see it. It is for you under all the circumstances of the case to say whether she was or was not guilty of negligence proximately contributing to her injury under all the circumstances of this case."

While of necessity there could be no positive evidence regarding the fact as to whether or not Mrs. Harris actually saw the truck just before she started from the street car to go toward the sidewalk, the man who had called to her that she could ride with him testified that, so far as he knew, Mrs. Harris did not "look up the street, and that she never did look"; and another witness testified: "I would say doubtlessly that she was looking westerly." A third witness, after testifying that the truck was in full view of the pedestrians of whom Mrs. Harris was one, stated: "Mrs. Harris, the deceased, had turned around, and I knew nothing of the call from the neighbor's window, or wherever it was from, but thinking that she had turned around and saw this truck coming started to run back toward the curb, and by that time the truck was on her and had hit her." The testimony of other witnesses was, in substance, that Mrs. Harris screamed and then started to run in a southwesterly direction in front of the truck before it struck her.

It is suggested by appellants that the reason why Mrs. Harris screamed and then ran toward the sidewalk was because she had seen the truck bearing down upon her, and had endeavored to escape the accident by running to a place of safety.

[1, 2] One of the issues in the case was that of the contributory negligence of Mrs. Harris, which necessarily involved the question of the failure of Mrs. Harris to use ordinary care for her own safety. If (without deciding the point) it be assumed that, considering the facts of this case (as may have been determined by the jury) as being that the street car had not stopped for the purpose of either discharging or taking passengers thereon at the time the truck was passing the street car, a part of plaintiffs' decedent's duty was to look with ordinary care for approaching vehicles before attempting to cross that part of the street lying between the street car and the sidewalk, it would follow that the decision of the question of whether Mrs. Harris did actually so look was one exclusively for the jury. Section 19 of article 6 of the Constitution forbids judges to charge juries with respect to matters of fact; and, while an instruction to the jury upon a question of fact may not in itself be sufficient to warrant a reversal of the judgment in the case, especially if such fact be either admitted or uncontroverted, or where no other conclusion could be reached, and such error has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice (Hoffman v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 45 Cal. App. 751, 188 Pac. 597), the authorities of this state, which are so numerous as to require no citation, are to the effect that, in the absence of some such qualification, such action on the part of the trial judge will necessitate the granting of a new trial to the aggrieved party. The instruction of which complaint is here made contains the statement (referring to the approaching automobile) that the evidence is "she did not look and did not see it," and that "I am not going to tell you whether the plaintiff [plaintiffs' decedent] was guilty of negligence because she didn't look for the approaching automobile, or not—it is for you to determine that;" and also the further admonition that no one "can proceed without taking care and looking to see where they are going." And, although within the same instruction the jury is advised that it must ultimately determine the question of the contributory negligence, if any, on the part of Mrs. Harris, the effect of the instruction is to tell the jury that it was the duty of Mrs. Harris to look, and that she did not do so. It cannot be stated with certainty that the fact that Mrs. Harris did not look is either uncontroverted, or that no other conclusion could have been reached by the jury. On the other hand, neither can it be said that the decision by the court of that particular feature of the case, and the consequent exclusion of a consideration thereof by the jury, did not result in a miscarriage of justice. It is highly probable that the jury determined that the failure of Mrs. Harris to look (which failure, according to the judge's instruction existed) amounted to negligence on her part; and, if the jury then concluded that such negligence proximately contributed to the injury of Mrs. Harris, there was nothing left for the jury but to return a verdict in favor of defendant.

It would follow that the judgment should be reversed. It is so ordered.

SWEET v. SWEET. (Civ. 4685.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 19, 1923.)

Divorce §133(3)—Evidence held not to entitle plaintiff to a divorce on ground of separation.

In a divorce action, evidence that went only to the fact that the parties were living apart, and that the separation occurred by reason of defendant going to another city, with no evidence of intent to desert or refusal of offer of reconciliation, was insufficient to entitle plaintiff to a decree of divorce, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 95, 100, 101.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action for divorce by Ernest L. Sweet against Hazel E. Sweet. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. White, of Salinas, for appellant.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to obtain a decree of divorce from the defendant on the ground of separation. The defendant did not appear, her default was entered, and the plaintiff thereafter introduced evidence, and the trial court denied him a decree. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The case was called for trial on November 22, 1922. The plaintiff took the stand and testified that he and the defendant had resided at Salinas for about two years when, on the 1st day of December, 1920, she left his bed and board. When she left it was against his will and without his consent. He did not know any particular reason why she left, only she did not want to live there. It is a fact that she showed a disposition, or rather her idea was she did not care particularly to live with him any more; she wanted to go home and live at San Jose where her folks were. Several of the foregoing statements were made in reply to leading questions, and some were made as mere conclusions—the witness not stating any probative facts. After the plaintiff had left the stand Erwin Collins testified that he knew that the defendant resided at San Jose at the time of the trial. He had known Ernest Sweet for the last two years, and Mrs. Sweet had not been at Salinas during that time. He knew Ernest Sweet and knew where he lived at the time of the trial; he lived alone, and had lived alone for a period of two years. Thereupon the trial court remarked:

"It will require additional corroboration. The mere living apart is not sufficient. You will have to show the wife was at fault. I will have to have something to show that she deserted her husband—that she stated to some one or admitted in some way she did not intend to live with her husband, or did not intend to come to Salinas. That corroborative proof is necessary."

The further hearing of the action was continued until December 28, 1922. At that time Mrs. H. H. Hellman was called as a witness and testified that she knew the defendant; that the defendant at the time of the trial resided at San Jose, and had resided there probably around about a year. "She is working in Gross & Sons dry goods store and has an apartment house she rents. She has been renting it for about a year." In reply to questions propounded by the court the witness testified that she had known the defendant for about fifteen years; that she knew her before she was married; that she saw her in Salinas; but the defendant never in any way directly or indirectly mentioned her domestic unhappiness. From general appearances the witness did not think the defendant and her husband were getting along well together. She saw nothing in particular, but just the general attitude of both of them. "If the defendant had been unhappy our relations were not such that she would have told me those things." Thereupon the trial court denied the decree.

In support of his appeal the plaintiff relies on the decisions entitled Morrison v. Morrison, 20 Cal. 431; Benkert v. Benkert, 32 Cal. 467; Lowman v. Lowman, 165 Cal. 352, 132 Pac. 439. The first two cases were decided before section 130 of the Civil Code was enacted. The last case cited is not at all helpful. After stating the facts testified to by the plaintiff in that case, the Supreme Court in its decision states:

"There was evidence of other witnesses in corroboration of these facts."

An examination of the record in that case shows that the corroboration was the testimony of an eyewitness who saw and heard everything that the husband had testified to regarding the facts constituting the desertion. In the instant case it will be noted that the testimony went to the fact that the plaintiff and defendant were living separate and apart, and that the separation occurred by reason of the wife going to San Jose. The corroboration tendered by the plaintiff was to the effect that the wife was residing in San Jose. There was not a particle of corroboration, and in fact there was no direct testimony, that when the wife left the domicile she did so "with intent to desert." Civ. Code, § 95. The plaintiff made no claim that his cause of action rested on the provisions of sections 96-99 of the Civil Code. No direct evidence and no corroboration was offered as showing, or tending to show, that the separation was amicable in the beginning, but that thereafter "the intent to desert" was "fixed during such absence or separation." Civ. Code, § 100. Neither was there any evidence, direct or corroborative, to the effect that after the defendant left the plaintiff's home the plaintiff sought a reconciliation, etc., and the defendant refused the same. Civ. Code, § 101.

In the case of Hayes v. Hayes, 144 Cal. 625, 78 Pac. 19, the Supreme Court had before it a cause of action for desertion which purported to rest on section 96 of the Civil Code. The court, among other things, held that there was no corroboration except perchance an alleged admission by the defendant, and that such admission should have been corroborated to constitute sufficient proof. In the case of Kenniston v. Kenniston, 6 Cal. App. 657, 92 Pac. 1037, the court was considering a cause of action which it was claimed rested on section 95 of the Civil Code, or, as claimed at another time, on section 102 of the Civil Code. It was argued that section 130 of the Civil Code was enacted to prevent collusion between the parties. On page 661 of 6 Cal. App. (92 Pac. 1039) the court said:

"Of these facts the court must be satisfied, but that conviction must rest in part at least upon corroborative evidence as provided by the statute. There seems to be no commanding reason why there should be any abatement of the rigorous requirement of the rule or any attempt by judicial action to enlarge the door of escape from the conjugal yoke and its corresponding obligations."

Corder v. Corder (N. J. Ch.) 59 Atl. 309, is a case that is almost parallel in its facts:

"The original separation of the husband and wife in this case, and the circumstances of it, are proved only by the oath of the petitioner. The corroboration of petitioner as to the fact that subsequent to the separation the wife lived alone is not a sufficient corroboration of the desertion charged. It proves the continuance of a separation, but not that the original separation was a desertion."

The case of Stedman v. Stedman, 179 Cal. 288, 176 Pac. 437, is a case that is stronger in its facts in support of the appellant's contentions. But, in that case, as in this case, when the plaintiff's evidence had been received the trial court called attention to the missing proof, and yet the plaintiff did not supply, nor offer to supply, the same. In that case the Supreme Court looked upon that feature as being determinative of what was otherwise a very close case. It therefore affirmed the judgment of the trial court denying the decree.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

GRAYBIEL v. AUGER. (Civ. 2635.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 10, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 6, 1924.)

1. Highways ⇨172(1) — Enormous traffic on highways of California constitutes traveled portions danger zone, necessitating due care of user.

Independently of Motor Vehicle Act 1915, § 20, subd. (w), as added by St. 1919, p. 219, § 12, before its amendment, and whether or not it is valid, the enormous traffic on the improved highways of California is such as to constitute the traveled portions thereof a definite danger zone, necessitating due care and caution by every user thereof to insure his own personal safety.

2. Evidence ⇨14—Court may take notice of enormous traffic on improved highways of California.

Court may properly take notice of the enormous traffic on the improved highways of the state.

3. Negligence ⇨83—Party having last clear chance to avoid injury liable.

If one's negligence contributes to the cause of the injury, which would not have resulted without it, he cannot recover, unless the other party had a last clear chance to avoid inflicting injury for negligence.

4. Highways ⇨176—Passing driver must drive to one side to avoid injury to another driver in the highway making repairs.

If plaintiff motorist, driving south, stopped his car on the westerly side of the highway for repairs, and there was sufficient room for defendant, coming north, to pass without injuring plaintiff, it was defendant's duty to drive his car sufficiently to his right-hand side of the road to admit of such passage without injury.

5. Highways ⇨176—Duty of driver, seeing another in danger, to reduce speed to pass other without injuring him.

If defendant saw plaintiff in the road, making repairs on his car, which was facing south, at a time when defendant, driving north, was sufficiently distant to admit of his car being stopped or brought under such reasonable control as to admit of its passage of plaintiff without injury to him, it was defendant's duty either to stop his car or reduce its speed accordingly, though plaintiff had placed himself in a dangerous position.

6. Highways ⇐176—Motorist, having opportunity to pass another without injuring him and failing to do so, is guilty of reckless driving.

Where plaintiff, auto driver, whose car was standing still on the highway facing south, was seen by defendant driving north to be in a position of danger while defendant had ample opportunity to lessen his speed of 30 miles an hour, so as to pass plaintiff without injuring him, it was his duty to do so, under Motor Vehicle Act 1915, § 22, as amended by St. 1917, p. 404, § 16, and in failing to do so he was guilty of reckless driving.

7. Highways ⇐184(2)—Evidence held to show injury to plaintiff was caused by defendant's negligence in passing plaintiff on highway.

Evidence held to support finding of trial court that injury to plaintiff auto driver, who stopped his car on the right-hand side of a highway facing south, was caused by defendant in driving past plaintiff at a reckless speed, in violation of Motor Vehicle Act 1915, § 22, as amended by St. 1917, p. 404, § 16.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Lloyd E. Graybiel against C. Auger. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Collins & Collins, of Fresno, and S. E. Tracy, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wm. N. Graybiel, of Turlock, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This action was instituted by plaintiff for the purpose of recovering damages from the defendant for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff as a result of being struck by an automobile owned and driven by the defendant. The trial was had before the court sitting without a jury. The plaintiff was awarded judgment in the total sum of $1,050. This sum included expenses for medical attendance, plus loss of wages or compensation, and $500 on account of pain and suffering sustained by the plaintiff.

It appears that the plaintiff at the time of the injury complained of was driving a Dodge automobile southerly on the state highway between the towns of Ceres and Keyes in Stanislaus county; that at the time of the injury in question construction work was being carried on along that portion of the state highway just referred to, such work consisting of the construction of shoulders on both sides of the improved portion of said highway. These shoulders were about 18 inches wide, and, according to the testimony, varied from 1½ inches to 3 inches in height above the theretofore traveled portion of the improved highway. As the plaintiff was traveling southerly it appears that the tire on the left-hand rear wheel collapsed, causing the plaintiff to stop for the purpose of changing tires. It further appears in the testimony that the shoulder on the right-hand side of plaintiff as he was traveling southerly had just been constructed, was not sufficiently hardened to permit travel thereon, and that the plaintiff placed the right wheel of his car within an inch or two of the inside line of the right shoulder or the shoulder along the westerly border of said improved highway, and proceeded with the work of changing the tire on the wheel referred to; that the shoulder referred to continued a distance of a quarter or a half a mile southerly from where the plaintiff stopped, and that its condition was such as to render it improper for him to drive his car over or upon the same, and also it further appears from the testimony that, over and beyond the left-hand side of the road, to wit, being the east shoulder, the ground was not in a condition to admit of a machine being driven over and stopped for the purpose of making repairs; that the place where the plaintiff stopped was upon an unobstructed and straight way portion, giving ample opportunity to all persons using the highway of seeing the plaintiff's car standing in the position which it occupied, and also enabling the plaintiff to see all cars approaching from either direction. It appears that at the time of the injury sustained by the plaintiff he was occupying a crouching position close to the left rear wheel, hereinbefore referred to, engaged in the work of changing tires, and that while in this position he was struck by the defendant's automobile, which automobile was being driven by the defendant in a northerly direction along said highway.

The defendant appeals to this court from the judgment against him, and for grounds of appeal alleges that the plaintiff's injury is the result of his own contributory negligence, and that no negligence was shown on the part of defendant, but, if shown, was not the sole cause of injury, and would not have caused any injury, to the plaintiff, had the plaintiff himself not been guilty of contributory negligence at the very time the injury was inflicted. It is also contended by the plaintiff that the findings of the court are not sustained by the testimony.

The court found, among other things, that to the right of the place where the plaintiff stopped his car, and along the westerly side of said highway, and for a considerable distance in both directions therefrom, a concrete shoulder for said highway was being constructed; that said concrete shoulder was soft and pliable; that it would have been impossible in the ordinary course of travel to drive an automobile over said shoulder without injury thereto; that it was impossible for the plaintiff to remove his car from the highway in order to make the necessary repairs, for the reasons that it could not be moved to the right without interfering with the work of construction on the highway, nor to the left by reason of the condition of the ground, and that, therefore, plaintiff did not violate the statute in turning to the extreme right of the pavement, close to the edge of said concrete shoulder, to make the repairs to his car; that at the time of the injury the plaintiff was on the westerly side of the center of said highway; that the defendant carelessly, negligently, and without due care so operated his automobile as to strike and injure the person of the plaintiff. Appellant first called attention to subdivision (w) of section 20 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1915 (as added by St. 1919, p. 219, § 12), wherein it is provided that no person shall stop an automobile upon the traveled portion of any highway for the purpose of making repairs, unless such automobile shall be disabled to the extent that it is impossible or impracticable to remove the same therefrom until the repairs have been made, and contends that to stop an automobile as the plaintiff did in this case constitutes a misdemeanor, and is such negligence per se as to prevent any recovery by him in this case.

[1, 2] Whether this section, which has now been changed by an amendment, as it then stood was sufficiently certain to describe the act of the plaintiff as a misdemeanor, or whether void for uncertainty, need not be determined, for the simple reason that the enormous traffic on the improved highways of the state of California, and of which we think the court may properly take notice, is such as to constitute the traveled portions thereof a definite danger zone, necessitating due care and caution on the part of every user thereof to insure his own personal safety. Under the motor vehicle law as applied to the circumstances under conditions requiring automobile drivers to use the right-hand half of the highway when unobstructed, there were two danger zones, to wit, one in the path of vehicles driven southerly, and one in the path of vehicles driven northerly. The testimony shows that, notwithstanding the construction of the shoulders referred to, there was sufficient space for each motor vehicle on the one-half of the road required to be used by the drivers of machines traveling in either direction, and that, while each machine remained on its proper side of the road, there would neither be collision, nor probability of collision, nor possibility of collision. It further appears from the testimony that at the time of the injury complained of much use was being made of the highway referred to. It thus appears, from what has been said, that whether subdivision (w) of section 20 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1915 is valid or invalid as a definition of an act constituting a misdemeanor, nevertheless, the plaintiff was required to use very great care in keeping his machine and person on the westerly half of the improved portion of said highway, and might readily be charged with contributory negligence, if he allowed any portion of his person to get beyond the center line thereof.

[3] As there is no dispute or controversy between the appellant and respondent as to the law applicable to this case, we do not deem it necessary to review the authorities cited. It is well settled that if one's negligence contributes to the cause of the injury, and the injury would not have resulted, had his negligence not contributed thereto, he cannot recover, unless it further appears that the defendant had a last clear chance to avoid inflicting injury. The court in this case found that the plaintiff was upon the westerly half of said highway, and was on the westerly side of the dividing line thereof, and that the defendant carelessly, negligently, and without due care drove his automobile, to wit, a Marmon car, against the person of the plaintiff, and in this manner inflicted the injury complained of.

[4, 5] As we view this case, if the testimony shows that the defendant had a last clear opportunity to avoid injuring the plaintiff, and could have done so by the exercise of due care, then whether the finding of the court that it was impracticable for the plaintiff to move his car to some other location for the purpose of making repairs is wholly immaterial. If the plaintiff was on the westerly side of the road, as just stated, and there was sufficient room for the defendant to pass without injuring the plaintiff, it was his duty to move his car sufficiently to his right-hand side of the road as to admit of such passage without injury; also, if the defendant saw the plaintiff in a position of danger at a time when his, the defendant's, car was sufficiently distant to admit of his car being stopped or brought under such reasonable control in relation to its stopping as to admit of its passage by the plaintiff without injury, then it was the duty of the defendant to either stop his car or reduce its speed to such a degree as to enable him to pass by the plaintiff without injury to him, even though the plaintiff had placed himself in a dangerous position.

[6, 7] This reduces the question in this case purely to one of fact and not to a definition of legal principles. The testimony set out in the transcript shows that the improved portion of the highway involved, lying within the shoulders, was 15 feet 4 inches in width; that the width of the Dodge car belonging to the plaintiff was 5 feet 6 inches; that the width of the Marmon car was 5 feet 10 inches, which would leave a space of 4 feet between the two cars; that at the time of the injury the plaintiff was in a crouching position, drawn up close to the left rear wheel of his machine, at work changing a tire, as hereinbefore stated; that the point or place where his body was struck by the defendant's car was from 17 to 21 inches from said wheel; that there was a distance between the Dodge car to the center of the highway of at least 26 inches, and thus that defendant's car, instead of being on the easterly half of said highway, which would have left plenty of space for passage, was in truth and in fact some 9 inches or more to the westerly side of said dividing line. The testimony to this effect, if believed by the trial court, was sufficient to establish the position of the plaintiff's car and the position of the plaintiff's body as being wholly on his right or westerly half of the traveled highway, leaving the easterly half wholly unoccupied and free for the use of passing vehicles. It also appears from the plaintiff's testimony that other vehicles had passed by during the meantime; his testimony being as follows in this particular:

"As I say, I figured I was on my half and edge of the highway, which left the other half of the old highway in addition to the shoulder, which seemed to me to give plenty of room. But in view of the fact that several cars had passed, and had given me a reasonably wide berth, going by carefully, my danger seemed less at the time I was finally hit than it did at first."

Keeping the foregoing facts in mind, let us examine the testimony relative to the conduct of the defendant. His own testimony is as follows:

"Now, I saw the Dodge car parked on the left-hand side of the road, and when we were perhaps 15 car lengths away—hard to determine just exactly—I saw a young man come out from the back of the Dodge car and squat down to put a tire on. Due to the fact that we had passed a great number of machines, both machines driving inside of the collar, I presumed that there was room enough for him to squat down there; but, however, I blew the horn, and blew it continuously clear up to the machine, you might say, slackening down the speed we had been traveling—about 30 miles an hour—and I guess we slackened to around 20 or so, and we went by this car. The right-hand wheels of the Marmon were against the curb or against the right-hand collar, as the tracks were defined in the light sand covering. And we compared the imprint of the McClaren cords I had on the rear tires, which tracks were in the sand, and we identified them as our tracks. As we got by the Dodge car, some one said we had hit a man, or something like that. I felt no impact whatever. And we were probably three or four car lengths beyond the Dodge car then."

The defendant further testified that he first saw the Dodge car standing when he was about 150 yards from it; that he saw the plaintiff come around and squat down by the rear wheel when he was distant between 100 to 200 feet; that the plaintiff had been sitting in a crouching position a few seconds before the Marmon car reached the portion of the highway opposite the standing Dodge car. It further appears that the defendant did not continue to watch the position of the plaintiff after first observing the same, and the explanation thereof is given as follows:

"Q. Will you explain to the court why, if you didn't see what happened until just a little bit before the accident happened, why it was you took your eyes off of him, and didn't even see your car hit him when you went by him? A. Why that is the natural thing to do Mr. Graybiel, if you are going by a little boy, or a man, or anything else, after you have got by, you naturally look ahead of you. If you are a careful driver, you don't keep looking at him."

"Q. Yes, I agree with you; but I ask you why you took your eyes off him before you got by? A. That's what I say, for I had seen the man right up to the time when we had got right there, and naturally supposed we were going by, and there was no reason for me to keep my eyes on him; would naturally look ahead of me more. I knew as I approached that he was bound to be very close to the edge of his car, as I passed by; and the way he was standing there, why, as I recollect it, it seemed to me there was a good space of light between me and him when he was squatted down; otherwise, I would not have attempted by any manner of means to go by him."

The testimony of the witness Fletcher is to the effect that the defendant on the day of the injury made the following statement:

"I asked Mr. Auger—I saw Mr. Auger and I says, 'How did it happen?' 'Well,' he said, 'he had his car (plaintiff's car) parked alongside the road changing a tire.' 'Well,' I says, 'you must have hit him awful hard,' I says, 'to hit him—bruise him up like that.' 'Well,' he says, 'I was going pretty fast,' he says, 'I was going 30 miles an hour.' 'Well,' I says, 'why didn't you slow down when you seen him?' 'Well,' he said, 'I figured I had all kinds of room, and I never even thought about hitting him.' He says, 'I never slowed down.'"

The testimony of other witnesses as to the speed of the defendant's car varied all the way from 20 to 35 miles per hour. The testimony of Mr. Hasse, a witness for the defendant, was as follows:

"Q. In your opinion, how fast were you traveling at the time you passed the Dodge? A. I don't know. I suppose between 20 and 30. It was a narrow highway there. Between 20 and 30 I should judge."

"Q. Between 20 and 30? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Then your statement that he was going at between 20 and 30 miles an hour is simply made as you think of it at this time? A. As I think of sitting in the car. I don't think it was moving any faster."

"Q. Than 30 miles? A. Yes."

The testimony of the plaintiff was to the effect that the defendant was driving from 30 to 35 miles per hour, from all of which the court was justified in concluding that the defendant's car was traveling at a rate of speed not far from 30 miles per hour; that the defendant saw the plaintiff's car standing on the highway when he was distant therefrom about 150 yards; that the defendant saw the plaintiff pass around the rear of the Dodge car and assume a squatting position at a distance of some 15 car lengths, which would equal approximately 140 or 150 feet; that, even though the defendant slowed his car down to some appreciable degree, he made no effort to stop the same. It further appears from the testimony that the 15 or 18 inch shoulder on the easterly side of the improved highway was dry and hard, and that its height above the theretofore improved portion varied according to the witnesses' statements from 1½ to 3 inches. The testimony as to its possible use appears in the transcript as follows: Question of the plaintiff:

"Any obstruction between your car and the outer edge of the pavement? A. On the right-hand side?

"The Court: On the right-hand side—the east side. A. Oh, no; nothing at all; no, nothing at all.

"The Court: There was no construction work there going on which could prevent the free passage of others, any place? A. Nothing at all. * * *

"The Court: Along there where the accident occurred could a man driving a car say in a northerly direction have crossed upon that shoulder and gone even beyond the shoulder? Was there anything to prevent that? A. No, he could have gone two or three feet further.

"The Court: So as to avoid any obstruction on the highway? A. Yes."

The defendant's testimony upon the same point is as follows:

"Q. Do you mean to tell the court, in this case, that you could not drive your big Marmon car up onto that shoulder? Is that right? A. I do; not without jeopardizing the car, and taking the chance of twisting my wheels and turning my car over.

"Q. Going at a rate, as you have said, of 20 miles an hour? A. Yes.

"Q. That you could not drive your big, heavy car, weighing 3,900 pounds, up onto that shoulder without jeopardizing your car and the people in it? A. Yes, sir; weight has nothing to do with it.

"Q. Weight has not anything to do with it? A. No.

"Q. In the striking of something with the wheel, as the shoulder? A. No.

"Q. That is your testimony as an expert driver of a car, is it? A. Yes, absolutely; the collar is stronger than three tons of weight—or ten tons.

"Q. Then will you say that a Ford, if that shoulder were two inches high, would go up onto it just as easily going 20 miles an hour as the Marmon car at the same speed? A. Oh, I believe so; yes, sir.

"Q. In your estimation? A. Judgment; yes, sir.

"The Court: And with as little jar? A. Yes; about the same.

"The Court: The jar would be the same? A. Yes; there is very little difference in that, whether the car was light or heavy. There is danger pulling the wheels over to the right and twisting it—throw the steering gear out."

Upon this point the plaintiff testified as follows:

"Q. There was no difficulty in getting out of the main portion of the road and up on top of the shoulder? A. I customarily go up on that to pass another car. Have done so.

"The Court: There is no difficulty in doing so? A. No."

The defendant's further explanation of the cause of the injury was that the plaintiff must have moved back, or toward the center of the road, just preceding the impact. This movement the plaintiff, however, denies. The defendant also testified that he examined the position of the tracks of his car after the impact. A witness for the plaintiff testified that no such examination was made. Upon this statement of the facts, as the defendant was not driving over 35 miles per hour, it is contended that he was not driving at an illegal rate of speed, and hence not guilty of any negligence. Section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1917, p. 404, § 16), as it then read, is as follows:

"Any person operating or driving a motor or other vehicle on the public highways shall operate or drive the same in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, and no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle or other vehicle on a public highway at such rate of speed as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property. * * *"

This provision of the section is just as much a portion of the law as that which allows a speed of 35 miles per hour under certain specified conditions. From what has been said, it is apparent that the trial court was justified in concluding that the defendant was driving at a reckless rate of speed at the time of the commission of the injury complained of; that there was no testimony showing that the plaintiff had changed his position from the time the defendant saw him crouching down near the left rear wheel of the Dodge car until some portion of the Marmon car came in contact with the plaintiff's body; that there was nothing to prevent the defendant from having driven the right-hand portion of his car on the right-hand side of the road, onto and along the 15 or 18 inch shoulder then extending along the easterly side of said highway, and thus obtained a free, open, and safe passageway, admitting of no harm to the plaintiff; that the defendant observed and had knowledge of the position of the plaintiff, and that he took the chance of driving his car at a rapid rate of speed past the person of the plaintiff, and in so doing did not keep on the easterly or what was then to the defendant the right-hand half of the improved highway; that the defendant had ample time, after observing the standing car, to not only lessen the speed of his own car, but to bring the momentum of the same down to such a degree that he could have passed the plaintiff safely and without doing him any injury; and we also think that the circumstances as hereinbefore detailed show that the section of the law which we have quoted required the defendant to slow his car down to such a rate of speed as to give him absolute control thereof and so prevent the injury. We also think that the section of the law just quoted justified the trial court, in view of the circumstances which we have detailed, in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiff's injury was due to the carelessness and negligence of the defendant in maintaining a high rate of speed while passing the person of the plaintiff. It may be here stated that the testimony shows that, after the injury of the plaintiff, the changing of the tire referred to on the Dodge car was completed without any one suffering any injury therefrom by passing automobiles; but what care was used thereafter in making the change of the tire or by passing motorists does not appear. And while, from the high rate of speed maintained by many motorists on the highway, it may be common knowledge that the use or occupancy thereof by any one, even though in broad daylight, as was the case in this instance, is more or less hazardous, yet from the circumstances detailed we think the trial court was justified in concluding that the plaintiff had taken all precautions, and was taking all the precautions, that could have been reasonably required of him under the circumstances, and that, if the defendant had done likewise, there would have been no injurious results.

No complaint is made as to the amount of damages awarded the plaintiff. It follows, from what has been said, that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

DUNLOP v. FARMER et al. (Civ. 2638.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 11, 1923. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 6, 1924.)

1. Attachment §349—Complaint against sureties on attachment bond held defective for failure to allege demand on principal and that damages were unpaid.

The complaint in an action against the principal and sureties on an attachment bond was defective as against the sureties for failure to allege a demand made on the principal, or that the alleged damages were unpaid; the foundation of the suit against the sureties being the breach of the principal's obligation in the attachment suit to pay such damages.

2. Appeal and error §1170(3)—Overruling demurrer to complaint not alleging essential fact held not miscarriage of justice.

Where an amended complaint in an action on an attachment bond alleged no part of the damages claimed had been paid, but did not allege a demand for payment, but the evidence showed payment was demanded before action was commenced and defendant answered denying the alleged damages and at the trial endeavored to show plaintiff had suffered no damages, error in overruling demurrer held not miscarriage of justice.

3. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Finding based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

Trial court's finding based on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

4. Attachment §375(3)—Measure of damages for wrongful detention of property under attachment is value of use during detention period.

The measure of damages for wrongful deprivation of the use of property, such as an automobile, is the reasonable value of the use of it during the period of detention.

5. Appeal and error §1052(8)—If evidence was erroneously admitted on the question of reasonable value of use of article during wrongful detention, no reversible error resulted.

In an action against principal and sureties on an attachment bond for damages for wrongful deprivation of the use of plaintiff's automobile, if in proving the reasonable value of the wrongful deprivation the trial court improperly admitted testimony of plaintiff to show his necessity for the car in his business, the amount he actually paid out for the hire of automobiles to use in place of the one under attachment, which proof showed he was compelled to pay out a total of $350 to $400 for the hire of other automobiles, admission of such testimony held not a miscarriage of justice where the award for wrongful deprivation was for less than 30 cents a day.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by William Dunlop against George A. H. Farmer and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. Braswell, of Lindsay, for appellants. Max B. Jamison, of Porterville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant Farmer, in an action brought by him against plaintiff, caused an attachment to be levied on an automobile belonging to the latter. At the time of the issuance of the attachment, Farmer, as principal, and defendants Reed and Davis, as sureties, entered into an undertaking in the sum of $500 to the effect that—

"If said defendant recovers judgment said plaintiff will pay all costs that may be awarded to the defendant, and all damage which he may have sustained by reason of said attachment, not exceeding the sum of five hundred ($500.00) dollars."

Dunlop was given judgment in that action and the automobile was restored to him. Thereafter this action was commenced to recover damages in the sum of $500, the plaintiff alleging that he had been damaged in the sum of $1,814 by reason of the wrongful attachment but praying for recovery of $500 only. Plaintiff was given judgment for $500 and costs of suit. From this judgment defendants appeal.

[1] The original complaint did not allege that a demand had been made on Farmer for payment of the alleged damages or that the same had not been paid. The defendants filed general demurrers to the complaint and the same were overruled. The undertaking on the part of the sureties was that the plaintiff in the attachment suit would pay the damages sustained by reason of the attachment and the complaint, as against the sureties, was defective for failure to allege a demand made on Farmer or that the alleged damages were unpaid. The foundation of the suit against the sureties was the breach of the obligation of the plaintiff in the attachment suit to pay such damages and the breach should have been alleged. 3 Cal. Jur. 555; Atlas Development Co. v. National Surety Co. (Cal. Sup.) 212 Pac. 196; Swain v. Los Angeles Morris Plan Co. (Cal. App.) 213 Pac. 703.

[2] By amended complaint, filed by permission of the court after the close of plaintiff's case, the plaintiff alleged that no part of the damages claimed had been paid, but did not allege a demand for payment. The evidence shows that payment was demanded before the action was commenced. An examination of the transcript on appeal in the case of Atlas Development Co. v. National Surety Co., supra, shows that the plaintiff therein did not allege a demand for payment or that the damages claimed had not been paid. A general demurrer was interposed and overruled. There, as here, the defendant answered, denying the alleged damages, and at the trial endeavored to show that the plaintiff had suffered no damage by reason of the attachment. The court said:

"The defendant was not deceived or misled by the imperfection of the pleading, and under the oft-cited sections of the Code and Constitution, no miscarriage of justice having resulted, the error should be disregarded."

[3] Appellant contends that the evidence shows that the plaintiff was not the owner of the automobile attached. Plaintiff testified that he purchased it for $420 on the monthly payment plan, making an initial payment of $215, and that he borrowed $75 from his mother with which to make the final payment and gave her a bill of sale of the automobile as security for the money borrowed, but that he did not deliver the machine to her and that she never had possession of it or any interest in it. After the levy of the attachment, the mother made a demand upon the sheriff for the possession of the automobile under a claim of ownership. One witness testified that, at the time the attachment was levied, the plaintiff stated that the automobile belonged to his mother. Under the foregoing conflicting evidence the finding of the trial court that plaintiff was the owner of the automobile cannot be disturbed on appeal.

[4, 5] The only other ground for reversal urged by appellant is that there was no competent evidence to show the reasonable value of the use of the automobile during the time it was held under attachment. The complaint alleges that such value was $2.50 a day. The automobile was held by the sheriff for 23 months. The court found that the plaintiff suffered damage in the sum of $250 by being deprived of the use of the automobile during the time it was held under attachment. In addition, the court found that that plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $306 for money actually and necessarily paid out by reason of the attachment. There is no contention that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover such additional sum. Deducting the $306 from the $500 for which judgment was given, it appears that plaintiff was given judgment for the value of the use of the automobile in the sum of only $194, or at the rate of less than $8.50 a month. At the trial there appeared to be some confusion as to the measure of damages for deprivation of the use of the machine. It has often been held that the proper measure of damages in such cases is the reasonable value of the use of the property during the period of detention. Atlas Development Co. v. National Surety Co., supra; Nahbas v. Browning, 181 Cal. 55, 183 Pac. 442, 6 A. L. R. 476; Taylor v. Bernheim, 58 Cal. App. 404, 209 Pac. 55; Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 206 Pac. 674; Los Angeles Furniture Co. v. Hansen, 46 Cal. App. 5, 188 Pac. 292; Ghio v. Cline, 45 Cal. App. 262, 187 Pac. 433; Tucker v. Hagerty, 37 Cal. App. 789, 174 Pac. 908. Apparently with this rule in mind counsel for plaintiff propounded the following question to the plaintiff while on the witness stand:

"What would you consider was a reasonable value for the use of that machine for the 23 months that it was held under attachment by the sheriff in that particular action?"

Counsel for defendants objected to the question. After a long colloquy between the court and counsel for the respective parties, but without any definite ruling on the objection, counsel for plaintiff, at the suggestion of the court, proceeded to prove plaintiff's necessity for the use of an automobile in his business and the amount he actually paid out for the hire of automobiles to use in place of the one under attachment. This proof shows that plaintiff was compelled to pay out a total of $350 to $400 for the hire of such automobiles. Evidence of a like character has been held sufficient to support a judgment for the reasonable value of the use of an automobile during its detention under attachment. Taylor v. Bernheim, supra. In view of the small amount awarded for the deprivation of the use of the machine, being less than 30 cents a day, it cannot be said that there has been a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Negligence ☞136(9) — Contributory negligence question of fact.

Contributory negligence is ordinarily a question of fact, and becomes one of law only when the facts are undisputed and such that reasonable minds can draw but one conclusion.

2. Street railroads ☞117(26) — Contributory negligence of truck driver in driving on car track held for jury.

Contributory negligence of truck driver in driving on car tracks, where he was struck without warning and killed by a disabled and runaway car traveling in the same direction as deceased at a rate of more than 60 miles per hour, held not established as a matter of law.

3. Street railroads ☞117(29) — Contributory negligence of truck driver, failing to look, held for jury.

A truck driver, killed while driving on car tracks by a disabled and runaway car traveling at the rate of over 60 miles per hour, which struck him from the rear, held not negligent per se, or as a matter of law, for failure to keep a constant watch behind for approaching cars.

4. Street railroads ☞85(1) — Railroad has no exclusive right of way.

An electric railway company has no exclusive right to that portion of the road occupied by its tracks.

5. Death ☞99(4) — $20,000 held not excessive.

$20,000 for the death of a 31 year old truck driver, with an expectancy of 34 years more, who had been contributing $125 to $150 a month to the support of a wife and two minor children, and who was a partner in a profitable truck-gardening business, held not excessive.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Clorinda Noce and others against the United Railroads of San Francisco.

Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Wm. M. Cannon, all of San Francisco, and Ross & Ross, of San Mateo (Enid Childs, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Walter E. Drobisch, Louis Ferrari, and Black & Black, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

NEEDHAM, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs are the widow and minor children of one David Noce, and they recovered damages in the sum of $20,000, awarded them by the verdict of the jury in an action wherein they allege that the death of David Noce was caused by the negligence of the defendant. This is the second trial of this case, a former judgment in favor of the plaintiffs having been reversed by this court upon appeal upon the ground that the trial court gave improper instructions to the jury. The former case upon appeal is reported in 53 Cal. App. 512, 200 Pac. 819.

There is some discussion in the briefs in the instant case by both the appellant and the respondents as to whether the doctrine, to wit, "the law of the case," is applicable to the case now under consideration. Both sides, however, have briefed the case upon the supposition that this doctrine is not applicable, the respondents stating in their brief:

"Without conceding this proposition, we respectfully desire to be understood that we are perfectly willing that the cause now pending before the court be determined upon the record in the instant case."

This being the situation, we will consider the present case and determine it as though the doctrine known as "the law of the case" does not apply. From the record in the case, the facts developed are substantially as follows:

On July 22, 1919, an electric car of the defendant left Daly City at 1:50 p. m., and proceeded in a southerly direction, and had gone but a short distance, when it collided with a motor truck, the property of one Witt. The car of defendant was running down a grade at the time of this collision; it crashed into the rear of the Witt motor truck, throwing it into an adjoining field; the front end of the electric car was smashed and dilapidated, and the motorman thrown to the floor, unconscious; the air brake and equipment and front control were destroyed. In this condition, the car proceeded on its course, downgrade, at a rapid and dangerous rate of speed. The car, while so proceeding and entirely out of control, ran into a truck operated by David Noce who as a result was killed. The truck of Noce, when struck, was on the car track proceeding in a southerly direction ahead of the car. The electric car being out of control, the motorman unconscious, of course, no gong or bell sounded as the car approached Noce's truck. It is conceded that the electric car at this time was running at the rate of at least 60 miles an hour.

The appellant urges three grounds for a reversal of the judgment: (1) Contributory negligence on the part of David Noce was established as a matter of law; (2) appellant was deprived of a fair trial, and was seriously prejudiced by the erroneous instructions to the jury; (3) the amount of damages awarded by the jury is excessive and wholly unsupported by the evidence. If the first collision was the result of the negligence of the motorman operating the defendant's electric car, or of the concurrent negligence of the motorman and the driver of the Witt truck, then it follows that in either event the defendant would be liable for the death of Noce, provided Noce himself was not guilty of negligence which proximately caused the second collision.

[1] The appellant urges with much detail that the evidence shows that Noce was guilty of contributory negligence, and that this was established as a matter of law. The question as to whether a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law has been before the appellate courts of this state very frequently, and this doctrine is well defined and stated in numerous cases. In the case of Loftus v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 464, 137 Pac. 34, this doctrine is concisely and clearly stated on page 467 (137 Pac. 35), as follows:

"Ordinarily, of course, the question whether a plaintiff has been guilty of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury. It becomes a question of law for the decision of the court only where the facts are undisputed, and, even then, only where, on those facts, reasonable minds can draw but one conclusion on the issue of plaintiff's negligence" (citing cases).

Again, in the case of Seller v. Market Street Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, on page 271, 72 Pac. 1006, the doctrine is put in the following language:

"It has often been said by this court that it is very rare that a set of circumstances is presented which enables a court to say, as a matter of law, that negligence has been shown. As a general rule, it is a question of fact for the jury, an inference to be deduced from the circumstances of each particular case, and it is only where the deduction to be drawn is inevitably that of negligence that the court is authorized to withdraw the question from the jury. This is true even where there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn therefrom. If the conceded facts are such that reasonable minds might differ upon the question as to whether or not one was negligent, the question is one of fact for the jury. These rules are so well settled as to render it unnecessary to here do more than state them" (citing cases).

Many other cases can be cited where the doctrine is stated, but the quotations from the two decisions just referred to are sufficient, and they very clearly and adequately express the doctrine.

[2] The appellant argues with much plausibility and with some detail that the evidence given upon the trial conclusively shows that Noce turned suddenly and directly in front of the electric car. We do not think the evidence necessarily warrants this conclusion. The Noce truck was traveling in the same direction that the defendant's car was proceeding. At just what point Noce drove his truck upon the car tracks is, we think, a matter of dispute. It is true that he swerved to the left to avoid two other trucks, standing upon the street and to his right. Various witnesses testified both for the plaintiff and the defendant in regard to this point. Furthermore, a map or plat showing the situation where the accident occurred and the immediate adjoining area was introduced in evidence and considered. Whether Noce did in fact drive suddenly upon the car track or whether he had been for some time upon the car track was for the jury to say. Under these circumstances we cannot see how it can be claimed that Noce was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. It seems clear that the question was properly one for the consideration of the jury.

[3] The counsel for appellant also argues that Noce was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in failing to keep a constant watch behind for approaching cars and in failing to look back for approaching cars at the time he turned upon the street car track, and asserts that the doctrine in the case of O'Connor v. United Railroads, 168 Cal. 43, 141 Pac. 809, is not applicable to the instant case and contends that the decision in that case deals with a situation in a large city where the traffic is congested, whereas the instant case concerns an accident which occurred on the state highway in San Mateo county in a region sparsely settled and rural. Whether the case of O'Connor v. United Railroads, supra, is applicable or not, it seems to us to be comparatively unimportant. There is no evidence brought to our attention, and we have discovered none from a careful reading of the record, that the accident in the case now under consideration occurred in a region sparsely settled. In any event, we think it must be held that the defendant had no exclusive right to that portion of the road occupied by its tracks.

accident occurred; at least, that is fairly deducible from the evidence. It cannot be claimed that one driving on or near the tracks of a street-car company on a public highway is guilty of negligence and ordinary care per se in failing to keep a constant watch rearward for approaching cars. Furthermore the evidence shows that the electric car of defendant was proceeding at a tremendous rate of speed, admitted to be sixty miles an hour, whereas the truck which the deceased was driving was not proceeding at a high rate of speed; therefore the electric car was overtaking the truck of the decedent in a space of time out of all proportion to that which would ordinarily be occupied by an electric car proceeding at the usual rate of speed. Furthermore, as stated, the electric car was running wild and no bell was sounded. It seems clear, therefore, that Noce was not guilty of contributory negligence per se.

The next point made by appellant is that the jury was erroneously instructed and that deprived appellant of a fair trial to its serious prejudice. We have read the instructions of the learned trial judge most carefully, and it seems to us that the instructions given are free from prejudicial error. The instructions, if anything, were more favorable to the defendant than to the plaintiffs. This case on the former trial was reversed because of two errors in the instructions. See Noce v. United Railroads, 53 Cal. App. 516, 200 Pac. 819. The learned trial court upon this, the second trial of the case, was careful to avoid the former errors. The argument of counsel for the appellant upon this branch of the appeal, in an endeavor to show that there were errors in certain instructions, seems to us to be highly critical and without substantial merit. We have carefully examined each and all of the criticisms of the instructions given, and we cannot see that they merit detailed consideration. It is sufficient to declare that in our opinion the jury was fairly and fully instructed, and we find no errors in the instructions given to the prejudice of the appellant.

[5] The last point urged for a reversal is that the amount of damages awarded by the jury is excessive and wholly unsupported by the evidence. The amount of damages awarded was the sum of $20,000. The deceased, David Noce, was at the time of his death between 30 and 31 years of age, and he left a wife and two minor children. According to the evidence introduced he had an expectancy of living about 34 years more. He had always earned a good living for his family, and had contributed from $125 to $150 per month for their support. In 1918 he became a partner in the firm of Cuneo & Co., truck gardeners, paying for a half interest in the firm the sum of $1,600. The net profits of the business during the 7 months that he was with the firm aggregated more than $3,900.

Under the authorities in this state this was not an excessive verdict, and does not suggestion passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. See Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel Gold Mining Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 Pac. 714; Diller v. Northern California Power Co., 162 Cal. 531, 123 Pac. 359, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 908; Peters v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 48, 116 Pac. 400. For the foregoing reasons it seems clear that the evidence amply supports the verdict of the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action brought to recover $5,250, the alleged reasonable value of plaintiff's services in negotiating a sale of real property owned by the defendant.

It was alleged and found by the trial court that prior to June 1, 1920, the plaintiff was a duly licensed real estate broker, engaged in business as such in the county of Fresno, state of California; that in January, 1920, defendant orally appointed plaintiff his agent to obtain for him a purchaser of certain real property situated in said county and state, orally promising plaintiff that if plaintiff should obtain a purchaser therefor at a price and upon terms acceptable to defendant, defendant would pay plaintiff the reasonable value of such services; that thereupon, and pursuant to said understanding, plaintiff obtained such purchaser, to whom defendant sold said real property for the sum of $105,000, which amount was acceptable to defendant; that thereafter defendant orally agreed to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of his services, and subsequent to said sale, and on June 26, 1920, defendants executed and delivered to plaintiff a written memorandum in words and figures as follows:

"San Francisco, June 26, 1920.

"Mr. Crawford, Fresno—Dear Sir: I received a letter from my daughter this morning in which she stated that you would like to have a writing from me. All I can say is that you may keep this letter to show that I am indebted to you. I cannot state the amount as that is to be settled between us, but you know me well enough to know that it will be settled satisfactorily. I expect to leave here in a day or so as I am tired of hearing anything regarding business. Every one seems to think we made a fine sale and all I can say is that I am glad I am out of it.

"Yours truly,

"[Signed] W. C. Kennedy."

The judgment for the defendant was reached upon the assumption that the above-quoted letter did not constitute an enforceable contract against the defendant. Appellant takes the position that he is not relying upon this letter as a contract of employment, but that he is entitled to recover upon it as a promise by the defendant, supported by the consideration of the past services of plaintiff in producing the purchaser for the land. The cases of Muir v. Kane, 55 Wash. 131, 104 Pac. 153, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 519, 19 Ann. Cas. 1180; Mohr v. Rickgauer, 82 Neb. 398, 117 N. W. 950, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 533; Bagaef v. Prokopik, 212 Mich. 265, 180 N. W. 427, 17 A. L. R. 1292; Carrington v. Smithers, 26 Cal. App. 460, 147 Pac. 225, and those cited in the note to Rask v. Norman, 17 A. L. R. 1353, are relied upon by appellant. They announce the rule that where services have been rendered with the intention that they shall be paid for, but, because there exists no written contract between the parties, payment for such services cannot be enforced, but the party receiving the benefit of the services, after their rendition, promises, in writing, to pay therefor, his moral obligation to pay for what he has received previously furnishes a consideration to support the subsequent promise to pay. Conceding to the appellant that the above rule is established in many jurisdictions, including California (Carrington v. Smithers, 26 Cal. App. 460, 147 Pac. 225) does not settle the question involved here. It merely advances the question to a point where we have a consideration sufficient to support any contract which the defendant may have made, and we must examine the alleged contract to see if it is sufficiently definite to be enforceable. We think it is obvious that the letter above quoted does not amount to an enforceable agreement. It does not promise to pay the reasonable value of services. It does not mention any services nor the nature of any indebtedness. It does not state the amount of the indebtedness nor any method by which it could be computed. To say that the amount "will be settled satisfactorily" does not furnish a basis for judicial computation.

The oral contract between plaintiff and defendant was unenforceable, because it did not meet the requirements of section 1973, Code of Civil Procedure, and section 1624, Civil Code, subd. 6. The subsequent letter, based upon the consideration of the services rendered under the unenforceable agreement, does not amount to a contract enforceable by the courts, because its terms are too indefinite.

The judgment is affirmed.

ZETTLE et al. v. GILLMEISTER.
(Civ. 4635.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 8, 1923.)

1. Ejectment — 73—Set-off and counterclaim — 34(2)—Counterclaim in ejectment based on fraudulent representations in effecting sale held improper.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 438, 442, defendant, in an action of ejectment, cannot either by counterclaim or cross-complaint set up as grounds for affirmative relief a cause of action sounding in tort, consisting of prior fraudulent representations by plaintiff regarding the productivity of the land and water supply thereon made at the time of effecting a sale to defendant.

2. Ejectment — 3—Is possessory action not involving land itself or title thereto.

Ejectment is a possessory action not involving the land itself or title thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action in ejectment by F. W. Zettle and Constance C. Zettle against Martha C. Gillmeister, wherein defendant by cross-complaint sought to recover damages for misrepresentations by plaintiffs. From a judgment for defendant in the action of ejectment, but which denied her relief on her cross-complaint, she appeals. Affirmed.

Rea & Caldwell and V. A. Chargin, all of San Jose, for appellant.

Fry & Jenkins, of San Jose, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. The plaintiffs commenced an action in ejectment against the defendant alleging that she had breached her contract with them by which she was to purchase certain real property in Santa Clara county, Cal., and that she had forfeited her right to its possession. She denied the breach of the contract, and pleaded that she had tendered to the plaintiffs the amount due thereunder. The difficulty had arisen, it seems, because of different interpretations placed upon the contract by the parties. Defendant also alleged by way of cross-complaint that the contract under which she had purchased the land was induced by fraudulent representations on the part of the plaintiffs regarding the productivity of the land and the water supply thereon, and that by relying upon such representations she had been damaged in the sum of $36,000, for which amount she asked judgment. The jury brought in a verdict for the defendant in the action in ejectment. The court refused to hear evidence upon the cross-complaint, and no issue thereon was submitted to the jury. Defendant appeals from the judgment because it fails to grant her any relief upon her cross-complaint.

[1] Whether defendant's pleading be regarded as a counterclaim or a cross-complaint is immaterial. Its justification in the present action will depend upon whether or not it arises out of the same transaction as set forth in the complaint or is connected with the subject of the action set forth in the complaint, or relates to or depends upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought or affects the property to which the action relates. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 438 and 442.

[2] Plaintiffs' action in ejectment was merely a possessory action; it did not involve the land itself or the title thereto. Porter v. Garrissino, 51 Cal. 559; Payne v. Treadwell, 5 Cal. 310; 19 C. J. 1031. The cross-complaint was an action for damages for a tort, asking for a money judgment. It did not relate to the possession of the land, nor affect the property to which the complaint relates. The right of action for the fraud did not arise under the contract between the parties, but was collateral to that contract. In the case of Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 511, 143 Pac. 729, 731, it was said:

"It is a principle of universal application that the right of action for damages for a fraud arises at once immediately upon the consummation of the fraud and of course upon its discovery. The consummation of a fraud may arise in a contract executed or executory. But in either case the right of action immediately exists. This is so, because even in the case of an executory contract the action for fraud is not upon the contract, but is collateral to the contract and is on the case. [Citing cases.]"

Plaintiffs' action in ejectment is not upon the contract; it arises out of alleged unlawful possession by the defendant, and sounds in tort. In the case of Empire Investment Co. v. Mort, 169 Cal. 732, 738, 147 Pac. 960, 962, it was said:

"The alleged tort of defendants and the tort of plaintiff averred by way of counterclaim did not arise out of the same transaction. In any event, such a counterclaim may not be set up in an action of ejectment. Wigmore v. Buell, 116 Cal. 95, 47 Pac. 927. The counterclaim does not tend to defeat plaintiff's recovery. Plaintiff asked for possession of certain land. Defendants' demand was for a money judgment by way of damages. Plainly the two causes of action founded on tort were distinct and did not arise out of the same transaction. It was therefore error to allow the amendment introducing the so-called counterclaim. [Citing cases.]

The contract for the purchase of the land set out in the complaint contains no statement as to the productivity of the land or as to the water supply or any of the other statements alleged in the cross-complaint to have been fraudulently made by plaintiffs.

In the case of Los Molinos Land Co. v. MacKay, 175 Cal. 305, 165 Pac. 926, a vendor sued a vendee of land in ejectment, alleging that the vendee had failed to make his payments under the contract of purchase, as in the present case. The vendee set up a counterclaim for damages arising out of certain alleged fraudulent representations and prayed for a money judgment. The court said:

"This is an action in ejectment, and an independent tort is not available against such a pleading. There was nothing in the contract by which the vendor guaranteed the quality of the land or its productiveness, and all of the allegations of fraud in the answer and counterclaim relate to misrepresentations and concealments regarding such matters. There was nothing in the fraud which prevented the defendant from carrying out the stipulations contained in the writing and then suing for the damages suffered because of plaintiff's misrepresentations and concealments, if any there were. Or he might have surrendered the land and sued while the contract was still of full vitality, praying for its rescission on account of the vendor's fraud and for damages. Having chosen to permit the vendor to rescind on account of his (the vendee's) own failure to comply with the terms of the contract, he is in no position to set up plaintiff's fraud either as an answer or by way of counterclaim as against the action in ejectment because such purported counterclaim may not be said to arise out of the same transaction. The counterclaim does not tend to defeat plaintiff's recovery which was for the repossession of the land after admitted breach of the contract of sale by the vendee. Defendant's demand was for a money judgment by way of damages, and cannot be said to arise out of the same transaction. See Empire Investment Co. v. Mort, 169 Cal. 738, 147 Pac. 960, and cases there cited."

Appellant attempts to distinguish the case last cited from the instant case by pointing out that in the former the vendee, admittedly, was in default, while in the latter the jury found that the vendee was not in default on her contract, and was not wrongfully in possession of the land. The unqualified principle that a defendant in ejectment may not set up as a counterclaim a tort of the plaintiff not arising out of the same transaction is involved in the two cases, and the language used in Los Molinos Land Co. v. MacKay, supra, is very definitely broad enough to control the present case. The reasons for the rule, as stated in the cases herein cited, are the statutory one that such a counterclaim does not arise out of the same transaction as the cause of action stated in the complaint, and that it does not tend to defeat plaintiff's recovery if he is able to prove the facts alleged in his complaint. These reasons are not affected by the incidental fact that upon trial the issues in the ejectment suit may be found in favor of the defendant.

The case of Roffinella v. Roffinella (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 397, is relied upon by appellants. That was an action to enforce specific performance of a lease of land alleged to have been made orally and partially executed so as to remove the same from the operation of the statute requiring it to be in writing. A cross-complaint in ejectment was filed. The causes of action stated in the complaint and in the cross-complaint were intimately connected as stated in the opinion of the court; both related to possessory rights in the same land. However, in the instant case, as has been pointed out, the cross-complaint sought to set up an action for damages because of the misrepresentations of the plaintiffs—a tort independent of the possessory right to the land which was the subject-matter of the plaintiffs' complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

EVANS v. SELMA UNION HIGH SCHOOL DIST. OF FRESNO COUNTY et al.
(ENOS, Intervener). (S. F. 10033.)(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1924.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 21, 1924.)1. Statutes $\S$ 184—Statutes construed in view of purpose and mischief aimed at.

The provisions of the Code must be construed with their intent and purpose, and the mischief at which they were aimed in view.

2. Schools and school districts $\S$ 165—Exclusion of all religious books not required by act excluding "sectarian" books from school libraries: "sect."

Pol. Code, $\S$ 1607, subd. 3, as added by St. 1917, p. 736, $\S$ 6, and section 1672, requiring exclusion of sectarian, partisan, or denominational publications from schools and school libraries, were intended, as indicated by their histories, to bar books and other publications of factional religion, but not all religious books not approved by all sects of a particular religion or the followers of all religions; the term "sectarian" being used in the sense of activities of the followers of one faith as related to those of adherents of another, rather than in accordance with the strict definition of the word "sect" as a body of persons distinguished by peculiarities of faith and practice from other bodies adhering to the same general system.

3. Constitutional law $\S$ 84 — Schools and school districts $\S$ 165—King James version of Bible held not "sectarian publication."

The King James version of the Bible is not a sectarian book, the purchase of which for a school library would violate Const. art. 1, $\S$ 4, as to religious freedom, article 4, $\S$ 30, or article 9, $\S$ 8, prohibiting appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes, or Pol. Code, $\S$ 1607, subd. 3, as added by St. 1917, p. 736, $\S$ 6, and section 1672, requiring exclusion of sectarian, partisan, or denominational publications from schools and school libraries, because there are differences between it and other versions, or because it is of Protestant authorship, used in Protestant Churches, and not approved by the Roman Catholic Church; the mere act of purchasing it carrying no implication of adoption of the dogma therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by Elbert L. Evans against the Selma Union High School District of Fresno County and others, in which George Enos intervened. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff and intervener appeal. Affirmed.

Drew & Drew and Saylor & Collins, all of Fresno, for appellant Evans.

James Gallagher and H. L. Meyers, both of Fresno, for appellant Enos.

E. S. Page, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff brought this action to enjoin the trustees of the Selma union high school district of Fresno county from carrying into effect a resolution for the purchase of 12 copies of the Bible in the King James version for the library of the high school. George Enos was permitted to intervene, and filed a complaint which alleged substantially the same matters and sought the same relief as that of plaintiff. Both complaints rest on the contention that the King James version of the Bible is a book of a sectarian character, and that its purchase for the library of a public school is therefore contrary to constitutional and statutory provisions in this state.

The trial court held that the Bible in the King James version was not a publication of sectarian, partisan, or denominational character, and accordingly gave judgment for the defendants. This appeal is from that judgment.

The Constitution of this state provides (article, 1, $\S$ 4) that—

"The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be guaranteed in this state."

It prohibits (article 4, $\S$ 30) appropriations, grants, or payments of public moneys in aid of any "religious sect, church, creed, or sectarian purpose," or to support or sustain any school or other institution "controlled by any religious creed, church, or sectarian denomination whatever." In section 8 of article 9 it provides that—

"No public money shall ever be appropriated for the support of any sectarian or denominational school, or any school not under the exclusive control of the officers of the public schools; nor shall any sectarian or denominational doctrine be taught, or instruction thereon be permitted, directly or indirectly, in any of the common schools of this state."

Political Code, $\S$ 1607 (subdivision 3), as added by St. 1917, p. 736, $\S$ 6, makes it the duty of boards of education and school trustees—

"to exclude from school and school libraries all books, publications, or papers of a sectarian, partisan, or denominational character."

Section 1672 of the same Code provides that—

"No publication of a sectarian, partisan, or denominational character must be used or distributed in any school, or be made a part of any school library; nor must any sectarian or denominational doctrine be taught therein."

The question before us is different from those dealt with in the reported cases which consider the question of Bible instruction in the public schools. We have examined with care all decisions cited by counsel and all that our independent research has discovered, and not one of them deals with the precise question now under consideration, namely, the placing of the Bible in a public school library. These decisions all deal with questions growing out of the use of the Bible in devotional exercises or for religious instruction or as a text-book in the public schools; for that reason we do not discuss these decisions in detail in arriving at our conclusion, although some of these decisions consider and decide whether or not the Bible is sectarian. In our opinion, for the reasons hereafter stated, it is clear that for reference and library purposes in the public schools, it is not a book of the class prohibited by our statute.

[1, 2] It will be seen from the provisions of our statutes above quoted that they do not in terms exclude from these schools "religious" books as such. Indeed, there is nothing in our statutes aimed at religious works. To be legally objectionable they must be "sectarian, partisan, or denominational in character." It is under our Code provisions that this question immediately arises, and their terms must be construed with their intent and purpose in view and the mischief at which they were aimed. The terms used are "sectarian" and "denominational." "Sect," strictly defined, means "a body of persons distinguished by peculiarities of faith and practice from other bodies adhering to the same general system" (Standard Dict.), and "denominational" is given much the same definition. But the term "sect" has frequently a broader signification, the activities of the followers of one faith being regarded as sectarian as related to those of the adherents of another. Since the object of these Code provisions was to exclude controversial matters of any kind from the school libraries, in so far as that object could be attained by the exclusion of printed matter of partisan tendency, we have no doubt that the term "sectarian" was used in its broad signification. The purpose was to bar from school libraries books and other publications of factional religion—those whose character is "sectarian, partisan, or denominational." As a book on almost any subject may adopt a partisan tone, so a book on religion, instead of confining itself to broad principles and simple fundamentals, may emphasize particular points—those upon which differences of opinion have arisen. In a word, a book on any subject may be strongly partisan in tone and treatment. A religious book treating its subject in this manner would be sectarian. But not all books of religion would be thus excluded. The fact that it was not approved by all sects of a particular religion, nor by the followers of all religions, would not class it as sectarian for library purposes. There is no religion that has found universal acceptance, and therefore no book of religion that has.

The correctness of this view of the meaning of these Code sections is indicated by their origin. Since 1851 the statutes of this state have excluded books of a sectarian character from public school libraries. Stats. 1851, pp. 491, 495, art. 3, § 5; Stats. 1852, pp. 117, 125, art. 6, § 3; Stats. 1855, p. 229, 237, § 33; Stats. 1863, pp. 194, 210, § 67; Stats. 1869-70, pp. 824, 835, 839, 842, §§ 42, 58, 71. Political Code, § 1607 (3), was derived from section 42 (subd. 11) of the Act of 1870, the language of which shows the class of publications in the mind of the Legislature. It required the school authorities to exclude from schools and their libraries "books, tracts, papers or catechisms of a sectarian character." As originally adopted into the Code (Pol. Code, § 1617, subd. 12, enacted March 12, 1872) this language was shortened to "books, publications or papers of a sectarian character." The words "partisan or denominational" were inserted after "sectarian" by Code Amendments 1873-74, p. 81, and its present number (1607) was given the section by an amendment in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 736).

Political Code, § 1672, which has remained the same since its adoption in 1872, was derived from section 58 of the same Act of 1870, which referred to "books, tracts, papers, catechisms or other publications of a sectarian or denominational character." Thus we think the history of these sections indicates the class of "books" and "other publications" at which the statute was aimed.

[3] Turning to the character of the King James version, it appears that the original manuscripts of the Bible have been lost for centuries. Those available for translation are themselves "versions," and either copies or translations or still older texts. There have been numerous English translations, but those most generally in use to-day are the King James version, and its subsequent English and American revisions, and the Douai version.

The Douai version consists of a translation of the New Testament made in the English College at Rheims, published there in 1582, and of the Old Testament published at Douai in 1609.

The King James version is a translation made at the direction of James I of England, and published at London in 1611. The work was done by a commission of forty-seven scholars drawn largely from the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The work of its revision by English and American committees was begun in 1870, and the revised New Testament published in 1881, and the revised Old Testament in 1884.

The Douai version is based upon the text of the Latin Vulgate, the King James version on the Hebrew and Greek texts. There are variances in the rendering of certain phrases and passages. The Douai version incorporates the Apocrypha, which are omitted from the texts of the Testaments in the King James version, though in many editions they have been printed between the two Testaments. The Douai version was the work of Catholics, and is the translation used by the Roman Catholic Church in English-speaking countries. The King James version and its revisions are the work of Protestants, and are used in Protestant churches.

The contention that the Bible in the King James translation is a book of a sectarian character rests on the fact that there are differences between it and, among others, the Douai version; that it is of Protestant authorship; that it is used in Protestant Churches; and that it is not approved by the Catholic Church. According to such a test the Bible in any known version or text is sectarian. In fact, until all sects can agree upon the manuscript texts that should be used, no English version of the Bible not "sectarian" in this view can be produced.

The statute, however, deals with publications of a sectarian character. It makes the character of the book the test of whether it is "sectarian," not the authorship or the extent of its approval by different sects or by all. That the authors of religious books belong to a sect or church does not necessarily make their books of a sectarian character. Nor does the fact that the King James version is commonly used by Protestant Churches and not by Catholics make its character sectarian. Its character is what it is, a widely accepted translation of the Bible. What we have said of the King James translation is equally applicable to the Douai version. Both are scholarly translations of the Bible, and neither is a book "of a sectarian character" within the meaning of the statute relating to school libraries. Both are eligible to a place on the shelves of our public school libraries for reference purposes. Each version has claims. Regarded merely as literature, the King James version is a recognized classic. For centuries it has been the version most generally used in Protestant Churches in England and America. The Douai version has merits of its own. It is the text approved by one of the world's greatest churches. Many children base their religious education upon its text. We do not assume to decide the comparative merits of the two versions. We do, however, hold that either or both may be purchased for and placed in a public school library without violation of the law of this state.

If it were a fact that the King James version of the Bible was sought to be placed in the public school library to the exclusion of all other versions of the Bible, or if it appeared to be a fact that this particular version or any other version of the Bible was to be used as a text-book for a prescribed course of study or to be used in reading therefrom to the pupils as a part of school exercises, it might then be well argued that such circumstances amounted to an implied declaration that this version was the only true version of the Scriptures, and that all others were false in so far as not in accord therewith. So used and under such circumstances it might be justly claimed to be used as a basis for sectarian instruction. Such are not the facts in the case at bar. The mere act of purchasing a book to be added to the school library does not carry with it any implication of the adoption of the theory or dogma contained therein, or any approval of the book itself, except as a work of literature fit to be included in a reference library. For aught that appears in the instant case the library in question may already contain copies of the Douai version of the Bible as well as copies of the Talmud, Koran, and teachings of Confucius. If the Douai version and these other books are not already in the library, we have no right to assume that they will not be added thereto in the future. That such action would be legal and appropriate we have no doubt.

We are not required in this case to decide, nor are we to be understood as deciding, the question of whether or not the use of the Bible for class instruction amounts to the teaching of sectarian or denominational doctrine, nor to consider whether or to what extent its reading may be made a part of the exercises in the schools, without offending the provisions of the state Constitution and statutes.

WILLIAMSON et al. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION et al. (Sac. 3497.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 18, 1924.)

1. Evidence §11, 22—Judicial notice taken of geographical source and primary purposes of water system and of contemporaneous historical events.

The geographical source and primary purposes of a water system, as shown by articles of incorporation, actual uses of the water, and contemporaneous historical events are matters of which the Supreme Court will take judicial cognizance.

2. Eminent domain §10(1)—Reservation of power in articles of incorporation of water company held unnecessary.

The power of condemnation or right to acquire property for the corporate purposes of a water company, constituting a public utility from its inception prior to the present eminent domain law, held inherent in its public organism, and hence not necessary to be expressly reserved in the articles of incorporation.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨232—Finding of dedication of water by corporation authorized.

The organization of a corporation by appropriators of water for the declared purpose of selling it for manufacturing, mining, and other public purposes, in a vast area of gold-bearing and agricultural lands, widely separated communities, and all other places adjacent to the system, establishment of the system and actual furnishing of water for many years to thousands of consumers indiscriminately at rates adjusted to the uses to be made of it, and readiness to comply with such declaration of purposes, held sufficient, in the absence of countervailing facts, to justify a finding that the water was dedicated to a public use and that the corporation is a public utility.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨232—Company's dedication of waters to public use operative until revoked.

Waters dedicated to a public use by a water company retain the impress thereof, unless such dedication has since been revoked.

5. Evidence ⇨11—Judicial notice that water power was much prized in early mining days.

The Supreme Court takes judicial notice that, in the early days of placer and hydraulic mining, water power was much prized, as indispensable to the operation of such a system of mining.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨257(1)—Finding water company was public utility justified.

Evidence held sufficient to justify a finding by the Railroad Commission that a water company was a public utility.

7. Public service commissions ⇨35—Reception of testimony not strictly within rules of evidence not ground for annulment of order, if sustained by evidence in record.

Reception of testimony not strictly within the rules of evidence is not a ground for annulment of an order of the Railroad Commission, if sustained by sufficient legal evidence in the record.

8. Waters and water courses ⇨232—Company's status as public utility held not affected by its use of water.

That most of the water furnished by a water company for all purposes for 7 recent years was consumed or used by the company, which had been in existence over 70 years, did not affect its status as a public utility, nor prove that it was not theretofore impressed with such character.

9. Waters and water courses ⇨232—Company's status as public utility not affected by title to property.

Whether a water company, as a public utility, could transfer its properties to another company without legislative sanction, is immaterial as respects the latter's character as a public utility.

10. Waters and water courses ⇨232—Failure of boards of supervisors to regulate water system mere circumstance in determining status as public utility.

Omission by boards of supervisors of counties, in which a water company maintained its system, to regulate it, as provided by Const. art. 14, § 1, is at best only a circumstance to be considered by the Railroad Commission in determining whether the company was a public utility.

In Bank.

Certiorari by W. H. Williamson and others to review an order of the Railroad Commission of California, fixing water rates to be charged by the Natomas Water Company. Order affirmed.

Elliott & Atkinson, of Sacramento, for petitioners.

Edgar T. Zook, of San Francisco, for respondent Natomas Water Co.

Hugh Gordon and C. I. Wheat, both of San Francisco, for respondent Railroad Commission.

SEAWELL, J. The petitioners are the owners of lands over which one of the branch ditches of respondent Natomas Water Company, known as the valley lateral, and which forms a part of an original system, is constructed, and each of said petitioners is a holder of a water-rate contract entered into by some of the petitioners in the year 1893 and by others in 1894, with the Natomas Vineyard Company, a corporation, predecessor in interest of said respondent.

On January 23, 1922, the state Railroad Commission, upon the application of respondent Natomas Water Company and after hearing duly had, by its order found and determined that respondent was, and its predecessor in interest, to wit, Natomas Water & Mining Company, a corporation, had been from its organization, a public utility, and the waters served by it and its successors were impressed with a public use, as defined by the laws of this state, and thereupon ascertained the value of respondent's property, and established a schedule of rates by which said utility was to be governed in all of its dealings with its consumers and the public in general.

Petitioners, whose contracts stipulate a fixed rate for the use of water, and which fixed rate will be increased by the commission's ruling, if permitted to stand, deny here, as they did at the hearing before the commission, that respondent or its predecessors in interest was, as found by the commission, a public utility, or that the waters in question were impressed with a public use from the beginning, or at all. Their claim, on the contrary, is that the waters in question have always been held in private use, and the commission exceeded its jurisdiction in holding upon the facts adduced that respondent was or is a public utility, and the commission's order is violative of both the state and federal Constitutions, which forbid the impairment of the obligation of contracts, the taking of property without due process of law, and the deprivation of the equal protection of the law to all persons within the state. The matter is before us for review.

No portion of the commission's decision, other than that relating to said contracts, is presented for review, and we are therefore not required to make an examination of the whole transcript, nor of all the exhibits and records.

[1] The original organization, which is now being operated by respondent by the right of succession under another name, is intimately connected with, and is historically inseparable from, the early mining activities of the state. The system has its source in a branch of the American river, and penetrates the heart of the placer mining district of the "New El Dorado." That one of the primary purposes of the promoters of the pioneer enterprise was to bring to the aid of the miners a quick and economical method of extracting precious metals from gold-bearing gravels and earth by bank washings, sluicing, and the drift process is sufficiently established by the purposes of the parent corporation as declared by its articles of incorporation, and as followed by the actual uses made of the water by miners and others, and also by contemporaneous historical events, all of which form a part of the state's history. These are matters of which this court will take judicial cognizance. In addition to the sale of said water for mining purposes, it has also been used for viticultural, orchard, farming, and domestic purposes for a period of about 70 years. The head of the canal system was at a point upon the South fork of the American river near Rocky Bar, about 2 miles above Salmon Falls, in the county of El Dorado, and was extended to numerous early-day mining and farming localities.

The original predecessor in interest, the Natomas Water & Mining Company, was incorporated on July 13, 1853, many years before the adoption of our present Constitution. Uses were made of said water, however, by means of ditches and aqueducts as early as 1851. The Natomas Water & Mining Company became soon after its incorporation the owner of approximately 17,000 acres of land situate near the town of Folsom, county of Sacramento, and from an early period was engaged in mining said lands. The evidence shows that at least as early as 1876 the main canal had a capacity of 3,500 miners' inches of water measured under an 8-inch pressure in accordance with the method of that period.

In 1888 the Natomas Vineyard Company was formed, and the agricultural lands owned by the Natomas Water & Mining Company were transferred to it. Later, by deed dated November 11, 1893, the title to the canals and water rights passed from the Natomas Water & Mining Company to the Natomas Vineyard Company. The incorporators of the vineyard company were the same persons, or the successors of the persons, who incorporated the water and mining company, and who at the time of the transfer owned and controlled the former. It is admitted that the subsequent corporations were subsidiary to the parent corporation. The purposes of the vineyard company, as set out in its articles of incorporation, were to purchase, acquire, hold, sell, and cultivate lands and real estate; to purchase and sell water and water rights; to engage in agriculture; in the cultivation and sale of grapes and fruits, and in the manufacture and sale of wines and liquors; also to engage in the issuance of bonds and other securities, and in any and all other businesses incidental thereto and connected therewith, in the county of Sacramento. One of the reasons stated by the witnesses for the incorporation of the vineyard company was that the water and mining company was soon to lapse (it then had about 14 years of corporate existence), and it was necessary to form a new corporation to take over the activities of the old. Another reason assigned for the formation of the new corporation was that "it did not look well for a water company to make and sell wines." Doubtless the chief reason for the organization of this corporation was to acquire authority by its articles of incorporation to engage in a new enterprise and incidentally to adopt a name expressive of the new industry which was at about that time a growing and important one in this state. The interests of the vineyard company were taken over in 1907 by the Natomas Land & Mining Company. In December, 1908, the latter's interests and holdings were transferred to the Natomas Consolidated of California, a corporation now known as the Natomas Company of California. In March, 1912, the water system, which had been organized about 60 years prior thereto, was transferred, together with all appurtenant and necessary lands, structures, rights of way, and water rights, to the Natomas Water Company, respondent herein, which corporation was formed and controlled by the Natomas Company of California.

This completes a brief résumé of the order in which respondent's predecessors have come into existence. While the said several corporations differ from the parent body in name, there was no substantial difference in the personnel of stockholders, or in privities of interests, or in the purposes and objects to be accomplished. The primary object of all of the projectors of said corporations was one of general industrial development, and as one industry by the law of progression succeeded another in the state's development a new corporation was formed, if the old was found to be inadequate to serve or promote the necessities of a growing section of the state which was undergoing many industrial readjustments and changes. Mining, which was the original and had long been the principal industry of the country, was becoming largely superseded by the planting of vineyards and orchards, and by general farming and other branches of husbandry. A fluctuating situation furnishes the reason for the formation of the several corporations, which were joined together by the cohesive force of mutual interests.

With this brief review of a situation which affected the several transactions, we return to a review of the parent organization and the purposes for which it was created. The articles of incorporation adopted by the first incorporators of the system, to wit, Natomas Water & Mining Company, so far as the question before us is affected thereby, state the purposes and objects to be as follows:

"To construct a canal commencing from a point near Rocky Bar, upon the South fork of the American river, about two miles above Salmon Falls, in the said county of El Dorado, and running from thence down the banks of said river, leading waters by means of canals, flumes, aqueducts, reservoirs, pipes and other necessary conduits to the gold-bearing regions, and to the agricultural grounds and inhabited districts in the vicinity of the McDowell Hill, Red Banks, Mormon Island, Willow Springs, Rhodes Diggings, Prairie Diggings, Alder Creek, Negro Bar, Texas Hill, Mississippi Bar, Pennsylvania Flats, and to all other places lying adjacent to the route of said canal or any of its branches, and to all such other places as the said water may be conveyed to by said canal, or any of its branches or extensions, for the purposes of using and selling said water for manufacturing, mining, mechanical, chemical, agricultural, or domestic purposes. The places of business of said company are to be located at Mormon Island, Willow Springs, and Prairie City, all of which places are situated in the said county of Sacramento, and the principal place of business of said company is to be located at Willow Springs, in the township of Natoma, in said county of Sacramento."

[2] It will be seen from the above quotation that said articles of incorporation include practically every known use to which water could at that early period have been devoted. It is true that the power of eminent domain was not reserved by express language, but such a reservation was not necessary, if the corporation was in fact a utility serving the public, which it unquestionably did in conformity with the powers and privileges conferred upon it by its articles of incorporation. If from its inception it was a public utility, as found by the commission, the power of condemnation or the right to acquire property necessary for its corporate purposes was inherent in its public organism from the first. The articles of incorporation in the instant case are not open to the criticism made in the case of Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 68, 175 Pac. 466, 8 A. L. R. 249. It was there pointed out that the articles of incorporation of the applicant as to its purposes declared that the corporation would acquire its water and water rights "by purchase and appropriation"; both methods being wholly within the purview of private ownership of such rights when acquired. "It is not without significance," the court observed, "that there is omitted therefrom the declaration of the right to acquire by condemnation, which right runs only with a public service, and of similar significance is the fact that when this applicant, in the course of its activities, needed to acquire and did acquire certain rights of way it did not undertake to do so by condemnation, but effectuated its purpose by purchase." The significance given by the court to the omission by the articles of incorporation of the right to acquire certain rights by condemnation, however controlling in view of the facts and circumstances of that case, is greatly weakened, if not entirely destroyed, when considered in the light of the circumstances of the instant case.

In the former case the power to acquire certain rights was expressly limited to the sole method of purchase and appropriation. No such limitation is placed upon respondent corporation here. The articles of incorporation in that case are much narrower in grant of powers in essential respects than are those of the instant case. It is neither significant nor strange that in the instant case no provision was made by the articles of incorporation for the acquirement of property or other rights by the method of condemnation as authorized by our present law of eminent domain. These terms, now common, were unknown to the earlier statutory law period within which respondent was incorporated. The only method of acquiring property for supplying cities or towns with pure fresh water, except by purchase, gift, or conveyance, was by following the statute adopted for the benefit of railroad corporations, which method consisted of presenting a petition to the judge of the district court, who appointed five commissioners of appraisal, who, upon giving such notices as were prescribed by law, became vested with the power of ascertaining in a procedural method the value of the property sought to be acquired and the assessment of whatever damages that may have otherwise accrued. The statute which gave the right to acquire property provided the method of procedure, and it was not necessary or usual to specifically refer to either in the articles of incorporation.

[3] While it is true that purposes avowed in articles of incorporation do not fix the character of the corporation in its future activities as being a public service corporation, as stated in Allen v. Railroad Commission, supra, and that the additional act of dedication is necessary to the creation of a public use, it is also true that when the original appropriators of water from a stream, having declared by broad terms that its purposes are to secure the commodity for a consumption or use which cannot be otherwise than to supply a general public use, organize a corporation which in its articles of incorporation declare its purposes to be that of utilizing the water thus acquired for sale, for manufacturing, mining, mechanical, chemical, agricultural, and for general domestic purposes, to be conducted by means of canals, flumes, aqueducts, reservoirs, pipes, and other necessary conduits to a vast area of gold-bearing regions, agricultural lands, and to inhabited districts and communities widely separated from each other, and to all other places lying adjacent to the route of its main system and its lateral branches, and when such corporation proceeds under such declared purposes and does establish a distributing system, and actually furnishes water for mining, irrigation and domestic purposes in large quantities through a period of many years to thousands of consumers indiscriminately, and without refusal to any one who made application or request for the use of its water for any purposes whatsoever, at rates adjusted to the uses to be made of the water, and has apparently held itself in readiness to comply with its declaration of purposes as rapidly as the growth of the communities to which it extends would permit or has required, it must be held that substantial evidence of such a carrying into effect of the originally declared purposes of the original appropriators of such water and of the corporation formed by them has been presented as would suffice, in the absence of countervailing facts, to justify a finding that the water thus acquired and utilized by such corporation had from its inception been dedicated to a public use and that such corporation was a public utility. Brewer v. Railroad Commission (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 511.

[4] And if it be a fact, as was found by the commission, that respondent at its inception or at any subsequent time, dedicated its waters to a public use, there being no claim that such dedication has at any time since been revoked, said waters have since continued to retain the impress of a public use. Allen v. Railroad Commission, supra; Brewer v. Railroad Commission, supra; Francioni v. Soledad L. & W. Co., 170 Cal. 221, 228, 149 Pac. 161; Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 82, 89, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213.

The contracts which have been superseded, so far as the water charges are concerned and which form the basis of petitioners' complaint, differ widely from the contracts considered in Allen v. Railroad Commission, supra, the case relied upon by petitioners, and which concededly is the most favorable to their claim of any to be found in our reports. The contracts before us, reduced to an epitome, are substantially as follows:

The petitioners, in consideration of the sum of $1 paid to each of them by the Natomas Water Company, respondent's predecessor, by separate but substantially identical contracts, conveyed to said water company the right to enter upon the lands of each of said petitioners situate in Sacramento county for the purpose of constructing and maintaining upon said lands a canal of a capacity sufficient to convey not less than 1,000 and not more than 2,000 inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure, the course of which canal had been located before the making of said contracts. The privilege of entering upon said lands to construct said canal also carried with it the right to enter at all needful times to maintain it. It was agreed that the canal should be constructed by the 15th day of May, 1893, and petitioners were thereafter to be perpetually furnished with such quantities of water as they should require for the irrigation of their lands, or such part thereof as they might desire to irrigate, at a price not to exceed $5 per calendar year per acre for bearing orchards and vineyards and land irrigated for other purposes, and not exceeding $3 per calendar year per acre for orchards and vineyards not in bearing. Petitioners were not bound to use any water from said canal, if they did not desire to do so. It was further provided that, should the water company fail to keep the covenants and agreements on its part to be kept, the petitioners should have the right to terminate the rights and privileges granted by them.

It will be necessary only to point out a few of the characterizing features which distinguish the contracts considered in the case of Allen v. Railroad Commission, supra, from the contracts before us. There Whittier, the applicant, and his associates, were the owners of a large body of land which was of small value in its arid state, but which the owners believed could be made very valuable if artificially supplied with water. They formed two corporations, to wit, Hemet Land Company and Hemet Land & Water Company. Whenever a parcel of land was sold by the Hemet Land Company the purchaser of such land desiring water thereon was obliged to purchase a water-right certificate from the Hemet Land & Water Company. The land company sold the land and the water company sold so-called "water certificates." These certificates entitled the holder to one miner's inch of water for 8 acres of land. Purchasers paid \$75 an acre for their land and \$75 per acre for their water rights appurtenant to their land. The water right was inseparable and was only transferable with the land. The water-right certificates contained a binding obligation upon the water company to deliver to the purchaser a constant flow of one-inch of water for each 8 acres of land. The purchaser paid in addition to \$75 an acre for the water right the sum of \$2 an acre while the contract remained in force. The use of water was limited to described land. The contract bound all assignees or successors in interest, but could not be assigned without the written consent of the company. The quantity of water which appellant could supply was limited. Approximately 94 per cent. of appellant's waters were devoted to use under its water-right certificates, 3 per cent. in supplying the needs of the municipality and citizens of the town of Hemet, leaving 3 per cent. remaining in storage. Whittier, who became the sole owner of said corporations, had for many years sought a repudiation of these contracts and water-right certificates. The opinion expressly states that he "did all that lay in his power to declare the company to be a public service corporation, in order to destroy the water rights of these petitioners, for which water rights he had received the sum of \$438,938.50." The applicant's voluntary submission to the jurisdiction of the commission and its declaration that it was a public utility could not, it was held, affect previously vested water rights of the petitioners. It was properly held that a dedication of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., or at the utmost 3 per cent., of its waters for the use of the town of Hemet for public uses, could not impose upon the 97 per cent. remaining the same servitude.

The facts of that case and others relied upon are so utterly different from those upon which the commission based its order in the instant case, and to which we will later refer, as to afford no precedent for a like finding in this case. A final summary of the material facts upon which the court reached its conclusion to the effect that the applicant was not a public service corporation, none of which appear in this case, follows:

"The character of the contracts evidenced by these water-right certificates, the restriction upon transfer, the fixing of the acreage quantum, the enormous sum in the aggregate paid by these petitioners for their water rights, establish beyond the need of further discussion that the parties to those contracts believed that they were dealing in their private capacities and selling and receiving water for private use. But one suggestion here is sufficient. Is it conceivable that these landowners would have given Mr. Whittier and his associates a bonus of $438,938.60 for the right to use water, which right the law had given them without the expenditure of one dollar of it?" Allen v. Railroad Commission, 179 Cal. 85, 175 Pac. 473, 8 A. L. R. 249.

In the case at bar the water was not conducted to a definite parcel of land for private use, but, on the contrary, the system meandered and was spread over a wide area of country traversing two counties. No bonus was paid by the petitioners for water certificates, as none existed. No contract was made as to acreage quantum. In fact, petitioners were privileged to use the water without limitation as to quantity at rates fixed at $5 and $3 per acre per annum, or not at all, if they did not desire its use, in which case no charge was made against them. Respondent's right to conduct the water across the lands of petitioners was defeasible. Here no unconscionable advantage was sought to be taken of the contract parties as is emphasized in Allen v. Railroad Commission, supra. The only thing parted with by petitioners was a right of way for the canal through the lands of each, the advantages of which they have enjoyed for a period of 30 years. None of the lands owned by the original corporation, as far as the evidence discloses, was placed on the market until 1880—27 years after its incorporation. At that time 1,000 acres were offered for sale, but no offer was made to convey the land with a proportionate share of water appurtenant thereto; the only reference made to water at all was in respect to furnishing purchasers with water for irrigation at very low rates. The offer of sale stated that canals and irrigation ditches had been constructed through the property, thus "insuring a large crop and water will be furnished at reasonable rates for the purposes of irrigation." It cannot be said in this case, as was said in the other, that the intention of the original plan was to "apply the waters to the land which the managers of the enterprise had for sale and to none other, except to the extent of any incidental surplus."

A brief reference only will be made to the evidence, which necessarily is meager on account of passing years. But few persons are likely to be now alive who were then at an age when the mind would have become impressed by the matters before us, and much record evidence has been lost or destroyed.

[5, 6] It is a part of the history of California, of which we take judicial notice, that in the early days of placer and hydraulic mining water power was much prized, as it was indispensable to the operation of such a system of mining. Water was brought from great distances at a great expense to the lower reaches of gold-bearing soils and sold to miners at a profit to its purveyors. The original corporation was organized before the purchase of any land whatsoever. In fact, water had been conveyed to the general locality as early as 1852. It is reasonable to conclude, not alone from the declared purposes of the original corporation, but from the situation itself, that the purposes of the incorporators was to sell water to miners and all others who should apply for it. The sale of water seems to have been its chief purpose. Indeed, the evidence shows that the corporation as early as 1876 was offering its lands free from ground rent to all persons who would go upon them for the purpose of mining, charging a water rate in case the applicants should be successful in finding gold. As many as 500 persons at one time were thus occupying lands belonging to said corporation. It is the undisputed evidence that 6,000 acres were prospected and mined under this sort of a water rental. Water was also furnished for the irrigation of several hundred acres of vineyard and orchard lands. The town of Folsom and other communities were supplied with water. David W. Finch, who had been the assistant superintendent of the Natomas Water & Mining Company, beginning with 1876 and continuing for 32 years thereafter, when asked concerning mining operations upon the land, replied that people were mining "all over" the property. No charge was made for the use of land during his time. The charge made generally for "drift" mining was "so much a dump. If it was a 2,000 dump we charged him $75, usually, and for a 3,000 we charged him, proportionately; that is, that was first water. Sometimes with second water it was cheaper." The water was also used for "bank" mining along the different creeks, particularly Willow creek and Alder creek. For this use water was generally sold by the inch.

This system continued until 1906. The company had two bank claims which were worked by it at broken periods. When working its main claim, it used 2,100 inches of water during five days of the week, according to the estimate made by witness Finch, assistant superintendent. The water sales from 1876 to 1886 amounted to $22,000 a year. The record of the water sales for the year 1892 totals $14,616.45; for 1893, $11,469.04; for 1894, $12,896.61. The decline of mining operations accounts for the falling away of water revenue. The evidence in the record shows that the town of Folsom was supplied by the vineyard company with water in the year 1893. Said company also supplied the railroad company with water. While the witnesses were unable to state definitely the amounts of water furnished for the several uses, they knew the general purposes for which it was supplied. The first pipe system was laid into the town of Folsom in 1889, and from that date forward water was sold for domestic purposes. Prior to the installation of the pipe system, water was conducted in open ditches into said town. One ditch was constructed to the state prison, and some 40 or 50 pipe lines led from the ditch into Chinese quarters. Neither the quantity nor the use of water was anywise limited as to individuals or purposes. Upon the decline of mining operations, in about 1876, the original company began clearing its lands and set out vineyards, to the extent of 1,000 or 1,300 acres. It also at one time conducted a nursery. Such amounts of water were used as were necessary for the irrigation of both, but during all times there was furnished to a large number of the public, diffusely located and representing various industries, water sufficient for the uses of all. The system was very extensive, and consisted of a main canal and a number of laterals. We think it unnecessary to go further into the evidence, in order to demonstrate the jurisdictional power of the commission to make the order attacked.

[7] Objection has been made to the reception of certain evidence before the commission which, it is claimed, was not legally admissible. Reception of testimony not strictly within the rules of evidence is not of itself a ground for the annulment of an order or decision of the commission. As was said in Brewer v. Railroad Commission, supra:

"This is not an ordinary appeal, nor has this court the authority, under its limited powers of review, to set aside orders of the railroad commission in matters over which it has been given jurisdiction, because of errors in the admission or rejection of evidence."

If there is sufficient legal evidence to be found in the record to sustain the commission's order, the requirements of the statute are satisfied. In such a case incompetent or immaterial matter becomes mere surplusage. Grouped under the heading of evidence improperly admitted are excerpts from findings appearing in the reports of this court and in the United States Supreme Court upon review of certain decisions on appeal from state courts in which the Natomas Water & Mining Company is defendant. These decisions review the history of the construction and the purposes of the construction of the water system before us in this proceeding, and tend strongly to support respondent's claim that it has been from its beginning a public utility. It is admitted that the findings in these cases are res inter alios acta; but it is claimed they are admissible under a well-recognized exception to the hearsay rule upon the principle that oral declarations and hearsay evidence are admissible to establish matters of general and public interest and as a means, and in many cases the only means, of proving traditionary reputation and ancient documents. Respondent's claim is not wholly without merit, but we feel satisfied that even though the matters complained of, and which were admitted in evidence, be eliminated from the record by us, we would not even then be justified in disturbing the commission's findings.

What has just been said is also applicable to the objection made to the reception of the report made in 1892 from a compilation of various reports of former superintendents of respondent's predecessors, many of whom, if not all, are now deceased, and which show the revenue derived from water charges at a very early period of the system's existence. A refusal in very recent years by the Natomas Water Company of an application made by an irrigationist to transfer the use of water from a certain acreage to another of equal area, or to supply additional water to others, is made a ground of complaint. But such refusal was probably justified, or deemed insufficient to overbalance the substantial facts which form the basis of the order.

[8] Petitioners have prepared a table showing the proportions of water furnished to the town of Folsom and devoted to other purposes covering a period of 7 years preceding the year 1921, by which it is suggested that the larger proportion of the water furnished by respondent for all purposes was consumed or used by itself. This table purports to cover only a very recent period, and but a brief portion of the water system's existence, and, giving it its fullest significance for the period covered, it could not control the entire situation, nor is it proof that the corporation was not prior thereto impressed with the character of a public utility.

[9] The point is made by petitioners that, if the Natomas Water & Mining Company was a public utility, it had no right, without legislative sanction, to transfer its properties to the Natomas Vineyard Company. The real question here is not whether the transfers made by one corporation to the other are in any sense defective or wanting in legal requirements, but rather it has to do with the status of the corporation. The title by which it holds its property is not necessary to a decision of the sole issue before us.

[10] We have also considered the omission on the part of the boards of supervisors of the counties in which the public utility maintained its system to regulate the same as provided by article 14, § 1, of the Constitution. This duty was not always performed by the boards of supervisors of the several counties, and the omission of such a duty by a public body at best is only a circumstance which was doubtless considered by the commission.

Upon review of the whole case, we are satisfied that we would not be justified, under the limitations placed upon us by the state Constitution and the Public Utilities Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 18), in disturbing the commission's order.

The order is affirmed.

MEYERSTEIN v. BURKE. (S. F. 10270.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 30, 1924.)

1. Reformation of instruments ⚡46—Finding that plaintiff's secretary "negligently" deleted certain words sufficiently followed allegation that he "inadvertently" did so.

Where a complaint for reformation of a contract for mutual mistake alleged that plain-tiff's secretary "inadvertently" omitted certain words, a finding that "the secretary did delete or strike" certain words and such deletion resulted from the secretary's error and negligence was sufficiently responsive, since "inadvertently" and "negligently" are synonymous.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Inadvertently; Negligently.]

2. Appeal and error ⚡1071(6)—Failure to find as to plaintiff's mistake rendered harmless by finding no mutual mistake.

In a suit to reform a contract for mutual mistake of fact, a finding for defendant on that issue rendered failure to find on an issue as to a mistake made by plaintiff harmless.

3. Reformation of instruments ⚡46—Finding of no mutual mistake did not contradict finding that plaintiff made mistake.

In a suit to reform a contract for mutual mistake, a finding that the mistake was not mutual did not contradict a finding that plaintiff made a mistake unknown to defendant, since, having found against plaintiff's whole theory, the court properly found that the paper under attack was the real agreement and plaintiff's mistake became immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Suit by Alfred L. Meyerstein against Frank J. Burke. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. C. Meyerstein, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John T. Williams and John D. Harloe, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Further consideration of the record and the points made in this case satisfies us that the decision in the first instance of the District Court of Appeal as rendered by Mr. Justice Sturtevant is correct, and we hereby adopt his opinion as follows:

"The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to obtain a judgment reforming a contract alleged to have been executed through the mistake of the parties. A trial was had before the court sitting without a jury, and thereafter a judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed, bringing up a bill of exceptions.

[1, 2] "The contract in question is an executory contract for the purchase and sale of a house and lot known as parts of lots 4 and 5, block 2983, Claremont court, San Francisco. It was the theory of the plaintiff that he sold to the defendant the house and lot for $7,000 and interest on unpaid installments at 6 per cent. payable $1,000 in cash and the balance at the rate of $50 per month. On the other hand, it was the theory of the defendant that he purchased of the plaintiff the house and lot for both principal and interest totaling $7,000 payable $1,000 in cash and the balance at the rate of $50 per month. The language used in the contract as written was, 'Witnesseth: That the party of the first part hereby agrees to sell and the second party hereby agrees to buy, for the sum of seven thousand dollars ($7,000) payable as hereinafter provided; * * * that said purchase price of seven thousand dollars ($7,000) shall be payable * * * in the sum of fifty dollars ($50) on or before the 30th day of each and every month thereafter until the entire sum of seven thousand dollars ($7,000) is paid.' But according to the plaintiff's complaint, the language that should have been used is, 'That said purchase price of seven thousand dollars ($7,000) shall be payable * * * the sum of fifty dollars ($50) on or before the 30th day of each and every month thereafter, including interest at six per cent. on deferred payments until the entire sum of seven thousand dollars ($7,000) is paid.' On the trial of the case each party introduced evidence both oral and documentary tending to support his theory. If there is a hopeless conflict in the testimony, it is conceded that this court has no power to interfere. But the plaintiff earnestly contends that if we keep in view an accurately focused picture of the transaction, unblurred by nonessentials, that there is no conflict. We have searched the entire record for that picture, but we are constrained to hold that on the evidence introduced there was a hopeless conflict in the testimony, and the findings of the trial court may not be said to be unsupported by the evidence.

"The plaintiff pleaded his cause of action in two counts. In the first count he pleaded that the mistake was mutual; in the second count he pleaded that the mistake was made by him and that the defendant knew and suspected that the mistake was made. Otherwise the two counts are the same. The defendant denied the allegations of mistake contained in each count, and inserted some new matter by affirmative allegations. The court made findings in favor of the defendant on all issues except as hereinafter specially mentioned.

"In conducting the negotiations leading to the framing of the purported contract, two papers were executed, and these papers were used by the parties as throwing light on the issues. One paper was signed by the broker, J. B. Ephraim, and the other paper is the formal contract which is the subject of controversy in the case. Of and concerning the latter paper, in each count of the complaint the plaintiff alleged: 'That the said actual agreement between the said parties as made on the 30th day of August, 1916, was reduced to writing by plaintiff's secretary, and that through an error of said plaintiff's secretary in reducing the said agreement to writing, said plaintiff's secretary having deleted certain words, viz.: "Together with interest on all unpaid installments from this day until paid, at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum, payable monthly," appearing in the printed form used by said secretary in reducing said agreement to writing, the said secretary inadvertently omitted to insert after the word "thereafter," as the same appears in the excerpt of said written agreement hereinabove, "including interest at six per cent. (6%) on deferred payments."' In answering that paragraph of the plaintiff's complaint the defendant denied all of the allegations. In making its findings the trial court made a finding as follows: 'That the actual agreement between the said parties as made on the 30th day of August, 1916, was reduced to writing by plaintiff's secretary and said plaintiff's secretary did delete or strike from the printed form of contract used by said secretary in preparing said agreement and reducing it to writing, certain words, viz.: "Together with interest on all unpaid installments from this day until paid, at the rate of six per cent. (6%) per annum, payable monthly," and that such deletion did result from the error and the negligence of plaintiff's secretary. The said secretary did negligently omit to insert after the word "thereafter," as the same appears in paragraph II of plaintiff's complaint the words, "including interest at six per cent. (6%) on deferred payments."' In his brief appellant contends that said finding inadequately responds to the allegations of the complaint. We think the contention is without merit. True, the finding is not couched in the identical words of the complaint. But, for all of the purposes of this case, the words 'inadvertently' and 'negligently' may be said to be synonymous. (See Century Dict.) Moreover, if the finding of the trial court had been made in the identical language of the complaint, and the finding had been made in favor of the plaintiff, that fact alone would have been of no assistance to the plaintiff. The trial court found that no mutual mistake was made and that any mistake made by the plaintiff was neither known to nor suspected by the defendant. Under these circumstances a failure to find on the issue in question was not a reversible error. Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 42, 46, 11 Pac. 489.

[3] "In each count of his complaint the plaintiff inserted a paragraph in which he alleged (1) the terms of the agreement as actually made according to his theory, and (2) its terms as it was written. In the defendant's answer to each of those paragraphs he inserted (1) a denial of the plaintiff's allegations, and (2) a traverse. In making its findings the trial court found in favor of the defendant and in doing so found in favor of the traverse 'that the actual agreement between the parties at the date of the execution of said written agreement mentioned in said complaint is identical with the agreement mentioned in paragraph I of plaintiff's complaint.' In making its findings as to count one, the trial court wrote the same to the effect that the plaintiff intended to insert the interest clause but that the defendant did not. In other words that the mistake was not mutual. In making its findings as to the second count the trial court wrote the same to the effect that the plaintiff made a mistake but that plaintiff's mistake was not known to, nor suspected by, the defendant. The appellant places his finger on these findings and claims that the same are contradictory. The point is not well founded. Having found against the plaintiff on each theory of mistake as pleaded in the separate counts of the complaint, it was not improper that the trial court should find that the paper under attack was the agreement of the parties. This is so even though it be a fact that one of the parties, or the agent of one of the parties, had made a mistake; because, it will not be contended that a contract can be reformed solely because one of the parties made a mistake. Furthermore, the plaintiff had pleaded in hæc verba the language of the contract as he claimed that it should have been worded. The defendant had answered the allegation with a denial and a traverse. The trial court found on both. In thus framing its findings the trial court committed no error."

The judgment is affirmed.

OVERLAND PUB. CO. v. H. S. CROCKER CO., Inc., et al. (S. F. 10079.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 30, 1924. Rehearing Denied Feb. 28, 1924.)

1. Monopolies ☞28 — Individual cannot sue members of trust unless specially damaged.

One in the printing business did not suffer special damages by reason of an organization of other printers under an agreement to increase prices, and could not maintain an action against the members of the organization under the Cartwright Act, as amended by St. 1909, p. 593, as an action because of such a conspiracy can only be brought by the Attorney General or the district attorney.

2. Monopolies ☞28—Complaint by individual held to state cause of action for conspiracy.

A complaint by a printer that the other printers in the city had organized for the purpose of increasing prices and that they entered into agreements with unions for the purpose of destroying the business of all non-members, or of forcing their joining the organization, held to state a cause of action for double damages under the Cartwright Act, as amended by St. 1909, p. 593.

3. Monopolies ☞12(2)—Agreement between printers' board of trade and labor unions held illegal.

Agreement between a "Printers' Board of Trade" and labor unions, whereby the unions agreed that their members should work for such concerns only as were members of the "Board of Trade," the primary purpose of the agreement being to create or carry out restrictions in trade or commerce, held illegal under the Cartwright Act; the validity of such agreement not being sustainable either as an exercise of the right of every man to work for or refuse to work for any man or class of men, or under the proviso of the Cartwright Act that labor is not a commodity.

4. Torts ☞4—Bad motives do not make legal act illegal.

Bad motives do not of themselves make an otherwise legal act illegal; but, if various acts are done in pursuance of a plan or scheme, the apparently lawful acts become so interwoven with the clearly illegal acts as to render them indistinguishable.

5. Monopolies ☞28 — Damages need not be itemized in complaint.

In an action for double damages under the Cartwright Act, as amended by St. 1909, p.

593, plaintiff must show actual damages; but this is a question of proof, and there is no reason why plaintiff should be required to itemize its damages in its complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by the Overland Publishing Company against the H. S. Crocker Company, Incorporated, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Hoefler, Cook & Snyder, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry G. McKannay, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint without leave to amend.

Plaintiff in its complaint seeks to allege a cause of action under the Cartwright Act (Act 4166, Gen. Laws of Cal. [1915] Deering, Stats. 1907, p. 984, as amended by Stats. 1909, p. 593) for double damages by reason of certain acts of defendants, who constitute, it is alleged, a trust as defined by that act. Before discussing the many and lengthy allegations of the complaint, we will refer to those parts of the Cartwright Act upon which plaintiff relies.

By this act a trust is defined to be a combination of—" * * * two or more persons, * * * [or] corporations * * * for either, any or all of the following purposes: 1. To create or carry out restrictions in trade or commerce. 2. To limit or reduce the production, or increase the price of merchandise or of any commodity. 3. To prevent competition * * * 4. To fix at any standard or figure, whereby its price to the public or consumer shall be in any manner controlled or established, any article or commodity of merchandise. * * * 5. To make * * * contracts, obligations or agreements of any kind or description, by which they shall bind or have bound themselves not to sell * * * any article of trade, * * * below a common standard figure, or fixed value. * * * " Section 1, as amended by St. 1909, p. 593, § 1.

And by section 11 of the act it is provided that any person who shall be injured by anything declared to be unlawful by this act may sue therefor and recover twofold damages.

With this brief summary of the provisions of the Cartwright Act, we will proceed to examine the various allegations of plaintiff's complaint, in order to ascertain whether it has brought itself within the terms of the act.

The plaintiff alleged that it and the deendants are all engaged in the business of selling stationery, letterheads, office supplies, paper, books, etc.; that the defendants control 90 per cent. of said business in the city and county of San Francisco; that the defendants are members of a certain association known as "Printers' Board of Trade"; that plaintiff has been invited and urged to join said association, but has refused to join the same. Details of the practices of said Board of Trade are then pleaded, substantially as set forth in the case of Overland Publishing Company v. Union Lithograph Co. et al., 207 Pac. 412 (hearing denied by this court June 15, 1922).

The allegations as to these alleged unlawful practices are, briefly, that the defendants have unlawfully combined and agreed together to carry out certain restrictions in the printing business; that they unreasonably increase to themselves the prices at which they sell the various articles of stationery mentioned in the complaint and the prices of printing, ruling, and binding which is done by them. It is also alleged that a committee representing the Board of Trade meets daily, and that, according to the rules of said board, each member of the board reports to this committee all their jobs amounting to $15 or over, and that, in the event that several members have been asked to bid upon the same job, these members and the committee determine the price to be charged for such work. Lots are then cast to determine which member of the board shall do the work at the price previously agreed upon. It is also alleged that the board issues a catalogue of prices of stationery, printing, ruling, and binding and that the defendants have agreed to abide by these prices, which are much higher than would give to the defendants a reasonable profit.

[1] These allegations are of facts which constitute the "Printers' Board of Trade," an association whose purpose is to fix and control the price of the commodities in which the defendants deal at a figure greater than would allow a reasonable profit upon the same to the defendants. However, as pointed out in Overland Publishing Co. v. Union Lithograph Co., supra, such practices as alleged restrict competition among the members of the said "Printers' Board of Trade," but plaintiff, not being a member of said association, is at liberty to bid for printing work freely and without limit as to the price to be charged therefor. Plaintiff, therefore, is not damaged by such action of the defendants, but rather benefited thereby, and consequently cannot show special damages to himself by reason of the existence of these restrictions. Assuming, in passing, that these allegations establish the fact that a conspiracy against trade exists, still, the plaintiff having failed to show that it suffered damages, an action against the defendants because of such conspiracy can only be brought by the Attorney General or the district attorney. Cartwright Act, § 2. Thus, it has been often held by the federal courts that an individual cannot recover under section 7 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law (Act of July 2, 1890, 26 Stats. at Large, p. 209, c. 647 [U. S. Comp. St. § 8829]), though the defendants might have been subject to a criminal prosecution by the government. Keogh v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. (C. C. A.) 271 Fed. 444; Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Eclair Film Co. (D. C.) 208 Fed. 416.

[2] We are of the opinion, however, that the complaint, in its entirety, contains sufficient allegations of unlawful acts claimed to have been done by the defendants, in pursuance of their alleged conspiracy against trade, to state a cause of action under the Cartwright Act for double damages.

The most important of plaintiff's allegations is, substantially, that all the journeymen printers, pressmen, and bookbinders in San Francisco are members of their respective unions, and that it is impossible to secure competent employees in the printing and stationery business without employing members of said unions. Further it is alleged that in pursuance of the unlawful combination and conspiracy, and for the purpose of utterly destroying the business of all nonmembers of their associations, or, as the alternative, of forcing all nonmembers engaged in said business to join said organizations, the defendants, on November 23, 1920, entered into agreements with said unions whereby the unions agreed that their members should work for only such printing, ruling, or binding concerns as belong to and are members of the associations of the defendants, and that the members of said unions should not work for any concern not a member of the associations of the defendants. It is further alleged that the effect of said agreement is to frighten away the customers of such nonmembers by reason of the fact that the defendants could compel the unions to call out the union employees of such nonmembers and thereby prevent orders from being filled; that during the month of January, 1921, the defendants did threaten the plaintiff that, unless plaintiff should join the associations of the defendants, the defendants would have the union employees of the plaintiff called out; that upon plaintiff's refusal to join said associations the defendants ordered said unions to call out plaintiff's union employees, and on the first day of February, 1921, solely pursuant to an order of the defendants, and for no other reason whatsoever, the officers of said unions ordered plaintiff's union employees to cease their employment with plaintiff, and thereupon, on said date, solely by reason of said order of the defendants and for no other reason whatsoever, plaintiff's union employees ceased their employment with the plaintiff.

Union Lithograph Co., supra, there is some language which apparently upholds the legality of the alleged agreement between the "Printers' Board of Trade" and the unions, but it otherwise appears that the basis of the conclusions of the District Court of Appeal in that case was that—

"There are no allegations establishing a causal connection between the plaintiff's grievance, i. e., the withdrawal of the union printers and these averments regarding the methods of the Printers' Board of Trade."

If this be the correct interpretation of the decision in that case, and we believe that it is, it was unnecessary to pass upon the legality of this agreement, because, assuming that it was illegal, the complaint as there framed did not show the causal connection between the methods of the "Printers' Board of Trade" and the withdrawal of the union men in pursuance of their agreement with the board. The complaint in the case now before us does allege the necessary causal connection. It alleges the agreement between the "Printers' Board of Trade" and the labor unions. Then it alleges that the defendants, in order to force the plaintiff into its association (and it had previously been alleged that this association constituted a conspiracy against trade), ordered the unions to call out the union men in plaintiff's employ. If further allegations are needed in order to connect the practices of the alleged conspiracy and the withdrawal of the plaintiff's men, it is contained in allegation XVIII of the complaint, which is:

"That each and every and all of the acts and things hereinabove alleged to have been done by the defendants, and each and every and all of the acts and things hereinabove alleged as now being done by the defendants, have been done and now are being done by them in pursuance of the said unlawful combination, conspiracy, confederation and agreement of the defendants hereinbefore alleged, and in carrying out the same and the purposes thereof."

Since the plaintiff sufficiently connects the action of the union men in leaving its employ with the alleged conspiracy, it becomes necessary to pass upon the legality of the agreement between the "Printers' Board of Trade" and the labor unions.

[3] There is no question in our minds but that the primary purpose of this agreement was to create or carry out restrictions in trade or commerce, and as such was tainted with illegality. As was said in Brescia Construction Co. v. Stone Masons' Contractors Association, 195 App. Div. 647, 651, 187 N. Y. Supp. 77, 80:

"The essential facts here appearing differ radically from those cases which have frequently arisen which involved the right of members of labor unions to refuse to work for those who do not employ union labor, or to pursue lawful means for inducing those who do not engage labor union men to do so, or to pursue lawful methods for securing betterment of conditions under which to work, including such matters as hours of work and wages. In the instant case we find that the defendant labor unions, in effect, entered into an alliance with the Contractors' Association under which the members of the union agreed to work exclusively for members of the Contractors' Association and to help it to enforce its decrees against expelled members, or, for that matter, perhaps against any persons or firms engaged in the mason trade who were not members of the Contractors' Association. The defendant unions had no grievance against the plaintiff. The grievance was that of the Contractors' Association, which utilized the labor unions to enforce its mandates against other contractors who were not affiliated with it."

Again, in Campbell v. People, 72 Colo. 213, 210 Pac. 841, 842, the court said:

"As to the first point, the only question under the first count is whether the agreement of the members of the Master Plumbers' Association and the members of the local union that they should neither employ nor be employed by any one except each other was a restriction on 'the full and free pursuit' of the business of plumbing. If the pursuit of the business is, by reason of the restriction, not full, or not free in any respect, the combination to 'create or carry out' the restriction is unlawful. That the business, under the restriction, is not full or free seems clear."

Notwithstanding the difference in wording in the Colorado anti-trust law and the Cartwright Act, the last-cited case is in point, and it correctly characterizes such agreements between employers and labor unions as illegal.

Defendants urge, however, that provisions substantially the same as herein pleaded were considered in People v. Epstein, 102 Misc. Rep. 476, 170 N. Y. Supp. 68. In that case there was an agreement between the Photo-Engravers' Board of Trade and the Photo-Engravers' Union, in many respects similar to the one herein alleged to be in effect between defendants and the various unions. The defendants were indicted under the Donnelly Anti-Trust Act of New York (Gen. Bus. Law [Consol. Laws, c. 20], §§ 340, 341), declaring contracts creating a monopoly illegal and void and prescribing a penalty. The court held that this law extended only to such contracts as affected the price of an article or commodity in common use, which terms do not include photo-engraving. If the photo-engraving trade was not within the scope of the New York anti-trust laws, it necessarily follows that an agreement between employers and employees, even though it prevented competition in this trade, would not be illegal. It is manifest, therefore, that the decision in that case is to be limited to the situation as there presented, and that whatever the court may have said with respect to such agreements in general between employers and labor unions, by which the latter agree that union men shall only work for employers belonging to an employers' association, was mere dicta.

It is interesting to note the subsequent history of the relations of the Photo-Engravers' Board of Trade and the Photo-Engravers' Unions in the courts of New York. An appeal in the case of People v. Epstein, supra, was dismissed on the sole ground that the order sought to be appealed from was not reviewable. 179 N. Y. Supp. 941. Subsequently the so-called Donnelly Anti-Trust Law, supra, was amended to bring within the purview thereof "any article or product used in the conduct of trade, commerce or manufacture." In Standard Engraving Co. v. Volz, 200 App. Div. 758, 193 N. Y. Supp. 831, the court held that this anti-trust law, as amended, prohibited the labor unions from establishing a minimum price at which the photo-engraving producers could sell their products. This minimum price had been established after the decision in People v. Epstein, supra, and in pursuance of the agreement between Photo-Engravers' Board of Trade and the Photo-Engravers' Union, as alleged in that case. In the course of its opinion in Standard Engraving Co. v. Volz, supra, the court quoted from Curran v. Galen, 152 N. Y. 33, 37, 46 N. E. 297, 37 L. R. A. 802, 57 Am. St. Rep. 496, as follows:

"The social principle which justified such organizations [referring to labor unions] is departed from, when they are so extended in their operation as either to intend, or to accomplish, injury to others."

In view of the decision and the language of the court in Standard Engraving Co. v. Volz, supra, it may be seriously questioned whether the courts of New York would be inclined to follow the dicta in People v. Epstein, supra, tending to support the position of the defendants.

Likewise, the validity of this agreement between the defendants and the labor unions cannot be sustained upon the authority of such cases as Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 Pac. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165; Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 103 Pac. 324, which hold that it is the right of every man to engage to work for or to deal with or to refuse to work for or to deal with any man or class of men as he sees fit, whatever his motive or whatever the resulting injury, without being held in any way accountable therefor. The principle laid down in those cases only applies where the employees are pursuing lawful means to secure a betterment of their working conditions, or where they have in fact a grievance against the employer. Brescia Construction Co. v. Stone Masons Contractors' Association, supra. Furthermore, the proviso in the Cartwright Act that labor, skilled or unskilled, is not a commodity within the meaning of the act, does not authorize any such agreement as was here made between employers and employees. In Duplex P. P. Co. v. Deering, 254 U. S. 443, 469, 41 Sup. Ct. 172, 177 (65 L. Ed. 349, 16 A. L. R. 196), Mr. Justice Pitney, in speaking of section 6 of the Clayton Act (Act of October 15, 1914, c. 323, 38 Stats. at Large, 730 [U. S. Comp. St. § 8835f]), which declares, as does the Cartwright Act, that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce, said:

"The section [section 6] assumes the normal objects of a labor organization to be legitimate, and declares that nothing in the anti-trust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of such organizations or to forbid their members from lawfully carrying out their legitimate objects; and that such an organization shall not be held in itself—merely because of its existence and operation—to be an illegal combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade. But there is nothing in the section to exempt such an organization or its members from accountability where it or they depart from its normal and legitimate objects and engage in an actual combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade. And by no fair or permissible construction can it be taken as authorizing any activity otherwise unlawful, or enabling a normally lawful organization to become a cloak for an illegal combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade as defined by the anti-trust laws."

Therefore, as this agreement between the labor unions and the defendants resulted in a combination or conspiracy in restraint of trade, it fell within the operation of the Cartwright Act, supra, notwithstanding the fact that some of the parties to the agreement were labor unions. And plaintiff, by alleging that it has been damaged by reason of the union men in its employ being called out in pursuance of this alleged agreement, stated a cause of action under this act for twofold damages.

There are also allegations in the complaint that the defendants in order to destroy the business of plaintiff and other nonmembers of the "Printers' Board of Trade," solicit the customers of plaintiff and other nonmembers and offer to do work for such customers at prices below the cost of production. It is also alleged that plaintiff and certain other printers do not possess all the necessary machinery to do certain portions of printing work, and that plaintiff and these other printers are compelled to let out this work to or purchase materials from such of the defendants as are equipped therefor; that the defendants have charged and do charge the members of said association much lower prices for such work and materials than they charge the plaintiff and other nonmembers. It is then averred that the defendants charge plaintiff and other nonmembers of the "Printers' Board of Trade," ters' Board of Trade" unreasonable and exorbitant prices for such work, all for the purpose of destroying the business of plaintiff and other nonmembers, or, as the alternative, of forcing plaintiff and other nonmembers to join said associations.

The plain inference from these allegations is that these acts were done by the defendants for the purpose of forcing the plaintiff into the alleged unlawful combination and thus strengthening their illegal organization and its potentialities for accomplishing its alleged objects. It may well be that these various acts in and of themselves are innocent and lawful. Certainly, for instance, the solicitation of trade is not prohibited by the Cartwright Act. Nor is such solicitation prohibited merely because the person so soliciting the trade is a member of a trust or conspiracy in restraint of trade. But these various acts of solicitation, as well as the other acts alleged to have been done by the defendants, if done by the members of a trust, as defined by the Cartwright Act, in pursuance of their unlawful conspiracy and to effectuate its illegal objects, may become unlawful. Thus in Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S. 375, 396, 25 Sup. Ct. 276, 279 (49 L. Ed. 518), Mr. Justice Holmes, discussing a demurrer to the bill in equity filed by the government for the purpose of enjoining the "meat trust" for alleged violation of the federal anti-trust statute, said:

"The scheme as a whole seems to us to be within reach of the law. The constituent elements, as we have stated them, are enough to give to the scheme a body, and, for all that we can say, to accomplish it. Moreover, whatever we may think of them separately when we take them up as distinct charges, they are alleged sufficiently as elements of the scheme. It is suggested that the several acts charged are lawful and that intent can make no difference. But they are bound together as the parts of a single plan. The plan may make the parts unlawful. Aikens v. Wisconsin, 195 U. S. 194, 206." (Italics ours.)

Commenting upon this, and other quotations to the same effect, the court in Monarch Tobacco Works v. American Tobacco Co. (C. C.) 165 Fed. 774, 780, observed that:

"The reasons for the rule do not seem to lie very deep, it being conceivable that the object of every such combination could, and probably would, be consummated by acts which would be perfectly lawful if not done with the design to put the unlawful scheme into successful operation. The conspiracy and combination, though themselves unlawful, cannot injure any person either in his business or property so as to give him a cause of action under section 7 [of the Sherman Anti-Trust Law] unless something be done to make the combination and conspiracy effective; but whatever is done by those engaged in the scheme or plot with the motive and intent to carry out the unlawful purpose itself becomes tainted with the illegality of the scheme, however innocent it might otherwise have been, the separate acts becoming thereby so interwoven with the unlawful scheme as to cause the injury 'by reason' of the combination, within the language of section 7. It therefore seems that a series of acts, each of which may be innocent in itself, may be wrongful if the direct object, purpose, and result thereof be to carry into effect a combination agreement whereby the free flow of commerce between the states or the liberty of a trader to carry on his business be obstructed. * * * Sometimes an unlawful act may be done by means that appear to be lawful, just as a lawful act may be accomplished by means that are manifestly unlawful."

[4] It is the contention of the defendants that so long as they were doing lawful acts, their motives in so doing these acts were immaterial. This court has often expressed the fundamental rule that bad motives do not of themselves make an otherwise legal act illegal. Union Labor Hospital Ass'n v. Vance Lumber Co., 158 Cal. 551, 112 Pac. 886, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 103; Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 103 Pac. 324; Parkinson Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 581, 98 Pac. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550, 16 Ann. Cas. 1165. But, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Holmes in Swift & Co. v. United States, supra, if various acts are done in pursuance of a plan or scheme, the apparently lawful acts become so interwoven with the clearly illegal acts as to render them indistinguishable. This we believe is the situation here presented, assuming, of course, that plaintiff's allegations are true, and it would in effect emasculate the anti-trust law to say that various acts done by the members of an alleged trust, in pursuance of the conspiracy against trade, do not lose their innocent character and become illegal. The view which we take is well illustrated by the following quotation from Munter v. Eastman Kodak Co., 28 Cal. App. 60, 667, 153 Pac. 737, 740:

"In other words, it was and is within its legitimate province as a manufacturer and wholesale vendor to select its own customers, and moreover, to sell at higher prices to one than to another, provided, of course, that such discrimination in prices is not the result of a combination, agreement, or conspiracy between it and others, the object of which was or is to monopolize or restrict trade or commerce or to prevent legitimate competition, or otherwise to injure the public, the protection of whose welfare is the first consideration of all anti-trust legislation," citing cases. (Italics ours.)

Applying these principles to this case, the defendants could select their customers, or refuse to sell to plaintiff or any one else, except on their own terms and prices, just so long as they were not acting in pursuance of a conspiracy to restrain trade. In other words acts having a direct causal connection or relation to the existence of a trust, when done by such a trust may lose their legal character and become illegal. And it is the theory of the plaintiff, and it so alleges, that the defendants constitute a trust, as defined by the Cartwright Act, with its dominant purpose to sell its goods at increased prices, and that all of the acts alleged to have been done by the defendants were done by them as members of this alleged trust, and to further the illegal object of the alleged trust. We are of the opinion that in these allegations the plaintiff has brought itself within the purview of the Cartwright Act.

[5] While it is necessary for the plaintiff, in order to recover under the Cartwright Act, to show that actual damages were sustained—damages in some amount which are susceptible of expression in figures and not dependent upon the conjecture of a jury (American Sea Green Slate Co. v. O'Halloran, 229 Fed. 77, 143 C. C. A. 353)—this is a question of proof, and we see no reason why the plaintiff should in this action be required to itemize its damages in its complaint. See Monarch Tobacco Works v. American Tobacco Co., supra, page 783.

For the reasons above indicated we are constrained to reverse the judgment, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer.

1. Sales ⚡273(4)—Warranty of seeds usually implied.

Where a purchaser asks a seed dealer for a certain variety of seed, and, in pursuance of that request, seed is furnished, in the absence of any additional facts the law will, from the transaction, imply a contract of warranty.

2. Customs and usages ⚡12(2)—Party bound by general custom, though ignorant of it.

A party to a contract may be bound by a custom not inconsistent with the terms of the contract, even though he is ignorant of the custom, if that custom is of such universal application that he may be conclusively presumed to know of it.

3. Sales ⚡261(1)—What representations constitute warranties.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1763, 1764, in order that a sale shall be upon a warranty, there must be two factors present, first, an affirmation of a fact by the seller with reference to the thing sold, and, second, an intention on the part of the seller that the affirmation shall be a warranty to the buyer, and the affirmation of the fact is shown by direct evidence, and the intent to warrant is inferred from the facts and circumstances surrounding the sale.

4. Sales ⚡261(4)—Representations constituting "warranty" in sale of seed.

In the case of sale of seed for planting, description of the seed by the seller is an affirmation of a fact concerning the thing sold, and the intent on the part of the dealer to warrant that vital fact to the buyer is inferred.

5. Customs and usages ⚡17—Effect of custom upon "warranty" of seed sold.

If there is a general custom among sellers of seed not to warrant the seed sold by them, the court cannot infer an intent on their part to warrant the seed from the facts and circumstances of the sale, because among these facts and circumstances is the custom of nonwarranty, and in such case proof of the custom does not contradict or vary the terms of an express warranty, but establishes that there never was any warranty at all.

6. Customs and usages ⚡11—Custom and usage considered in determining whether warranty implied.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1619–1621, 1637, 1647, 1655, 1656, 1763, in determining whether or not a contract of warranty is to be implied the court may consider general custom or usage.

7. Customs and usages ⚡12(1)—Buyer of seed bound by custom not to warrant.

A buyer of celery seed was bound by general custom of nonwarranty on the part of seed dealers, though he was ignorant of it.

Seawell and Lawlor, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Ben Miller against the Germain Seed & Plant Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Eugene Daney, of San Diego, for appellant.

E. L. Johnson, of San Diego, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. The plaintiff purchased celery seed from the defendant. The seed turned out to be a different variety from that ordered. This action was brought to recover the damages suffered by the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed. The main question presented by the record is whether or not there was a warranty of the seed and a consequent responsibility for the damages suffered by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff was engaged in raising celery for the market, and the defendant was engaged in the sale of seeds and plants. On March 16, 1920, the plaintiff ordered $20 worth of celery seed of the Golden Yellow California stock, and on April 8, 1920, he ordered $12 worth of celery seed of the Golden Yellow Celery California stock. The orders were by letter. The defendant complied by forwarding two bags of celery seed. Aside from the address of the purchaser and seller, the only marking upon the seed was the following: "Germain. Germain Seeds Germinate. Seeds. Los Angeles, California." The seeds were not the character of seed ordered, but were of a variety known as Green celery seed. The two varieties of seed were indistinguishable one from the other, and the celery plants could not be distinguished until approaching maturity; when the bleaching process was applied, it was discovered by reason of the fact that they would not bleach properly, that they were of the variety known as Green celery seed.

The plaintiff claimed to be damaged in the sum of $11,900, but the jury returned a verdict in plaintiff's favor for the sum of $4,000 only. The most serious question raised by the appeal is as to whether under all the facts and circumstances shown in the case there was a warranty by the defendant of the character of seed supplied by it to the plaintiff. This question turns largely upon the claim of the appellant that under the general custom of seed dealers there is no warranty of the character of the seed sold and that the defendant in the conduct of its business makes every effort possible to apprise the purchaser of seed of that fact. The trial court instructed the jury that if there was a custom of nonwarranty on the part of seed dealers, the plaintiff could not recover upon the alleged warranty if he had notice or knowledge of such custom; but the trial court refused to instruct the jury as requested by the defendant that, if there was a general custom of nonwarranty, the plaintiff would be bound thereby even if he did not in fact know of such custom or usage. To state it more concretely, the question arises upon the refusal of the trial court to give the following instructions proposed by the defendant:

"Where there is a general custom and usage appertaining to a business, which custom or usage is so universal in its application that it is presumptively known to all who have dealings in the business to which it is applicable, then I charge you that unless there is a contract to the contrary, such general custom or usage is presumed to be taken into consideration by all parties in entering into the transaction, so that if in this case it should appear from the evidence that there is a general custom or usage of the seed trade that no seeds are warranted as to name, description, productiveness, or other matter, and if you find from the evidence that such custom is so universal that it must be presumed to have been known by people who have transactions in the seed business, then I charge you that such custom or usage is as much a part of the contract of purchase and sale as if it had been expressly so stipulated."

"If you find from the evidence in this case that it is, and has been for many years, the general custom of the seed trade in the state of California not to warrant either the description, quality, productiveness or any other matter of seeds, then I charge you, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff in this case is presumed to have known such custom, and it will be presumed, in the absence of any express understanding to the contrary, that such custom is a part of any dealings in such trade or business, and in such case it is not necessary that there should be on or in the package containing the seed any notice of nonwarranty, nor is it necessary if such notice of nonwarranty is on, or in the package containing such seed that it be read by the buyer, because the custom of the trade is part of the contract unless excluded by an expressed agreement to the contrary."

"If you find from the evidence in this case that it is the custom of the seed trade in California, and has been the custom for many years, not to warrant the description, quality, or productiveness of seeds bought or sold, and that this custom is a well established one, and well known to those either buying or selling seeds, then I charge you that notwithstanding the fact, if it be a fact, that the plaintiff may have not seen the disclaimer notice which the defendant used in his business, or if he did see it that he did not read it, or even if the defendant entirely omitted to inclose one with the seeds, still the general custom and usage of the seed business would control the transaction unless there was an express contract to the contrary."

Testimony was introduced by the defendant upon the subject of custom which would require the giving of these instructions if they are correct statements of the law. The question for determination then is whether or not from the facts and circumstances shown there was a contract of warranty between the purchaser and seller of the seeds. If it was the general custom of all seed dealers, including the defendant, to refuse to warrant the character of the seed sold by them, and if the price for seed was fixed in view of this uniform custom, it is evident that if we hold that the seller is, under the circumstances, liable upon a warranty of the character of the seed, we thereby hold the defendant to the terms of an agreement which it did not in fact intend to make. It is clear that if the purchaser of the seed had inquired of the seller whether or not it would warrant the character of the seed that the seller would have replied in the negative. It may be conceded that where a purchaser asks a seed dealer for a certain variety of seed, and in pursuance of that request seed is furnished, in the absence of any additional facts the law will, from the transaction, imply a contract of warranty. This warranty partakes of the nature of both an express and implied warranty. It is express in the sense that it is based upon the express language used by the purchaser in his order or request; it is implied in the sense that results from the circumstance that the request for seed is from a grower of celery to a seller of celery seed for the purpose of raising celery plants, and therefore the character of the seed is an essential and vital provision of the contract between the parties. It is, of course, conceded that if there had been a written warranty or an expressed oral warranty of the character of the seed, the custom of the dealer in other cases not to give such a warranty would have no bearing upon the terms of the express warranty. The question here is somewhat different, namely, whether or not in determining the contract between the parties we should consider, not only the character of the business conducted by the purchaser and by the seller, but also the general custom of seed dealers not to warrant the character of seed sold by them.

The Supreme Court of the state of Wisconsin had occasion to consider the subject now before us in the case of Ross v. Northrup, King & Co., 156 Wis. 327, 144 N. W. 1124, in 1914. The court in that case said:

"There is still another insurmountable difficulty in the way of plaintiff's recovery. The jury found that at the time of the sale there was 'a general custom in the Northwest, including Wisconsin, among seedsmen such as the defendants, to refuse to warrant seeds.' The jury also found that the plaintiff did not know of such custom. The jury made no such finding in reference to Morton. There is no evidence to show whether he knew of such custom or not. He did testify that he had no notice from any source that the defendant would not sell its seeds with a warranty. This might all be true and still the general custom such as the jury found might not only exist, but Morton might have knowledge of it. It is probable that, had he been asked the direct question, he would have denied all knowledge of the custom, and we will assume that on the evidence referred to the court might have found lack of knowledge, and that it actually did so find.

"It is not the law that ignorance of a general trade custom relieves a party from the effect of it. If there was a general custom among seedsmen such as was found, Morton as a retail dealer in seeds was bound to know of it.

"The object of proving a general custom is not to contradict or change a contract made between the parties, but to interpret it to the court and jury as it was understood by the parties at the time it was made; and this evidence of a general custom, when it does not contradict or change the express terms of the written contract, is admitted for the purpose of showing what the real contract between the parties was * * * And, when it is clearly proven, the parties are supposed to have contracted with reference to such custom, unless such custom changes the express terms of the written contract.' Hewitt v. John Week L. Co., 77 Wis. 548, 556, 46 N. W. 822, and cases cited.

"A uniform trade custom is readily accepted by courts to define what is ambiguous or is left indeterminate in a contract, where both parties have knowledge of the custom, or are so situated that such knowledge may be presumed, for the reason that the majority of such transactions are had in view of the custom, and the agreement on which the minds of the parties actually met will thereby be carried into effect. * * * Where the custom is proved to be known to both, it may even add terms to the contract. * * * Where the custom is general, it will be presumed to have entered into the contract, and one may be bound thereby although ignorant, unless the other party be shown to have knowledge of his ignorance.' Gehl v. Milwaukee P. Co., 105 Wis. 573, 580, 81 N. W. 666.

"Replying to the argument of counsel in another case, that a custom in order to be binding must be known to both parties to the contract, or it must have existed a sufficient length of time to raise a presumption of knowledge, the court said:

"That rule of course prevails in case of an attempt to annex to a contract some incident not expressed therein, as in the case of Hewitt v. John Week L. Co., 77 Wis. 548, 46 N. W. 822, where the question was whether the owner of a sawmill, under his contract to saw logs by the thousand, was entitled to the slabs. There is a difference between evidence of usage to establish a custom for the purpose of annexing that as an incident to a contract, and the same kind of proof to show the meaning of some word or term used in a contract. In the latter situation the meaning of the term as understood at the time and place of the contract governs, whether both of the parties knew of such meaning or not. They are presumed to contract with reference to the meaning of words and terms used by them, as such words and terms are understood at the place of their contract.' Shores L. Co. v. Stitt, 102 Wis. 450, 455, 78 N. W. 562.

"The case at bar is in its facts very much like one recently decided by the Supreme Court of Iowa, from which we quote the following:

"The alleged liability of the Younkerman Seed Company may be considered first. The evidence that a general custom, such as pleaded, prevails in the seed trade was conclusive. The particular package had the printed matter thereon, and, though this may not have been noticed, the sale is presumed to have been negotiated with reference to the general custom of the trade. * * * This being so, a warranty that the seed was true to name could not be inferred, and the court rightly found in favor of the Younkerman Seed Company.' Blizzard Bros. v. Growers' C. Co., 152 Iowa, 257, 132 N. W. 66, 67."

The Supreme Court of Iowa rendered a decision to the same effect which is cited and quoted in the decision by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. Blizzard Bros. v. Growers' C. Co., supra.

[1, 2] The rule seems to be uniform that a party to a contract may be bound by a custom not inconsistent with the terms of the contract, even though he is ignorant of the custom, if that custom is of such general and universal application that he may be conclusively presumed to know of the custom. See 2 Page on Contracts, § 604, p. 925. The author of this text-book states the rule in that regard as follows:

"To be regarded as part of a contract, however, the usage or custom must have both of the foregoing elements. (1) It must be actually or constructively known; and (2) it must be consistent with the contract. If either of these elements is lacking the usage or custom cannot be regarded as part of the contract. If the usage is neither actually or constructively known to one of the parties to the contract, it is not binding upon him."

In the case of Rauth v. Southwest Warehouse Co., 153 Cal. 54, 109 Pac. 839, it was assumed that a seller of seed would be bound by "a custom or usage so notorious that defendant must be presumed to have known it, for actual knowledge was not shown, to the effect that the term 'barley' did not include barley exactly like the common bearded variety ordinarily grown in Orange county."

The rule that a person will be presumed to have contracted with reference to a general custom or usage whether he knew of that custom or not has frequently been invoked. In Steidtmann v. Joseph Lay Co., 234 Ill. 84, pages 88, 89, 84 N. E. 640, 642, it was said:

"A person entering into a contract in the ordinary course of business is presumed to have done so in reference to any existing general, usage or custom relating to such business. (Collins Ice Cream Co. v. Stephens, 189 Ill. 200; Chisholm v. Beaman Machine Co., 160 Id. 101; Leavitt v. Kennicott, supra.) And this is so whether he knew of the custom or not. (Samuels v. Oliver, 130 Ill. 73; Taylor v. Bailey, 169 Id. 181; Lyon v. Culbertson, 83 Id. 33; Doane v. Dunham, 79 Id. 131; Bailey v. Bensley, 87 Id. 556.) Such general custom and technical meaning of words may be proved without being specially pleaded. (Stewart v. Smith, 28 Ill. 397; Lowe v. Lehman, supra.) The evidence offered should have been admitted."

The Court of Appeals of Maryland, in Lyon v. George, 44 Md. 295, said:

"The defendant not being able to offer direct proof of the contract between himself and the plaintiffs, was seeking to establish it by indirect and circumstantial evidence. The usage offered in evidence, had certainly an important bearing upon the issue on trial. Where uniform and well established, it has been held to shape the contracts of parties, and serve as a guide to their true meaning and understanding. However well established, it may undoubtedly be controlled by a special contract, but in the absence of evidence of such special contract, where services are rendered, and a uniform usage is shown to exist in regard to such services, it will be presumed that they are rendered in accordance with the usage. In the case of Given v. Charron, 15 Md. 507, the identical question arose. There the action was brought to recover for an alleged wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff from the employment of the defendant. No direct evidence was offered of the contract between the parties. But to show what the contract was, the plaintiff proposed to offer testimony of a usage among dry goods jobbers, such as the defendant, in regard to the terms upon which they employed their clerks. This court speaking through Le Grand, C. J., say in regard to the admissibility of the evidence: 'We think the testimony was properly admitted. It was pertinent to the contract declared upon, and a link in the chain of evidence, to establish a custom existing among dry goods jobbers, as to the time for which they were to be understood as employing clerks, when nothing was said in regard to it.' In the case of Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat. 548, evidence of the usage of banks in the District of Columbia, in regard to the day of demanding payment upon bills of exchange and promissory notes, was held to be admissible for the purpose of explaining the understanding of parties as to their contracts. This authority was recognized and followed in the case of Bank of Columbia v. Magruder, 6 H. & J. 180, and in the case of the Bank of Columbia v. Fitzhugh, 1 H. & G. 248.

"The objection to the admissibility of the evidence, that its offer was not accompanied with an offer to prove that the usage was known to the plaintiffs cannot be sustained. The defendant was under no legal obligation to offer such proof. The contract was entered into with a member of the plaintiffs' firm, since dead, and the knowledge of the usage, on his part, when the agreement to employ the defendant as agent was made, will be presumed in law. This doctrine is so strongly recognized in the case of the Bank of Columbia v. Fitzhugh, [supra] that it may now be considered a settled question in this state, and it is unnecessary to refer to other cases in support of it."

The Supreme Court of Michigan, in Austrian & Co. v. Springer, 94 Mich. 343, 54 N. W. 50, 34 Am. St. Rep. 350, said:

"The rule is that the custom must be one so well settled and notorious as to raise the presumption that it was known to buyer and seller. Mechem, Ag. § 348. This presumption was not, therefore, rebutted by defendant's testimony that he was not aware of such custom, although it might have been, had the custom been shown to have been a purely local one. This was shown to be a general custom pertaining to the glass trade in this country, and not confined to any particular locality, as was the case in Pennell v. Transportation Co., ante, 247."

In Laver v. Hotelling, 5 Cal. Unrep. 534, 46 Pac. 1070, this court held that the custom or rule of an architects' association fixing their compensation was not binding upon a layman ignorant of the rule, but distinguished the case from the rule concerning a general custom, as follows:

"It was not accompanied by any proof that the rule or usage of architects was known to the defendant at the time of the alleged contract with plaintiffs, nor that it was so generally accepted and acted upon by the public as to give it the standing of a custom, reasonable, uniform, and notorious, knowledge of which was to be imputed to him. In the absence of such complementary proof, the law, as we understand it, does not allow that a rule for professional guidance, adopted by organizations or societies of the members of any profession, is competent evidence in their favor in controversies with lay employers regarding the quantum of their compensation. * * * We do not deny the principle illustrated by Sewell v. Corp., 1 Car. & P. 392; Thomas v. Brandt (Md.) 26 Atl. 524, and other cases, that, if there is a general usage, applicable to the charges of a particular profession, it may be looked to in order to determine the compensation to be paid by one who employs an individual of that profession; but we hold that such a usage cannot be proved for that purpose against laymen by showing a rule adopted within the profession only."

This court in a number of cases has held a party to a contract bound by general usage or custom, although he did not know of it. We have held that a general usage cannot become ineffective merely because of an actual or professed ignorance of that custom. Nicoletti v. Bank of Los Banos (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 51. In that case we said:

"This court in Davis v. First National Bank of Fresno, 118 Cal. 600, 50 Pac. 666, held that the usage of the bank to send its commercial paper to its correspondent banks for collection was binding upon the customer, even if he was ignorant of the usage and made no inquiries in reference thereto. In that regard the opinion states as follows:

"The court should also have permitted the defendant to show by the witnesses, which it called for that purpose, the usage of banks in regard to the collection of paper presented by persons who were unknown to them, and that the defendant conformed to that usage (Warren Bank v. Suffolk Bank, 10 Cush. 582). If such usage was reasonable and did not contravene any principles of law, the fact that the defendant followed it would tend to show that it exercised reasonable care in seeking to collect the draft. One who gives a draft to a bank to collect is held to have an implied knowledge of its usage in collecting drafts, so far as such usage does not contravene any rule of law. (Morse on Banking, § 9; Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet. 25.) "The fact that one deals with the bank without taking the trouble to inquire as to its system will raise the implication that he already knows and is satisfied with that system. It is clear that if a person hands over a note to a bank for collection, without any species of remark as to the course to be pursued, the bank is not bound to thrust upon him a statement of its intended course and to retain him until the whole theory has been expounded to him, when his conduct unmistakably shows that either he already knows it, or else he does not desire to know it. Either he knows and approves it, or he voluntarily trusts to the wisdom of the bank at his own deliberately assumed risk of its sufficiency. In such a case the bank not only has a right to assume, but it is even positively bound to assume, that his desire is that the ordinary and established usage be pursued." See, also, San Francisco National Bank v. American National Bank, 5 Cal. App. 408, 190 Pac. 558."

There seems to be no good reason why the rule applied in the case of Nicoletti v. Bank of Los Banos, supra, and in the cases therein cited, should not apply to the purchase of seeds from a person engaged in the business of selling seed.

In connection with the effect of custom upon the transaction here in question, it is suggested, however, that inasmuch as the warranty of the seller of seed to the buyer of seed is an "express" warranty, that such warranty cannot be contradicted or modified by a custom of the seed trade not to warrant their seed sold. This suggestion requires a consideration of the meaning of the term "express warranty" as applied to sales of personal property. In Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) §§ 610, 613, pp. 610, 611, 612, it is said:

"Sec. 610. A warranty in a sale of goods is not one of the essential elements of the contract, for a sale is none the less complete and perfect in the absence of the warranty. But it is a collateral undertaking, forming part of the contract by the agreement of the parties express or implied. [Foster v. Smith, 18 C. B. 156; Mondel v. Steel, 8 M. & W. 858; Street v. Blay, 2 B. & Ad. 456; Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 M. & W. 399.] It follows, therefore, that antecedent representations made by the vendor as an inducement to the buyer, but not forming part of the contract when concluded, are not warranties. * * *

"Sec. 613. No special form of words is necessary to create a warranty. It is nearly two hundred years since Lord Holt first settled the rule, in Cross v. Gardner [Carthew, 90; 3 Mod. 261; 1 Show. 68], and Medina v. Stoughton [1 Lord Raym. 593; L. Salk. 210], which Buller, J., in 1789, laid down in the opinion given by him in the famous leading case of Pasley v. Freeman [3 T. R. 51, at p. 57; 2 Sm. L. O. p. 74 (Ed. 1887)], as follows: 'It was rightly held by Holt, C. J., and has been uniformly adopted ever since, that an affirmation at the time of a sale is a warranty, provided it appear in evidence to have been so intended.'

"And in determining whether it was so intended, a decisive test is, whether the vendor assumes to assert a fact of which the buyer is ignorant, or merely states an opinion or judgment upon a matter of which the vendor has no special knowledge, and on which the buyer may be expected also to have an opinion, and to exercise his judgment. In the former case there is a warranty, in the latter not."

"A warranty is an engagement by which a seller assures to a buyer the existence of some fact affecting the transaction, whether past, present, or future."

This general statement is broad enough to cover mere representations of any fact, unless the word "assures" is given a more limited meaning than the word "represents." The general statement in section 1763, Civil Code, is also limited by the provisions of the next section (1764), as follows:

"Except as prescribed by this article, a mere contract of sale or agreement to sell does not imply a warranty."

The rule for determining whether a representation of a fact is to be treated as an assurance to the buyer, that is, as a warranty, is stated in the articles on "Sales" in Cyc., as follows (35 Cyc. p. 374-5):

"4. Intention of Parties. An affirmation made by the seller with respect to the thing sold amounts to a warranty if it appears to have been so intended and understood by the parties, and not as a mere matter of opinion or judgment. The rule is broadly stated in most decisions that a mere affirmation does not constitute a warranty unless shown to be so intended and understood by the parties, and not as a mere matter of opinion; that in the contract of warranty, there must be an agreement of the minds of the contracting parties as in all other contracts. And while there are decisions to the effect that the actual intent of the seller to warrant the thing sold is immaterial if the affirmations made—whether written or oral—and relied on by the buyer as an inducement to purchase, import a warranty, that the seller is responsible for the language he uses. * * * The true aim in construing every agreement, that of warranty included, is of course, to reach the real intention of the parties to it. This is accomplished, not by taking what they may afterward say their intentions were, but what they appear to have been from the words employed, the occasion of using them, and all accompanying facts and circumstances explanatory thereof. * * *

This court has adopted the rule as stated in Benjamin on Sales and in Cyc. In McLennan v. Ohmen, 75 Cal. 558, 17 Pac. 687, it is said:

"To create an express warranty, the word 'warrant' need not be used, nor are any particular words necessary. Any affirmation made at the time of the sale as to the quality or condition of the thing sold will be treated as a warranty, if it was so intended, and the purchaser bought on the faith of such affirmation; and whether it was so intended, and the purchaser acted upon it, are questions of fact for the jury." (Italics ours.)

This decision followed the earlier case of Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 573, where the rule was stated as follows:

"It is certain that no particular words are necessary to create a warranty. Any affirmation made at the time of sale as to the quality or condition of the thing sold will be treated as a warranty if it was so intended." (Italics ours.)

See, also, Hackett v. Lewis, 36 Cal. App. 687, 688, 173 Pac. 111, and Firth v. Richter, 49 Cal. App. 545, 196 Pac. 277.

It is established by the foregoing authorities that in order that the sale shall be upon a warranty there must be two factors present, first, an affirmation of a fact by the seller with reference to the thing sold, and, second, an intention on the part of the seller that his affirmation shall be a warranty to the buyer. The affirmation of the fact is shown by direct evidence, and the intent to warrant is inferred from the facts and circumstances surrounding the sale. In the case of the sale of seed for planting, the description of the seed by the seller is an affirmation of a fact concerning the thing sold. From the fact that seed is sold for planting and that the description of the seed is therefore a vital element in the contract, the intent, on the part of the dealer, to warrant that vital fact to the buyer is inferred. We thus have the two essentials of a warranty.

If, however, there is a general custom among sellers of seed not to warrant the seed sold by them, we cannot, in the face of this universal custom, infer an intent on their part to warrant the seed from the facts and circumstances of the sale, because among these facts and circumstances is the custom of nonwarranty, which precludes the inference of an intent to warrant. In such a case the proof of the custom does not contradict or vary the terms of an express warranty, but establishes that there never was any [express] warranty at all, for the intent to warrant was absent. It is conceded in this case that if the purchaser knew of the custom he could not recover, and the court so instructed the jury. This being conceded, the only remaining question is whether a purchaser who contracts with dealers in seed is bound by such a general custom of the seed trade, even if ignorant of the custom. A customer cannot by his mere ignorance of a general custom of nonwarranty impose upon a dealer a contract of warranty which he never intended to make and which the slightest inquiry would disclose to the purchaser was not intended to be made.

[6, 7] Our Code points to the same conclusion we have reached by a consideration of the decisions from this and other states, and from the fundamental principles involved in the transaction. "A contract is either express or implied." Civ. Code, § 1619. "An express contract is one, the terms of which are stated in words." Civ. Code, § 1620. "An implied contract is one, the existence and terms of which are manifested by conduct." Civ. Code, § 1621. So far, then, as a warranty is based upon the language used by the parties, it is an express contract, and so far as it is "manifested by conduct," it is an "implied contract." From other Code sections it is clear that in determining whether or not a contract of warranty is to be thus implied we may consider general custom or usage. "A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates." Civ. Code, § 1647. "However broad may be the terms of a contract, it extends only to those things concerning which it appears that the parties intended to contract." Civ. Code, § 1648. "Stipulations, which are necessary to make a contract * * * conformable to usage, are implied, in respect to matters concerning which the contract manifests no contrary intention." Civ. Code, § 1655. (Italics ours.) "All things that in law or usage are considered as incidental to a contract, or as necessary to carry it into effect, are implied therefrom, unless some of them are expressly mentioned therein, when all other things of the same class are deemed to be excluded." Civ. Code, § 1656. (Italics ours.)

The foregoing Code rules are laid down

"for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties to a contract. * * * " Civ. Code, § 1637. It is clear, then, that general custom or usage must be considered in determining the intent of the parties, and are in effect a part of the contract unless the contract manifests a contrary intention. Civ. Code, § 1655, supra.

It should be noted that we are discussing proposed instructions to a jury concerning a general custom, and not an undisclosed custom of an individual seller, or a purely local custom, of which the buyer was ignorant.

The court erred in refusing the defendant's proposed instructions.

Judgment reversed.

We concur: MYERS, J.; WASTE, J.; KERRIGAN, J.; LENNON, J.

SEAWELL, J. I dissent. The indisputable facts of this case are that defendant is a corporation, doing a general seed and plant business throughout Southern California, with its principal place of business at Los Angeles, this state. Plaintiff was engaged in raising for sale in the market of San Diego and vicinity a variety of celery known as the Golden Yellow. Eight acres of his 18-acre holding situate at Chula Vista, San Diego county, were devoted to this use. He had been a grower of celery for something like 40 years.

On March 16, 1920, through the United States mail, he forwarded from Chula Vista to defendant the following order, written on plain letter paper:

"Germain Seed Company: Please send me twenty dollars worth of celery seed, the Golden Yellow Cali stock. Inclosed find money order for same. From the French stock I also have a bal due me for $20 & 10 cents for seed I sold to Brackenhoff. He refers me to you for payment for same. He claims you have taken over the seed when he sold. Please let me know what I can do about it & oblige. Res. Ben. Miller. Nat. Ave & B St. Chula Vista, Cali."

A second letter was as follows:

"April 8, 1920. Germain Seed Co.: Please send me 12 dollars worth of celery seed of French Golden self-bleaching Cali stock, and oblige Ben Miller, National & E St. Chula Vista, Cal. Inclosed find money order for same."

No reply by letter was made by defendant to either of said orders, but in response thereto defendant forwarded to plaintiff's address by common carrier two bags of celery seed which were received by him in the due course of transportation. The first order was for the use of plaintiff. The second order was for the use of his son, Fred Miller, and Oscar Lehner. Written or printed on the forwarding tags were the words:

"Ben Miller. National Avenue at E Street, Chula Vista, California. From Germain Seed and Plant Co., Los Angeles, California."

Upon each bag there was stamped the word "Germain," beneath which appeared the words "Germain Seeds germinate. Seeds. Los Angeles, California." Neither the tags nor the bags bore any other words or marks.

The seed forwarded was not true to the variety ordered, but was a different and inferior variety known as Green celery seed. Relying upon defendant to furnish the variety ordered, and believing the seed received to be of such variety, plaintiff in good faith planted said seed in beds prepared for that purpose, raising 240,000 plants, 80,000 of which were transplanted in four acres of soil prepared to receive them, and 180,000 of said plants were reserved to be planted later on an additional four acres which also had been prepared for that purpose, but which were not subsequently planted because it became apparent that the plants were not of the Golden Yellow variety, but were of a worthless variety and possessed no market value whatsoever. Plaintiff suffered a substantial loss. The soil had been fertilized and carefully prepared for celery raising. Considerable care and attention is required to successfully plant, cultivate, bleach, and prepare this plant for the market. In addition to the expense of putting the soil in condition to receive the plants, plaintiff sustained the loss of the use of his land for farming or other profitable uses, and his time and labor. He was further damaged by being deprived of the gains which he would have received had the seed been true to variety. It was shown that had the celery seed been of the Golden Yellow variety the acreage sown by plaintiff should have yielded a crop of 75,000 bunches of Golden Yellow celery, which would have brought a return of $1.25 per dozen bunches; but, being of a kind that was not marketable, the entire crop was lost. Plaintiff placed his loss at $11,900. The jury returned a verdict in his favor in the sum of $4,000.

The second bag of seed was planted by Oscar Lehner and Fred Miller with like disastrous results. The evidence fully sustained the claim that the Green variety of celery was of no market value while the Golden Yellow was readily marketable and brought a good price. It is admitted that there is no known test by which any one of the several varieties of celery seed may be distinguished from any other variety. The true character of the plant cannot be readily determined until it reaches an advanced stage of development known as the "bleaching period."

Defendant admits that for a period of 15 years it had supplied plaintiff with celery seed. Also that it knew that plaintiff grew and raised Golden Yellow celery. This admission goes to the point that the defendant had knowledge of the special use that was to be made of the seed, to wit, planting.

Such knowledge on the part of the seller is a highly important factor and furnishes a very strong reason, as pointed out by the leading authorities on this subject, for the application of the principle of warranty to cases in which the seller, such as here, assumed from the nature of his business, a superior knowledge of the thing sold.

Defendant admits that the celery seed furnished by it to plaintiff was not of the variety ordered and by way of answer alleges that it attempted in good faith to fill said order in compliance with plaintiff's directions and that it believed and had good reason to believe that the seed shipped to plaintiff was Golden Yellow celery seed, and if not of that variety the defendant was ignorant of the fact. By way of avoidance it is alleged to be the "general established usage and custom of the seed business in the state of California, and in compliance with and in conformity to its own usage and custom in that behalf, the said defendant inclosed with each package containing said seed a slip upon which was printed the following: "The Germain Seed and Plant Company gives no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness or any other matter, of seeds, bulbs, plants, or trees they send out and they will not be responsible in any way for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms they are at once to be returned."

Defendant further alleges that for a period of 15 years prior to the commencement of the action plaintiff had at various times purchased seed from defendant, and in each instance there was inclosed in the package containing said seed a slip upon which was printed the notice of nonwarranty as above set out; that plaintiff at the time of ordering said Golden Yellow celery seed and at the time of the receipt of the packages containing said seed well knew and was fully advised that it was the established usage and custom of the seed trade in the state of California and also of the defendant not to warrant, expressly or impliedly, any seed as to description, quality, or productiveness. The knowledge on the part of plaintiff of the existence of usage and custom as pleaded was denied by plaintiff, as was the allegation that any such usage or custom prevailed.

The small loose-leaf slips, one of which it is claimed was inclosed in each bag of seed, contained the following nonwarranty notice:

"Germain seeds germinate. The Germain Seed and Plant Company gives no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness or any other matter, of seeds, bulbs, plants, or trees they send out and they will not be responsible in any way for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms they are at once to be returned."

The same notice closely printed appears in appellant's elaborate catalogue and was printed on the order blanks and on other stationery used by it. Respondent denied that he was at all familiar with appellant's catalogues or had ever seen said notice, printed or published, and had no knowledge, either directly or indirectly, of said disclaimer notice. Respondent, his wife, and his son, testified that the seed bags contained no nonwarranty notice or disclaimer and that there was nothing inside the bags except the celery seed, and nothing by way of notice on the outside of the bag or container—the place where the public have become educated to look for directions and instructions—save that which has already been set out. All disputed questions of fact were passed upon adversely to appellant's contention by the jury and finally by the trial court in denying appellant's motion for a new trial. There is sufficient evidence in the record to sustain a finding supporting the contention of respondent on questions of disputed facts and the jury's findings in this respect cannot be disturbed.

In view of the fact that the opinion of the court does not definitely decide—omitting from a consideration of the case all questions of custom—whether or not the main facts of the case which are practically agreed upon constitute a warranty as that term relates to sales of seed when sold with the knowledge on the part of the seller that they are to be planted by the purchaser, justifies an extended review of the general subject. An apparent distinction is observed by the authorities in cases where seed or grain or corn is bought without a knowledge of the use to be made of it and cases where the seller has knowledge that it is to be planted for a specific purpose of husbandry. In the latter case the rule is given stricter application.

The second distinction, which must also be kept in mind, is the one made by the decisions and text-writers between a warranty as to kind—the thing itself—and the quality of the thing sold. It is true that the terms "express warranty" and "implied warranty" are frequently loosely used by courts and by text-writers, but in the final analysis a warranty is but what the term implies and the means by which it is established do not create degrees of warranty, that is to say, one of a higher and another of a lesser degree. The Code of this state (section 1764, Civ. Code) makes no such distinction and goes no farther than to say that a warranty is not implied (established) except as prescribed by the articles defining warranty. This particular subject will hereafter be adverted to.

In addition to the principal authorities cited in the main opinion a few others not directly cited therein, but which are relied upon by appellant, will be noticed. An examination of the cases cited to support the main opinion and which involve the question of warranty as to sales of seed, exclusively, will show that not one rests its decision upon the sole ground that general custom furnished an absolutely satisfactory answer to the claim of warranty. The conclusion in each case consists of a grouping of composite elements. In some of the cases cited to that end it will appear that the purchaser was directly or indirectly chargeable with notice of nonwarranty which was brought to his attention in some form. In others the contract of sale contained a nonwarranty clause or the case showed that the buyer, so far as knowledge of the transaction was concerned (perhaps through agencies) stood on an equal plane of vantage with the seller. In other words, there is to be found in said cases some consideration which differentiates the facts of those cases from the instant case.

The two cases most carefully considered and widely cited in American jurisdictions on the subject of warranty of seed and the seller's liability thereunder and which have been cited by this court with favor are Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. Law, 262, 13 Am. Rep. 438; Id., 38 N. J. Law, 496, 20 Am. Rep. 425, and White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13. Each is an example of exhaustive research, and the soundness of the principles enunciated by their respective authors remain unshaken to this day. The first may be thus stated: Mount, a market gardener, applied to Wolcott & Co., merchants, who kept agricultural and other seed for sale, for "Early strap-leaf red-top turnip seed." Wolcott sold him seed which he said was of that kind and which was bought by Mount as such. Mount informed Wolcott at the time of purchase that he wanted the kind of seed described to raise a crop for the early market. Mount sowed the seed, and it turned out to have been another kind of turnip seed of an inferior quality. The representation was made in good faith, Wolcott & Co. having purchased the seed as "early strap-leaf red-top" turnip seed. In an action by Mount for a breach of warranty, it was held that the question whether the statements made by Wolcott were merely an expression of opinion or a warranty was one of fact in the court below, and the evidence tending to show that a warranty was made, the finding could not be reviewed. The measure of damages was there held, as it is in this state, to be the difference between the value of the market crop raised and the same crop from the seed ordered. The seed sold to Mount by Wolcott was sown upon ground which he had prepared with care and great expense for the purpose. He had been in the habit, year after year, to sow early strap-leaf red-top turnip seed to produce turnips for the early New York market, such kind and description of turnips yielding a large profit and at the time of purchase he stated that he wished this description and kind of seed for that purpose. The turnips produced from the seed purchased and sown were not early strap-leaf red-top turnips, but of a kind and description not salable and fit only for cattle feed, and his entire crop was lost. It was agreed that Wolcott did not know that the seed sold was not the kind ordered and no fraud is charged in the transaction. It was also agreed that the kind of turnip seed attempted to be purchased could not be known or distinguished by examination through sight or touch from other kinds, but only by the kind of turnips it produced after sowing. It is a case in all respects applicable to the facts here presented. The close resemblance of the facts of that case with the case at bar and its able and excellent review of our earlier American and English cases is a sufficient justification for the extended quotation which follows:

"In the well-known case of Chandelor v. Lopus, Cro. Jac. 4, it was decided that a bare affirmation that a stone sold was a bezoar stone, when it was not, was no cause of action.

"The cases cited fairly present the negative of the proposition on which the plaintiff's right of action depends. Chandelor v. Lopus was decided on the distinction between actions on the case in tort for a misrepresentation, in which a scienter must be averred and proved and actions upon the contract of warranty. 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 283. Chancellor Kent, who delivered the opinion in Seixas v. Woods, in his Commentaries expresses a doubt whether the maxim, caveat emptor, was correctly applied in that case, inasmuch as there was a description in writing of the article sold, from which a warranty might have been inferred. 2 Kent, 479. And in a recent case before the commission of appeals of New York, Earl, C., declared that Seixas v. Woods had been much questioned and could no longer be regarded as authority on the precise point. Hawkins v. Pemberton, 51 N. Y. 204. In the later English cases some criticism has been made upon the application of the term 'warranty' to representations in contracts of sale, descriptive of articles which are known in the market by such description, per Lord Abinger in Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 M. & W. 404; per Erle, C. J., in Bannerman v. White, 10 C. B. (N. S.) 844. But in a number of instances it has been held that statements descriptive of the subject-matter, if intended as a substantive part of the contract, will be regarded in the first instance as conditions, on the failure of which the other party may repudiate in toto, by a refusal to accept or a return of the article, if that be practicable, or if part of the consideration has been received, and rescission therefore has become impossible, such representations change their character as conditions and become warranties, for the breach of which an action will lie to recover damages. The rule of law is thus stated by Williams, J., in Behn v. Burness, as established on principle and sustained by authority, 3 B. & S. 755.

"In Bridge v. Wain, 1 Starkie, 504, no special warranty was proved, but the goods were described as scarlet cuttings, an article known in the market as peculiar to the China trade. In an action for breach of warranty, Lord Ellenborough held that if the goods were sold by the name of scarlet cuttings, and were so described in the invoice, an undertaking that they were such must be inferred. In Allan v. Lake, 18 Q. B. 560, the defendant sold to the plaintiff a crop of turnips, described in the sold note as Skirving's Sweetes. The seed having been sown, it turned out that the greater part was not of that kind, but of an inferior kind. It was held that the statement that the seeds were Skirving's Sweetes was a description of a known article of trade and a warranty. In Josling v. Kingsfold, 13 C. B. (N. S.) 447, the purchaser recovered damages upon a contract for the sale of oxalic acid, where the jury found that the article delivered did not, in a commercial sense, come properly within the description of oxalic acid, though the vendor was not the manufacturer, and the vendee had an opportunity of inspection (the defect not being discoverable by inspection), and no fraud was suggested. In Wieler v. Schillizzi, 17 C. B. 619, the sale was of 'Calcutta linseed.' The goods had been delivered, and the action was in form on the warranty implied from the description. The jury having found that the article delivered had lost its distinctive character as Calcutta linseed, by reason of the admixture of a foreign substance, the plaintiff recovered his damages upon the warranty.

"The doctrine that on the sale of a chattel as being of a particular kind or description, a contract is implied that the article sold is of that kind or description, is also sustained by the following English cases: Powell v. Horton, 2 Bing. N. S. 668; Barr v. Gibson, 3 M. & W. 390; Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 id. 399; Nichol v. Godts, 10 Exch. 191; Gompertz v. Bartlett, 2 E. & B. 849; Azemar v. Casella, Law Rep., 2 C. P. 431, 677; and has been approved by some decisions in the courts of this country. Henshaw v. Robins, 9 Metc. 83; Borrekins v. Bevan, 3 Rawle, 23; Osgood v. Lewis, 2 Harr. & Gill, 495; Hawkins v. Pemberton, 51 N. Y. 198, 10 Am. Rep. 595.

"The right to repudiate the purchase for the nonconformity of the article delivered to the description under which it was sold is universally conceded. That right is founded on the engagement of the vendor, by such description, that the article delivered shall correspond with the description. The obligation rests upon the contract. Substantially, the description is warranted. It will comport with sound legal principles to treat such engagements as conditions in order to afford the purchaser a more enlarged remedy, by rescission, than he would have on a simple warranty; but when his situation has been changed, and the remedy, by repudiation, has become impossible, no reason, supported by principle, can be adduced why he should not have upon his contract such redress as is practicable under the circumstances. In that situation of affairs the only available means of redress is by an action for damages. Whether the action shall be technically considered an action on a warranty, or an action for the nonperformance of a contract, is entirely immaterial.

"The contract which arises from the description of an article on a sale by a dealer not being the manufacturer, is not in all respects co-extensive with that which is sometimes implied, where the vendor is the manufacturer, and the goods are ordered by a particular description, or for a specified purpose, without opportunity for inspection, in which case, a warranty, under some circumstances, is implied that the goods shall be merchantable, or reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were ordered. In general, the only contract which arises on the sale of an article by a description, by its known designation in the market, is that it is of the kind specified. If the article corresponds with that description, no warranty is implied that it shall answer the particular purpose in view of which the purchase was made. Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 M. & W. 414; Ollivant v. Bayley, 5 Q. B. 288; Windsor v. Lombard, 18 Peck. 55; Mixer v. Coburn, 11 Metc. 559; Gossler v. Eagle, etc., Co., 103 Mass. 331. The cases on this subject, so productive of judicial discussion, are classified by Justice Mellor, in Jones v. Just, Law Rep. 3 Q. B. 197. Nor can any distinction be maintained between statements of this character in written and in oral contracts. The arguments founded on an apprehension that where the contract is oral, loose expressions of judgment or opinion pending the negotiations might be regarded as embodied in the contract, contrary to the intentions of parties, is without reasonable foundation. It is always a question of construction or of fact, whether such statements were the expression of a mere matter of opinion, or were intended to be a substantive part of the contract when concluded. If the contract is in writing, the question is one of construction for the court. Behn v. Burmiss, 3 B. & S. 751. If it be concluded by parol, it will be for the determination of the jury, from the nature of the sale, and the circumstances of each particular case, whether the language used was an expression of opinion, merely leaving the buyer to exercise his own judgment, or whether it was intended and understood to be an undertaking which was a contract on the part of the seller. Lomi v. Tucker, 4 C. & P. 15; De Sewhanberg v. Buchanan, 5 Id. 343; Power v. Barham, 4 A. & E. 473. In the case last cited, the vendor sold by a bill of parcel, 'four pictures, views in Venice-Canaletto;' it was held that it was for the jury to say, under all circumstances, what was the effect of the words, and whether they implied a warranty of genuineness, or conveyed only a description or an expression of opinion, and that the bill of parcels was properly laid before the jury with the rest of the evidence.

"The purchaser may contract for a specific article, as well as for a particular quality, and if the seller makes such a contract, he is bound by it. The state of the case presented shows that the plaintiff inquired for seed of a designated kind, and informed the defendants that he wanted it to raise a crop for the New York market. The defendants showed him the seed, and told him it was the kind he inquired for, and sold it to him as such. The inspection and examination of the seed were of no service to the plaintiff. The facts and circumstances attending the transaction were before the court below, and from the evidence, it decided that the proof was sufficient to establish a contract of warranty. The evidence tended to support that conclusion, and this court cannot, on certiorari, review the finding of the court below, on a question of fact, where there is evidence from which the conclusion arrived at may be lawfully inferred."

The case of White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13, is equally direct to the issue of warranty. The question was whether there had been a warranty by the defendants that the seed sold to plaintiff was "genuine large Bristol cabbage seed." The facts follow:

"The defendants were growers of garden seeds for sale, and the plaintiffs were market gardeners raising vegetables for sale in the market. In 1867 they bought of the defendants cabbage seed, of the variety known as large Bristol cabbage seed, which produced Bristol cabbage. In the fall of 1867 Miller, one of the trustees of the defendants, informed the plaintiffs that they had raised that year 200 pounds of Bristol cabbage seed, like that the plaintiffs had had, and solicited them to come early if they wished any."

The defendants knew that plaintiffs were market gardeners and desired a particular variety of seed that would produce Bristol cabbages which were a valuable variety for market. The plaintiffs in making the purchase of said seed went to the store of the defendants following the conversation above related and on making known their business to the defendants' clerk the latter produced a printed catalogue of the seeds the defendants had for sale and exhibited it to the plaintiffs; among the seeds in the list was large Bristol cabbage seed. Plaintiffs then ordered, among other seed, six pounds of Bristol cabbage seed. Some days afterwards the seed was delivered at a store for plaintiffs. In the bill the cabbage seed was described as six pounds large cabbage seed.

It is true that the opinion states that the "grower of seeds must be presumed to be cognizant of any omissions or negligence in cultivation, whereby they have been deteriorated or rendered unfit for use"; but the decision nevertheless is placed upon the general principle that a bargain and sale of a chattel of a particular description imports a contract of warranty that the article sold is of that description and it matters not whether it be an article manufactured by another than the seller or whether it be seed sold by one who was not the grower. The authorities cited in the opinion support this view. It is there said:

"The doctrine that a bargain and sale of a chattel of a particular description imports a contract or warranty that the article sold is of that description, is sustained by a great weight of judicial authority. The cases of Seixas v. Wood (2 Caines, 48) and Swett v. Colgate (20 J. R. 196), based mainly upon the authority of the case of Chandelor v. Lopus (Cro. 1, 4), are, it must be admitted, adverse to this view. The case of Chandelor v. Lopus has been overruled in England, and the cases in this state referred to have been often questioned, and Chancellor Kent, who took part in deciding Seixas v. Wood, intimates in his commentaries a doubt whether the case was correctly decided. (2 Kent, 479.) The case of Hawkins v. Pemberton (51 N. Y. 198), adopts, as the law in this state, the doctrine upon this subject now prevailing elsewhere, that a sale of a chattel by a particular description, is a warranty that the article sold is of the kind specified; and this case was recognized in Dounce v. Dow (64 N. Y. 411), as modifying the doctrine of Seixas v. Wood and Swett v. Colgate. We think the modern doctrine upon the subject is reasonable, and proceeds upon a just interpretation of the contract of sale. A dealer who sells an article, describing it by the name of an article of commerce, the identity of which is not known to the purchaser, must understand that the latter relies upon the description as a representation by the seller that it is the thing described; and this constitutes a warranty. We content ourselves without further argument, with referring to some of the cases bearing upon this question, which must, we think, be regarded as decisive. (Barr v. Gibson, 3 M. & W. 390; Budge v. Main, 1 Har. 505; Shepherd v. Kain, 5 B. & Ald., 210; Baker v. Barness, 3 B. & S. 749; Allan v. Lake, 18 Ad. & El. [N. S.] 561; Powder v. Barbour, Ad. & El. 473; Bomerkin v. Bevan, 3 S. & R. 37; Henshaw v. Robbins, 9 Met. 83; Hawkins v. Pemberton, supra.)

"The referee was, therefore, justified in finding that the defendants warranted the seed sold to the plaintiffs to be large Bristol cabbage seed, from the fact that the plaintiffs applied to purchase that description of seed; and that the seed delivered was designated in the bill of parcels as large Bristol cabbage seed. * * * Aside from the warranty raised in this case by the description in the bill of parcels, there was, also, upon the sale in question, within the authority of Hoe v. Sanborn (21 N. Y. 552), a warranty implied by law, that the seed sold were free from any latent defect arising from the mode of cultivation. It was decided in Hoe v. Sanborn, that upon a sale of a chattel by a manufacturer, a warranty is implied that the article sold is free from any latent defect growing out of the process of manufacture. The rule is based on the presumed superior knowledge of the vendor; and there seems to be the same reason for implying a warranty on a sale of seeds by the grower, that they are not defective from improper cultivation, as to imply a warranty of freedom from defects in the manufacture, on a sale by a manufacturer of the article made by him. The grower of seeds must be presumed to be cognizant of any omissions or negligence in cultivation, whereby they have been deteriorated or rendered unfit for use."

In this case it will be observed that Miller was not only the seller of the seed, but also had raised it. The seed was grown upon Bristol cabbage stocks, but the stocks had been planted in the vicinity of stocks of other varieties of cabbage, had become fertilized by the pollen therefrom, and in consequence of the crossing of the varieties, the seed grown upon the Bristol cabbage stock became hybridized and were not genuine Bristol cabbage seed, but had lost their character and quality and the plants raised by the plaintiff from the seed purchased from defendants in consequence of such crossing were of no known variety of cabbage and were of no value except as food for cattle. The misfortune of the situation was not deemed sufficient to relieve defendants of the obligation of their warranty.

In the footnote to the case of Meehan v. Ingalls, Ann. Cas. 1918B, pp. 71, 75 (91 Wash. 86, 157 Pac. 217), it is said:

"The courts are not altogether agreed as to whether the warranty which results from the furnishing of seed in response to a request for a particular variety is express or implied. * * * The weight of authority is however that in any sale of seed specifically designated by name or variety the seller warrants that it is in fact of the kind or variety indicated."

See Sanford v. Brown Bros., 208 N. Y. 90, 101 N. E. 797, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 778; Jones v. George, 61 Tex. 345, 43 Am. Rep. 280; Cline v. Mock, 150 Mo. App. 431, 131 S. W. 710; Edgar v. Breck & Sons Corporation, 172 Mass. 581, 52 N. E. 1083 (opinion by Mr. Justice Holmes).

Another judicial landmark in this country as to what words or acts amount to an express warranty in this class of cases is Hoffman v. Dixon, 105 Wis. 315, 81 N. W. 491, 76 Am. St. Rep. 916. This is one of the leading cases on the subject and is known in the books as the "rape seed case." The facts were: The plaintiff, a farmer, sent his son to defendant's store to purchase rape seed. The merchant kept seed for sale. The son asked the clerk if they had rape seed for sale and the latter replied that they had and weighed out the amount desired. Neither the son, the clerk, the defendant, nor the plaintiff knew rape seed from wild mustard seed, which the article sold proved to be, and each was wholly unaware of the ignorance of the others. The son relying upon the fact that the seed sold to him was what he called for; the plaintiff planted the seed, relying upon the fact that it was sold as rape seed. The wild mustard seed fouled plaintiff's lands to his injury. A nonsuit was granted and the Supreme Court of Wisconsin reversed it. A very thorough and interesting review is made of the many authorities bearing on the subject. We quote from the closing portion of the opinion:

"With but few exceptions, which we shall not take time or space to refer to specifically, the judicial authorities and the text writers as well are in harmony with the foregoing. Biddle, Warranties, § 108. That rule is just. It holds a dealer responsible for breach of contract when he sells a thing as being of a particular kind, if it does not answer the description, the vendee not knowing whether the vendor's representations are true or false, but relying upon them as true. There is no good reason why a dealer should be permitted to exhibit seed to his customers, asserting it to be rape seed when it is something else, and then protect himself from the consequences of his falsehood by a plea of ignorance. The injury by the deception is just as great whether it be wilful or innocent. The customer has the same right to rely upon the representation in the one case as in the other. Knowledge on the part of the vendor is not essential either to actionable fraud or a contract of warranty.

"Applying the principle stated to the facts of this case, what was the contract between the parties? Upon what did their minds meet? The answer must be, that the defendant would sell to the plaintiff rape seed and that the seed delivered was of that kind. Opportunity on the part of the plaintiff to inspect does not militate against his right to insist upon the condition of the contract as to the identity of the article delivered being made good, since he relied wholly on his contract, not knowing whether the article he received answered such condition or not, and not being chargeable with negligence because he did not know. In such a case the doctrine of implied warranty does not apply, but the doctrine of express warranty does. No particular form of expression or words is necessary to make an express contract of warranty. The word 'warranty' is not necessary to it. An affirmation of the fact as to the kind or quality of an article offered for sale, of which the vendee is ignorant, but upon which he relies in purchasing such article, is as much a binding contract of warranty as a formal agreement using the plainest and most unequivocal language on the subject. In Benj. Sales (6th Ed.) 623, 625, as conclusions from a review of authorities in this country and England, including the New York cases overruling Seixas v. Woods, it is said: 'All agree that any positive affirmation of a material fact as a fact, intended by the vendor as and for a warranty, and relied upon as such, is sufficient' to constitute a warranty. 'The better class of cases hold that a positive affirmation of a material fact as a fact, intended to be relied upon as such and which is so relied upon, constitutes in law a warranty, whether the vendor mentally intended to warrant or not.' The latter is the doctrine of this court, as indicated by numerous cases where it has been applied. Austin v. Nickerson, 21 Wis. 542; Giffert v. West, 33 Wis. 617; Neave v. Arntz, 56 Wis. 174; White v. Stelloh, 74 Wis. 435.

"It follows from the foregoing that the decision of the trial court that the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to the facts of this case, and that the evidence does not justify a finding that the defendant warranted the seed to plaintiff to be rape seed and that he was entitled to recover for a breach of it, was erroneous, and the nonsuit was improperly granted." (Italics ours.)

Mr. Williston, in his work on Sales, at page 224, says:

"In the early English law it is probable that all warranties were collateral in form, but in the early English law promises implied in fact were not recognized and the doctrine of caveat emptor was carried so far that unless the seller expressly said that he warranted the goods there was no obligation imposed upon him in regard to their quality. In the nature of the case, therefore, the seller had to make a separate and distinct promise; that is, a promise collateral in form. At the present day, however, it is clear in England and elsewhere that a promise need not be collateral in form in order to constitute a warranty. When A. contracts to sell B. a sound horse, there is no collateral promise. Yet if A. delivers to B. an unsound horse and B. takes title to him, A. is a warrantor of the horse's soundness with precisely the same consequences as if he had sold the horse with a separate statement, 'I warrant him sound.' Further, it may be supposed that specified goods are sold in compliance with an order describing the goods desired. A buyer asks for 'strap-leaf red-top turnip seed' or 'large Bristol cabbage seed' or 'rape seed' or bulbs of a named variety. No agreement to sell precedes the actual sale, but when the seller furnishes goods, he is said to warrant that the goods are of the kind asked for, yet the description is not collateral in form."

Mr. Benjamin, in his work on Sales (7th Ed. 611), under the chapter of express warranty, quotes from Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 51, the following:

"It was rightly held by Holt, C. J., and has been uniformly adopted ever since, that an affirmation at the time of a sale is a warranty, providing it appear in evidence to have been so intended."

Continuing, he says:

"And in determining whether it was so intended, a decisive test is, whether the vendor assumes to assert a fact of which the buyer is ignorant, or merely states an opinion or judgment upon a matter of which the vendor has no special knowledge, and on which the buyer may be expected also to have an opinion, and to exercise his judgment. In the former case there is a warranty, in the latter not. * * * In relation to express warranties, the rules for interpreting them do not differ from those applied to other contracts. The intention of the parties is sought and carried into effect, and in some cases, even where the alleged warranty was expressed in writing, it has been left to the jury to say whether the intention of the parties was that the representation or affirmation should constitute a warranty or not, for simplex commendatio non obligata."

The more recent cases hold that a positive affirmation understood and relied upon as such by the vendee is an express warranty. Fairbanks Canning Co. v. Metzger et al., 118 N. Y. 260, 265, 23 N. E. 372, 16 Am. St. Rep. 753. See, also, Gubner v. Vick, 42 Hun (N. Y.) 657, 6 N. Y. St. Rep. 4.

Appellant cites a line of cases to the effect that personal property may be sold with or without warranty. This point is conceded. An examination, however, of the cases cited by appellant to sustain the contention that the rule of caveat emptor applies to the case at bar will show that in practically every one there exists some fact or condition which clearly distinguishes the instant case from those cited. We will briefly refer to a few of them.

In Leonard Seed Co. v. Crary Canning Co., 147 Wis. 166, 132 N. W. 902, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 79, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1077, plaintiff agreed to sell defendant a certain variety of peas. Among other things, plaintiff agreed to furnish a thousand bushels of "Advancer" peas and guaranteed 75 per cent. delivery. Said peas were to be grown during the season of 1909. The peas were sold by defendant to farmers for the purpose of planting under contracts by virtue of which the farmer agreed to sell the peas raised from such seed to defendant. Defendant had given its promissory notes in payment for the seed. Plaintiff brought an action upon said notes. Defendant interposed a counterclaim that said peas were not "Advancer" peas and were received without knowledge of that fact and that there was no means of discovering that they were not "Advancer" peas until the seed had germinated. The contract of sale of the peas contained a provision of nonwarranty very similar to the provision which it is alleged in the instant case was printed on a slip and enclosed in each bag of celery seed. The court held in that case that a dealer could by contract exempt itself from warranty.

In Seattle Seed Co. v. A. Fujimori, 79 Wash. 123, 139 Pac. 866, it was held that the sale and delivery of "Alaska" or "Early Alaska" garden pea seed was made subject to the printed condition contained in the seed bag which the trial court found to be a condition of the sale. There was also in the record evidence that "a general custom prevails in the seed trade of making all sales subject to the conditions named on the printed slips." The court said:

"This, coupled with the evidence that the printed slips were placed in each bag of seed, is sufficient to support the finding that the sale was made without warranty or condition, and warranty or condition that the seed was true to name could not be inferred," citing as authority Leonard Seed Co. v. Crary Canning Co., supra, and Blizzard Bros. v. Growers' Canning Co., 152 Iowa, 257, 132 N. W. 66.

It would seem from the quoted language that neither one of the two elements standing alone was quite sufficient to support the court's conclusion.

In Blizzard Bros. v. Growers' Canning Co., supra, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant "to plant and properly cultivate three acres of pumpkins, all of which he agrees to deliver to the factory of said company in good condition for canning purposes." The seed was to be furnished to the growers by the company. No particular variety of seed was named. The company being out of pumpkin seed inquired of the Younkerman Seed Company if it had the large cheese pumpkin seed and was informed that it had. Blizzard Bros. were directed to said seedhouse and inquired if a package of large pumpkin seed was there for them. A clerk of the company responded in the affirmative and handed them a pound package on which was written, "Large cheese pumpkin seed." The seed was planted, but proved to be of an inferior pumpkin and the canning company refused to accept them. Suit was filed against the canning company and the seed company was made a party defendant. The canning company denied liability and in a cross-petition alleged the fault to be that of the seed company and prayed for such judgment against it as might be entered against the cross-petitioner. The seed company pleaded that it was the general custom of dealers in seed to sell with disclaimer as to quality or whether true to name, and on all packages there was customarily printed a nonwarranty notice similar to the notice brought to our attention in the instant case. It is there said:

"The evidence that a general custom, such as pleaded, prevails in the seed trade was conclusive. The particular package had the printed matter thereon [nonwarranty notice], and, though this may not have been noticed, the sale is presumed to have been negotiated with reference to the general custom of the trade."

Three Iowa cases are cited, two of which deal with mining customs. The court held, however, that inasmuch as the canning company undertook to furnish seed of no specific kind, but such as was suitable for canning purposes, the clear implication was that the seed furnished should have been such as would produce that quality of pumpkin. It will be borne in mind that the contract out of which the suit sprang was as to quality and not as to variety. In fact, the contract between plaintiff and defendant called only for any variety of pumpkin seed suitable for canning purposes. The case cited under its own peculiar facts is not authority against the principle contended for by appellant in the instant case.

Perhaps as strong a case as can be found in appellant's favor and upon which much reliance is placed is Ross v. Northrup, King & Co., 156 Wis. 327, 144 N. W. 1124. The principle there announced is in the main essentially in line with the Walcott, Miller, and other approved authority. It expressly recognizes the rule to be, leaving any question of custom out of consideration, that where a certain variety of seed is called for and is furnished in response to such call, there is a warranty that it is true to description unless the seller advises the purchaser that the sale is made without warranty. The facts stated are entirely different from the facts of the instant case. There the seed was ordered from the printed catalogue, upon a printed blank order sheet, upon each of which was printed a disclaimer of warranty, and upon one side of the shipping tag attached to the bag of seed was conspicuously printed in red letters a specific refusal to warrant as to description, quality, productiveness, etc. In addition to this, the invoice contained a statement similar to that in the catalogue as to nonwarranty. There was convincing evidence to show that a disclaimer or nonwarranty was printed on the bag containing the tobacco seed also. Here the facts are altogether different. The seed was not ordered from a printed catalogue nor was the order given upon a blank order sheet containing a nonwarranty or disclaimer notice. On the contrary, the bag containing the seed bore the suggestive words, "Germain seeds germinate." The court, after disposing of the question that was fully determinative of the case, to wit, that the sale was made without warranty by reason of the circumstances above related, proceeds to discuss the special finding of the jury and holds that at the time of the sale there was "a general custom in the Northwest, including Wisconsin, among seedsmen such as defendant, to refuse to warrant seeds," and holds that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the finding by the jury of a general custom. The plaintiff's agent, who was held to have been charged with knowledge of general custom, was a seller of seeds. The Leonard Seed Case and the Blizzard Case are cited as authorities, and, strange as it may appear, the case of Hoffman v. Dixon, supra, is also cited with approval. The latter is a leading case, to the effect that where a certain variety of seed is called for and purchased in response to such call that this constitutes not an implied warranty but an express warranty. The economical reasons which received the attention of the court in the case of Ross v. Northrup are by no means persuasive, as surely sounder reasons resting upon economical grounds could be stated in behalf of the claim of the planter and producer than any that may be advanced in favor of the seller of seed.

The case of Kircher v. Conrad, 9 Mont. 191, 23 Pac. 74, 7 L. R. A. 471, 18 Am. St. Rep. 731, is inapplicable to the facts before us. It is not a case in point. But the law, as stated by the Supreme Court of the state of Montana, in Keeler v. Green, 51 Mont. 42, 149 Pac. 286, decided later, is important to a consideration of the instant case. It is there said that it is the duty of the seller to know that the wheat which he sold was of the character represented and if it was not the responsibility is the seller's in the absence of an acceptance with knowledge by the buyer, citing Wolcott v. Mount, supra; Hoffman v. Dixon, supra.

Lord v. Grow, 39 Pa. 88, 80 Am. Dec. 504, is a case of a sale of wheat. The tendency of the modern cases to the doctrine that in sales of articles in regard to which the seller is presumed to have superior knowledge, is a warranty that the thing sold shall be of the kind which it is represented to be is there recognized. The opinion states that neither the contract of sale nor the identity of the article was defined by a bill of parcels. Nor was the subject of the contract a manufactured article ordered and supplied for a particular purpose. The buyer insisted on seeing and actually inspected the wheat. The court, observing that the difference between spring wheat and other wheat is not ascertainable by inspection, holds that the case is one of a purchase by inspection of an article of which the vendor's means of knowledge were no greater than those of the vendee and the rule of caveat emptor applied. This case is out of line with the greater array of authorities and has not escaped the criticism of Mr. Biddle on Warranties (section 125), and the American editor of Benjamin on Sales (6th Am. Ed. 843, n. 23). Shisler v. Baxter, 109 Pa. 443, 58 Am. Rep. 738, follows Lord v. Grow, supra. Kingsbury v. Taylor, 29 Me. 508, 50 Am. Dec. 607, rests upon the doctrine announced in Chandelor v. Lopus, Sexias v. Woods, supra, Snell v. Moses, 1 Johns. (N. Y. 96), which hold that the vendor of personal property is not liable for defects of any kind, in the thing sold, unless there is express warranty or fraud of the seller. This doctrine was later repudiated in Miller v. White, Wolcott v. Mount, supra, and numerous other cases which followed.

The court has kept in line with the courts generally throughout the nation by recognizing the rule as stated in Wolcott v. Mount, supra, and White v. Miller, supra, in practically every instance in which it has been called upon to express itself upon the subject. A few of the authorities applicable to the specific subject are: Flint v. Lyon, 4 Cal. 17; McLennan v. Ohmen, 75 Cal. 588, 17 Pac. 687; Shearer v. Park Nursery Co., 103 Cal. 415, 37 Pac. 412, 42 Am. St. Rep. 125; Rauth v. Southwest Warehouse Co., 158 Cal. 54, 109 Pac. 839; Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 88 Pac. 380; Newhall v. Hogue-Kellogg Co., 56 Cal. App. 90, 204 Pac. 562.

In the very recent case last above cited Mr. Justice Kerrigan upon a review of the authorities of this and other states correctly stated the rule in the following language:

"Where an article of a particular variety or type is ordered by name and the seller purports to furnish the same, with or without any express statement that the article furnished is of the kind ordered, a warranty of the identity of the variety or kind arises."

It is conceded that the case of Nicoletti v. Bank of Los Banos, 214 Pac. 51, is all that is claimed for it. It is not to be assumed that this court is willing to apply the rule there announced to every situation that may be presented. That case speaks for itself and must make its own defense. The subject-matter of that case is wholly foreign to and different from the subject-matter of the instant case. The Nicoletti Case dealt with a business almost as ancient as civilization itself and with which every citizen, however impecunious he may be or however limited may have been his business sphere, has had some experience. Banking is a universal business. It is regulated by the laws of the land and there is scarcely issued a publication of any sort which does not discuss some feature of the banking system. Here we have an alleged trade usage prevailing among growers and sellers of seed who, it is claimed, as between themselves, have agreed not to warrant the kind of seed sold, the essence of the contract itself. Appellant offered evidence in the court below to prove what it contends to be a general custom prevailing among dealers and growers of seed not to warrant the kind of seed sold. A number of seed sellers and growers, members of the American Seed Trade Association, a protective organization, testified that such was their custom. A number of catalogues of seedsmen of various states were received in evidence. For years it has been the purpose of the seed trade under the direction of the American Seed Trade Association to create a trade custom which would have the effect of contravening the ordinary contract of sale and protect its members from liability as to the kind of seed or plants sold. No member of the public not interested in the sale of seed was called upon to testify as to his knowledge of the existence of any trade custom for the reason that it is highly probable that he would have no knowledge whatsoever on the subject. The rule is in such cases that the public is not chargeable with knowledge of general usage applicable only to a particular business or profession or protective organization and that such a usage cannot be proved against a layman by showing a rule adopted within a particular business or profession only. Laver v. Hotaling, 5 Cal. Unrep. 534, 46 Pac. 1070. There is nothing better offered in this case to establish a general custom than trade catalogues of dealers, small slips placed inside of seed bags, printed notices on private letter and bill heads, and possibly one or two other similar methods of conveying notice to the public. From such a class of evidence it cannot be claimed that a usage or custom has been established of such universality and notoriety as to justify a court in taking judicial cognizance of it as such. Appellant therefore was called upon to prove that respondent had actual knowledge of the existence of the usage or that it was made to appear from the evidence that it was so general and notorious that knowledge of it will be imputed to him as matter of law. In both there is a failure of evidence to justify such a conclusion. As a matter of law the evidence was insufficient to justify the court in holding that the custom was so universal as to imply knowledge and the jury having found under proper instructions that respondent had no knowledge of such usage no injury was done by the refusal to give the requested instructions.

In Powell v. Thompson, 80 Ala. 51, noted also in 17 C. J. 495, it is pertinently said:

"The tendency of modern authorities is strongly against the loose policy of the English courts, as manifested in their earlier decisions, admitting inconclusive facts in proof of local usage, and thereby contradicting the necessary implications of written agreements, under the pretext of annexing incidents. * * * Thompson v. Riggs, 5 Wall. 663, 18 L. Ed. 704; Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 136, 18 Am. Rep. 463."

In Strong v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 15 Mich. 206, 93 Am. Dec. 184, 17 C. J. 496, Judge Cooley said:

"Special customs are so liable to create confusion * * * in directions not contemplated in their adoption, that they are admitted into the law with great reluctance; and it is not often a hardship to parties to reject a custom, so long as they are left free to make their own bargains, and can incorporate it in their contracts if they see fit to do so."

Mr. Justice Storey, in Donnell et al. v. Columbian Ins. Co., Fed. Cas. No. 3987, 2 Sumn. 366, remarked:

"I am among those judges, who think usages among merchants should be very sparingly adopted, as rules of law, by courts of justice, as they are often founded in mere mistake, and still more often in the want of enlarged and comprehensive views, of the full bearing of principles."

It is conceded that custom must yield to a written contract or to an expressed oral warranty. The following quotation from McLennan v. Ohmen, supra, seems to be regarded as placing an insurmountable obstruction in the way of respondent's cause:

"To create an express warranty, the word 'warrant' need not be used, nor are any particular words necessary. Any affirmation made at the time of the sale as to the quality or condition of the thing sold will be treated as a warranty, if it was so intended, and the purchaser bought on the faith of such affirmation." (Italics ours.)

It is also the law that representations made by a vendor may be sufficient to create a warranty if the vendee so understood them and acted upon them whether the vendor intended such representations to be a warranty or not. Hawkins v. Pemberton, 51 N. Y. 198, 10 Am. Rep. 595. The issue here is not as to quality or condition, but is whether appellant furnished the specific variety of seed ordered and paid for by respondent. It is not a question whether the seed was a good or bad quality or whether it was in good or poor condition, but rather did appellant furnish the specific thing which respondent sought to buy. There is but one answer to the question. No distinction is recognized by the main opinion between a transaction in which a purchaser is led into the belief that he is buying grain and is in fact sold tares and one involving the simple question of good or bad quality of a designated commodity.

The tendency of the main opinion is to place the laboring oar throughout the entire transaction and in every phase of it in the hands of respondent, as is illustrated by the assumption as to how appellant would have conducted itself under the following test:

"It is clear that if the purchaser had enquired of the seller whether or not it would warrant the character of the seed that the seller would have replied in the negative." It is inconceivable that respondent would have assumed the risk of incurring such losses in preparing and fertilizing his land, and also in labor, time, use of his land and profits of anticipated crops which he has in fact sustained if he had not been made to feel secure by the assurances of the seller which the relations of the contracting parties inspired that he had been furnished the thing which he had in writing contracted for. The purchase money for the seed was retained and a bag containing the seed was sent with an assurance written upon the bag that "Germain seeds germinate."

The planting of the seed was the natural result of the transaction. The response of appellant cannot be set aside as being without meaning or significance. If it did not intend to convey any assurance whatever to respondent that the thing sent was the thing purchased or was not willing that it should be so understood, or if it entertained doubt in the matter, its duty unquestionably was to have replied to respondent's letter informing him that it did not warrant its seed. Where the circumstances are such as amount to a representation of fact on the part of the vendor that an article sold is of a particular kind or description, as, for instance, where the buyer in terms asks for a particular kind and the seller purports to comply with his request, he warrants the article as being of that kind, although he may not have made any declaration in words to that effect. Firth et al. v. Richter, 49 Cal. App. 545, 196 Pac. 277.

Under the title of "Warranty," the term is defined by section 1763, Civil Code, to be "an engagement by which a seller assures to a buyer the existence of some fact affecting the transaction, whether past, present or future." "Assure" is thus defined by the Standard Dictionary:

"To offer assurances to; endeavor to impart conviction to; to assert something earnestly to as a ground of confidence; to cause to feel certain; give confidence to," etc.

No good reason for a limitation of the meaning of the word in its application to warranty has been shown to exist. Under the circumstances of the transaction the sale was as clearly an express warranty as though respondent had specifically inquired of appellant whether or not it had for sale for planting purposes Golden Yellow Celery seed and the reply had been "Yes," and respondent, acting under such assurances, was misled to his damage. The conduct and acts of appellant cannot be regarded in any other sense than an affirmation made by it to respondent in regard to a matter about which it assumed to have superior knowledge.

The Code sections governing warranty are sought to be modified by certain sections of the Code dealing with the general subject of contracts. Much importance is attributed to the fact that a contract is defined as either express or implied. It is express when its terms are stated in words and implied when the existence of terms of the contract are manifested by conduct. Sections 1619 and 1620, Civ. Code. An implied contract is in no less degree a contract than an express contract. The only difference between the two is in the mode of proof by which they are respectively established. Smith v. Moy-nihan, 44 Cal. 53. Other Code sections providing for the explanation of contracts by reference to the circumstances under which they are made and stipulations which are necessary to make the contract conformable to usage or as necessary to carry them into effect are cited to sustain the ruling that the issue of warranty presented by the facts of this case is amenable to said sections. The contract under consideration is brief, clear, and unambiguous in its terms, and there is no reason to resort to usage as an instrument of interpretation.

The effect of usage as evidence is limited by the provisions of section 1870, subdivision 12, Code of Civil Procedure, as follows:

"Usage, to explain the true character of an act, contract, or instrument, where such true character is not otherwise plain; but usage is never admissible, except as an instrument of interpretation." (Italics ours.)

Usage of trade cannot be proved contrary to the clear meaning of unambiguous contracts. Holloway v. McNear, 81 Cal. 156, 22 Pac. 514; Polhemus v. Heiman, 50 Cal. 438; Ah Tong v. Earle Fruit Co., 112 Cal. 679, 45 Pac. 7; Langenberger v. Kroeger, 48 Cal. 149, 17 Am. Rep. 418. A clear, certain, and distinct contract cannot be modified by proof of custom inconsistent with it or which expressly or by necessary implication contradicts it. Champion Mach. Co. v. Ervay (Tex.) 16 S. W. 172; Globe Mill Co. v. Minneapolis Elevator Co., 44 Minn. 153, 46 N. W. 306.

Appellant relied upon its printed catalogue as a basis for the establishment of custom by which it also sought to bind the respondent on the question of notice. While the catalogue contains the nonwarranty notice heretofore set out, there is also set out on the same page a statement or notice that appellant maintains at a great expense trial grounds where extensive tests are made of seeds. On another page, under the caption of "Celery," printed in bold-face type, appears the following:

"Golden Self-Blanching California Stock. Similar to French stock; seed raised in California from selected plants."

Directly beneath in the same style of type are printed the following words: "Golden Self-Blanching French Stock. See specialty opposite." In another column, on the same page, in bold-face type, appear the words, "Golden Self-Blanching Celery Seed (French stock)." The body of the article follows, a portion of which is general as well as specific:

"The trial ground test in comparison with samples of seed from thirty growers should prove the selected lot to be as fine seed as can be produced. This is exactly the test we applied to this year's stock of this variety, and even at the present high price of celery seed we are satisfied we are offering the greatest value for the money in this tried and true sort. Celery seed has for many years been a strong item with Germain's for purity and high quality, but with the establishment of our testing ground we are in a better position than ever to praise this item. * * *

These statements are not by way of inducement, but are positive statements of material existing facts. Surely, if respondent is to be bound by the catalogue offered in evidence as to the nonwarranty notice, he should be entitled to the benefit of those portions which have the direct effect of neutralizing the force of the nonwarranty clause. Two important statements are there made: First, that the seed sold was raised in California from selected plants; second, that trial grounds are maintained where tests are made of seeds. These statements, as set out in the catalogue, were well calculated to lead a buyer into the belief that if the seed was not grown by appellant it had at least been tested and found true to variety. They surely amount to an assertion of superior knowledge on the part of the seller which is one of the underlying principles that support the rule of warranty.

The question of whether a vendor merely states an opinion or judgment upon a matter of which the vendor has no special knowledge and on which the buyer may be expected also to have an opinion, and to exercise his judgment, is not an issue in this case.

The instant case must be solved by the following legal test: Was the sending of the seed in response to the written order, in the light of all the circumstances of the transaction, intended to cause the sale, and was it operative in causing it? To my mind "yes" is the only rational answer that can be given to the question.

Upon a consideration of this very interesting subject, I am of the opinion that there was a warranty of the celery seed sold by written request and assent thereto so clear and unambiguous as to leave no room for the introduction of usage as a means of interpretation; that if a local custom or usage prevailed it was not sufficiently shown by the evidence offered for that purpose to be of that general or notorious character as to charge the public with notice thereof. The jury was fully instructed as to the effect of custom or usage and its binding effect upon respondent if they should find that the existence of either or both was brought to the attention of respondent. If any error was committed, it is not so serious but that it may be brought within the provisions of article 6, § 4½, of the State Constitution. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

I concur: LAWLOR, J.

BEVERLY v. GUERIN, Superior Court Judge. (Civ. 4619.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 17, 1923.)

1. Divorce ☞ 283—Appellant held entitled to have amount of stay bond fixed.

Where at the time of modification of an interlocutory decree of divorce as related to community property, so as to require plaintiff to deliver possession of both real and personal property to defendant, such decree had become final with respect to such matters, on an appeal from such modifying order, plaintiff was entitled under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 943, 945, 947, to have the amount of a stay bond fixed by the trial court.

2. Mandamus ☞ 57(2)—Writ of mandate warranted after refusal to fix amount of stay bond.

Improper refusal of court to fix amount of stay bond on appeal from an order modifying a divorce decree held to warrant issuance of writ of mandate, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085; there being no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law.

Application by Johanna Beverly for a writ of mandate, to be directed to Hon. C. W. Guerin, Judge of the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles. Writ granted.

Fred J. Spring, Samuel H. Garrett, and William Crop, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve and Leslie S. Bowden, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this proceeding an alternative writ of mandate was issued requiring respondent judge of the superior court to fix the amount of a stay bond on appeal, or show cause why he should not be required so to do.

From the petition and the return to the writ we understand that in a certain action, wherein petitioner, Johanna Beverly, is plaintiff, and Chester Beverly is defendant, the superior court on the 10th day of May, 1923, determined that the defendant, as cross-complainant, is entitled to a divorce by reason of extreme cruelty on the part of the wife, as charged in the cross-complaint. The interlocutory decree entered at that time, in addition to establishing cross-complainant's right to a divorce, awarded to Mrs. Beverly the custody of their minor child; provision being made for a monthly allowance to be paid by Mr. Beverly to Mrs. Beverly for the support of said minor child. The parties owned certain community property, concerning which the decree ordered:

"That the comparatively small equity in the property, which both sides agree is community property, will be and is assigned to the defendant, with the exception of the property consisting of the lot with three houses located at 1414 East Twenty-Third street in the city of Los Angeles, Cal., and described as lot 4, block 8, Geo. Dalton Sr. Tr., recorded in said county, one of which is now occupied by the plaintiff, and which shall be assigned to her together with the furnishings; the other property consisting of the equity in the vacant lot on East Washington street in the said city of Los Angeles, Cal., is hereby assigned to the defendant, Chester Beverly."

On the 1st day of October, 1923, pursuant to a petition of Mr. Beverly and an order to show cause, and after a hearing thereon, the court ordered:

"That the interlocutory decree concerning the maintenance and support of the minor child of the plaintiff and defendant, and the assignment of the property of plaintiff for her maintenance and support, be and the same is hereby modified as follows, to wit: The equity in the property known and called 1414, 1414½, and 1416 East Twenty-Third street, Los Angeles, Cal., consisting of three (3) houses, be and the same is hereby reassigned to the defendant, said property being hereby declared to be community property, subject to the further order and disposition of this court. Upon such property so reassigned to the defendant, the defendant is to pay all the upkeep, interest on mortgage, taxes, and necessary expenses incident thereto. That plaintiff is to have the right to live and reside, with her minor child, in either one of the two houses in the rear, known as 1414½ and 1416 East Twenty-Third street, as she may desire; such election to be made within two days after the service of this order upon her or her attorneys, such selection to be made by serving on the attorneys for the defendant herein a written notice of such selection. That in addition thereto, for the maintenance and support of herself and minor child, defendant is to pay plaintiff, on the 10th day of each and every month, the sum of fifty ($50.00) dollars a month. This change of possession is to be made in this way: That until the tenants now occupying houses 1414½ and 1416 shall be legally removed therefrom by the defendant, that the order heretofore made by the court is to stand in full force and effect; that is to say, that defendant is to pay the sum of thirty-five ($35.00) dollars a month, and plaintiff is to receive the rents and income from the profits above described. Defendant is hereby directed to give legal notice to the tenants now in possession of 1414½ and 1416 East Twenty-Third street, to remove therefrom, and plaintiff, as soon as such house of her selection is vacated, is to immediately remove from premises known as 1414 East Twenty-Third street, and to surrender possession thereof to the defendant, including the furniture and furnishings therein located."

On November 3, 1923, plaintiff duly served and filed her notice of appeal from said order entered on the 1st day of October, 1923, and said appeal is now pending. On the 12th day of November, 1923, pursuant to notice duly given, the plaintiff made application to respondent to fix the amount of the stay bond on appeal required on the part of the plaintiff to stay the execution of said order of October 1, 1923, for the delivery of possession thereunder of the property therein mentioned, during the pendency of said appeal. The court, without passing upon the question as to the amount for which the bond should be given, decided as a matter of law that appellant was not entitled to any order fixing the amount of said bond, and thereupon the court denied said application. Hence this application for a writ of mandate.

[1] Prior to the 1st day of October, 1923, the interlocutory decree had become final with respect to those portions thereof relating to the division of the community property between the plaintiff and the defendant. Such, at least, is the theory of appellant, which, for the purposes of the present proceeding, we think should be assumed to be correct. Newell v. Superior Court, 27 Cal. App. 343, 149 Pac. 998; Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107. Therefore, with reference to the provisions of law applicable to a stay bond, appellant has whatever rights are incident to the prosecution of an appeal from a final judgment, or from an order made after final judgment. Since the order from which the appeal is taken requires appellant to deliver up possession of personal property, and also to deliver up possession of real property, she is entitled to give an undertaking to stay the execution of the same in such sum as shall be fixed by the judge of the trial court. Therefore she is entitled to an order fixing the amount in which such bond shall be given. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 943, 945, and 947.

[2] The judge having refused to perform the duty thus imposed upon him by law, and it appearing that there is no other plain, speedy, or adequate remedy therefor in the ordinary course of law, a proper case is shown for the granting of a writ of mandate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1085.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

BENIOFF et al. v. BENIOFF et al.
(Civ. 4677.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 14, 1923.)

1. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇨31 — Right to protection of trade-name does not extend beyond market of claimant.

The right to the protection of a trade-name, not constituting a trade-mark, does not extend beyond the market of the person claiming such protection, since the use of such trade-name in another market would not constitute unfair competition.

2. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇨73(2) — Facts held to establish unfair competition in fur business.

Where a partnership was engaged in the fur business under the name of the "Hudson Bay Fur Company" in one of the principal cities of the state with a branch in another city and with a state-wide business and customers in all of the principal cities of the state, the organization of a corporation under the name of "Hudson Bay Fur Company" to engage in the fur business in a third city constituted unfair competition, and equity will enjoin such corporation from engaging in such business under that name.

3. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⇨73(1) — Equity will protect person first in field doing business under a given name.

In the interest of fair dealing equity will protect the person first in the field doing business under a given name to the extent necessary to prevent deceit and fraud upon the public, and will enjoin a second person from using the name even though the principal places of business are at considerable distance from each other.

4. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition — 39—Permission to engage in business under trade-name held subject to revocation.

Where a copartnership, engaged in the fur business in a principal city of the state under a trade-name with a state-wide business, granted to a certain person the right to engage in the fur business in another city under such name without receiving any consideration for permission so granted, and where such person did not avail himself of the privilege so granted, the copartnership could revoke the permission and was entitled to an injunction restraining a corporation subsequently organized, of which such person was one of the incorporators, from engaging in the fur business in such town under such name.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel O. Deasy, Judge.

Action by George H. Benioff and another against David Benioff and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Fred Horowitz, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Fred L. Dreher, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment enjoining them from engaging in the fur business in the state of California under the name of Hudson Bay Fur Company, or any similar name, claiming that the judgment is erroneous "in so far as it prohibits the defendants from engaging in the fur business in Los Angeles" under that name. The action is not based on the ground that plaintiffs have any trade-mark or exclusive right to the name, but is predicated on the common-law right to protection against unfair competition in trade.

The plaintiffs, who are husband and wife, have, since about June 1, 1915, conducted a fur business in San Francisco under the name of Hudson Bay Fur Company. They at first operated through a corporation and continued, as partners, under the same name after its voluntary dissolution March 15, 1918; the business at all times being under the exclusive management of plaintiff George Benioff. At the time the business was commenced no other person, firm, or corporation was transacting any business in the state of California under the name of Hudson Bay Fur Company, and their right to the use of the name is unquestioned.

The evidence shows, among other things: That from a small retail business in 1915, with its debts exceeding its assets, the Hudson Bay Fur Company developed into an extensive and profitable general wholesale and retail fur business, carrying a stock worth from $110,000 to $125,000 cost price, with the annual sales amounting to from about $300,- 000 to $400,000. That the main store was maintained in San Francisco, with a branch in Oakland. That the business included "repairing, making up and handling of furs, tanning and so forth. Anything and everything in the fur line, pertaining to furs," dealing in raw skins, and buying and selling all kinds of furs and fur garments. That the business was extensively advertised through the medium of newspapers (chiefly San Francisco and Oakland), circulars, and catalogues. That the circulars and catalogues were mailed throughout the state as far south as Bakersfield, but no attempt was made to advertise locally in Los Angeles. That the catalogues solicited a mail order business. That all the garments from their stores, both repaired and new, were labeled with the name of Hudson Bay Fur Company. The evidence further shows that, through their advertising, sales were made to people outside of the state in addition to those within; that within the state sales were made to people both north and south of San Francisco, including Los Angeles and points south thereof; that a portion of this business was sent out on mail orders. Plaintiffs were considering opening a store in Los Angeles and to that end, in January or February, 1921, had their attorney in Los Angeles investigate certain property there for the purpose of leasing. Plaintiff George Benioff and the individual defendants are brothers. Defendants David Benioff and Fred Benioff are engaged in the wholesale fur business in San Francisco under the name of Benioff Bros. In June, 1921, defendants, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiffs, incorporated under the name of Hudson Bay Fur Company. The incorporation was effected by the attorney above referred to who had a few months previously acted for plaintiffs in investigating a Los Angeles location. He had also at various times, among other matters, represented plaintiffs in preventing others in the southern part of the state from using that or a similar name, of which defendant David Benioff was aware. The articles of incorporation, which were filed with the county clerk of Los Angeles county on June 8, 1921, named Los Angeles as its principal place of business and stated its purpose was to engage in the fur business. Plaintiffs first learned of the organization of the corporation November 23, 1921. They immediately objected and offered to reimburse defendants for all expenses incurred in incorporating. Defendants refused the offer and plaintiffs filed this suit.

Appellants' main contention is that respondents' business is confined principally to the San Francisco Bay district and that their market does not extend to Los Angeles; that therefore any business conducted by appellants in Los Angeles would not be in competition with respondents at all, and hence could not be unfair competition. They then argue that the right to protection of a trade-name does not extend beyond the market of the person claiming the same; and that therefore respondents are not entitled to protection against the use by others of their trade-name in Los Angeles.

[1] We agree with the rule stated by appellants, but in its application they have assumed a state of facts directly contrary to the findings of the trial court. The findings are, in part, to the effect that plaintiffs' business extends over the whole of the state of California and that they have customers in all the principal cities of the state; that the business conducted by the said plaintiffs has been and is known to all persons dealing with them and throughout the whole of the state of California as the Hudson Bay Fur Company; "that as a result of the care, attention, skill and strict adherence to their said business and through their honesty and fair dealing the said plaintiffs have under the name of Hudson Bay Fur Company established throughout the state of California a wide and honorable reputation as a fair and reliable business and firm to deal with and the said plaintiffs under said trade-name now enjoy throughout the whole of the state of California, and elsewhere, a good reputation and credit." The court further finds that "the said defendants organized the said defendant corporation under the name and style of Hudson Bay Fur Company with the intention of engaging in business under the said firm name to trade on the credit and reputation of the said plaintiffs, to pass off their goods as those of the plaintiffs herein, and to deceive the public into believing that the business conducted or to be conducted by the said defendant corporation was the business or a part of the business conducted, owned, and controlled by the plaintiffs herein"; that it is not true that defendants intended to engage in business solely in the county of Los Angeles or that if they do engage in business solely in the county of Los Angeles they will not be competing with plaintiffs; and that defendants intended to engage in the fur business in competition with plaintiffs.

[2, 3] We are satisfied upon reviewing the evidence that it supports these findings, and that the two concerns, engaged in the same character of business, under identical names, would be competing for the same patronage. It can scarcely be doubted that this would result in deceiving and confusing the public to respondents' detriment. This is held to be unfair competition. In the interest of fair dealing, courts of equity will protect the person first in the field doing business under a given name to the extent necessary to prevent deceit and fraud upon his business and upon the public. Yellow Cab Co. of San Diego v. Sachs (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 33. For this purpose the second comer may be enjoined from using the name (Morton v. Morton, 148 Cal. 142, 82 Pac. 664, 1 L. R.

A. [N. S.] 660; Dodge Stationery Co. v. Dodge, 145 Cal. 380, 78 Pac. 879; Hainque v. Cyclops Iron Works, 136 Cal. 351, 68 Pac. 1014; Bissell Chilled Plow Works v. T. M. Bissell Plow Co. [C. C.] 121 Fed. 357; Ball v. Best [C. C.] 135 Fed. 434; Juvenile Shoe Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [C. C. A.] 289 Fed. 57; and this is true even though, as in this case, the principal places of business are at a considerable distance from each other (Bissell Chilled Plow Works v. T. M. Bissell Plow Co. [C. C.] 121 Fed. 357, 371; Northwestern Knitting Co. v. Garon, 112 Minn. 321, 128 N. W. 288, 291; Ball v. Best [C. C.] 135 Fed. 434; Juvenile Shoe Co. v. Federal Trade Commission [C. C. A.] 289 Fed. 57).

The second point made by appellants is that, if respondents ever had any right to use the trade-name referred to in Los Angeles, they lost it by giving David Benioff the right to use the name in Los Angeles, and that such permission amounted to a gift and could not be revoked.

The permission relied on is contained in the following letter which respondent George Benioff wrote to his attorney in Los Angeles, heretofore referred to, on March 14, 1918, the day before the dissolution of the corporation Hudson Bay Fur Company under which respondents were at that time conducting business:

"Dear Cousin Fred: Will you kindly file a notice with the county clerk that David Benioff will use the name of Hudson Bay Fur Co. You know what I mean, some one else wants to use the name, and as Dave may want to open a store in your city, I want to protect him. You can give uncle's address as temporary, or any other it won't matter, just so that no one else will use that name. * * *

Pursuant to this letter a certificate of doing business under a fictitious name was prepared on behalf of David Benioff and filed with the county recorder of Los Angeles county on or about August 17, 1918. No business was ever transacted by appellant David Benioff, or any of the appellants, in Los Angeles or elsewhere under the name of Hudson Bay Fur Company. No consideration was given by David Benioff or received by respondents for permission to use said name. Subsequently, about June 21, 1919, and thereafter on many occasions, respondent George Benioff told David Benioff that he could not use the name in Los Angeles or elsewhere. Respondent George Benioff testified regarding his reasons for writing the above-quoted letter to his attorney that he and appellant David Benioff had previously discussed going in business in Los Angeles together; that the letter was written the day before the dissolution of the Hudson Bay Fur Company, the corporation under which respondents had been conducting business; that he was advised that unless such certificate was filed, any one could go down to Los Angeles and use the name, and the certificate was filed to prevent any one else appropriating the name in Los Angeles; that this was prior to the time that they had expanded their business through the state to the extent that they now have done.

[4] It is clear from the evidence that both George and David Benioff understood that the former did not intend this permission to extend to any one other than David Benioff; that he did not intend that any one else should use the name; and consequently that he did not intend to give David Benioff any right in the name which could be transferred to others. In other words, it appears to have been intended and understood by both parties merely as a personal privilege or license to David Benioff alone, which, however, he never acted upon, and for which no consideration was paid. As such it was subject to revocation, and the trial court found that the respondents did so withdraw said consent and permission.

Judgment affirmed.

MAGUIRE v. CUNNINGHAM (BOLD et al., Interveners). (Civ. 4096; L. A. 7291.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 27, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 25, 1924.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit ⚡55—Motion to dismiss denied where one cause of action good.

Motion to dismiss action on the ground that it involved title to real estate lying in another county must be denied where one count seeks recovery as for money had and received.

2. Appeal and error ⚡185(1)—Objection to jurisdiction of court may be first made on appeal.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 434, objection can be first made on appeal that the trial court had no jurisdiction, at least in favor of a defendant.

3. Appeal and error ⚡1078(2)—Question of jurisdiction considered, though not presented in briefs on appeal.

Appellate court could consider question of jurisdiction as arising upon appeal, notwithstanding the fact that it was not presented in the briefs on appeal, but only briefs under a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, especially as the point was one arising under Const. art. 6, § 5, and Code Civ. Proc. § 78.

4. Venue ⚡5(1)—Actions affecting real property to be commenced in county where property situated and cannot be waived.

Actions to quiet title, and certain others which affect real property, must be commenced in the county in which the real property is situated, and the question is one which cannot be waived.

5. Parties ⚡48—Interveners could object to jurisdiction.

Objections to jurisdiction that a complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action are always open to the defendants, under Code Civ. Proc. § 434, and, since the objection that there is no jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be waived, interveners in a suit to quiet title were entitled to object that the court had no jurisdiction in that the land was situated in another county.

6. Quieting title ⚡28—Action must be commenced in county where land situated, and if brought in other county venue cannot be changed.

Under Const. art. 6, § 5, and Code Civ. Proc. § 78, an action to quiet title must be brought in the county where the land is situated, and an action brought in any other county is so completely a nullity that the venue cannot be changed to the county in which the land lies.

7. Action ⚡38(1)—But one cause of action presented where several parcels of land included.

But one cause of action is presented where complaint seeks to quiet title to many parcels of land, even if they be noncontiguous, provided only that the conflicting claims to all the parcels be between the same parties.

8. Pleading ⚡64(2)—Complaint may combine in one count both personal and real property.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, a complaint may seek in one and the same count to quiet title to both real and personal estate.

9. Pleading ⚡406(8)—Misjoinder waived by failure to demur.

Misjoinder of causes of action was waived by failure to demur, under Code Civ. Proc. § 434.

10. Husband and wife ⚡262(1)—Presumption that property belonged to wife's separate estate only part of evidence.

In an action to quiet title, presumption arising from deeds of gift to wife that the property conveyed thereby was her separate estate was merely a part of the evidence in the case, tending to show that it was not community property.

11. Husband and wife ⚡264—Evidence held to show property community and not separate estate of wife.

In action to quiet title evidence held to sustain a finding that land involved was community property, notwithstanding presumption that it was wife's separate estate.

12. Witnesses ⚡133—Husband could testify in action against administrator of wife to quiet title.

A husband in an action to quiet title against wife's administrator is not incompetent to testify as a witness, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3.

13. Executors and administrators ⇨431(2)—Husband could maintain suit to quiet title against administrator without filing claim or demand.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1500, a husband could maintain an action to quiet title against his wife's administrator without filing a claim or demand against the estate.

14. Evidence ⇨157(8)—Entries in books not best evidence.

Entries in books of account are never the best evidence in the sense that they are primary to the testimony of men who have participated in events of which a record has also been made in the books, nor are they primary to the testimony of parties who have witnessed the occurrence of the events.

15. Evidence ⇨157(8)—Book entries receivable as evidence of equal value.

Book entries, if sufficiently vouched for, are receivable as evidence of equal value with that of witnesses to occurrences, on the score of admissibility.

16. Statutes ⇨270—Amendment permitting action to quiet title to personal property applicable to existing claim and pending actions.

The amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 738 by St. 1921, p. 542, § 1, permitting action to quiet title to personal property, is purely remedial, and will support an action upon a claim or demand existing at the time the amendment took effect, and also applies to pending actions.

17. Statutes ⇨267(2)—Statutes affecting procedure or allowing new remedy applicable to actions pending.

Statutes affecting procedure, or allowing a new remedy for the enforcement of existing rights, are justly and properly applicable to actions pending when such statutes become effective.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

18. Venue ⇨4—Action involving money held in personam of transitory character.

An action involving a sum of $3,000 on deposit in a certain bank was an action in personam of a transitory character, whether it be regarded as a suit to impress and enforce a trust or as an action to recover the possession of personal property under Code Civ. Proc. § 1582.

19. Courts ⇨2—Court not deprived of jurisdiction because complaint defective.

The mere fact that a complaint was in some respects defective would not of itself deprive the court of jurisdiction, if it stated, though imperfectly, a cause of action the subject-matter of which was within the jurisdiction of the court, and if the defects therein were capable of being cured by amendment, and this was applicable to a complaint which sought to quiet title to land in another county and to recover or determine the ownership of money on deposit in a bank, being good as to the part relating to the money.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by Michael Edward Maguire against Thomas J. Cunningham, in which Anna Maguire Bold and others intervened. From the judgment, interveners appeal. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for respondent Michael Edward Maguire.

WORKS, J. This action was commenced in the county of Los Angeles. The complaint consists of three counts. The first of these is in the ordinary form of a complaint to quiet title, but the real property involved lies in the county of Alameda and in the city and county of San Francisco. The second count partakes of a hybrid character, being in form a complaint to quiet title to the real property described in the first count and to personal property consisting of $3,000 in cash. The third count is for the recovery of money had and received in the sum of $3,000. Plaintiff had judgment, and the interveners appeal.

Before disposition is made of the appeal a preliminary matter engages our attention. Appellants move the court "to dismiss the * * * action, and for an order * * * ordering and directing" the trial court "to dismiss said action, and for an order and decree therein that" the trial court, "and, therefore the above entitled court, never had jurisdiction of said action or right or power to try the same." The motion is made "on the ground that said action involves the title to real property, all of which is situated, lying, and being in the county of Alameda, * * * and that said action was commenced in the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, * * * and not commenced in the superior court in and for the county of Alameda. * * *"

[1] Whatever may be said of the first and second counts of the complaint, it is at once evident that the grounds upon which the motion is based do not reach the third count. The cause of action there pleaded, plainly, does not involve the title to real property, situate in the county of Alameda, or elsewhere. Accordingly, the motion, addressed as it is to the action in its entirety, falls to the ground. As we cannot under the motion dismiss the cause of action pleaded in the third count, we cannot dismiss the action as a whole.

There may be some question whether the motion made by appellant is proper practice. We are, therefore, not to be understood as passing upon that point. It is also to be understood that we are not determining several questions which appear to present themselves on the face of the complaint: (1) Does the second count set forth two causes of action without separate statement? (2) If it does not, is the first count properly joined with the other two? (3) Is the third count properly joined with the other two? These questions will receive mention later.

[2-4] The motion made by appellants was an afterthought; that is, the notice of the motion was served and filed long after the filing of both appellants' opening brief and the brief of respondent Michael Edward Maguire. Respondent Cunningham, administrator, has filed no brief. The point made in support of the motion is under the statute available on appeal, for the right to object to the jurisdiction of the court is always open (Code Civ. Proc. § 434), at least, in favor of a defendant and we state this qualification, for reasons which will hereafter appear, because the presentation of the point under the motion here is made by appealing interveners. We are now confronted with the question whether we shall consider the question of jurisdiction as arising upon the appeal, notwithstanding the fact that it is not presented in the briefs on appeal, but only in the briefs under the motion. We have concluded that it is our duty to do so. In the first place, the point is one which arises under the Constitution of the state (article 6, § 5), the provision also finding its echo in the Code of Civil Procedure (section 78). It is the settled policy of the state that actions to quiet title, and certain others which affect real property, shall be commenced in the county in which the real property is situated. Moreover, the question is one which cannot be waived. Fritts v. Camp, 94 Cal. 393, 29 Pac. 867. Further, by the presentation of the motion appellants have indicated a desire to avail themselves of this state of the law, and it appears to us that we should allow the point the same effect upon the appeal—provided, of course, that it possesses merit—that it would have had under the motion if the latter had been addressed to the separate counts of the complaint, and not to the pleading as a whole. Again, the point has been argued under the motion and it is therefore fully before us, in form at least. For these reasons we shall proceed to consider it upon the appeal, after we have made disposition of a point made by the appearing respondent, to whom we shall hereafter refer as if he were the sole respondent.

[5] Respondent contends that appellants, being interveners, may not raise the question of jurisdiction, because of the well-established rule that an intervener must take the action into which he projects himself as he finds it. This principle has found expression in many cases, but none of them supports the contention made by respondent here. In fact, the statement of the rule, in terms—that is, that an intervener must take the action "as he finds it"—would seem to exclude the contention of respondent. Objections to the jurisdiction and the objection that a complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action are always open to the defendants (Code Civ. Proc. § 434), and we have already seen that the objection that there is no jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be waived (Fritts v. Camp, supra). So the interveners "found" this action when they were permitted to intervene. As the original defendants could have objected to the jurisdiction as well after the intervention as before, it seems that the same right must inhere in the interveners. From an examination of the authorities on the subject we are satisfied that the rule for which respondent contends is correctly stated in a note to Walker v. Sanders, 123 Am. St. Rep. 276, 292, thus:

"It is sometimes said that an intervener must take the case as he finds it, and by this is generally meant that he cannot avail himself of or urge * * * irregularities in the proceeding which the original parties have expressly or impliedly waived, nor of defenses which are personal to them."

Later on in this same note are one or two general statements which seem to uphold the contention of respondent, it is true; but an examination of the cases cited in support of them will show that the editor in making them did not have in mind such a question as is presented here, that is, whether the trial court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter. It certainly cannot be the law that an intervener cannot object that the complaint in the action in which he intervenes fails to state a cause of action. The contrary has been directly decided. Hanchett v. Gray, 7 Tex. 549. We are convinced that the right to object to the jurisdiction must be placed in the same category.

[6] It cannot be questioned that appellants' objection to the jurisdiction, as applied to the first count of the complaint, taking it alone, is good; and we say "taking it alone" for the reason that we shall later have something to say of the pleading in its entirety as made up of three counts. It will be remembered that the first count was presented to the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles for the purpose of quieting title to real property in the county of Alameda and in the city and county of San Francisco. Under both Constitution (article 6, § 5) and Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 78) an action to quiet title to the Alameda property could have been commenced only in that county, and a similar action involving the San Francisco property could have been commenced only in that city and county. The presentation of the first count of the complaint to the Los Angeles superior court, remembering still that we are considering it alone, was an idle act, as that court had no jurisdiction to receive it, nor to try the issues tendered by it after receiving it (Urton v. Woolsey, 87 Cal. 38, 25 Pac. 154; State v. Royal Consol. Min. Co., 187 Cal. 343, 202 Pac. 133. In fact, the filing of such an action in a county other than that in which is situated the real property involved is so completely a nullity that the venue cannot be changed to the county in which the property lies, for no court can have jurisdiction of such an action unless it was commenced in the county where the land is situated. Urton v. Woolsey, supra. See, also, Fritts v. Camp, supra; Duffy v. Duffy, 104 Cal. 602, 38 Pac. 433. The trial court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the first count of the complaint, standing alone.

[7, 8] We meet a greater difficulty when we come to consider the second count, which has for its purpose the quieting of title to the Alameda and San Francisco parcels of real property and also to personal property consisting of $3,000 in cash. Does this count state but a single cause of action, or does it in its essence include two causes of action? This question is one of great moment, for it is settled that an action "must be wholly local in its nature to require it to be brought in the county" wherein is situated the property which is the subject-matter of the action. Weyer v. Weyer, 40 Cal. App. 765, 182 Pac. 776. See, also, State v. Royal Consol. Min. Co., supra. The right to maintain an action to quiet title to personal property is of recent origin in this state, having been created in 1921 by an amendment to Code of Civil Procedure, § 738 (St. 1921, p. 542), and whether a claim to quiet title to both real property and personal property may be included in the same complaint without separate statement has never been determined here, nor in fact, so far as we can discover, elsewhere. It is the rule in this state, however, as to actions to quiet title to real property, that but one cause of action is presented where a complaint seeks to quiet title to many parcels of land, even if they be noncontiguous, provided only that the conflicting claims to all the parcels be between the same parties (Pennie v. Hildreth, 81 Cal. 127, 22 Pac. 398), and the same rule seems also to prevail in Colorado (Mitchell v. Knott, 43 Colo. 135, 95 Pac. 335). Is there not in these cases a condition which is analogous to the subject of our present inquiry? It is the same section of the Code of Civil Procedure, § 738, that confers the right to maintain actions to quiet title to both real and personal property. Before the amendment of 1921, the opening language of the section was:

"An action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real * * * property, adverse to him," etc.

The amendment consists in the insertion of the words "or personal" between the words "real" and "property." If under this provision a conflict may be waged, under the same complaint, between those who have opposing claims to many parcels of real property, no matter how different the chain of title of each claimant to each parcel may be—and nothing on this latter head is shown in the ordinary complaint to quiet title—we can see no good reason why a similar contest may not be carried on, under the same complaint, between parties who hold adverse claims to a city lot and to a piano. It has been said in a case in which the right to maintain an action to remove a cloud on the title to personal property was in question:

"Any distinction between real estate and personal property in this respect must be purely artificial and tend to hinder the practical administration of justice." Earle v. Maxwell, 86 S. C. 1, 67 S. E. 962, 138 Am. St. Rep. 1012.

The court then upheld the right to maintain the action, independent of statute. That right did not exist in this state until section 738, Code of Civil Procedure, was amended in 1921, but by that amendment the Legislature yielded recognition to the fact that in respect to the right to maintain actions to quiet title the distinction between real property and personal property is artificial. At any rate, if it did not recognize that artificiality, the Legislature by the amendment wiped out any distinction which had theretofore existed in that respect between the two kinds of property. Under section 738, property is property, whether it be realty or personalty, and the logic of Pennie v. Hildreth, supra, compels us to hold that in the second count of the complaint now before us there was properly included respondent's right to quiet title to both the real property and the personal property mentioned therein. Therefore, as the cause of action stated in that count was not wholly local, the trial court had jurisdiction of the entire subject-matter of it.

[9] We find the complaint, then, in this condition, disregarding for the moment any possible question of misjoinder of causes of action and considering each count as if it stood alone: The trial court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the first count, while it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of both the second and third. We need not consider the question of joinder as between the first and second counts for the reason that the latter included the entire subject-matter of the former. Touching the question of joinder as between the second and third counts—granting for the sake of argument, which we do not decide, that there is such a question—no demurrer on that ground was ever interposed. There being no question of jurisdiction involved in the point, it was waived by failure to demur. Code Civ. Proc. § 434. It therefore appears, to sum up the situation, that the trial court had jurisdiction to quiet title to real property described in the second count, to quiet title to personal property in the form of

$3,000 in cash, and to determine whether respondent was entitled to judgment for money had and received in the sum of $3,000. It is to be noted that throughout the foregoing discussion we have assumed, without deciding, that cash is personal property within the meaning of section 738, Code of Civil Procedure. This we have done for two reasons: First, the point that cash is not such personal property is not made in the briefs on appeal; second, those briefs assure us that the $3,000 mentioned in the second and third counts is one and the same sum of money. This latter reason is controlling because evidence entitling respondent to judgment quieting title to the money would also entitle him to judgment for money had and received, and the trial court made its findings of fact, conclusions of law, and judgment in favor of respondent, as to the $3,000, upon each of the two theories.

[10] We now take up the questions presented by the briefs upon the appeal. The case was one in which a surviving husband sued the administrator of the estate of his deceased wife for the purpose of procuring decree that the property mentioned in the three counts of the complaint was the community property of the spouses before the death of the wife, and not her separate estate, as claimed by the administrator. The interveners were nieces and nephews of the decedent, the Maguires never having had children of their own. The interest of the decedent in a part of the real property described in the complaint, laying aside for the moment the question as to the nature and character of the funds by means of which it was acquired, arose because of the fact that her husband has made to her conveyances of that part of the property by way of deeds of gift. The record title as to this property stood in the wife at her death under these deeds of gift. One of the contentions of appellants is that the evidence was insufficient to overcome the presumption, arising from the deeds of gift to the wife, that the property conveyed thereby was her separate estate. The point really is, in effect, that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding of the trial court that the property mentioned was community property, for under the issues framed upon the complaint the presumption was merely a part of the evidence in the case tending to show that it was not community property. Fowler v. Enriquez, 56 Cal. App. 107, 204 Pac. 854. In order to determine whether the court's finding in this regard is supported by the evidence it will be necessary for us to recapitulate a part of the testimony concerning the property covered by the husband's deeds of gift to the wife. In doing so we shall refer to it by parcel numbers, as far as may be, in accord with the designation employed in respondent's brief, although it will be observed that testimony quoted as to specific parcels will in part often refer to the entire property. To avoid more than a mere statement of the testimony we shall resort frequently to the use of italics. Respondent himself testified as to parcel I:

"At the time that that property was bought * * * I was interested in playing the races in Oakland. I had this amount of money, * * * and, for fear I would spend the money at the race track, I bought the property. * * * I thought it was better to buy the property than to take a chance to spend it on the races, * * * and I thought it would be a little nest egg * * * for my wife, in case anything was to happen to me. That was the whole reason I gave it to her while she was living, but I never intended—and everything we ever had, * * * it was always between us; if she had a thousand dollars and I says, 'Give me $990,' she would give me $990; I would give the same thing to her. * * *"

Respondent testified concerning parcel II:

"As I deeded the other property to her prior to that time—to protect myself—to protect myself and to give the property to Mrs. Maguire for fear that at any time—my name was good in Oakland, sir—I could bet on the races at $5,000, if I wanted to, without having to put up any cash, * * * but for fear I would bet and lose our property, I gave it to the wife; I made the deed to her in order to protect myself. That was the whole, sole reason for it all."

Respondent had the following to say as to parcel III:

"I wanted to secure my wife. I was an extravagant man, and in case anything happened to me in my extravagance, I want to have her secure while she lived, that everything I had belonged to her. * * * Q. That was the only reason you put it in her name? A. The only reason in the world I put it in her name; she never asked me to put it in her name, but I wanted to secure her."

The property can be treated no further as to specific parcels, the remainder of the testimony being either general as to all three parcels, or relating to some one piece or other which we are unable to identify from the briefs as any particular one of the designated parcels. It is to be observed, however, as an aid to an understanding of the testimony, that the three parcels constitute the whole of the Alameda county property, all of which lies in Oakland. The whole of the San Francisco property was held by the husband and wife, in her lifetime, under deeds running to them both, as tenants in common. To proceed with the testimony: Respondent testified that one of the pieces of Oakland property had buildings on it when it was purchased; that certain improvements on the buildings were paid for by him in cash; that whenever any repairs had to be made tenants came to him about them; that he hired carpenters, plumbers, painters, or paperhangers whenever anything was to be done and paid them in cash which he either took from his pocket or drew from the bank; that he paid taxes on the property with cash which was "Michael and Bridget Maguire's; it was my cash at the time"; that later the taxes were taken care of by an agent (whose testimony will be mentioned later); and that respondent attended to the insurance on the buildings. Respondent also testified:

"Q. Was there ever any conversation between yourself and your wife as to what would become of this property in case she should outlive you?
* * * A. Well, she said—she would always say, 'If I die first, the property goes to you, and if you die first the property goes to me.'
* * * She said, being as it is community property, then the property goes to the one that is living. That is what she always said."

Respondent further testified that during all the time that he and his wife lived in Oakland he collected all rents on the rented property there, and that at other times the rents were collected by the agent already mentioned. This agent, one George D. Troy, of Oakland, testified that Mr. and Mrs. Maguire removed from Oakland to Los Angeles in the latter part of 1918. The record shows that Mrs. Maguire died in the latter place on June 15, 1920. Mr. Troy further testified that he collected the rents on the Oakland rented property from the time that the husband and wife removed to Los Angeles until the trial of the present action, in July, 1921; that when he collected rents during the entire time, about three years, he mailed to respondent drafts for amounts collected, together with statements showing collections; that on an occasion in March, 1919, when Mrs. Maguire was in Troy's office while on a visit to Oakland he showed her one of these statements which he had just made out; that then, to quote him, "I told her I had a certain amount of money here and didn't care to keep it and I would give it to her, and gave her a copy of the statement." He also read the statement to her and she made no objection to its form. This paper was introduced in evidence at the trial. It was headed "Rents Collected to Date for M. E. Maguire." Then followed eight items of rent collected, with a total of $380. Next came the heading "Money Paid Out on Account of M. E. Maguire," followed by nine items of expenditure, totaling $160. A balance of $219.90 was then struck and the statement closed. Mr. Troy also testified that Mrs. Maguire once said to him, after she had received the deeds of gift from respondent, that the property was earned by Michael and it was only right that he should have it should anything happen to her, and that she talked to him, Troy, about making deeds of gift back to respondent before she should die.

[11] The above is a goodly portion of the evidence pointed to by respondent as bearing upon the finding that the property in question was the community property of the spouses, despite the fact that deeds of gift had been made by the husband to the wife. We have found it unnecessary further to refer to or quote from the evidence. No matter what the opposing showing may have been, in addition to the presumption arising from the deeds of gift, we are satisfied that the finding receives a substantial support from the evidence to which we have adverted.

[12, 13] Appellants contend that the filing of a claim or demand against the estate of his wife, pursuant to the terms of Code of Civil Procedure, § 1500, to the effect that "no holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon, unless the claim is first filed with the clerk, or presented to the executor or administrator, except," etc., was a necessary prerequisite to the maintenance of this action by respondent. As no such claim was filed, they ask for a reversal on that ground. Appellants also insist that the trial court erred in overruling objections made to the competency of respondent as a witness under the language of Code of Civil Procedure, § 1880, subd. 3, providing that parties to an action cannot be witnesses if the action is "against an executor or administrator upon a claim, or demand against the estate of a deceased person," and if the testimony of such party relates "to any matter of fact occurring before the death of such deceased person." These two points may be treated together, as they are both concluded by Bollinger v. Wright, 143 Cal. 292, 76 Pac. 1108. The legal question in that case was identical with the last of the two which we have just stated—that is, the one arising under Code of Civil Procedure, § 1880—and the case was in principle like the present one. The court said:

"We are of opinion that the witness was competent and the evidence properly admitted. The controversy is not concerning a claim or demand against the estate of deceased within the meaning of the section. It is concerning the property of plaintiff and to quiet a claim or demand or title asserted by the estate to such property. The question to be determined is as to whether or not the interest held by deceased under the deed is the property of the estate or the property of plaintiff. If it is not the property of the estate, then the action does not involve a claim or demand against the estate. To hold that the claim or demand in controversy here was a part of the estate, and thus render the witness incompetent, would be to determine in advance the very question at issue."

The point in the case cited, it is true, relates specifically to the question presented here under section 1880, only, but the reason of the opinion is directed as clearly at the point raised under section 1500. This is shown by the sentence:

"If it [the property involved] is not the property of the estate, then the action does not involve a claim or demand against the estate."

We are aware that the question of the applicability of section 1500 has often been held to turn on the question whether a money judgment was sought to be obtained in the action in which the application was attempted to be made. This fact would seem to lend some plausibility to a contention that the section applies to so much of the present action as relates to the sum of $3,000 in cash. It is to be remembered, however, that the action, considering now the second count of the complaint, is to quiet title to the sum named, as personal property. Under all the authorities, and especially under Bollinger v. Wright, supra, the section cannot apply to actions to quiet title to real property. With equal reason it cannot apply to an action to quiet title to personal property in the shape of a herd of cattle. It seems to follow clearly, as well, that it cannot apply to an action to quiet title to personal property in the form of cash. The reasoning of Bollinger v. Wright seems to fit all three classes of cases, or, rather, to show that there are not three classes, but only one. No claim need have been filed prior to the commencement of the action. Respondent was a competent witness to all the matters concerning which he testified.

[14, 15] Respondent testified to deposits and withdrawals of various amounts from a bank. This testimony was received over the objection that the books of the bank were the best evidence on the subject, and the appellants insist here that the objection was good. Entries in books of account are never the best evidence in the sense that they are primary to the testimony of men who have participated in events of which a record has also been made in the books, nor are they primary to the testimony of third parties who have witnessed the occurrence of the events. In truth, upon the basic principles of evidence it is the testimony of the actors in any occurrence, or of those who see their acts or hear their words, which is primary to any record kept in books. It has long been the law, however, that book entries, if sufficiently vouched for, are receivable as evidence of equal value, upon the score of admissibility, with the testimony of the real witnesses to the occurrences recorded in the entries. For a statement of the theory upon which books of account are received as evidence, generally, see 22 C. J. 861-864. See, also, Landis v. Turner, 14 Cal. 573; Severance v. Lombardo, 17 Cal. 57; White v. Whitney, 82 Cal. 163, 22 Pac. 1138. The objection was properly overruled.

Many points attempted to be made by appellants are so casually mentioned that we are unable to ascertain from the brief what they are. To illustrate the method of presentation of these points, we quote a portion of appellant's brief which covers but a part of them:

"'Error No. 2' speaks for itself. It certainly was incompetent for Maguire, and calling for his conclusion, to testify as to what his wife owned when they were married, or at any other time. The same point is presented in 'Error No. 3' (folio 183). 'Error No. 4' (folio 186), 'Error No. 5' (folio 187), 'Error No. 5A' (folios 198 and 199) all speak for themselves: Ruling 8 (folios 201 and 203) speaks for itself. This line of evidence, as this court can readily see, was very dangerous: Ruling 9 and 16 likewise speak for themselves."

The reports of the decisions of both the Supreme and appellate courts of the state are full of cases in which there has been a refusal to consider points no better identified than are those referred to in the above quotation. This court had the following to say in a similar situation:

"Appellant makes at least eight points upon rulings during the trial, each of them stated in this manner: 'The court erred in overruling defendant's objection,' followed by a reference to the transcript. Not only, in each instance, does counsel fail to state the question to which objection is made, or the objection itself, but none of the points is argued, and no authority is cited in support of any of them. Such a casual presentation of points, if followed up, would impose upon us a labor which is within the peculiar province of counsel, and which does not come within the range of our duty. We are not called upon to consider points so presented. Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 108 Pac. 278." People v. Zarate, 54 Cal. App. 372, 201 Pac. 955.

It is true that in two or three instances appellants' meager statement of points is aided to some extent by comments in respondent's brief which serve in some measure to identify the points made. From what we are able to gather as to those two or three points, however, from both briefs, we are unable to perceive that they merit a particular discussion.

The foregoing is the text of an opinion rendered by us on a former hearing of the cause, with the exception of the judgment pronounced, and it is now adopted as a part of our opinion upon the present hearing.

Within the proper time after the filing of the former opinion appellants made application for a rehearing of the cause upon various grounds. A rehearing was granted for the reason, solely, that in disposing of the appeal we had not paid regard to the fact that section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1921, did not take effect until after the action was commenced. What bearing that situation has upon the cause must now be considered.

[16] The complaint was filed December 7, 1920. Section 738, as amended, became effective on or about July 29, 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 542). The findings and judgment in the action were filed August 24, 1921, and the judgment was entered August 27. In a brief presented since the rehearing was granted, respondent contends that the amendment to section 738, authorizing actions to quiet title to personal property, is remedial in character and that it therefore applies to the present action, pending, as it was, at the time the amendment took effect. That the amendment is purely remedial does not admit of doubt, as it afforded merely a new means of enforcing an existent right. See 36 Cyc. 1173; Denning v. State, 123 Cal. 316, 55 Pac. 1000. It seems also reasonably clear that the amendment applies to the present cause. That such an enactment will support an action upon a claim or demand existing at the time it takes effect, but upon which no suit has theretofore been commenced, is well settled in this state (Gilman v. County of Contra Costa, 6 Cal. 676; Chapman v. State, 104 Cal. 690, 38 Pac. 457, 43 Am. St. Rep. 158; Buck v. Canty, 162 Cal. 226, 121 Pac. 924), and, upon principle, it is difficult to perceive how such a proposition could be questioned. However, this proposition, simple as it appears to be, was announced by the Supreme Court, in the opinion in the case first cited, upon a contention which gives the decision a bearing upon the exact question now present—that is, does an enactment like the amendment to section 738 apply to pending actions? The appellant in Gilman v. County of Contra Costa argued:

“Though it may be contended that the act of 1854 is a remedial statute, and that remedial statutes may be of a retrospective nature, provided they do not impair contracts or disturb absolute vested rights, and only go to confirm rights already existing, and in furtherance of the remedy, still the act in question, if construed to give the plaintiff the right to maintain an action against the county upon a demand which accrued entirely before its passage, is open to the objection that it does impair the vested right enjoyed by the county in its sovereign nature of exemption from actions, and of its power to postpone payment or to refuse to pay at all.”

This argument was a most cogent one, the state of the law prior to the enactment then in question and subsequent to the accrual of the claim upon which the action was commenced apparently having been that, while the claimant might have presented his demand to the board of supervisors, and in that sense had a “remedy,” he must have been satisfied with a rejection of the demand and had no remedy in the courts. In response to the argument of appellant the court pronounced an opinion which is, in full:

“The act prescribing the manner of commencing and maintaining suits by or against counties, passed May, 1854, applies as well to claims existing before its passage, as those which arose afterwards.”

A similar condition of affairs is presented by Chapman v. State, supra. The action was commenced to recover damages for breach of contract. The court said in its opinion:

“At that time,” that is, at the date of the breach, “the only remedy given the citizen to enforce the contract liabilities of the state, was to present the claim arising thereon to the state board of examiners for allowance, or to appeal to the Legislature for an appropriation to pay the same; but the right to sue the state has since been given by the act of February 28, 1893, and, in so far as that act gives the right to sue the state upon its contracts, the Legislature did not create any liability or cause of action against the state where none existed before. The state was always liable upon its contracts, and the act just referred to merely gave an additional remedy for the enforcement of such liability, and it is not, even as applied to prior contracts, in conflict with any provision of the Constitution. ‘The fact that the state is not subject to an action in behalf of a citizen does not establish that he has no claim against the state, or that no liability exists from the state to him. It only shows that he cannot enforce against the state his claim, and make it answer in a court of law for its liability. What is made out by this objection is not that there is no liability and no claim, but that there is no remedy.’ Coster v. Mayor of Albany, 43 N. Y. 407.”

These cases, while not directly touching the question before us, are surely not without value in solving it. There appears to be no difference, in principle, between them and the present case. At any rate, they show how far the Supreme Court has gone in construing remedial statutes to be retroactive where the dictates of natural justice impel such a construction and where the constitutional guaranties concerning vested rights are not infringed by it.

[17] When we resort to other jurisdictions we find no lack of authority upon the exact question now before us. It has been held in a number of cases that statutes affecting procedure or allowing a new remedy for the enforcement of existing rights are justly and properly applicable to actions pending when such statutes become effective (Lew v. Bray, 81 Conn. 213, 70 Atl. 628; Cahill v. Wissner, 183 App. Div. 659, 170 N. Y. Supp. 1000; City of Chicago v. Industrial Commission, 292 Ill. 409, 127 N. E. 46; also see 36 Cyc. 1215); and an early case in this state is to the same purport, although the point is not discussed in the opinion (Dent v. Holbrook, 54 Cal. 145; see, also, Moss v. Smith, 171 Cal. 777, 155 Pac. 90). We must conclude that justice requires that the amendment to section 738, Code of Civil Procedure, be construed to have a retroactive effect to the extent that actions pending when it became operative are brought within its purview. This conclusion gives to the section the force which we ascribed to it in our original opinion in this cause.

The motion to dismiss and the motion for a direction to the trial court to dismiss are denied.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for transfer and decision by this court after judgment by the District Court of Appeal is denied. We do not, however, approve that portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal which seems to hold that the amendment of 1921 to section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure operated retrospectively to confer jurisdiction upon the superior court of Los Angeles county to entertain and dispose of this action, assuming said court to have had no such jurisdiction at the time of the commencement of the action and at the time of the trial thereof. As to this question we express no opinion, as we do not deem its determination necessary to a disposition of this appeal. Under the facts alleged herein, we are satisfied that said superior court had jurisdiction of this action from the time of its commencement, wholly regardless of said amendment.

[18, 19] In so far as this action involved the sum of $3,000, which was identified in the complaint as a specific fund on deposit in a certain bank in the maiden name of the deceased, it was an action in personam of a transitory character which could be lawfully commenced in the superior court of Los Angeles county. This is true whether it be regarded in this aspect as a suit to impress and enforce a trust (Roach v. Caraffa, 85 Cal. 436, 25 Pac. 22), or as an action to recover the possession of personal property (Hillyer v. Eggers, 32 Cal. App. 764, 164 Pac. 27; Code Civ. Proc. § 1582). The mere fact, if it be a fact, that the complaint was in some respects defective, would not of itself deprive the court or jurisdiction, if it stated, though imperfectly, a cause of action, the subject-matter of which was within the jurisdiction of the court, and if the defects therein were capable of being cured by amendment.

EVANS et al. v. SHACKELFORD et al.

STONE v. SAME.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 15, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 11, 1924.)

1. Schools and school districts *§*81(2)—Matters considered in determining whether building bond given under Public Works Act or Code of Civil Procedure.

In action on bond, the fact that it referred to contract for construction of school building and was executed at the same time, and that the contract related to a public building and the bond was given to insure payment by the contractor for work and labor performed, may be considered in determining whether the bond was given under and in accordance with the terms of the Public Works Act, or Code Civ. Proc. § 1183.

2. Schools and school districts *§*81(2)—Finding that bond of contractor was given under Public Works Act sustained.

In action on bond given by contractor, constructing school building, signed and delivered on the same day that the contract for construction of the building was executed, held, that the court was warranted in finding that the bond was given under Public Works Act approved May 10, 1919, and not under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, and the former statute controlled time for filing claim and suit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Actions by H. C. Evans and Herbert Newby, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Tulare Planing Mill Company, and by Fred W. Stone, respectively, against F. H. Shackelford and others. From adverse judgments, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Le Roy McCormick and J. A. Chase, both of Visalia, for appellants.

Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, Guy Knupp, of Porterville, and Earl W. Westcott, of Visalia, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. For the purposes of this appeal the above cases are consolidated and heard as one. The plaintiffs in the two cases began their actions to recover on a certain bond given to secure payment for materials furnished and work done on a certain school building about to be erected by F. H. Shackelford, one of the defendants, for the Saucelito school district; said bond being dated the 23d day of September, 1920. The defendants Retherford and Swanson, the sureties on said undertaking or bond, had judgment, and from this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

It appears from the transcript that F. H. Shackelford, a contractor, on the 23d day of September, 1920, entered into a contract with the board of trustees of the Saucelito school district in the county of Tulare for the erection of a certain school building; that upon this day there was made, executed, and delivered to the board of trustees of said Saucelito school district a bond, signed by the defendants Retherford and Swanson, in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Know all men by these presents that F. H. Shackelford (contractor), as principal, and B. F. Retherford and J. E. Swanson, as sureties, are held and firmly bound unto any and all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the work described in the building contract hereinafter mentioned, or in any modification thereof, in the sum of sixty-one hundred ninety-one and 25/100 dollars, lawful money of the United States, for which payment well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, administrators, successors, and assigns, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents.

"Signed and sealed with our seals, and dated the 23d day of September, 1920.

"The condition of the above obligation is such that—

"Whereas, a certain building contract, dated September 23, 1920, was made and executed by board of trustees of Saucelito school district, as owner, the party of the first part therein, and the above-named F. H. Shackelford as contractor, the party of the second part therein, which contract is hereby referred to; and

"Whereas, in and by said building contract, said contractor agreed to furnish the necessary labor and materials to complete the work described in said contract, upon the real property therein mentioned, in accordance with plans and specifications referred to in said building contract, and for the contract price therein set forth:

"Now, therefore, should said F. H. Shackelford, contractor, well and truly pay or cause to be paid all claims against him for such labor or materials, or either or both, so performed or furnished, as the case may be, then this obligation to be null and void; otherwise, to be and remain in full force and effect, and the same is hereby expressly made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor upon or furnish materials to be used in the work described in the said contract, or in any modification thereof; and any and all such persons shall have and are given a right of action to recover upon this bond against the said principal and sureties, or either of them, in any suit brought to foreclose mechanics' liens, which may be filed by such persons, or any of them, upon the property mentioned in said contract, or in a separate suit brought upon this bond, and may recover in such action or actions the value of such labor done or materials furnished, or both, not exceeding, however, in the aggregate of said recoveries, the amount of this bond as above specified.

"B. F. Retherford. [Seal.]

"J. E. Swanson. [Seal.]"

The contract for the erection of the school building and the bond just referred to appear to have been signed and delivered on the same day. On the 16th day of April, 1921, the contract and bond were recorded in the office of the county recorder of Tulare county. The amount of the bond is exactly one-half of the amount of the contract price for the erection of the school building. The contractor failed to complete the building, failed to pay for all the materials furnished and work and labor performed, and this action was begun by the plaintiffs against the defendants upon the bond referred to to recover the amount due for work and labor performed and materials furnished. The court found that the bond in question was given under the provisions of the act approved May 10, 1919, known as the Public Works Act (St. 1919, p. 487); that plaintiffs had failed to file a statement of their claims within the time provided by section 2 of said act, and also had failed to institute this action within the time provided by said section 2; and hence that the cause of action against the defendants was barred. It is admitted that, if the Public Works Act applies to this case, the judgment in favor of the defendants should be affirmed. On the part of the appellants, however, it is contended that section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies, and hence that the action is not barred, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. As heretofore stated the court found that the Public Works Act applies, and not section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The bond in question is phrased very similar to the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and also to the wording of the Public Works Act. In the case of Miles v. Baley, 170 Cal. 151, at pages 156 and 157, 149 Pac. 45, at page 47, the Supreme Court of this state quotes with approval the opinion of this court, written by Associate Justice Hart, stating rules by which it may be determined whether any particular bond has been executed and delivered under the provisions of the Public Works Act or under section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The opinion just referred to was dealing with section 1 of the act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 201), which was superseded by the act of 1919, the provisions of which, however, so far as material to this case, are almost identical. The opinion of this court, approved by the Supreme Court, as applicable to this case, is as follows:

"Comparing the undertaking with the statute, it will readily be noted that that part of the former which specifies the conditions to be fulfilled by the contractors to render the undertaking inoperative or without effect is in the precise language of the statute. It is also to be observed that the amount of the bond is approximately that prescribed and required by the statute. There is no conceivable substantial difference, in substance and legal effect, between the conditions of the bond and those prescribed by the statute. Moreover, the presumption is that the board of trustees, as a public official body, performed every duty imposed upon it by law, and that therefore it exacted from the contractors the bond required by the statute in such cases. 'The language of the statute is that the contractor 'shall, before entering upon the performance of such work,' make, give, and file the bond, and appears to impose upon the governing board a mandatory duty in that regard. Furthermore, the bond especially refers to the building contract, makes it a part and the consideration for the execution of the bond. Martin v. McCabe, 21 Cal. App. 658, 662, 132 Pac. 606. And it may be remarked, as a circumstance of more or less significance in this connection, that the bond was executed on the same day that the building contract was executed.

"It is obviously not necessary that the bond should expressly refer to the statute in order to constitute it a statutory bond. A bond, though not in the words of the statute requiring it to be given, if its substance and legal effect is the same as the form prescribed by such statute, is a statutory bond. McCracken v. Todd, 1 Kan. 148; Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty (3d Ed.) § 615. 'A recital in such a bond that it was executed by virtue of a given section of the Code is not controlling or conclusive. It simply furnishes prima facie evidence of the fact. When the same fact is apparent otherwise than by the recital, it is as available for all purposes as if recited.' San Francisco Lumber Co. v. Bibb, 139 Cal. 192, 72 Pac. 964; Martin v. McCabe, 21 Cal. App. 658, 132 Pac. 606."

The bond in question is signed only by the sureties. It refers to the building contract entered into on the same day by F. H. Shackelford, a contractor, with the board of trustees of the Saucelito school district, whereby the contractor agreed to furnish the necessary labor and material to complete the work described in said contract. The bond then follows more nearly the provisions of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure than the provisions of the Public Works Act, in that some of the provisions of the Public Works Act are omitted which are not contained in the section of the Code referred to. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure differs little in its terms from the Public Works Act in the form of the bond to be executed. The section of the Code, as to the bond to be given, reads as follows:

"* * * In case said original contract shall, before the work is commenced, be so filed, together with a bond of the contractor with good and sufficient sureties in an amount not less than fifty (50) per cent." etc.

It will be noted that this provision reads "bond of the contractor."

The Public Works Act, in relation to the giving of the bond, is as follows:

"* * * Before entering upon the performance of such work, filed with the commissioners, managers, trustees, officers, board of supervisors, board of trustees, common council or other body by whom such contract was awarded a good and sufficient bond to be approved by such contracting body," etc. "Such bond shall be executed by the contractor, and either at least two sureties or by corporate surety as provided by law. * * *"

[1] The bond in question was delivered to the board of trustees of the school district coincident with the execution of the contract and was not filed with the county recorder until the 16th day of April, 1921, or approximately seven months after the execution of the contract and the beginning of the work called for by the contract just referred to. It will be noted that the language of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure calls for the delivery of a bond "of the contractor"; the the Public Works Act provides for the giving of a bond "executed by the contractor." The bond in question in this particular does not conform to the requirements of either the section referred to or the Public Works Act, as it was not signed by him. The Public Works Act also provides that, unless a bond is given as therein provided, no claim in favor of the contractor shall be audited, allowed, or paid. However, the board of trustees allowed and paid under the contract a sum aggregating nearly $9,000. While this act would not be controlling in and of itself, it does indicate the intention and understanding of the parties in executing the contract and bond, and the conditions under which the bond was executed and received.

The bond itself, as before stated, refers to the contract, and, being executed at the same time, may be considered as one transaction; in other words, that the contract and bond were both intended to be executed under and in conformity with the provisions of the Public Works Act. The fact that the contract related to a public building, and the bond was given to insure payment by the contractor for work and labor performed upon such public building, are also matters which we think the court below was justified in considering, in determining whether the bond in question was given under and in accordance with the terms of the Public Works Act. It will also be noted that the Public Works Act provides that, unless such bond is given to persons who have in good faith performed work, they may be entitled to payment of their claims upon giving the notice prescribed in section 1 of the act. This section specifies the time of giving this notice, and also the time within which action may thereafter be begun upon any bond. As heretofore stated, these provisions were not complied with in point of time, and appellants' claims were held barred by the trial court on account of such failure.

Appellants call attention to the case of General Electric Co. v. American Bonding Co., 180 Cal. 675, 182 Pac. 444. This case, however, has to do with a private enterprise, and not any public work. The court in the Bonding Company Case points out the distinction between that case and the case of Miles v. Baley, supra, and calls attention to the fact that the case of Miles v. Baley had to do with the claims of materialmen and workmen employed upon a public work, and that the requirements of certain sections of the Code are not applicable where the contract and bond relate to the erection of public buildings.

Whether the failure of the contractor to execute the bond in any way affects the validity of the instrument need not be considered, because of the fact that the bond in question fails to comply in this respect with the provisions of section 1183, and also the provisions of the Public Works Act, as heretofore stated, and therefore does not indicate anything as to the act under which the bond was executed.

[2] Being of the opinion that the principles set forth in the case of Miles v. Baley are applicable to the case at bar, and that the trial court was justified in holding that the bond in question was given under the terms and provisions of the Public Works Act, the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

RANDOLPH MARKETING CO. v. STEVENSON. (Civ. 2657.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 20, 1923.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨72—Verbal lease reserving annual rental held for term of one year only.

That an oral lease agreement reserved an annual rental, under Civ. Code, § 1943, warrants the conclusion that it was for the term of but one year, particularly in view of section 1624, subd. 5, limiting the terms of verbal leases to one year.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨161(1)—Lessee held to have lost right to remove machinery on expiration of term and renewal of lease.

Under a lease from year to year of a packing house, which provided for the installation by the lessee of machinery and an annual rental, which might be paid in cash or by the lessee's leaving the machinery, held, under Civ. Code, § 1019, that the expiration of a year without the payment of a cash rental and the renewal of the lease divested the lessee of the right to remove the machinery, so that a subsequent attempted transfer of title to the machinery was without legal force, nor did the taking of possession of the packing house and its operation by such transferee as successor of the lessee operate to divest the lessor of title previously accrued.

3. Landlord and tenant ⇨161(1)—Judgment denying lessee's right to remove articles not fixtures held erroneous.

A judgment denying a lessee's right to remove machinery which he had installed, after divestiture of his title to fixtures, held erroneous, for the inclusion therein of movable articles not attached to building, so as to become fixtures.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by the Randolph Marketing Company against G. F. Stevenson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

C. W. Braswell, of Lindsay, for appellant. Lamberson & Lamberson, of Visalia, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is in claim and delivery, and is for the recovery of certain packing house equipment installed by the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff in the packing house of defendant, situated at Woodlake, Tulare county, designated and known as the "Rose Street Packing House." The various articles constituting the equipment referred to, according to the complaint and the findings, were: One double stand grader, together with the partition boards, bins, sprocket wheels, and other attachments; one 30-inch Miller elevator, 5-foot delivery tables; one two-way stem and brushes and floor hopper, shafting, and pulleys; one convey press, plain top, two men, with strapping attachment; two No. 18-5-4 Center hanger clamp trucks; one No. 18-4-4 Center spring clamp truck; fifteen plain-top packing stands.

The complaint alleges that, on or about the 1st day of August, 1919, and a long time prior thereto, the plaintiff was and now is the owner, and entitled to the possession, of said personal property, the same being a complete packing house equipment, etc.; that said property is of the value of $1,200; that on or about the 1st day of August, 1919, without the consent of the plaintiff and wrongfully, the defendant obtained possession of said property, and, claiming the right to the possession thereof, has refused and still refuses to deliver the same to the possession of the plaintiff; that prior to the commencement of this action, to wit, on or about the 1st day of August, 1919, the plaintiff demanded of the defendant the possession of said personal property, but that the defendant refused and still refuses to comply with said demand; that plaintiff, by reason of the alleged wrongful detention of said property by the defendant, has been damaged in the sum of $1,500. The prayer is for a return of said property to the plaintiff, or for the recovery of the sum of $1,200, the alleged value thereof, together with damages in the amount stated as the extent of the injury claimed.

The answer, after denying each and all of the allegations of the complaint, sets up a special defense substantially as follows: That the plaintiff leased from defendant the packing house above referred to at an agreed rental of $360 per year, and thereafter placed the personal property mentioned in the complaint in said packing house, and used the said packing house under said agreement of lease until the month of October, 1916; that during said period of time the plaintiff packed the fruit of this defendant, for which the former was paid the current market value; that the plaintiff did not at any time pay to the defendant any rental for the use of said packing house until said month of October, 1916, and that at said last-mentioned time there was due from plaintiff to defendant for such rental the sum of $1,080; that in the month of October, 1916, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement, by the terms of which the said personal property described in the complaint, and the whole thereof, was sold by plaintiff to defendant for and in consideration of the said sum of $1,080, then due from plaintiff to defendant for the said rental of said packing house as aforesaid, and thereupon and in said month of October, 1916, the said defendant went into possession of the said personal property and the whole thereof, and ever since said time has continued to remain in the possession thereof and used the same as his own openly, continuously, and adversely as against the plaintiff, "and as against the whole world claimed, occupied, and possessed the said personal property and every part thereof, with the knowledge, acquiescence, and consent of the said plaintiff, up to the time of the commencement of this action and for more than three years prior to the commencement of the said action." The answer also sets up the special plea that the action of the plaintiff is barred by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The court found that the plaintiff was not the owner or entitled to the possession of the personal property above described; that on or about the 1st day of August, 1919, the plaintiff demanded of defendant possession of said property and the defendant refused to deliver possession of the same to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff has not been damaged by reason of the detention of said property in any sum whatever or at all; that said action is not barred by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that said property is of the value of $1,000. The findings proceed as follows:

"(4) That about the month of September, 1914, the Randolph Fruit Company, a corporation, entered into an oral contract with the defendant, under and by the terms of which the said Randolph Fruit Company placed the said property described in the complaint into a packing house owned by the defendant, situated near the town of Woodlake, in said county of Tulare, and agreed to pay a rental therefor, and securely attached the said property to said real estate by means of bolts and nails.

"(5) That thereafter the Randolph Fruit Company sold its interest in the said property to the Randolph Marketing Company; that there never was any agreement between plaintiff and defendant as to the payment of rent for the said packing house, or as to the removal of said fixtures or machinery, being the property sued for herein; that said property was so attached as to become a part of the real property upon which said packing house was situated, and thereupon became and was the property of the defendant.

"(6) That either the Randolph Marketing Company nor the Randolph Fruit Company ever paid any rent for the use of said packing house.

"(7) That about the month of April, 1917, the defendant gave notice to the agent of the plaintiff that the said defendant would thereafter retain and hold as his own all the said property, and the plaintiff did not after the giving of said notice take any steps to secure the possession of said property or make any claim therefor until the commencement of this action."

Judgment was rendered accordingly and the plaintiff appeals therefrom. The contention is that the findings are not supported by the evidence. Preliminarily to the statement of the facts of the transaction involved herein, as shown by the evidence, it should be stated that, as the court found, the Randolph Fruit Company, by an instrument in writing or a bill of sale, through W. O. Randolph, as president, and J. F. Eichar, as secretary, thereof, on the 1st day of March, 1916, transferred and sold to the plaintiff all its packing house equipments, which had been installed and which were then still maintained in 16 different packing houses situated in as many different localities in the southern part of the state. Among the equipments so purported to be transferred to the plaintiff was the one contained in the Rose street packing house, as we will hereafter refer to the packing house in controversy.

The defendant testified that he erected and completed the packing house in question a short time before the month of September, 1914; that he owned another packing house on his premises, some distance from where the Rose street packing house was erected; that there was not enough fruit raised in the immediate neighborhood of the Rose street packing house to justify its equipment with the machinery necessary for operating it. The agreement between Randolph, acting for the plaintiff or its predecessor, and the defendant, was entirely verbal, no written lease or contract having been executed between the parties; but it appears that at some time prior to the month of September, 1914, and prior to the time at which the equipment was installed, the defendant met W. O. Randolph, the president of the plaintiff, and a conversation ensued between the two regarding the operation of the packing house by the predecessor of plaintiff. The defendant testified that he stated to Randolph that he was willing that his company should take possession of the packing house; and install the necessary machinery therein and operate the same in consideration of annual rent equal to 6 per cent. on the cost of the packing house, plus the taxes and insurance, which, the defendant stated, would amount, approximately, to the sum of $330 per year; that he proposed to Randolph that he would accept either cash or any machinery which might be installed in the plant for the purpose of operating it as in payment of rent; that this was, in effect, agreed to by Randolph; at any rate, the plaintiff's predecessor, after said proposition was made by the defendant to Randolph, installed the equipment in the packing house; that thereupon the predecessor of plaintiff entered into the occupation of the building and operated the plant until the purported transfer by it of the equipment to the plaintiff, on the 1st day of March, 1916; that on or near the last-mentioned date the plaintiff entered into the possession of the packing house and operated the plant until the month of September, 1917, when it ceased further operation of and abandoned the packing house, leaving in the packing house, however, the equipment which its predecessor had installed therein, and not paying nor offering to pay the defendant money or cash as in payment of the rent for the use and occupation of the building. From that time until the time of the commencement of this action, to wit, December 19, 1919, the defendant himself operated the packing house.

The evidence, without conflict, shows that the machinery constituting the packing outfit, with the exception of a few movables, was attached to the building by means of bolts and nails. This machinery consisted of brushes, shafting, pulleys, elevator, sprocket wheels, the motive power, etc. As to the trucks and other movables connected with the operation of the plant, the defendant's witness, Webb, who was the foreman or overseer of the Rose street plant while operated by plaintiff and its predecessor, testified that, after the plaintiff had ceased operating the packing house, he had a conversation with the defendant in which the latter stated that, while he intended to retain the machinery attached to the building as in payment of rent for the use of the house, he claimed no interest in the "packing boxes and the trucks and other movable materials, including the shook, and would like to have it removed as quickly as possible," etc.; that he (Webb) thereupon "loaded up all that stuff, including the shook, paper, nails, trucks, stoves, and took the Marketing Company sign down," shipping all said articles to Naranjo, where the plaintiff was interested in a packing house.

[1] It should be added that there is no evidence of a specific agreement as to the term during which the lease should run, but from the testimony of the defendant that he proposed to the plaintiff's predecessor through its president, Randolph, that the rental would be upon the basis of $330 per year, and that the plaintiff entered into the occupation of the building upon that proposition, although not expressly assenting to it, the conclusion or a finding would be justifiable that the term was for one year. Indeed, in the absence of any express agreement as to a determinate period during which the lease was to exist, the presumption would be that the hiring of the property was to be for one year from its commencement; there being no evidence that in the particular locality in which the Rose street packing house is situated there prevails or has prevailed any usage on that subject. Civ. Code, § 1943. The lease, being verbal, could not be for a longer period than one year. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5.

[2] As is to be understood from what has already been said, there was no agreement that the Randolph Fruit Company should or might remove the property affixed to the building, except upon payment to the defendant of the rental in money. The transaction, therefore, is governed by section 1019 of the Civil Code. Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 60; Pomerooy v. Bell, 118 Cal. 635, 50 Pac. 683; Conde v. Sweeney, 16 Cal. App. 157, 116 Pac. 319. Said section 1019 reads as follows:

"A tenant may remove from the demised premises, any time during the continuance of his term, anything affixed thereto for purposes of trade, manufacture, ornament, or domestic use, if the removal can be effected without injury to the premises, unless the thing has, by the manner in which it is affixed, become an integral part of the premises."

The situation, as it is presented by this record, is this: That the Randolph Fruit Company abandoned the premises and its right to the further possession thereof during the term of its lease, leaving the property in dispute still attached to the building, without paying or offering to pay the defendant the rental due in money. Under the terms of the agreement, therefore, the equipment, or so much thereof as was attached to the building by means of bolts, screws, and nails, thereupon became fixtures, and consequently the property of the defendant. Indeed, since the lease was from year to year, the tenancy of the Randolph Fruit Company was terminated on the expiration of the first year of its lease and by a renewal thereof at that time. With the termination of the lease at the end of the first year, the plaintiff not having paid the defendant the first year's rental in money, the right to remove the fixtures also terminated. Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 60, supra; Marks v. Ryan, 63 Cal. 107; Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 488, 13 Atl. 370, 6 Am. St. Rep. 474; Watriss v. First Nat. Bank of Cambridge, 124 Mass. 578, 26 Am. Rep. 699; Sanitary District v. Cook, 169 Ill. 191, 192, 48 N. E. 461, 39 L. R. A. 369, 61 Am. St. Rep. 164, 165.

In view of this conclusion, the attempted transfer of the equipment, or so much thereof as was attached to the building, by the Randolph Fruit Company to the plaintiff, was obviously without legal force. The former, under the circumstances, was wholly without authority to make a transfer of that part of the equipment affixed to the building to a third party. The taking of possession of the packing house by plaintiff through the mere authority of the Randolph Fruit Company, without attornment by defendant, would be beyond the rights of said company. There was no express consent by the defendant that the plaintiff should take possession of the premises; but, it may be granted, consent may be implied by the silence of the defendant or his failure to object to the plaintiff taking possession, in which case the plaintiff's tenancy would be by mere sufferance or at will. But in any event the mere taking of possession of the packing house by the plaintiff, whether with the consent of the defendant or not, could not have the effect of divesting the defendant of his ownership of the fixtures; they having become such before such possession was taken. In fact, the plaintiff appears to have recognized the right of the defendant to retain the equipment as fixtures, for, as seen, the latter himself operated the packing house with the equipment in question for over two years from the time that the plaintiff ceased to operate the packing house and abandoned the possession and its right to the possession thereof. Indeed, as the findings show, the defendant, in the month of April, 1917, gave notice to the agent of the plaintiff that he would thereafter retain and hold, as his own, the property in question, and the plaintiff thereafter took no steps to secure possession of the same, nor did it make any claim of ownership of said property until the commencement of this action.

[3] The foregoing is decisive of the case against the appellant. The findings and the judgment, however, are erroneous, in that there are thereby awarded to the defendant, in addition to those articles belonging to the equipment which were attached to the building, a number of movable articles used in connection with the operation of the plant, to wit, several trucks and a number of tables. These articles were shown by the evidence not to be attached to the building, and, of course, they could not become fixtures within the meaning of the law.

The judgment, in so far as it adjudges that part of the equipment which is attached to the building by means of nails and bolts to be fixtures, and therefore the property of the defendant, is affirmed, and that part of the judgment which awards the defendant the movables mentioned is reversed.

1. Stipulations ⚭8—Proposed agreement signed only by part of litigants held binding on none.

A proposed agreement, signed by some of the parties to litigation, when refused by others, constitutes a mere offer to stipulate, and is of no binding effect on any party.

2. Appeal and error ⚭714(5)—Discussion of matters not within record may not be considered by court.

Discussion in briefs of matters upon which the record furnishes no light cannot be considered by the court.

Conclusions of law and judgment in an action for dissolution of a partnership held unsupported by findings of fact to the extent of the valuation placed upon certain office furniture.

4. Partnership ⚭344—In action for dissolution, order for execution against fund in trustee's hands held improper.

In an action for the dissolution of a partnership, where it was conceded and appeared in the findings that a certain fund had been created and existed in the hands of a trustee, and that the issue was merely as to its division between the parties, no order in the judgment for execution against the property is warranted or proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by Edmund Welch against Edward H. Alcott and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, certain defendants appeal. Judgment modified.

CRAIG, J. Appeal by defendants Edward H. Alcott and Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, from judgment after a second trial between the parties, following a reversal by the Supreme Court and order remanding "for a new trial upon the issues as to the Hendricks deal only." Welch v. Alcott, 185 Cal. 731, 762, 198 Pac. 626, 639.

The plaintiff, and defendant Alcott were copartners until May 23, 1914, when an action for dissolution and accounting was instituted, and were engaged in establishing a townsite and selling real estate embracing what is known as Niland, in Imperial county, and described as the southeast quarter of section 4, township 11 south, range 14 east, San Bernardino meridian. The findings made at the former trial, as affirmed, recite that:

"The defendant Edward H. Alcott on the 13th day of March, 1914, granted and conveyed in trust to the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, the said townsite here-inbefore described, the said defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company being therein named as trustee to carry out the provisions of a certain declaration of trust of the same date, and being described as trust No. 3152, and that the said defendant, Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, did, on the 13th day of March, 1914, execute a declaration of trust described as said trust 3152, whereby the said defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company undertook and agreed that the said townsite hereinbefore described should be improved, the cost of improvements paid out of a certain improvement fund therein provided for, and should hold the said townsite to sell the lots thereof at prices not less than those indicated in the schedule of selling prices attached to said declaration, and to receive amounts collected by the First National Bank of Brawley, and to disburse all moneys coming into the hands of said trustee in the manner provided in said declaration."

It was further found that of the personal property belonging to said partnership there was in the hands of said trustee, to the credit of the defendant Alcott, the sum of $5,158.19 in cash.

One of the questions before this court arises from a state of facts related in the opinion of the Supreme Court, as follows:

"Appellant attacks the finding in the Hendricks deal, which is to the effect that a sale was attempted in the business of but no commission was made for the partnership. The complaint alleged the deal was made in the business of the partnership, and a commission of $200 was earned 'and the same accounted for in the partnership.' The answer denies the deal was for the partnership, and alleges it was 'made by the plaintiff alone for his own account'; that appellant had nothing to do with it, nor did he claim or receive any part of the commission received by respondent. The commission does not appear in the accounting. Respondent testified the deal was made by him and Carroll Owen, and that he, respondent, got all the commission, and 'it was accounted for in the partnership.' Appellant's testimony follows the answer. The finding is that the partnership did not earn the commission. All the evidence, however, shows respondent actually received the commission and retained it. The finding is therefore contrary to the complaint and the evidence. It was developed in the direct examination of respondent that an action brought by Hendricks against him alone for the recovery of the commission on the ground of fraud was pending. It is not made to appear, however, whether this action is responsible for the finding. A new trial of this issue is necessary."

The trial court in due time accordingly proceeded to a hearing, at which time the previous findings and judgment, in conjunction with the opinion of the Supreme Court, were reviewed by the court and respective counsel, but no additional evidence was adduced. The court there announced:

"As I take it, this court at this time is bound by the decision of the Supreme Court that there was a copartnership. Whatever is tried now is tried upon the law as established there. It is a copartnership. I take it the only two questions I can possibly see would be whether he did receive the $200, and that is admitted; second, whether or not he paid it back."

It appears that the plaintiff, though claiming to have repaid the amount, offered to renounce credit therefor, and tendered the full sum of $200, whereupon the court ordered that findings be prepared and served. The findings of fact as they appear in the record brought here include the following assets of the partnership:

"Dishes and tents; rug; office furniture; Owens notes, with First National Bank, $3,000; cash belonging to said partnership, with trustee, Title Insurance & Trust Company, to credit of E. H. Alcott, now on hand, $5,158.19."

Notwithstanding the remarks of the court and its findings, the conclusions of law recite that the office furniture is of the value of $3,000, which amount is added to the assets found belonging to the partnership, and the judgment accords with the conclusions of law in this respect. Cash in the sum of $3,725, which includes the Owens notes, is found to be in the hands of the First National Bank, thus making the total value of the personal property of the copartnership $11,883.19. Liabilities in the sum of $2,569.71 are deducted, leaving a balance of $9,313.48, one-half of which, or $4,656.74, is adjudged to be due each copartner. Certain credits due the defendant Alcott are then debited against the amount thus allowed the plaintiff, and it is finally adjudged and decreed that the share of the plaintiff is $3,164.58.

Said judgment directs that the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company render and account to the plaintiff for an equal one-half of all rights heretofore vested in defendant Alcott, since the latter was shown to be the trustor of the trust property held by said company. The judgment concludes:

"That execution issue hereon against defendants Edward H. Alcott, Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, First National Bank, a corporation, in the sum of $3,164.58, together with costs of retrial, amounting to $5."

The trust company appeals from the judgment upon the ground that the previous judgment, as affirmed by the Supreme Court, did not authorize the trial court in holding it liable to the plaintiff to account as a trustee for any amount outside of the partnership assets, there being no finding that it was guilty of a breach of trust; that all it can be required to do is to execute the provisions of the trust, and pay the plaintiff his share when entitled thereto.

Defendant Alcott appeals from the judgment, and complains that the findings of fact and conclusions of law are materially different; that neither in the evidence nor in the findings is the furniture shown to be of any value, though this sum is in the conclusions and judgment added to the true valuation of the assets, and plaintiff Welch allotted one-half of this greater amount, thus diminishing by $1,500 the share of defendant Alcott. This defendant also complains of the judgment directing execution against him personally for the full amount of the share of the plaintiff. It was subsequently stipulated between all the parties, except the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company, that no judgment be taken or execution issued against the First National Bank.

[1] The only response of the plaintiff and respondent upon this appeal is that the defendant Title Insurance & Trust Company entered into a like stipulation with him; but the Title Company replies that the same was not filed, because some of the parties to the cause declined to sign it. At all events, no such stipulation is before the court, and we cannot consider it, except, perhaps, as having a bearing upon the contention of plaintiff that because of this stipulation the defendant title company, if successful here, should not be allowed its costs herein as against him. Upon that point it is clear that a proposed agreement signed by some of the parties to the action constituted no more than a mere offer to stipulate, and when refused by the others it acquired no binding force upon any party.

[2, 3] The briefs of counsel contain much discussion concerning matters upon which the record fails to furnish any light, such as the service upon appellants by respondent of conclusions of law claimed to have been at variance from those which the court signed; also an alleged stipulation which it is admitted was never fully executed or filed. It is obvious that these matters cannot be considered upon this appeal. As the record exists we have a simple case of conclusions of law and a judgment unsupported by the findings, in that an item of $3,000 appears in the former which is not to be found in the latter.

[4] The only additional question necessary for us to determine is with respect to that part of the judgment which directs that execution issue against the three defendants. It is a fact conceded in the record, not contested in any way, and appearing in the findings, that a certain fund had been created and exists in the hands of the title company, and that the dispute is merely as to its division between the plaintiff and the defendant Alcott. Under such circumstances the entire matter is within the jurisdiction of the court as one of equity to direct the trustee as to the distribution of the fund in its hands, and no order for execution against the property is warranted.

In accordance with these views it is therefore ordered that the superior court modify its judgment by eliminating therefrom the item of $3,000, and also the provision directing execution against the defendants; and that appellants recover their costs on this appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Mandamus by G. Fred Clark against the Board of Education of Eureka School District, and the members thereof. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Metzler & Mitchell, of Eureka, for appellant.

E. W. Wilson and James W. Henderson, both of Eureka, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of dismissal entered after sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiff's second amended complaint.

The action is for a writ of mandate, requiring the defendants as the board of directors of the Eureka school district to reinstate the plaintiff as a teacher in the schools of said district.

After certain formal matters being set forth, the complaint of the petitioner alleges as follows, in paragraph 3 thereof:

"That petitioner has been successfully employed as a teacher by the Eureka school district for more than two consecutive school years, to wit, for four consecutive years, and was and is a permanent teacher, and employed in one of the public schools in the Eureka school district, viz. in the Winship school, in which said school are employed at least eight teachers under a principal, who has and does devote at least two hours per day to supervision in said Winship school, a school under his control. That petitioner has been such teacher during all that period, and has not resigned from said position, nor made any request that his resignation be accepted. That petitioner was employed prior to the commencement of the school year of 1918-19, and assumed his duties as a teacher in said Winship school in the capacity of principal, and performed such services as such principal teacher of said Winship school continuously during each school year thereafter, up to and until the 23d day of June, 1922."

It further appears from the complaint that on or about the 19th day of May, 1922, the petitioner made a request in writing for leave of absence. To this request the board of directors replied as follows:

"My Dear Mr. Clark: At an adjourned meeting of the board of education held May 19, 1922, your communication was read. No action was taken upon your communication for the reason that the board of education reached the conclusion that the principal of the high school should also be the principal of the Winship school, and it might be inferred in granting the leave of absence that you would be entitled to reinstatement at the end of your leave of absence. Your communication was therefore placed on file.

"Mr. Geo. C. Jensen was appointed principal of the Winship school.

"Respectfully yours,

"Geo. B. Albee,

"Clerk Board of Education."

In paragraph 6 of the complaint the plaintiff's demand for reinstatement is alleged as follows:

"That thereafter, to wit, on or about the 7th day of August, 1922, petitioner made a demand for reinstatement, and did on the 28th day of August, 1922, present himself at said Winship school, prepared to go on with his work as such permanent teacher, and was thereupon by order of the defendants, ejected therefrom, and informed that he could not assume such position. That defendants failed and refused and do now fail and refuse to reinstate petitioner or permit him to assume the duties as such permanent teacher, or otherwise."

In paragraph 7 of plaintiff's complaint it is next alleged that the plaintiff was dismissed without cause, etc. Paragraph 7 is in the following words:

"That your petitioner was dismissed and discharged by said defendants from said position in said Winship school without just cause or any sufficient or legal reason, and without any hearing of any kind, or trial as in such cases provided, and is now refused such position by defendants illegally and contrary to law. That petitioner has all the qualifications of such teacher, and the certificates required by law, and has actually been acting as such teacher for the period of four consecutive school years last past, continuously, and at all times while school was in session. That defendants acted without any just cause or sufficient reason, and contrary to law and procedure."

Paragraph 9 alleges the amount of salary formerly received by the petitioner, to wit, $2,400 per year, payable in ten monthly installments. To this complaint the defendants interposed both a general and a special demurrer. The language of the general demurrer is as follows:

"That said second amended petition does not state facts sufficient to authorize or justify the issuance of an alternative, or any writ of mandate therein."

The special demurrer contains eight different specifications, three of which only we deem it necessary to consider, to wit, the fifth, sixth, and seventh specifications, which are as follows:

"(5) That it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether the petitioner was employed as a substitute, a probationary, or a permanent teacher.

"(6) That it cannot be ascertained therefrom when or for how long a time the petitioner was employed or whether or not such employment was with or without limitation as to time.

"(7) That it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether the said petitioner was employed as principal, as a principal teacher, or as a permanent teacher."

[1] Just what grounds of demurrer were sustained by the court does not appear from the transcript. The order is general and allowed the plaintiff ten days within which to file a third amended petition. This he declined to do, and judgment was thereupon entered. If any ground of demurrer alleged is good, then the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

[2] On the part of the petitioner, it is contended that section 1609 of the Political Code, as amended by an act approved June 3, 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1664), governs this case. On the part of the respondent it is strongly insisted that the section of the Political Code referred to prior to its amendment is the law which must be applied in determining the questions here presented. In the case of Kennedy v. Board of Education of the City and County of San Francisco, 82 Cal. 483, 22 Pac. 1042, it was held that an amendment to section 1793 of the Political Code, forbidding the removal of teachers except for cause, applied to all teachers elected by boards of education, whether they were elected before or after the enactment of the amendment.

If teachers are elected without any contract having been entered into between the teachers and the board of trustees, we see no reason why the decision in the Kennedy Case would not be applicable to the amended section 1609, approved in 1921, and hence its provisions would apply to teachers elected both before and after the date of that amendment becoming effective.

With this view of the law we will examine the plaintiff's petition, and judge it according to the provisions of the amended section.

[3-5] The general ground of demurrer is that the plaintiff's second amended petition does not authorize the issuance of an alternative writ of mandate. Subdivision (a) of paragraph 5 of section 1609 of the Political Code, as amended in 1921, provided that boards of trustees shall have power to employ as teachers only persons who hold legal certificates for teaching, in full force and effect, and on file at the time of such appointment in the office of the county school superintendent, etc. The plaintiff's petition alleges in paragraph 3 that the petitioner was employed prior to the commencement of the school year of 1918-19 and assumed his duties as teacher in said Winship school in the capacity of principal and performed services, etc., until the 23d day of June, 1922. And in paragraph 6 that thereafter, to wit, on or about the 7th day of August, 1922, petitioner made a demand for reinstatement and did on the 28th day of August, 1922, present himself at said Winship school, prepared to go on with his work as such permanent teacher, etc. Then in paragraph 8, as hereinbefore stated, it is alleged that petitioner has all the qualifications of such teacher, and the certificates required by law, etc. The petition was filed on the 20th day of November, 1922. It thus appears that the petition does not show that the petitioner had any of the necessary qualifications or that he had the certificate required by law, either at the time of his alleged employment as teacher, or at the date of his demand for reinstatement as a teacher in the schools of the Eureka school district. It is a necessary prerequisite in a petition for a writ of mandate that the petitioner set forth all the qualifications and legal requirements necessary to show that at the time of the demand for reinstatement in the schools the board of school trustees would have the legal right and authority to make such reinstatement, and if he fails to do so his petition is necessarily defective, and a demurrer thereto would consequently be properly sustained. The fifth ground of special demurrer is that it cannot be ascertained from the petition whether the petitioner was employed as a substitute, a probationary, or a permanent teacher. By an examination of paragraph 3 of plaintiff's complaint it will be seen that this specification is also well taken. It does not allege in what capacity the plaintiff was employed. In this particular attention may also be called to subdivision (e) of the fifth paragraph of section 1609 of the Political Code as to the qualifications of permanent teachers. It is there specified:

The board shall have power "to classify as permanent teachers all persons who shall have been successfully employed as teachers by the district for two consecutive school years at the time of classification; provided, also, that the two years of successful service shall have been performed in a district employing at least eight teachers under a principal who shall devote at least two hours per day to supervision in the school or schools under his control.

The language of the petition in paragraph 3, attempting to comply with the provisions of the subdivision of the Code just referred to, is as follows:

"And employed in one of the public schools in the Eureka school district, namely, in the Winship school, in which said school are employed at least eight teachers, under a principal who has and does devote at least two hours per day to supervision," etc.

It will thus be seen that the petition is entirely silent as to whether the district had employed the requisite number of teachers during the two years' period. The mere allegation that there are employed eight teachers is referable in point of time to the date of the filing of the plaintiff's petition, to wit, November, 20, 1922. In other words, the petition uses words of present application and does not comply with the Code. It is required that such number of teachers must have been employed under the supervision of a principal for the past period of at least two years.

[6] The sixth ground of special demurrer is that it cannot be ascertained from the petition when or for how long a time the petitioner was employed or whether or not such employment was with or without limitation as to time. That this must appear in the petition is readily seen by an examination of the cases of Kennedy v. Board of Education, 82 Cal. 483, 22 Pac. 1042; Marion v. Board of Education, 97 Cal. 606, 32 Pac. 643, 20 L. R. A. 197, having to do with the same questions with which we are now dealing. In the Kennedy Case the election was without reference as to limitation, and, therefore, by the court held to come under the terms of section 1793 of the Political Code, as amended in 1881 (St. & Amdts. 1881, p. 46) prohibiting the removal of teachers without cause, etc. In the Marion Case the election was for one year or for a definite period, and the court held that, even if such an election was void, nevertheless the statute did not apply, and the power of removal on the part of the school trustees was not taken away. In the Marion Case the decision in the Kennedy Case is taken up and considered, and the distinction to which we are here referring pointed out, and the application which should be made set forth, just as we are making it here. The Kennedy Case also sets forth the necessary allegations as to qualifications in holding certificates to which we have heretofore referred.

[7] The seventh ground of special demurrer is that it cannot be ascertained from the petition whether petitioner was employed as principal, as a principal teacher, or as a permanent teacher. This ground also appears to be well taken, as will appear by a rereading of paragraph 3 of plaintiff's second amended petition with this subject in mind. This defect becomes more apparent with the petitioner's demand for reinstatement, as his demand for reinstatement must correspond with the position to which it is claimed the petitioner had theretofore been elected.

From the foregoing the conclusion necessarily follows that the defendants' demurrer to the petitioner's second amended complaint was properly sustained. The petitioner was given ample time within which to amend, but declined to do so, and, under such circumstances, we see no reason for disturbing the judgment of the trial court.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

Application for writ of prohibition by Frank C. Smith, as Superintendent of Streets of the City of East San Diego, Cal., against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of San Diego. Writ granted.

Crouch & Sanders, Sloane & Sloane, and F. G. Blood, all of San Diego, for petitioner.

S. J. Higgins, City Atty., and Arthur F. H. Wright, Deputy City Atty., both of San Diego, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Petition for writ of prohibition. There is now pending in the superior court of the county of San Diego an action entitled People of the State of California, on relation of Charles H. Harris, Plaintiff v. City of San Diego, a Municipal Corporation, and the City of East San Diego, a Municipal Corporation. Said action is in the nature of quo warranto, wherein the plaintiff seeks to establish the invalidity of certain proceedings for the consolidation of the city of East San Diego with the city of San Diego.

The petitioner herein alleges that on the 1st day of November, 1923, by virtue of proceedings duly instituted and perfected for the improvement of certain streets in the city of East San Diego, it had become the duty of petitioner, as superintendent of streets of that city, to enter into a contract for said street improvement work under an accepted bid therefor; that on the 1st day of November, in the quo warranto action, the superior court issued a temporary restraining order whereby petitioner is restrained and commanded to desist and refrain from entering into any contract for or on behalf of said city of East San Diego or of the officers thereof or of the taxpayers, citizens, or electors thereof, and to refrain from instituting, carrying on, perfecting, or completing any proceeding for the improvement of any street or other public place in said city of East San Diego, "save and except in proceedings in which a contract has actually been signed on behalf of said city by the superintendent of streets, and a vested right has accrued, during the pendency of the above-entitled action, and until a final determination thereof." Petitioner alleges that the said temporary restraining order was made on the ex parte application of the city of San Diego, and was not based upon a verified complaint or upon affidavits showing the existence of any grounds therefor, nor had any complaint or affidavit showing any grounds for the issuance of said injunction been filed in the said action or served upon the petitioner; that no notice of any application for the said temporary restraining order was made upon petitioner nor any one in his behalf, and petitioner had no notice of said application; that said temporary restraining order was made without a return day upon which petitioner might appear to show cause why the same should not continue for the pendency of the action, and that the said restraining order was made in violation of the provisions of section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure, wherein it is provided that no temporary restraining order made ex parte and without notice shall be granted, unless the matter shall be made returnable not later than 10 days from the date of such order; that petitioner has made application to the superior court for the dissolution of said injunction, and that said court has refused to hear or determine the said matter or modify or amend the said restraining order; that said restraining order is made in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court, and it is the legal duty of petitioner to sign a contract with the California Construction Company for the said street, and that, unless the said superior court be directed to refrain from further proceedings in connection with said temporary restraining order, said court will attempt to punish petitioner for performance of his legal duty as a violation of said unlawful order. The petition is duly verified.

A return to the alternative writ issued herein has been filed, duly verified by S. M. Marsh, one of the judges of said superior court. In its return, respondent denies that said temporary restraining order was made ex parte or without notice or stipulation or appearance by petitioner's attorney, or the said city of East San Diego; alleges that said order was made pursuant to a stipulation made in open court by the attorneys for the petitioner and by Arthur T. French, city attorney of the city of East San Diego and attorney for said petitioner, and by the city attorney and assistant city attorney of the city of San Diego, which stipulation was duly entered on the minutes of the superior court for November 1, 1923. A copy of the minute order, annexed to the return, is entitled in two actions; one being said quo warranto action and another being an action entitled Arthur Tocque, Plaintiff, v. City of San Diego et al., Defendants. It recites the appearance of Sloane & Sloane, Crouch & Sanders, and F. G. Blood for the plaintiffs, and the appearance of S. J. Higgins, city attorney for the city of San Diego, and Arthur T. French, city attorney for the city of East San Diego, as attorneys for the defendants. The minute order further states:

"By stipulation of Sloane & Sloane and F. G. Blood, Crouch & Sanders objecting, and S. J. Higgins, city attorney for city of San Diego, it is by the court ordered that an injunction pendente lite, in the case of Harris v. City of San Diego et al. be made, as more fully appears in the signed order filed herein. * * * On motion of counsel for defendants herein, it is by the court ordered that the motion of the city of San Diego for a modification of the temporary restraining order in the case of Tocque v. City of San Diego et al. be denied, and that by stipulation of respective counsel a temporary restraining order be granted in the case of Harris v. City of San Diego et al., as more fully appears in the signed order filed herein."

Respondent herein denies that said court has refused to hear or determine the application for dissolution of said injunction, and alleges the fact to be that said application is now pending in said quo warranto action, and that said motion of petitioner to modify and amend said restraining order will be heard and determined at such time as the matter may be presented for determination by the attorneys for the parties to said quo warranto action; that further proceedings in said action, including the motion to modify and amend said restraining order, have been continued upon the request and with the consent of the respective parties therein.

In said return, respondent further alleges that there is now pending in said superior court the said quo warranto action; that the petitioners in said action are represented therein by Crouch & Sanders, Sloane & Sloane, and F. G. Blood (attorneys for petitioner and his attorneys), and that defendants are represented therein by S. J. Higgins, city attorney of the city of San Diego, and Arthur F. H. Wright, deputy city attorney of that city, as attorneys for the city of San Diego, and by Arthur T. French, city attorney of the city of East San Diego, as attorney for the said city of East San Diego; that on the 1st day of November, 1923, before Hon. S. M. Marsh, judge of said superior court, personally appeared Hugh A. Sanders, of the firm of Crouch & Sanders, Harrison G. Sloane, of the firm of Sloane & Sloane, and F. G. Blood, on behalf of said petitioner, and S. J. Higgins, Arthur F. H. Wright, and M. R. Thorp, attorneys for the city of San Diego, and Arthur T. French, city attorney and attorney for the city of East San Diego, and in open court agreed and expressly stated to the court, in the hearing and presence of each other, that a restraining order should issue out of the superior court restraining the defendant, the city of East San Diego, and its officers from certain acts specified in the restraining order set forth in the petition for the writ of prohibition herein; that pursuant to said stipulation so made in open court and entered on the minutes of the court, the judge of said court, the said S. M. Marsh, ordered the preparation of such restraining order; that thereafter Hugh A. Sanders, one of the attorneys for said petitioner, and Stanley T. Howe, deputy city attorney, on behalf of S. J. Higgins, city attorney of the city of San Diego, appeared before Judge Marsh and presented to him for his signature a restraining order; that said restraining order so presented was then and there modified in certain particulars, and with the consent and in the presence of said attorneys said restraining order so modified was signed by the said judge, same being the same restraining order attached to the petition for writ of prohibition herein; that said restraining order was signed pursuant to said stipulation and with the consent and at the request of the attorneys of record in said quo warranto action, and that by reason of said facts petioner and his attorneys are estopped at this time to dispute the legality or validity of said restraining order or the jurisdiction or authority of respondent court to make and issue the same.

At the hearing on the return to the writ herein, petitioner presented counter affidavits, made respectively by petitioner Frank C. Smith, by A. Ray Sauer, Jr. (who is president of the board of trustees of the city of East San Diego), by Arthur T. French, by F. G. Blood, by Harrison G. Sloane, and by Hugh A. Sanders. It was agreed that the evidence upon the issues raised by said return should consist of the said verified return and the said affidavits.

The affidavit of Frank C. Smith states that neither Crouch & Sanders, Sloane & Sloane, nor F. G. Blood had authority to represent him in any capacity prior to the 9th day of November, 1923, at which time he employed said attorneys to present his petition for writ of prohibition herein; that affiant had no knowledge of any stipulation or application relating to said restraining order in the quo warranto case until after said order had been made; that neither affiant nor any other officer, agent, or employee of the city of East San Diego, or any attorney for said persons, consented to the making of said restraining order.

The affidavit of A. Ray Sauer, Jr., states that neither of said attorneys last above named were attorneys representing or authorized to represent the said city of East San Diego nor any officer or agent thereof in connection with said quo warranto action, but that in fact said attorneys and all of them were and are attorneys for the plaintiff in said action, in which the city of East San Diego is a defendant; that Arthur T. French is the city attorney for the city of East San Diego and for all of its officers, agents, and employees; that neither of said attorneys other than French had any authority to represent the city of East San Diego nor any officer thereof in said actions in the superior court on the 1st day of November, 1923, or to make any stipulation in such actions on their behalf; that the said temporary restraining order was not made pursuant to any stipulation or agreement by any authorized attorney for the city of East San Diego or any officer thereof.

The affidavit of Arthur T. French states that he is, and at all times mentioned herein was city attorney of the city of East San Diego and the only attorney at law authorized to represent the said city of East San Diego and all of its officers, agents, and employees in connection with said quo warranto action; that affiant was present on the 1st day of November, 1923, before the said Judge Marsh, when the quo warranto action and another action entitled Tocque v. City of San Diego were heard; that Judge Marsh refused to recognize Hugh A. Sanders as attorney for the plaintiff in said quo warranto action and only recognized the firm of Sloane & Sloane as attorneys in said action; that a stipulation was presented in said case by Harrison G. Sloane, and agreed to by the city attorney of the city of San Diego; that thereafter the court took up the said case of Tocque v. City of San Diego, in which said Sanders made an application for a continuance until the 5th day of November, and offered to stipulate that as far as the said Tocque was concerned, if the city of San Diego would consent to said continuance, an order might be made restraining the city of East San Diego and its officers from signing any new contracts until the said 5th day of November, and no longer, but that the city attorney of the city of San Diego refused to agree thereto and opposed said continuance; that after argument thereon the court granted said application for a continuance and ordered that a restraining order be made restraining the officers and employees of the city of East San Diego from signing or entering into any new contracts until Monday, the 5th day of November, and no longer, when the matter could be heard; that affiant did not consent to the making of said order, nor have any part or connection therewith, and was not an attorney in said suit, but was merely in the courtroom as a spectator; that thereafter, on the same day, the said Judge Marsh signed a temporary restraining order in another action, to wit, the said quo warranto action, and made the said temporary restraining order run during the pendency of said action, the same being the restraining order attached to the petition for writ of prohibition herein; that neither affiant nor any officer, agent, or employee of the city of East San Diego or any attorney for them had any knowledge of the making of said order, but that the said order was signed and made upon the ex parte application of the city attorney of the city of San Diego and without notice to affiant or to any of the said officers, agents, or employees of the city of East San Diego, and was not made in the case of Arthur Tocque; that thereafter, on the 5th day of November, upon the further hearing of the Tocque Case, the matter was heard before Hon. W. P. Carey, judge of said superior court, and that the judge of said court, before going into said matter, requested Judge Marsh to come to his courtroom and state the status of the said temporary restraining order made on the 1st day of November; that thereupon Judge Marsh stated in the presence of Judge Carey, Sanders, Sloane & Sloane, and Blood, that he understood that Mr. Sanders had agreed that a restraining order might be made in the Tocque Case, restraining the city of East San Diego from entering into any contract until Monday, the 5th day of November, when the matter would be finally heard; that later Sanders and a deputy city attorney for San Diego presented themselves in his chambers, at which time the said deputy city attorney requested that the restraining order be made in the case of the People of the State of California instead of the Tocque Case, and made for the pendency of the action, and that Mr. Sanders objected thereto and stated his objection over the telephone to the city attorney, but that, notwithstanding such objection, he, the said judge, had signed the said order.

The affidavits of Blood, of Harrison G. Sloane, and of Sanders are substantially like that of French, so far as the principal transactions which occurred on the 1st day of November are concerned.

[1] The most sharply disputed question of fact is that relating to the consent of Mr. French to the making of the restraining order in the quo warranto case. As he was present in the courtroom when that case and the Tocque Case were taken up for consideration on the 1st day of November, the court seems to have assumed that he took part in the stipulation, and made its recitals accordingly in its minutes. But we think that the recitals in the minutes are not conclusive of the matter in this proceeding, where the jurisdiction of the court to make the order depends upon actual consent having been given by French as attorney for the city of East San Diego and its officers, of whom the petitioner here was one.

[2] We find that in fact the primary and principal discussion before the court related to the granting of a restraining order to continue until November 5th in the Tocque Case. Mr. French was not an attorney in that case, and remained silent, as a mere bystander. It was determined by the court at that time that a restraining order should issue in the Tocque Case, to remain in force until November 5th, when there would be a further hearing of that matter. Later in the day Mr. Sanders and Mr. Howe, a deputy city attorney of the city of San Diego, alone appearing before the judge in chambers, and the city of East San Diego not being represented, the restraining order, which is the subject of the present proceeding, was made in the quo warranto case instead of the Tocque Case, and was made to continue in force "pending the determination of said action." The order signed by Judge Marsh is entitled in the quo warranto case alone and does not recite the appearances by counsel or any stipulation by them. The minute order which preceded the signed order, and which is entitled in both cases, does recite the appearance of French as city attorney for the city of East San Diego, and does state "that by stipulation of respective counsel" the temporary restraining order is granted in the quo warranto case. But by reason of the facts to which we have referred concerning Mr. French's relation to the transaction, we think that the recital of his appearance as set forth in the minute order should be construed as referring only to the quo warranto case. Nevertheless, we find that in fact French did not stipulate to the granting of any temporary restraining order in that case, or at all.

[3] Since the injunction order in the quo warranto case was granted without notice to petitioner or to the city of East San Diego and without their consent and without consent of their attorney, it necessarily follows that the power of the court to restrain the act sought to be enjoined was restricted to the period of 10 days specified in the statute, and was further restricted by the requirement that the matter be made returnable on an order requiring cause to be shown why the injunction should not be granted, on the earliest day that the business of the court would admit of, but not later than ten days from the date of such order. Section 527, Code Civ. Proc. The situation presented by the facts of this case is similar to that considered by this court in Kelsey v. Superior Court, 40 Cal. App. 229, 236, 180 Pac. 662, 665, where this court said:

"The provisions of section 527 provide a complete scheme in a proper case for the obtaining of a writ of injunction, and such scheme must be deemed the measure of the power to be exercised by trial courts in the matter of provisional injunctions. United Railroads v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 755, Ann. Cas. 1916E 199, 151 Pac. 129. The effect of the order made was to nullify the terms of the statute, which are so plain and unambiguous that no room exists for interpretation. German Sav., etc., Society v. Aldrich, 5 Cal. App. 215, 89 Pac. 1063."

In view of the facts and the law as hereinabove stated, we are of the opinion that in making and issuing its said restraining order in the quo warranto case the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

YOUNG v. ROCHA et al. (Civ. 2615.)

1. Sales $\S$ 170—Where purchaser furnished date of shipment as required by order, seller could not modify it and offer performance at later date.

In an action for breach of contract based on defendant's refusal to accept a shipment of cocoanut meal, the original order providing for the giving of shipping dates later, where it appeared that when defendant furnished a shipping date plaintiff did not deliver on such date, held, that the date given became a part of the order as though originally inserted therein, so that plaintiff by responding that he would ship "about" such date could not modify the date of shipment, and, time being of the essence of the contract, delay in performance was not within Civ. Code, $\S$ 1492, providing for offer of performance after date fixed.

2. Sales $\S$ 175—Refusal to accept shipment of goods after time ordered not a cancellation of contract of sale.

By refusing to accept a shipment of goods after the time fixed by order, the buyers did not cancel or rescind the contract, but stood thereon and based their rights on its terms.

3. Sales $\S$ 176(3)—Purchasers held not to waive right to object to time of delivery by giving other reasons for refusing to accept goods purchased.

Where purchasers of meal refused to accept shipment thereof after the time specified by contract, they did not waive their right to object to the delay in performance merely because they gave other reasons for refusal to accept, in view of Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2076, and of Civ. Code, $\S$ 1501.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by R. Young against Manuel Rocha and others for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred L. Dreher, of San Francisco, and Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for appellant.

Metzler & Mitchell, of Eureka, and O. A. Wuolle, of San Francisco, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The jury returned a verdict in favor of defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly. Plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied. This appeal is from the judgment. Plaintiff is the assignee of Lewis Simas Jones Company. For convenience, the company will be hereinafter referred to as plaintiff. The action is for damages alleged to have resulted from defendants' breach of the following contract:

"Order No. 225. Date, June 15, 1920.

"Ship to Farmers' Store at Arcata, Cal., * * * 2 cars copra meal per ton 47 f. o. b. S. F. Shipping dates to be given later. To be taken before Dec. 30th, 1920.

"Farmers' Store, by Manual Rocha, Mng."

By mutual consent of the parties, the words "Eldorado meal" were later substituted in the order for the words "copra meal." September 6, 1920, Rocha wrote plaintiff:

"I * * * ask you to send me a car on the first of October and the other car on the first of December."

September 8th plaintiff wrote in reply:

"We have your letter of September 6, and in accordance with your instructions will ship you a 30-ton car of Eldorado Cocoanut Meal about the 1st of October, and a 30-ton car about the 1st of December."

In anticipation of receipt of the car of meal at the time ordered, the Farmers' Store sold a car of Eldorado meal to one of its customers to be delivered October 1st. October 4th this customer canceled the order because the meal was not delivered to him at the time ordered. Rocha thereupon, on October 4th, wrote plaintiff:

"This is to advise you, if you have not already sent the car of cocoanut, not to send it for the reason that I cannot sell it because the price has gone down so much that I have not been able to sell any that I have had on hand and from what I see the price is going down lower and lower. Therefore I ask you to please cancel my order and let me know what you decide to do."

The plaintiff received this letter October 6th, at which time it had not yet made the shipment, nor did it at any time make any shipment to the defendants. The plaintiff made no reply to the letter, but placed the matter in the hands of its attorneys, who wrote Rocha, according to the latter's testimony, "and says there is a carload to ship, and if I don't accept I have to stand the damages." October 18th Rocha again wrote plaintiff, saying:

"Once more I write you asking you what can be done so that I do not lose so much on the cocoanut which I ordered, because I asked you to cancel not so much on account of the price but because I could not sell it on account of Nilsen selling cheaper than I could buy it. * * * See what you can do, so that you do not lose and I do not lose because I do not want a lawsuit with anybody."

The parties not having succeeded in reaching an adjustment of the controversy, the present action was commenced March 16, 1921. The complaint alleges that "defendants refused to accept said Eldorado meal, and canceled the whole contract." The answer alleges that when plaintiff "failed and refused to carry out said contract * * * and failed to ship said Eldorado Cocoanut Meal on October 1, 1920, * * * defendant could not use or sell said Eldorado Cocoanut Meal, and refused to accept the same at a date later than said contract called for."

[1] Appellant contends that plaintiff was not under obligation to ship the meal on the 1st of October because in its letter of September 8th it stated that it would ship it "about the 1st of October," and that the "words on or about do not mean exactly." Plaintiff's letter of September 8th, however, is no part of the contract between the parties. The original order provided for "shipping dates to be given later." This provision gave the defendants the option to fix the dates of shipment at any time before the end of the year. When defendants thereafter fixed the date for the first shipment at October 1st, that date became a part of the order as much as if it had been originally inserted therein. Plaintiff's letter of September 8th could not have the effect of modifying the date of shipment so fixed by defendants any more than it could have changed any other term of the order. Of course, defendants were required to give reasonable notice of the time selected for shipment, but it cannot be successfully contended that a notice of 24 days was not reasonable.

Time was of the essence of the contract, though not expressly so declared therein. Section 1492 of the Civil Code provides:

"Where delay in performance is capable of exact and entire compensation, and time has not been expressly declared to be of the essence of the obligation, an offer of performance, accompanied with an offer of such compensation, may be made at any time after it is due, but without prejudice to any rights acquired by the creditor, or by any other persons, in the meantime."

In this case the delay in performance was not "capable of exact and entire compensation," nor was any offer of such compensation made. In a case not unlike this in some respects it is said:

"In the contracts of merchants, time is of the essence. The time of shipment is the usual and convenient means of fixing the probable time of arrival, with a view of providing funds to pay for the goods, or of fulfilling contracts with third persons." Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 6 Sup. Ct. 12, 29 L. Ed. 366.

For numerous other cases in point, see 13 Rose's U. S. Notes, Rev. Ed. 36, and L. R. A. 1916E, 940.

[2] At the time defendants refused to accept the meal they did not state that their refusal was based on plaintiff's failure to deliver the same at the time directed. Appellant argues that—

"Where a contract is attempted to be canceled and the person attempting said cancellation bases his right thereto on certain objections, all other objections which might have been pleaded at the time or stated are thereby waived."

By refusing to accept the shipment after the time ordered the defendants did not cancel or rescind the contract, but stood upon it, and based their rights upon its terms. Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 14, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

[3] Plaintiff's position can be no more strongly stated in its favor than by assuming that on the 6th day of October it expressly offered to deliver the car of meal to defendants. Section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The person to whom a tender is made must, at the time, specify any objection he may have to the money, instrument, or property, or he must be deemed to have waived it."

Section 1501 of the Civil Code provides:

"All objections to the mode of an offer of performance, which the creditor has an opportunity to state at the time to the person making the offer, and which could be then obviated by him, are waived by the creditor, if not then stated."

In Allen v. Chatfield, 172 Cal. 60, 69, 156 Pac. 47, 51, it is said that—

Section 1501 "provides in effect that the failure to object does not waive a defect which the person making the offer could not then obviate if objections were then made thereto. Section 2076 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not in direct conflict with this provision. The provisions of the different Codes, with relation to each other, must be construed as parts of the same statute. Pol. Code, § 4480. This provision of section 1501 is, therefore, to be construed as a qualification of section 2076."

It is obvious that on the 6th of October the plaintiff could not have obviated the defect of failure to deliver on the 1st of the same month.

In the bill of exceptions, certain rulings of the court admitting testimony are assigned as errors. The evidence was properly admitted under the pleadings as they stood at the time of such admission. Plaintiff was thereafter permitted to amend the complaint in such manner as to eliminate the issues to which such testimony was directed. Plaintiff's remedy was a motion to strike out the testimony or to request an instruction to disregard it. In any event, the plaintiff suffered no prejudice from the admission of the testimony because, viewing the whole evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff and disregarding the testimony to which objection was made, the court would have been warranted in instructing the jury to find for defendants.

The judgment is affirmed.

BAKER v. BAKER. (Civ. 4459.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 19, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1)—Judgment not reversed for defective finding or want of finding, if evidence supports judgment.

A judgment will not be reversed because of a defective finding or even for a want of a finding, if the evidence is such that the trial court must have made one of such a character as to support the judgment.

2. Divorce ⇨203—Wife's allegations held to present issue as to her ability to defend action without financial assistance from husband.

In a divorce action, in which the wife sought attorneys' fees under Civ. Code, § 137, her allegations that she "had no occupation, and no means of support, and is at present relying upon her relatives for support, and has no money or funds with which to pay counsel or costs of this action," held to present the issue of whether the wife was without financial assistance and would be unable from her own property to defend the action.

3. Divorce ⇨226 — Evidence held to show wife's inability to defend action without financial assistance from husband.

In a divorce action, in which the wife sought attorneys' fees under Civ. Code, § 137, evidence held to show that the wife was unable to defend the action without financial assistance from husband.

4. Divorce ⇨228—Order allowing wife counsel fees not reversed for failure of court to make finding as to wife's dependence on husband in view of evidence.

In a divorce action, in which the wife sought attorneys' fees under Civ. Code, § 137, an order allowing the wife attorneys' fees will not be reversed because of court's failure to make a finding that the wife was unable from her own property to defend the action and needed the financial assistance of the husband, where the evidence was such that the court could not have found otherwise.

5. Divorce ⇨222—That hearing on wife's motion for attorneys' fees did not take place prior to trial did not deprive court of jurisdiction.

Where wife's motion for attorneys' fees under Civ. Code, § 137, in divorce action was made in due time to have been heard before the trial of the case on its merits, the fact that the hearing and decision did not take place prior to the trial did not deprive court of jurisdiction to direct the husband to pay attorneys' fees.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action for divorce by Arthur G. Baker against Helen Baker, in which the defendant filed a cross-complaint. From an order directing the plaintiff to pay defendant counsel fees on denial of divorce to both parties, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Amend & Amend, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George P. Adams and A. J. Sherer, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This action is one for divorce. The defendant filed a cross-complaint, and the court denied each party a decree. In the judgment it was ordered that the plaintiff pay the defendant $200 as counsel fees in the action, and the appeal is from this order.

Prior to trial the defendant moved the court for an order under section 137 of the Civil Code that she be allowed her counsel fees. It was then stipulated by the parties that decision upon such motion be made at the time of the trial. In the judgment no finding appears as to the property of either party. The finding and order of the trial court upon this issue is as follows:

"Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiff pay to the defendant the sum of $200 as and for counsel fees in said action; said sum to be paid in five monthly payments, the first payment to be made during the month of April, 1921."

Appellant insists that section 137, Civil Code, does not authorize the allowance of counsel fees to the wife unless it be established and found that without financial assistance from her husband she would be unable from her own property to defend the action.

[1-4] It is a familiar rule that a judgment will not be reversed because of a defective finding, or even for want of a finding, if the evidence is such that the trial court must have made one of such a character as to support the judgment. Hulen v. Stuart (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 750; Krasky v. Wolpert, 134 Cal. 338, 342, 66 Pac. 309. In the instant case the issue as to the wife's financial ability to defend was properly presented by the pleadings. The cross-complaint alleges:

"That the cross-complainant and cross-defendant had no occupation and no means of support, and is at present relying upon her relatives for support, and has no money or funds with which to pay counsel or costs of this action."

A similar allegation is contained in the answer. The only evidence upon the question of the defendant's financial worth was her own testimony. She testified as follows:

"I have a little cash on hand; I had to borrow to live. I owe about $200 which I borrowed from George P. Adams and gave my note to him for it. I have no business or occupation. I have never worked for a living. I have no employment now. I have not fitted myself for a position. I am living with my brother, Dr. and Mrs. Sherer."

It is true that in addition to this Mrs. Baker stated that she was the devisee of an interest in an estate which, however, was undistributed, and that she had no information as to when her share would be received by her. This, of course, did not constitute an available fund with which to defend or prosecute the action. Had the trial court made any finding it is difficult to see how it would have been possible for it to have found otherwise than that without financial assistance in providing counsel fees the respondent would have been unable to defend against appellant's charges of cruelty, subsequently determined to have been entirely unfounded, from her own property.

[5] It is suggested by appellant that as the respondent was actually able to conduct her case without the payment of counsel fees ultimately ordered, this in itself establishes the fact that such an order was unnecessary. The motion for the allowance was made in due time to have been heard before the trial of the case on its merits. The fact that the hearing and decision upon the motion did not take place prior to the trial does not remove it from the court's jurisdiction as provided in section 137, Civil Code. Farrar v. Farrar, 41 Cal. App. 452, 182 Pac. 989.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY
et al. (Civ. 4567.)

1. Statutes $\S$ 158, 159—Repeal by implication not favored; showing necessary to establish repeal by labor act stated.

Repeals by implication are not favored, and to establish same it must appear from the later act that it was intended to take the place of or repeal the former, or that the two are so inconsistent that force and effect cannot be given to both.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 260(4)—Right of appeal by state from justice's court not lost by failure to take in open court.

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1466, 1467, providing that appeals from justice's court may be taken as provided in title 9, pt. 2 (sections 1235-1265), "except that such appeal must be taken within fifteen days after judgment is rendered," the state does not lose its right of appeal from an order dismissing a prosecution in a justice's court by failure to announce the taking of same in open court, notwithstanding section 1240, which is included in title 9, part 2, and provides that an appeal may be taken by the people by announcement in open court when the order is made.

Application by the People of the State of California for a writ of mandate to be directed to the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles and Sidney N. Reeve, Judge thereof. Writ granted.

Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

Edward T. Bishop, Co. Counsel, and J. H. O'Connor, Asst. Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Haas & Dunnigan and J. J. Wilson, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

HOUSER, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate for the purpose of directing the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles and Sidney N. Reeve, as a judge thereof, to hear and determine certain appeals from the justice's court of Los Angeles township.

The essential facts surrounding the matter appear to be that in two several actions pending before the justice's court of Los Angeles township, in which certain defendants were charged with a violation of the provisions of section 626f of the Penal Code in that they unlawfully had deer and deer meat in their possession, a justice of the peace (in all respects regularly, but in the absence of the district attorney or any deputy district attorney representing the people) had sustained demurrers in each of said cases, and, in addition thereto, had ordered each of the actions dismissed. Later, on the same day, a deputy district attorney appeared before the justice of the peace in his chambers and gave oral notice of appeal from each of the said judgments of dismissal, and still later, and on the same day, filed in the justice's court a written notice of appeal in each of said actions; following which the defendants therein served upon the district attorney their several notices of motion to dismiss each of said appeals on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction, and that the appeals were not taken as provided by law, which said motions were and each of them was granted by the judge of the superior court.

In view of the fact that it is conceded that mandamus is the proper remedy herein the only question which this court need determine is the one suggested by counsel for petitioner: Were the appeals in these cases taken at the proper time?

The right of appeal in such cases is provided for by section 1466 of the Penal Code, and section 1467 of the Penal Code contains the provision with reference to the time within which the appeal may be taken, as follows:

"The appeal may be taken, heard and determined as provided in title nine, part two of this Code, except that such appeal must be taken within fifteen days after the judgment is rendered or within ten days after the order is made from which the appeal is taken."

It will be noted that the effect of said section is to make the right of appeal from the justice's court of the superior court identical with the right of appeal from the superior court to the Supreme Court, except that in appeals from the justice's court to the superior court the appeal "must be taken within fifteen days after the judgment is rendered." It is contended by respondents that because under section 1240 of the Penal Code (which is included within title 9, part 2, of the Penal Code, to which section 1467 regulating the appeals from the justice's court to the superior court relates) it is provided that in appeals from the superior court to the Supreme Court "an appeal may be taken by the people by announcing in open court at the time the order is made that the people appeal from the same"; and because of the further fact that said section 1240 was enacted at a later date than was said section 1467—an implied repeal as to section 1467 resulted. The argument of respondents is based upon the history of the legislation in the matter. Section 1466 of the Penal Code, which provides for appeals from justices' courts, has remained unaltered since its amendment in 1880; and until 1907, when the exception that such appeals "must be taken within fifteen days after the judgment is rendered," etc., was added to section 1467, said section 1467 merely provided that such appeals might be taken as provided in title 9, part 2, of the Penal Code. Up to 1907 section 1239 of title 9, of part 2 of the Penal Code required that appeals from a judgment in a superior court to the Supreme Court must be taken within one year after its rendition, and, by section 1240 of the Penal Code, the appellant was required to file with the clerk of the court a notice of such appeal and to serve a copy of such notice on the adverse party. In 1907 section 1239 was amended so that thereafter appeals by the defendant from a judgment of the superior court to the Supreme Court had to be taken within 90 days from the rendition of the judgment, and it was at the same legislative session that section 1467 of the Penal Code was amended as heretofore stated. Section 1240 was not amended in its present form until 1909.

It is urged that the amendment of 1907 to section 1467 of the Penal Code was a limitation applicable to appeals to superior courts upon the time which was otherwise prescribed by section 1239 and which would apply in the absence of the limitation.

The fact that section 1466 of the Penal Code provides that appeals from the justice's court to the superior court may be taken in like cases and for like causes as appeals may be taken to the Supreme Court, and that section 1467 of the Penal Code provides that such appeals may be taken as provided in effect in sections 1239 and 1240 of the Penal Code, might be conclusive were it not for the special exception in section 1467 that justice's court appeals from the judgment must be taken within 15 days after the judgment is rendered. In 1907, when such exception was enacted, section 1239 was also amended so that appeals from a judgment in a superior court might be taken within 90 days after the rendition of the judgment. The conclusion is irresistible that the Legislature intended that the time for taking appeals from the justice's court should be differentiated from the time for taking appeals from superior courts. Having thus expressly separated the time for taking such respective appeals, it should now require strong and explicit language to reunite them in that regard.

[1] That repeals by implication are not favored is a well-known principle of law. The intention to do so must be unmistakable, or there must be a direct statutory enactment to accomplish that result. In substance, it has been decided by our Supreme Court many times that, in order for a subsequent act to repeal a former, it should appear from the last act that it was intended to take the place of or to repeal the former, or that the two acts are so inconsistent that force and effect cannot be given to both. In the Matter of Yick Wo, 68 Cal. 304, 9 Pac. 139, 58 Am. Rep. 12, and cases there cited; Christy v. Board of Supervisors, 39 Cal. 10; Capron v. Hitchcock, 98 Cal. 432, 33 Pac. 431. The principle applicable herein is covered in the cause of Bateman v. Colgan, 111 Cal. 586, 44 Pac. 238, where the court says:

"It is an established rule * * * that the law does not favor a repeal by implication, but that, where there are two provisions relating to the same subject-matter, they must, if possible, be construed so as to maintain the integrity of both. And, where two statutes treat of the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, although latest in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter, so far as coming within its particular provisions."

In the case entitled Matter of Petition of Johnson, 167 Cal. 142, 138 Pac. 740, it is held (syllabus) that—

"Repeals of statutes by implication are not favored. A later act, containing no repealing clause, does not repeal a prior act except so far as the two are clearly inconsistent, or unless it is manifest that the latter act was intended as a substitute for the former in all respects and to cover the entire subject-matter to which both relate. In other words, the language of repeal, to be effective, must be of unmistakable meaning."

See, also, Fox v. Townsend, 2 Cal. App. 193, 83 Pac. 272; Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 Pac. 9, 18; People v. Pacific Improvement Co., 130 Cal. 442, 62 Pac. 739; People v. Sands, 102 Cal. 12, 36 Pac. 404; Thompson v. Board of Supervisors, 111 Cal. 553, 44 Pac. 230; Banks v. Yolo County, 104 Cal. 258, 37 Pac. 900.

[2] We have here two statutes relating to the same subject-matter; one of them by its exception applies strictly to appeals from the justice's court, and the other, as originally enacted and without reference thereto by any other statute, applies solely to appeals from the superior court. They are not irreconcilably inconsistent one with the other. There is no express repeal of the statute first enacted, and it may stand without doing violence to the later statute. In such circumstances it must be held that the right of the people to appeal herein was not lost until after the expiration of 15 days after the judgment was rendered.

It is also contended that under the provisions of section 1387 of the Penal Code the effect of the dismissal of the actions by the justice of the peace was to produce a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense. But the appeal being effective, neither the question of the legality nor the effect of such dismissal is one for determination by this court in this proceeding. If the superior court should conclude that the dismissal of the actions by the justice's court was illegal, necessarily any question of bar by reason of the provisions of section 1387 of the Penal Code would be eliminated, as would also any question of "once in jeopardy," which is also suggested by counsel as being proper for this court to determine at this time.

It is ordered that the writ issue as prayed.

BASSI et al. v. WALDEN. (Civ. 2640.)

1. Sales §168(2)—Purchaser's right of inspection should be exercised at time and place of delivery.

Ordinarily, a purchaser's right of inspection should be exercised at or before the time, and at the place, of delivery.

2. Evidence §450(8)—Contract held not so definite as to preclude parol proof of intention as to time and place of inspection.

A seller's agreement to load stakes sold for shipment by the buyer, and "to stand all shortages and culls," held not so definite and certain as to preclude parol proof of intention as to the time and place of inspection, though the natural inference, in the light of the situation and the surrounding circumstances, was that the culls were to be rejected while the stakes were being transferred from piles to the cars.

3. Sales §359(1)—Buyer's right to credit for culls rejected at point of destination of shipments by him held not established as matter of law.

In an action for the price of stakes delivered to and shipped by defendant, whose answer was only a general denial, evidence as to shipment of culls, which defendant contended were to be rejected at the points of destination, held insufficient to show, as a matter of law, contrary to the court's finding, that defendant was entitled to any credit therefor, irrespective of the place of inspection intended.

4. Continuance —44—Motion held properly denied as not supported by affidavit or other proof.

Where defendant presented no affidavit or other proof in support of his motion for a continuance to take depositions, the record did not disclose the names of the desired deponents or the facts to which they would testify, and there was no showing as to why their depositions were not taken before trial, the motion was properly denied under Code Civ. Proc. § 595.

5. Evidence —171—Parol evidence held admissible to prove shipment of carload of stakes by buyer.

In an action for the price of stakes delivered to defendant on board cars for shipment to purchasers from the latter, parol testimony as to shipment of a carload by defendant held admissible as against his objection that the bill of lading, a contract to which plaintiff was not a party, was the best evidence; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1937, 1938, relating to proof of the contents of writings, being inapplicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by A. Bassi and others, copartners, doing business as A. Bassi & Co., against E. D. Walden. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. G. Weaver and Metzler & Mitchell, all of Eureka, for appellant.

Mahan & Mahan, of Eureka, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiffs were given judgment, and the defendant appeals.

February 17, 1921, plaintiffs entered into a contract with the defendant reading as follows:

"The parties of the first part do hereby agree to deliver 200 M A #1 6-ft stakes at the Shively switch. Delivery to be made as soon as possible. Price to be paid—$52 per M delivery at switch, or $53.30 delivery on cars. One-half to be paid on delivery at switch, balance to be paid 10th month following shipment."

Under this contract either four or five carloads of stakes were delivered to and shipped by defendant during the early part of 1921, the evidence being conflicting as to the number of cars. In addition to the stakes shipped, the plaintiffs, up to January 20, 1922, had piled 165,000 stakes south of the depot at Shively. On the latter date the parties entered into the following agreement:

"Agreement entered into between Bassi & Co. of the first part and E. D. Walden, party of the second part. The party of the first part agrees to load 165,000 stakes, price to be paid fifty-one dollars ($51.00) f. o. b. car, and agrees to stand all shortage and culls, load promptly, and load light stakes 165,000 stakes now piled south of depot. Party of the second part agrees to make payments 10th of month, following shipment, full payment or settlement March 15th, 1922. This is new agreement to cover former contract made in February or March. Amount 200,000."

It is admitted that 161,200 stakes were shipped under the second contract. It appears that the stakes were shipped by defendant to various persons in the San Joaquin valley, where they were used as grape stakes.

[1] Appellant contends that it was the understanding of the parties that the culls were to be rejected and deducted at the points of destination in the San Joaquin valley and that plaintiffs were to stand the loss of the stakes so rejected. Ordinarily a purchaser's right of inspection should be exercised at or before the time of delivery and at the place of delivery. J. K. Armsby Co. v. Blum, 137 Cal. 553, 70 Pac. 669; Whitaker v. Dunlap-Morgan Co., 44 Cal. App. 140, 186 Pac. 181; Samuel M. Lawder & Sons Co. v. Albert Mackie Grocery Co., 97 Md. 1, 54 Atl. 634, 62 L. R. A. 795, and note, p. 804. There are, of course, well-recognized exceptions to the rule, as pointed out in some of the authorities cited.

[2] Defendant's place of business was in Humboldt county. The stakes were delivered to him at Shively, and title undoubtedly passed to him at that place. The stakes were on the ground at the time the second contract was executed. Interpreting the contract in the light of the situation of the parties and the surrounding circumstances, the natural inference from the stipulation that plaintiffs were "to stand all shortage and culls" is that the culls were to be rejected during the transfer of the stakes from the piles to the cars. The term, however, is not so definite and certain as to preclude parol proof of the intention of the parties as to the time and place of inspection.

[3] The evidence shows, without substantial conflict, that there is a custom among the buyers of Humboldt county to pay for stakes purchased upon the basis of the count made at the places to which the buyers ship the stakes, after deducting the culls rejected at such places. The defendant testified that the second contract was executed with the express understanding that the plaintiffs were to "be responsible for the shortage and culls at the other end of the line." There is no direct contradiction of this testimony. Witnesses for the plaintiffs testified that either the defendant or his brother, W. M. Walden, acting for defendant, inspected the stakes as they were loaded on the cars; that when asked if they were graded "good enough" they would say "they were fine"; that, when asked "if we were culling them good enough," W. M. Walden "said they were fine"; that W. M. Walden went over each car as it was loaded every day; that he was there every day and went into each car and looked at the stakes. The whole contract price was $10,378.73, and, while the defendant paid the plaintiffs a total of $8,550.50 prior to the completion of the shipments, he made no claim that culls had been shipped until after the last shipment. Whatever the place of inspection intended by the parties, the evidence shows that the culls were thrown out before shipment, and there is no evidence that any culls were shipped, except as hereinafter stated.

The men who loaded the stakes on the cars were experienced loaders. They "load nearly all the stakes loaded from Shively * * * for all the people around there." In loading plaintiffs' stakes they culled out from 5,000 to 6,000 of them. They threw out the culls in loading from the piles to the wagon and again in transferring from the wagon to the cars. They inspected the stakes "pretty close," would see "just about" every stake. The defendant testified that he was at the point of destination when a car, No. 88373 containing 8,000 stakes, was received, and that 1,800 of them were rejected as culls. The evidence does not show that any of plaintiffs' stakes were shipped in a car of that number, but that 8,000 of their stakes were shipped in car No. 88673 on March 7, 1922, and that five different cars contained 8,000 stakes each. A Mr. Carter seems to have had charge of the loading and shipment from Shively of stakes belonging to defendant and not involved in this action. Relative to the 8,000 stakes contained in car No. 88373, the defendant testified:

"This car came in to me. * * * I saw the car was billed out by Carter, and I wired back to my brother to tell Carter not to load any more culls in the car. At the time I thought Carter billed it out and at the time I thought that it was my car, * * * but come to find out it belonged to Gianoni and Bassi & Co. and I sold it to another party at a loss of $10 a thousand. * * * Q. Were the culls sold? A. I got two cents apiece for them. * * * Q. You never reported to Gianoni or Bassi & Co.? A. We never even deducted that; I have reported. Q. You did not deduct it? A. No, sir; I thought we would agree on that after I got back here. * * * We never deducted on our report. Q. Then you are making no claim for those now? A. There is 1,800. * * * Q. And you made no deduction for this? A. No."

From the foregoing testimony it is uncertain whether defendant at the trial claimed credit for the 1,800 culls. The answer consisted of a general denial which, of course, was sufficient, but it did not particularly point out the defense relied on. In view of the nature of the answer and the uncertainty of the testimony, the defendant should have clearly made known to the trial court whether he claimed credit for the 1,800 culls. From the discrepancy between the number of the car containing the culls and that of any car loaded by plaintiffs, together with defendant's testimony that he "saw the car was billed out by Carter," may have caused the court to conclude that the stakes therein were not loaded by plaintiffs. It further appears from the foregoing evidence of defendant that he assumed ownership of the culls and sold them and made no deduction by reason thereof. The evidence in this regard is not so clear and certain as to establish, as a matter of law, contrary to the finding of the trial court, that defendant was entitled to any credit on account of the 1,800 culls. There is no other evidence tending to show that culls were included in any of the shipments.

[4] The defendant attempted to show the number of culls rejected at the points of destination by the returns received by him from his purchasers at such points. The record does not show what these returns disclosed. The court sustained plaintiffs' objection to the admission of the evidence. Counsel for defendant thereupon asked for a continuance to enable him to take the depositions of the persons to whom shipments had been made for the purpose of showing the number of stakes which had been rejected as culls. At the close of the evidence he renewed the motion for a continuance. The motion was denied, and appellant contends that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion. The defendant did not present any affidavit or other proof in support of his motion. The record does not disclose the names of the persons whose depositions were desired or the facts to which they would testify. Neither was there any showing as to why the depositions of such persons had not been taken prior to the trial.

"A motion to postpone a trial on the ground of the absence of evidence can only be made upon affidavit showing the materiality of the evidence expected to be obtained, and that due diligence has been used to procure it." Code Civ. Proc. § 595.

[5] Plaintiffs produced bills of lading showing the shipments of four cars of stakes under the first contract. A witness for plaintiff was then asked:

"After these stakes had been shipped was there another carload shipped by Mr. Walden from your stakes?"

Counsel for defendant objected as follows:

"We object to it on the ground it is not the best evidence; the best evidence is the record of the railroad company for shipping those."

The objection was overruled, and several witnesses testified that the carload of stakes in question was shipped. No contention is made, nor could any be made successfully, that the evidence produced, if admissible, is not sufficient to show that the carload of stakes was shipped. The contention is that the court erred in admitting parol testimony to prove the shipment. The question in issue was whether the stakes had been delivered to defendant on the car and the number thereof, not the contents of the bill of lading. The best and secondary evidence rules are not applicable to the admissibility of evidence on that issue. The bill of lading was a contract between the defendant as shipper and the railroad company as carrier, and the plaintiffs were not parties to that contract. If the controversy were between the shipper and the carrier, the rule contended for might be applicable. Appellant relies upon the provisions of sections 1937 and 1938 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to proof of the contents of writings. As stated, there was no attempt to prove the contents of the bill of lading but the number of stakes shipped, and the sections relied on have no application to the question.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte SOUZA. (Cr. 746.)

1. Criminal law §238—Evidence held to show probable cause for believing defendant guilty.

Evidence that defendant had been issued a license to conduct a soft drink parlor, and that a person acting as bartender therein sold intoxicating liquor to customers on request, showed probable cause for believing defendant guilty of a violation of the prohibition law, within Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 7, so as to authorize the magistrate in holding him.

2. Intoxicating liquors §168—When principal liable for acts of agent in selling liquor.

The mere selling of intoxicating liquor by an agent is not sufficient to warrant a conviction of the principal; but, if the circumstances are such that it may be inferred that the sale was made with the consent or knowledge of the principal, then he is equally guilty with the agent, and may be held criminally liable.

3. Criminal law §560—"Probable cause" defined.

Probable cause means having more evidence for than against; supported by evidence which inclines the mind to believe, but leaves some room for doubt.

Application by Jack Souza for a writ of habeas corpus against the Superior Court of Sacramento County. Writ discharged.

Neil McAllister and Clifford A. Russell, both of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. J. Henderson, Dist. Atty., and Wm. V. Cowan, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On the 5th day of October, 1923, the petitioner was bound over to the superior court of the county of Sacramento by the police judge of the city of Sacramento to answer the charge of selling liquor in violation of what is generally known and called the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79). The petitioner seeks his discharge herein on the ground that he was held to answer for such alleged offense without probable cause, basing his petition upon subdivision 7 of section 1487 of the Penal Code.

The testimony, as set out in the transcript, shows the following state of facts: During the month of July, 1923, the defendant applied to the proper officers of the city of Sacramento for and obtained a license for conducting a soft drink establishment at 218 L street, in the city of Sacramento; that this license was in full force and effect at the time of the alleged offense for which petitioner was arrested; that on or about the 3d day of September, 1923, at about 7:30 p. m., two officers visited the establishment just referred to, and found in the place a bar behind which was a man engaged in dispensing soft drinks. The two officers referred to requested that they be served with something stronger than soft drinks, and, in response to such request, each of said officers was served with a drink of liquor known as and called jackass brandy. A portion of the drink so served was retained by the officers, and upon being analyzed was found to contain 26.26 per cent. of alcohol by volume, which is considerably more than the quantity allowed by law.

At the time the officers visited the place of business referred to the defendant was not present, and the charge against him is founded upon the theory that the principal, under such circumstances, is chargeable for the act of his agent, and that the circumstances tend to show that the agent was acting within the scope and authority of his employment, and therefore with the consent of the principal.

[1, 2] The question before the court is not whether the evidence in this case is sufficient to warrant a conviction, but simply whether there is sufficient testimony to justify the committing magistrate in coming to the conclusion that probable cause existed for believing the defendant guilty. That the crime was committed by the bartender is without question, and the only fact remaining, Is there sufficient evidence to indicate that he was acting in the capacity of the defendant's agent, and not simply on his own responsibility? The law seems to be well settled that in such cases the mere sale of intoxicating liquor by an agent is not sufficient, in and of itself, to warrant a conviction of the principal; but, if the attendant circumstances are such that the court or jury may reasonably infer that the sale was made with the consent or knowledge of the principal, then, and in that case, he is equally guilty with the agent and may be held criminally liable.

In the first place, as we have seen, the testimony shows that the petitioner applied for and had issued to him and was in the possession of a license to conduct a soft drink establishment at 218 L street, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, at the date of the alleged offense. Evidence that defendant had previously applied for or obtained a license to sell liquor at the place in question is admissible as tending to show him to be the keeper or proprietor of the place. Commonwealth v. Sullivan, 156 Mass. 229, 30 N. E. 1023; Commonwealth v. Andrews, 143 Mass. 23, 8 N. E. 643; Commonwealth v. Brown, 124 Mass. 318. Whether such testimony is sufficient to establish the fact of proprietorship beyond a reasonable doubt is wholly immaterial upon this inquiry, or upon the inquiry conducted by the committing magistrate; it is, however, testimony tending to show the fact of proprietorship, and therefore measures up to the requirement of the statute specifying probable cause.

Now, let us reason a little on the question of probabilities. According to the usual course of business, the proprietor of an establishment is the owner, who places others in charge thereof. It is possible that the man denominated by the witnesses as a bartender, as the one who dispensed drinks, was an interloper; but that conclusion is not probable. It is also possible that the bartender in charge of the establishment, for which we have seen another held a license to conduct the same, and therefore may be held to be the proprietor, was doing business upon his own responsibility, and not upon the responsibility of the proprietor. But this again is not probable. It is possible that the bartender brought the jackass brandy to the place of business, which the testimony tends to show was conducted by another, and kept the brandy there for sale for his own personal benefit; but this again is not probable. The usual and ordinary course of business is for the agent, clerk, or bartender, or by whatever name the person may be known, to sell those articles at the place of business that have been supplied by the proprietor thereof. Unless there is something appearing to the contrary, we think it reasonable to conclude that the usual and ordinary course of business has been followed, and that, under such circumstances, the requirement of the Penal Code has been met.

In Knight v. Commonwealth, 194 Ky. 563, 240 S. W. 40, in considering a somewhat similar case, the Supreme Court of Kentucky used the following language:

"It cannot be questioned that a principal can be subjected to penal prosecution and punishment for an offense against the penal or criminal law of the state committed by his agent acting by his authority or approval, or within the scope of his employment. Nor is it necessary to prove express consent of the principal to the agent's illegal act. The assent of the former may be shown by any competent evidence to that effect; and proof of the fact that the illegal act was committed by the agent in the principal's place of business and in the conduct of his business has been held sufficient, in most circumstances, to make out a prima facie case of implied authority."

The facts in that case are strikingly similar to those in the case at bar, to wit:

"It appears from the testimony of the two witnesses named that the appellant owns and conducts a store in the village of Knightsburg, Muhlenburg county, in which are kept and sold such articles of general merchandise as are usually handled in a village store. Schmidt and Blythe in July or August, 1921, went together to the store, and, upon entering the former, in an open manner and in an ordinary tone of voice, made known to a young man in charge of the store, and then standing behind one of its counters, that he wished to purchase a quart of whisky, whereupon the man thus addressed produced from behind the counter a glass fruit jar containing a quart of 'moonshine' whisky, which in the presence of Blythe he sold and delivered to Schmidt at the agreed price of $5, which sum the latter did not at that time pay, but then agreed to pay later. Following his purchase of the whisky Schmidt carried it away from the store accompanied by Blythe, but he failed to state, nor was he asked, whether he afterwards paid for it, or, if so, to whom the payment was made. Though Schmidt and Blythe positively testified that the man from whom the former purchased the whisky was in charge of the appellant's store, both professed to be unacquainted with him, and claimed that his name was unknown to them. Both also testified that they and the vendor of the whisky were the only persons in the store when the sale of the whisky took place."

[3] This case was decided in April, 1922, and was before the court upon a judgment of conviction, and, while the judgment was reversed on account of an error in the instructions given by the court, the Supreme Court of Kentucky, nevertheless, held that the trial court was correct in refusing to instruct the jury to bring in a verdict of not guilty on the testimony just referred to. It will be seen that the sale of the whisky in the Knight Case was made at an ordinary country store, where articles of merchandise were kept, as is common in establishments of that kind.

In Elliott v. State, 19 Ariz. 1, 164 Pac. 1179, the proprietor of a soft drink establishment was held liable for the sale of liquor by his agent, or the one in charge of the establishment. In that case it was held that the principal would not be liable unless the sale was made by his direction or knowingly assented to, or acquiesced in by him, but that such knowledge, direction or acquiescence might be shown by the circumstances. It appears in that case that the real testimony upon which the defendant was held was the fact of sales made by the agent or the person called the bartender, both before and after the sale of the offense charged in the information. This is for the purpose of showing the course or conduct of business. In Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1109, are collected a large number of cases on the subject of the liability of a principal for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor by his servant, one line of authorities holding that, in the absence of an express statutory provision to the contrary, a person licensed by the state to sell intoxicating liquors is not criminally liable for illegal sales made by a servant without authority and against his positive instructions; and also another line of authorities holding that a licensee is absolutely liable for illegal sales of liquor made by his servant, and that his instructions to the servant not to make such sales are immaterial on the question of his liability. These cases are all arising after judgment of conviction in the trial court, and necessarily differ in principle from the question with which we are now dealing. In the cases which we have cited, the liability of the principal for the act of the agent depended upon whether there was testimony sufficient to show the principal guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. With this we are not concerned. It is only, Does the testimony which we have referred to raise a probability of the defendant's guilt? The fact that the courts are so evenly divided upon whether such testimony does or does not show the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt is certainly sufficient to justify the holding that such testimony does raise a reasonable probability of the principal's guilt. The Kentucky case is but a trifle stronger, if any, than the evidence introduced against the petitioner herein, and in that case the Supreme Court held that the trial court was not in error in refusing to direct an acquittal. If such testimony is sufficient to go to the jury and support a verdict it is surely sufficient to justify a committing magistrate in holding that probable cause has been shown. Probable cause has been defined as "having more evidence for than against; supported by evidence which inclines the mind to believe, but leaves some room for doubt." Following the usual and ordinary course of business there was sufficient testimony to induce in the mind of the committing magistrate the belief that the man who held a license for the establishment conducted at 218 L street, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, was a proprietor; that the person found in charge thereof and acting as bartender was placed there by him; that the goods being sold were articles of merchandise placed there for that purpose by the proprietor; and that whatever was done by the person so placed in charge was at the instance, knowledge, and acquiescence of the owner thereof. We therefore conclude, even though we are satisfied that the prosecuting officers might by the introduction of a little more evidence have obviated this proceeding, that probable cause has been shown, and that the petitioner's application for discharge herein should be denied; and it is so ordered.

Writ discharged.

ROBINSON v. McABEE. (Civ. 2634.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 12, 1923.)

1. Elections $\S$ 285(1)—From the affidavit and statement of grounds of election contest held that it sufficiently appears two precincts named were within township.

In an election contest for justice of the peace, where in affidavit and statement of grounds of contest which stated the parties were opposing candidates in a certain township and that illegal votes were cast in two specified precincts, the affidavit was sufficient as against general demurrer to show that such precincts were within the township.

2. Elections $\S$ 287—Question whether precincts included within township not raised in contest by general demurrer.

In election contest wherein the affidavit and statement of grounds alleged that illegal votes were cast in A. and C. precincts in a township, and the prayer of the complaint was for a recount in these precincts, a general demurrer did not raise the question whether the two precincts were embraced within the township.

3. Elections $\S$ 293(3), 295(1)—Record of minutes of board of supervisors of election held admissible and prima facie evidence as to facts therein stated in election contest for justice of the peace.

In an election contest for the office of township justice of the peace, the minutes of the board of supervisors containing statement of votes received by all candidates was admissible and its contents prima facie correct as to facts therein set forth, including the number and names of the precincts of the township.

4. Elections $\S$ 293(3)—Requiring voter not legally qualified to disclose name of person voted for not error.

In an election contest requiring a voter, not legally qualified, to disclose the name of the person for whom she voted for the office, was not error.

5. Elections $\S$ 72—Registered voter held not legally qualified when she had not been a resident of county for 90 days at time of election.

Though a voter was registered as such before a general election, she was not legally qualified when, prior to and at the time of the election, she had not been a resident of the county for 90 days as required by Const. art. 2, § 1.

6. Witnesses ⇨306—Right to decline to give testimony on ground that it would incriminate is personal.

The right of a witness to decline to give testimony because it may tend to establish crime against witness is wholly personal.

7. Witnesses ⇨306—Compelling witness to testify over her objection because incriminating not prejudicial to rights of contestee in election contest, and not to be availed of by him.

In an election contest the court's action in compelling a witness, not qualified to vote and not a party of the contest, to state for whom she voted as against her objection that her testimony would tend to incriminate her, was not prejudicial to contestee's rights, and could not be availed of by him.

8. Elections ⇨293(3)—Rule as to right of voter to preserve the secrecy of his ballot applies to qualified voters only.

The rule as to the right of a voter to preserve the secrecy of his ballot is restricted to electors who have legally qualified to vote, and does not apply to voters not qualified at the time of casting their ballots.

9. Elections ⇨295(1)—Trial court's conclusion that disqualified voter's ballot was for contestee held justified by her testimony.

Testimony of disqualified voter held to justify trial court's conclusion that she cast her ballot for contestee.

10. Elections ⇨293(3)—Circumstantial evidence resorted to, if necessary, to prove disqualified voter voted for particular candidate.

Circumstantial evidence may be resorted to, if necessary, to prove that a disqualified voter has cast his ballot or voted for a particular candidate at a particular election.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Election contest by O. H. Robinson against S. T. McAbee. Judgment for contestant, and contestee appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. L. Held, of Ukiah, for appellant.
M. H. Iversen, of Ukiah, for respondent.

HART, J. The contestant and the contestee were rival candidates for the office of the justice of peace of Anderson township, in Mendocino county, at the general election held throughout the state on November 7, 1922. On the face of the returns, as indicated by the canvass of the vote for said office by the board of supervisors of said county, McAbee, the contestee, received a total of 165 votes, and his opponent, Robinson, received 164 votes. Said board officially declared that McAbee received the highest number of votes cast for said office at said election and directed a certificate of election to be issued to him, and the same was so issued.

On November 21, 1922, Robinson instituted a proceeding contesting the election of McAbee, and in his petition or verified statement of the grounds of contest alleged, among other matters, that certain illegal votes were cast at said election in Counts and Anderson precincts of Anderson township for said McAbee, and that "the greater number of legal votes and ballots were cast at said general election for the contestant herein than for the contestee, and that at said election contestant received a plurality of the total of votes cast for the candidates for said office." Upon the filing of said affidavit or petition, a citation, addressed to the contestee, was issued, and, together with a "notice of illegal votes" (section 1116, Code Civ. Proc.), was served on him on the 21st day of November, 1922. After a general demurrer to the contestant's affidavit or petition interposed by him was overruled by the court, the contestee filed an answer to the affidavit or statement of contest denying the allegations thereof.

At the trial of the contest the ballots cast at the election in the several precincts of Anderson township were recounted by the court. Upon said recount the court found that one ballot was cast in Counts precinct which bore no expression of choice for the office of justice of the peace of said township, but which was erroneously counted by the election officers for McAbee. The throwing out of this vote left the contestee and contestant with 164 votes each. The court further found that in Anderson precinct of said township one Leila Waggoner cast a vote for McAbee and which was counted for him, and that said Leila Waggoner was an illegal voter. This vote was deducted from McAbee's total, with the result, obviously, that his total vote was reduced to 163, the vote then standing: Robinson 164, and McAbee 163. Upon these findings the court rendered judgment declaring Robinson to have been elected, canceling the certificate issued to McAbee, and directing a certificate of election to be issued to Robinson.

The contestee appeals from said judgment and supports the appeal by a bill of exceptions.

The correctness of the ruling rejecting the ballot which contained no stamp opposite the name of either of the candidates for justice of the peace of said township is not challenged. In fact, it is conceded by contestee that the court's ruling was proper with respect to said ballot. The contention is, however, that the judgment should be reversed for several different reasons, to wit: (1) That there was no evidence showing that Anderson and Counts precincts are included within the boundaries of Anderson township; (2) that the court committed prejudicial error in requiring the witness Waggoner to state for whom she voted, she having through her counsel, especially employed to represent her at said hearing, declined to testify on the ground that her testimony would tend to incriminate her, and the further ground that to compel her to state for whom she voted would require her, against her consent, to surrender her right to preserve the secrecy of her ballot; (3) that the testimony of said witness did not warrant the court in finding that her ballot was cast for McAbee.

[1-3] 1. We think it sufficiently appears in the affidavit and statement of the grounds of contest that Anderson and Counts precincts are situated within Anderson township. It is not so specifically stated, but the affidavit does declare that the contestant and contestee were opposing candidates for justice of the peace of Anderson township and in connection therewith alleges that illegal votes were cast at said election in Anderson and Counts precincts and that the greater number of legal votes and ballots were cast at said election in said township for the contestant herein. The prayer of the complaint asks for a recount of the ballots cast in the two precincts named. As stated, the demurrer was general, and the question whether the two precincts mentioned were embraced within Anderson township was not thus raised. In that particular we think the affidavit was sufficient to countervail the claims of a general demurrer. The answer does not deny that the two precincts named constitute a part of Anderson township. At the trial the contestant introduced in evidence the minutes of the board of supervisors containing a statement of the votes received by all candidates at the general election held in the county of Mendocino on November 7, 1922, including the votes canvassed by the board of supervisors for the office of justice of the peace in Anderson township by precincts, and also the results of said canvass. The several precincts constituting Anderson township were therein named, and opposite each was given the number of votes received therein by McAbee and Robinson, respectively. Among the precincts so named were Anderson and Counts precincts. This record was admissible in evidence under the state of the pleadings, as indicated above, and its contents are prima facie correct as to the facts therein set forth, including the number and names of the several precincts of Anderson township. Calaveras County v. Brockway, 30 Cal. 325, 326; People v. Davidson, 2 Cal. App. 100, 83 Pac. 161; Starkweather v. Dawson, 14 Cal. App. 666, 112 Pac. 736; Merkley v. Trainor, 142 Cal. 265, 75 Pac. 656.

[4, 5] 2. The court did not err in requiring the witness Miss Waggoner, an alleged illegal voter, to give testimony disclosing the name of the person for whom she voted for the office of justice of the peace. It is first to be remarked that the evidence, independently of any testimony given by Miss Waggoner, conclusively shows that, prior to and at the time of the general election held in California in November, 1922, and at which election she is alleged to have voted, she had not been a resident of Mendocino county for a period of 90 days. Indeed, this proposition is not disputed by the contestee. The witness, therefore, was not legally a qualified voter at the time of the holding of said election, although it is conclusively shown and, in fact, not disputed, that she registered as a voter of Anderson township in the month of October, 1922. Const. art. 2, § 1.

[6, 7] As to the complaint that the court erred in requiring Miss Waggoner to testify over her objection that her testimony would tend to incriminate her, it is first to be remarked that the right of a witness to decline to give testimony for the reason that it may tend to establish a crime against him is wholly personal to the witness. It is a personal privilege which the witness may himself either claim or waive. Miss Waggoner was not a party to the present contest, and the fact that her testimony might show, or have a tendency to show, that she committed a public offense, can in no measure affect the rights of the contestee. Whether the court's action in compelling her to testify involved a violation of her right to refuse to testify on the ground stated is a matter which can in no manner concern the contestee or which could have operated prejudicially against his rights in the trial of the contest. Nor is it of any concern to the contestee whether the testimony so given may or might be used against the witness in a prosecution for illegally voting at said election. Indeed, the learned attorney for the contestee appears to have well recognized these propositions, since the objection to the witness' testimony on said ground was not interposed by him but by the witness herself, through an attorney, not connected with the trial of the contest, but who, as he himself stated, appeared before the court for no other purpose than to represent and protect the rights of the witness. It follows from the foregoing considerations that the objection to the witness giving her testimony upon the ground that it would tend to incriminate her cannot be availed of by the contestee.

[8] The objection made by the contestee himself, through his attorney, that the court could not legally require the witness to state for whom she voted for the office of justice of the peace for the reason that such action by the court would involve a violation of the right of a voter to preserve the secrecy of his ballot, is untenable. It is well established in this country that the rule sought to be invoked by counsel for the contestee here is to be restricted in its application to those electors who have the legal qualifications which entitle them to vote. As applied to such voters the rule that the secrecy of the ballot shall be maintained is "justly regarded as an important and valuable safeguard for the protection of the voter and particularly the humble citizen, against the influence which wealth and situation may be supposed to exercise. And it is for this reason that the privacy is held not to be limited to the moment of depositing the ballot but is sacredly guarded by the law for all time unless the voter himself shall voluntarily divulge it." McCrary on Elections (4th Ed.) § 488. The rule, however, is not applicable to persons who vote at a particular election but who are not qualified voters at the time of casting their votes. As is said by the author just named (section 492):

"A person who votes without being qualified is a mere intruder and not entitled to the privileges which belong to legal voters."

Or, as was well said by the late Chief Justice Beatty, in the case of Patterson v. Hanley, 136 Cal. 265, 276, 68 Pac. 821, 825:

"The policy of the law is, it is true, to preserve secrecy of the ballot, but this policy does not extend to illegal votes. If the elector disregards the terms upon which he is allowed to vote, and thereby secures the counting of an illegal ballot, he forfeits the privilege of secrecy in favor of the superior right of a party injured by his act to have the truth disclosed."

See cases cited in the footnotes of the case of People v. Pease, 84 Am. Dec. 242, 268 et seq. See, also, 15 Cyc. p. 424; Ann. Cas. 1912A, 728; People v. Turpin, 49 Colo. 234, 112 Pac. 539, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 766, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 724; Van Winkle v. Crabtree, 34 Or. 462, 55 Pac. 831, 835, 56 Pac. 74; Skain v. Milward, 138 Ky. 200, 127 S. W. 773, 778.

Of course, such a person will not be compelled to testify as to the person for whom he voted until it is clearly shown he voted illegally. And so long as the question as to the legality of his vote is in doubt, he cannot be compelled to make the disclosure. In this case, however, Miss Waggoner was shown to be without the qualifications of a voter before she was asked to state for whom she voted.

The counsel for the contestee cites the cases of Lauer v. Estes, 120 Cal. 652, 53 Pac. 262, and Smith v. Thomas, 121 Cal. 533, 54 Pac. 71, as supporting the position that a voter cannot be compelled to disclose the names of the persons for whom he voted at an election. Those cases do not support that position. They merely hold, among other things, that the extrajudicial declarations of a voter disclosing for whom he voted at an election involve hearsay testimony and are, therefore, inadmissible. This rule is stated and approved by nearly all the authorities to which our attention has been called and is undoubtedly sound.

[9] 3. The evidence discloses that the county clerk of Mendocino county had, prior to the day of the election in question, delivered to the election officers of Anderson precinct, in Anderson judicial township, 250 ballots; that 101 of said ballots were returned unused to said county clerk; that six of said ballots had been spoiled and 143 had been voted; that, according to the poll list of said precinct, 143 persons had voted in said precinct at said election. The ballots, on the recount of the same under the order of and before the court, disclosed that in said precinct 76 ballots were cast or votes had been voted at said election for the contestee for justice of the peace of Anderson township, and 59 for the contestant. The first question asked Miss Waggoner by counsel for the contestant was whether, at the election in question, in Anderson precinct of Anderson township, she cast her vote or stamped her ballot "for one of the candidates or a candidate for justice of the peace of Anderson township," to which question she unequivocally replied that she did. The following questions were then propounded to the witness by counsel for the contestee and the answers following returned:

"Q. For whom did you cast your vote? A. Well, if I stamped it as I intended to, I stamped it for Mr. McAbee. I don't know whether I got the stamp in the right square, and I wondered afterwards whether I got it in the right one. Q. Will you say whether or not you stamped a cross after the name of S. T. McAbee? A. I don't know his initials. I said that is who I intended to stamp it after. Q. Mr. McAbee was a candidate for that office, wasn't he? A. That is who I intended to stamp it for."

On cross-examination the witness testified:

"Q. You say you intended to stamp your ballot for Mr. McAbee? A. When I went there I intended to stamp my ballot for him, but I couldn't swear I did. Q. But by your testimony you are not testifying that you did stamp your ballot for Mr. McAbee, is that right? A. Well, I suppose I did; but, as I say, I was in a hurry and wondered afterwards if I did mark the cross in the right place. I was quite in a hurry to get back to my work. Q. And you don't know whether you stamped your ballot for Mr. McAbee or not? A. No, sir; I couldn't swear to it. Q. Do you remember when you voted if or whether or not you stamped it in the voting square? A. I suppose I did, but couldn't swear I did stamp it in the right place."

The witness, proceeding on cross-examination, stated that she recalled that she intended to vote for a certain measure and for certain candidates for other offices, and that she was able to recall that she "put the stamps on the ballot, but just where I couldn't say." On redirect she testified:

"Q. You went to the polls for the express purpose of voting for Mr. McAbee for that office, didn't you? A. When I went to the polls, I had in mind another measure I was more particularly interested in than any of the local officers. Q. Did you see the name of Mr. Mc-Abee on the ballot? A. I suppose so. I read the ballot over. Q. You read his name there and remember of seeing his name there? A. Well, I read the names over. Q. Will you state now whether or not you stamped your ballot on the squares after the names in voting? A. No I couldn't swear that I did. Q. You understood that it was necessary at the time you voted that you should stamp your ballot in the squares, didn't you? A. Yes. I made an attempt to do that. Q. And you stamped your ballot in the square after the name of Mr. McAbee, or that was your intention? A. That was my intention, but I couldn't say that I got it in the right place."

On further recross, and further redirect, the witness stated that she had no personal acquaintance with McAbee prior to the day of the election; that he never solicited her vote; that she had never spoken to him until some day subsequent to the day of the election, but that, prior to the election, she was familiar with his name and became so through having one of his children in her classes; that she learned, on the night preceding the day of the election, that he was a candidate for justice of the peace; and that at that time she made up her mind to vote for him for said office.

The foregoing is all the testimony given by Miss Waggoner, except her statement that, after preparing her ballot, she delivered it to one of the election officers.

[10] We cannot justly say that the trial court misinterpreted the testimony of Miss Waggoner or the effect thereof, or was not justified in concluding therefrom that she cast her ballot for the contestee for the office of justice of the peace. It will be noted that the witness, in reply to the first question put to her by counsel for the contestant, positively stated that she did cast her vote for one of the candidates for justice of the peace at said election. It is true that she subsequently stated that she would not "swear" that she marked her ballot "in the right place" for said office; but it is also true that she stated that she looked over the ballot before preparing it for the ballot box and saw thereon the names of those persons who were candidates for the several offices to be filled at said election. She did not at any time deny that she voted for McAbee, but declared that she went to the polls and into the voting booth with the intention of doing so and that she supposed that she did mark her ballot for the contestee. The only matter as to which she appeared to be uncertain was whether she stamped her ballot for justice of the peace in the square opposite the name of the contestee, and she was no less uncertain in that particular as to candidates on the ballot for other offices and certain measures which were to be voted upon that she intended to vote for. The ballots were inspected by the court, and it may be assumed, since the record here is silent as to that consideration, that the ballots, save and except the one which, as seen, bore no expression of choice for justice of the peace, were properly stamped. If they had not been, undoubtedly that fact would have been made to appear in the record. The witness did not claim that she might have mistakenly or inadvertently voted for any other candidate for justice of the peace than the contestee. Indeed, she declared, as seen, that she went to the polls and into the voting booth intending to vote for McAbee, that she "looked over the ballot" before starting to mark it, and that she supposed she voted for the contestee. Her statement that she "supposed" that she so voted is tantamount to saying that she "thought" or "believed" she voted for McAbee. At all events, it was for the trial court to determine from all the circumstances and the manner in which the witness gave her testimony whether she did or did not vote for McAbee. Further discussion of the evidence is not necessary. As stated above, the case, so far as the evidence is concerned, is one in which the conclusion of the trial court cannot justly be interfered with. It will not be disputed that, no less than as to any other issue of fact, circumstantial evidence may be resorted to, if necessary, to prove that a disqualified voter has cast his ballot or voted for a particular candidate at a particular election (see McCrary on Elections [4th Ed.] § 493; People v. Pease, 27 N. Y. 45, 84 Am. Dec. 242), and it is certainly true that if from such evidence a finding has been deduced that the vote so cast was for a candidate whose election is challenged by reason of such illegal vote, and that said vote is accordingly deducted from his total vote, no court of review will disturb such finding unless it clearly appears from the circumstances themselves as they stand in the printed record that they are inherently too weak or upon their face insufficient in probative force to justify the conclusion arrived at by the trial court.

We think the result reached herein by the court below should be approved. Accordingly, the judgment is affirmed.

court of Visalia township, county of Tulare, state of California, adjudging him guilty upon three counts of a complaint charging him with a violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79). The first count charged him with the possession of intoxicating liquor, the second with transporting the same, and third with having in his possession a still and other implements in use for the manufacture of said intoxicating liquor. He alleges that a fine of $500 was imposed upon each count, and that in default of payment he was committed to the county jail to be imprisoned therein at the rate of $1 per day for each dollar of the fines so imposed. The fines were imposed October 17, 1923, and petitioner has not therefore served full time for the payment of any one of the several fines imposed upon him.

The sole question presented by the petitioner as the ground for his release is that the Wright Act in adopting the provisions of the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, 10138¼ et seq.), made no provision for imprisonment for nonpayment of fine, for the reason that the Volstead Act made no such provision. The question of the right of a justice's court to provide for imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine imposed under the Wright Act, where no term of imprisonment was fixed by the Volstead Act, was recently before us in Ex parte Kennerly (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 857. We there determined that imprisonment for a fine was not a distinct punishment, but merely a method of enforcing the payment of a fine. People v. Markham, 7 Cal. 208; Ex parte Kelly, 28 Cal. 414; Ex parte Crittenden, 62 Cal. 534; Ex parte Miller, 82 Cal. 454, 22 Pac. 1113; Ex parte Karlson, 160 Cal. 378, 117 Pac. 447, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1334. That principle thus relied upon in Ex parte Kennerly, supra, disposes of the question presented by the petitioner, although it is true that the main point presented and considered in Ex parte Kennerly, supra, was whether or not the provisions of section 1205 of the Penal Code, which prohibited imprisonment for nonpayment of fine for a longer period than was permitted for the punishment of the offense, prevented such imprisonment. The argument there was that, inasmuch as the Wright Act provided no term of imprisonment, therefore section 1205 of the Penal Code prohibited such imprisonment for nonpayment of fine. We held that, the judgment being imposed by a justice's court, section 1446 of the Penal Code controlled. While the question here involved was not directly presented in that case, it was involved therein, and the reasoning by which the conclusion was reached that imprisonment for nonpayment of fine was proper applies equally to the petition herein.

Fines ☞ 11—Justice's court can imprison for nonpayment of fine, though statute does not provide therefor.

Though the Wright Act does not provide for imprisonment for nonpayment of fine imposed under it, a justice's court can provide for such imprisonment; this not being a distinct punishment, but merely a method of enforcing the payment of a fine.

PEOPLE v. MENDEZ et al. (Cr. 2580.)

Criminal law — 739(2)—Circumstance of proof of alibi held to present only substantial conflict in evidence which was for the jury.

In a murder case, the circumstance that each of the defendants presented, by several witnesses, an alibi which was substantially perfect on its face, suffices merely to present a substantial conflict in the evidence, to be resolved by the jury, where witnesses at the place of the crime testified to defendants' presence there.

2. Criminal law — 1167(1)—Defect in authentication of indictment mere irregularity and not prejudicial.

That deputy county clerk, who filed an indictment, instead of placing in a space provided therefor the name of the clerk together with his own signature as deputy, stamped therein with a rubber filing stamp the date and clerk's name, underneath which he placed his signature, if a defect, did not operate to prejudice any right of the defendants.

3. Criminal law — 655(1)—Proper for judge to advise district attorney to offer photographs in evidence.

It was not misconduct for the judge, when the district attorney was about to hand to the jurors for their inspection certain photographs which had been fully identified, but had not been formally offered in evidence, to interrupt and advise the district attorney to first offer them in evidence.

4. Witnesses — 246(1)—No misconduct for court to intervene and question witness to show location on photograph pointed out by witness.

Where a witness had indicated a location upon a photograph or upon a plat by merely pointing thereto in such manner that the written transcript of his testimony would be unintelligible, it was not misconduct for the trial court to intervene and by questions elicit answers such as would make the record truly reveal what the witness was actually testifying.

5. Witnesses — 246(1)—Proper for trial judge to intervene and clarify testimony.

When it appeared that boy witness was confused, it was proper for the trial judge to intervene and by questions of his own help to straighten out the witness and clarify his testimony.

6. Criminal law — 655(1)—Court properly intervened and required readings of portions of testimony at coroner's inquest.

Where counsel read isolated portions of testimony at coroner's inquest which apparently conflicted with the testimony at the trial, it was not error for the trial judge to intervene of his own motion and compel the reading of other portions of the context which revealed that the apparent conflict was not a real conflict; the circumstance that in so doing he may have incidentally aided the prosecution being of no consequence.

7. Criminal law — 633(1)—Duty of trial judge to supervise and regulate course of trial.

It is not only the right but the duty of a trial judge to so supervise and regulate the course of a trial that the truth shall be revealed in so far as it may be within the established rules of evidence.

8. Criminal law — 656(8)—Judge should not convey personal opinion to jury.

The trial judge is rigorously prohibited from action or words having the effect of conveying to the jury his personal opinion as to the truth or falsity of any evidence.

9. Criminal law — 1170½(5½)—Questions of judge held not prejudicial.

Though the court in questioning witnesses should not have referred to "the place where the murder was committed," "the scene of the crime," "the time the murder was committed," defendants were not prejudiced thereby, where the defense consisted of an alibi and the claim that the crime was committed by some other person or persons.

10. Criminal law — 1035(3)—Defendant must object to act or statement of trial judge.

A defendant who deems himself injured by an act or statement of the trial judge during the trial is not permitted to keep silent in order to speculate upon the verdict and claim redress only after the verdict is adverse.

11. Witnesses — 40(1)—Nine year old boy competent.

There was no error in ruling that a boy nine years old was a competent witness under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1879, 1880.

12. Homicide — 234(1)—Evidence sufficiently identified defendants.

In prosecution for murder in the first degree, evidence held sufficient to warrant a finding that defendants were the persons who did the killing.

13. Witnesses — 41—Personal injuries affecting mentality of witnesses to homicide held to go only to weight of evidence.

Testimony that witnesses testifying to killing did not fully recover mentally, by reason of being beaten into insensibility, until some time after the crime, only went to the weight of the testimony of the witnesses and not to its admissibility or legal sufficiency.

14. Criminal law — 404(1) — Admission of butcher knife in evidence held not error, and refusal to exclude proper.

In a murder case, court did not err in admitting in evidence, and refusing to exclude therefrom, a butcher knife found upon the person of one defendant at the time of his arrest; defendant stating at the time that there was no objection to it being introduced.

15. Criminal law — 424(1)—Statements of defendant held admissible.

In murder case there was no error in admitting testimony as to damaging statements made by one defendant which were in no sense confessions, where one of the witnesses was not a peace officer at the time the statements were made and the other, who was an officer, informed the defendant of his legal rights, and the statements were freely and voluntarily made without any threats or promises.

16. Witnesses —240(2)—Leading questions discretionary.

The extent to which leading questions shall be permitted rests in the sound discretion of the trial judge.

17. Homicide —178(1)—Always proper to show some other person committed crime.

In a prosecution for murder it is always proper to show that some other person, and not the defendant, committed the crime.

18. Homicide —234(1)—Defendant need not establish guilt of third person with degree of certainty requisite to sustain conviction.

A defendant in a murder case, in order to exculpate himself by showing guilt of another, should not be required to establish the guilt of the third person with that degree of certainty requisite to sustain a conviction of the latter.

19. Homicide —178(1)—Evidence simply affording possible ground of suspicion against another inadmissible.

In prosecution for murder, evidence which simply affords a possible ground of possible suspicion against a third person is inadmissible.

20. Homicide —178(2, 3)—Mere motive and threats by third party inadmissible.

Mere evidence of motive in another person or of motive coupled with threats of such other person is inadmissible, unless coupled with other evidence tending to directly connect such other person with the actual commission of the crime charged.

21. Criminal law —368(1), 419, 420(1)—Confessions, threats, and flight by third parties hearsay and inadmissible if not res gestæ.

Confessions, threats, and circumstances of flight on the part of third parties are all in the nature of declarations or admissions of such third persons, and are therefore inadmissible as hearsay unless they come within the res gestæ exception, and they cannot be regarded as a part of the res gestæ unless and until evidence is produced which has an inherent tendency to connect such persons with the actual commission of the crime.

22. Homicide —178(1)—Evidence as to flight of third parties held properly excluded.

In prosecution for murder where from the evidence it appeared that four persons took part in the crime, held, that the court did not err in excluding evidence that four Mexican laborers, not including defendants, quit work upon the morning following the homicide and could not be found some weeks later.

23. Homicide —285—Duty of trial judge to state clearly separate elements essential to crime.

It is, generally speaking, the duty of the trial judge to state clearly to the jury the separate elements essential to constitute the crime charged; but, where murder was substantially conceded and the only real issue was whether the crime had been committed by the defendants or by some one else, defendants cannot complain of the failure of the court to instruct as to the separate elements constituting the crime.

MYERS, J. Each of the defendants appeals separately herein from a judgment of conviction upon a verdict of guilty against each of them of murder in the first degree, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The evidence produced in behalf of the prosecution was ample, if credited by the jurors, to sustain each of the verdicts. There is no contention herein to the contrary except in one respect, which will be hereinafter mentioned. Assuming, as we must, that the evidence in behalf of the prosecution was given full credit by the jurors, the following is a brief statement of the facts established thereby. Mike Farnesaro was operating a ranch in the Imperial valley, a few miles from the Mexican boundary line, and was residing thereon with his wife and three children, Joe, aged nine, Paul, aged seven, and a little girl still younger. On the evening of January 2, 1923, at about dusk, Farnesaro with his two boys was at a haystack about 60 feet from his house pitching hay to his cattle in the corral. Three Mexicans, identified by Joe as these two defendants, and a man named Rubo (or Rubio), came in from the highway, apparently from the south, and asked Farnesaro for work, to which he replied he had none for them. One of the three men had a gun in his hand, and each of the other two had a knife in his hip pocket with the blade projecting upward. They then sought to purchase some bread from Farnesaro, tendering some Mexican coins, which he refused to accept. They then asked where they might find work, to which Farnesaro replied, in effect, that they might find it at the Sample ranch, which lay to the northward. The two little boys then went to the house for supper, leaving their father with the three Mexicans at the haystack. A short time afterward the three Mexicans came into the house, shouting in Spanish: "Money! We want Money!" One of them, Cazares, seized the two little boys, threw them upon the bed where the little girl was sleeping, and bound their hands and feet with portions of the bedding. At the same time the other two men seized Mrs. Farnesaro and forced her, struggling, into the adjoining room. Then Cazares with a stick or metal rod beat the three children into a state of insensibility, while the other two men did likewise with Mrs. Farnesaro in the adjoining room. A fourth Mexican, identified by Joe only as a man named Mike, entered the house while this was going on. Some hours later the four men returned to the house and unbound the hands and feet of the two boys upon the bed, and finding Joe returned to consciousness again beat him into a state of insensibility. The crime was not discovered until the morning of the second day following, some 36 hours later, when the body of Farnesaro was found upon the ground near the haystack. He had been beaten to death with some blunt instrument. The three children were at that time up and out of the house, but they were in a pitiable condition physically and were mentally irrational. Mrs. Farnesaro was found lying upon the floor of the room into which she had been dragged at the time of the assault, and she was totally unconscious and so remained for several days thereafter. Each of the four had sustained skull fractures and other serious injuries. It does not clearly appear from the record whether or not anything had been actually stolen from the house, but the entire house had been ransacked. The trunk and the dresser drawers had all been opened and their contents strewed about. Mrs. Farnesaro had had $85 in gold coin wrapped in a rag, which she had seized at the entry of the men and kept concealed in her hand during the assault, and which was found underneath her body after the discovery of the crime. Mrs. Farnesaro at the trial identified the defendant Cazares, whom she had previously known, with the utmost positiveness, notwithstanding the fact that he had a handkerchief over the lower portion of his face at the time of the assault. Her identification of Mendez, whom she had not known previously, was much less positive and less convincing; but she did point him out at the trial as one of the two men who had assaulted her. The boy Joe positively identified both defendants, both of whom he had known previously, and his testimony in this respect was not substantially shaken by a severe cross-examination. It is true that he did state at one time that he had never known Mendez until after the latter's arrest, but in response to questions from the court it was made apparent that what he meant thereby was that he had not known Mendez' name until after the arrest; that he had previously been acquainted with the man Mendez, but had been ignorant of his name.

[1] The circumstances that each of the defendants presented, by several witnesses, an alibi which was substantially perfect upon its face, suffices merely to present the familiar situation of a substantial conflict in the evidence, which could be resolved only by the jurors, who saw and heard the several witnesses and observed their demeanor and manner of testifying. It may be mentioned that the identification of these two defendants was afforded substantial corroboration by evidence of numerous facts and circumstances subsequent to the crime which tended legitimately to indicate a guilty conscience upon the part of each of the defendants.

[2] There is no merit in the contention that the indictment herein was fatally defective, in that it is not shown to have been presented in compliance with section 944 of the Penal Code. The indictment as filed bears upon its back the indorsement: "A true bill. P. N. Bucklin, Foreman Grand Jury." Immediately underneath the same is a printed form of blank indorsement reading as follows:

"Presented by the foreman of the grand jury in the presence of the grand jury in open superior court of the county of Imperial, state of California, and filed as a record of said court this ——— day of February, A. D. 1923."

Immediately underneath the same was a blank space for the signature of the county clerk. The deputy county clerk who filed the same, instead of placing in this space the name of the clerk, together with his own signature as deputy, stamped therein with a rubber filing stamp the words, "Filed; February 15, 1923. C. G. Mousseau," underneath which he placed his signature, "H. L. Foster, Deputy." There is no contention that the indictment was not in fact presented by the foreman of the grand jury in their presence to the court on February 15, 1923, and filed on that date with the clerk of the court. Under these circumstances, the defect in the authentication thereof by the clerk, if it be conceded to be a defect, was nothing worse than a mere irregularity of procedure which did not operate to prejudice any right of either defendant.

[3-10] Both defendants complain that the trial judge throughout the trial exhibited a bias in favor of the prosecution and prejudice against the defendants to their great injury. It is charged by counsel that—

"Throughout the prosecution's case in chief the court has aided the district attorney in presenting his evidence and getting his evidence in; has aided and assisted in the correction of testimony of the prosecution's witnesses; has sought to defeat the effect of the cross-examinations of the defendant by immediately breaking in upon it, to lead and assist the witnesses in correcting the effect of damaging cross-examinations, and in numerous other ways caused the jury to be influenced in arriving at their verdict."

We are cited to many instances appearing in the record as supporting these charges. We have examined all of them. In many of the cited instances which give some color of support to these charges, it is clearly apparent that the trial judge acted with entire propriety. For example, when the district attorney was about to hand to the jurors for their inspection certain photographs which had been fully identified, but had not been formally offered in evidence, the trial judge interrupted and advised the district attorney to first offer them in evidence, which was done, and they were properly received. In various instances wherein a witness had indicated a location upon a photograph or upon a plat by merely pointing thereto in such manner that the written transcript of his testimony would be unintelligible, the trial court intervened and by questions elicited answers such as would make the record truly reveal what the witness was actually testifying. Other instances occurred while counsel for defendants were endeavoring to impeach the witness Joe Farnesaro by showing conflicts between his testimony at the trial and his testimony at the coroner's inquest, and calling upon him to explain them. This procedure is frequently confusing to a lay witness of mature years and intelligence. In the case of a boy of nine years, who apparently was accustomed to use three languages and had but an imperfect knowledge of either, it was obviously difficult to apply this method without doing an injustice to the witness. When it appeared that the boy was confused in this manner, the trial judge would intervene and by questions of his own would help to "straighten out" the witness and clarify his testimony. Upon one or two occasions when counsel read isolated portions of the testimony at the coroner's inquest which apparently conflicted with the testimony at the trial, the trial judge intervened of his own motion, compelling them to read other portions of the context which revealed that the apparent conflict was not a real conflict. In all of these things the trial judge was but doing his duty. The circumstance that in so doing he may have incidentally aided the prosecution is of no consequence. The object of a trial is to ascertain the facts and apply thereto the appropriate rules of law, in order that justice within the law shall be truly administered. It is not only the right but the duty of a trial judge to so supervise and regulate the course of a trial that the truth shall be revealed in so far as it may be, within the established rules of evidence. Other instances are cited wherein the trial judge (inadvertently without doubt) apparently overstepped the narrow bounds of strict propriety which the policy of the law prescribes for the conduct of a trial judge. In questions to witnesses he referred to "the place where the murder was committed,"

"the scene of the crime," "the time the murder was committed," and in discussions with counsel during the trial as to the admissibility of evidence, he used some expressions which might be considered as invading to some slight extent the province of the jury. Of course this should not be done, but it is frequently difficult to discuss questions of the admissibility of evidence without using some such expressions.

"Under our system the trial judge is rigorously prohibited from action or words having the effect of conveying to the jury his personal opinion as to the truth or falsity of any evidence. The determination of questions of fact must be made by the jury free from the influence that knowledge of the trial judge's views thereon might have." People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 12, 18, 87 Pac. 1016, 1019.

Our Constitution expressly forbids judges to charge jurors upon matters of fact, and in obedience thereto a trial judge should be rigorously careful not to say or do anything in the course of a trial in the presence of the jurors which may be taken by the latter as an expression of his opinion upon any question of fact in issue. In some cases a reference by the trial judge to "the place of the murder" or "the scene of the crime" might be seriously prejudicial to the defendant charged therewith, but not so in the instant case. The defense of each defendant herein consisted of an alibi and the claim that the crime was committed by some other person or persons. No question was made at any point of the trial that Farnesaro had been murdered. The sole contention of defendants was that he had been murdered by persons other than themselves. If the trial judge was indiscreet in this respect counsel for the defendants were equally so. They each made repeated references during the trial to "the time the crime was committed," "the scene of the murder," "the place where Mike Farnesaro was murdered," etc. In none of the instances cited, with but three or four exceptions, did counsel for either defendant make any objection at the trial to the statement made or question asked by the trial judge, which is the subject of the present complaint. In the three or four instances wherein objection was made it was not well founded and was properly overruled. In all of the other instances no objection was made or in any way called to the attention of the trial judge. If objection had been made the trial judge could, and doubtless would, have promptly repudiated the intention to indicate any opinion upon the facts and thus would have effaced from the minds of the jurors any false impression which they might have gained. A defendant who deems himself injured by an act or statement of the trial judge during the trial is not permitted to keep silent in order to speculate upon the verdict and claim redress only after the latter has gone adversely to him.

[11-13] There was no error in ruling that Joe Farnesaro, nine years old, was a competent witness. Section 1879, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that—

"All persons, without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and, perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. * * *"

Section 1880 provides:

"The following persons cannot be witnesses: (1) Those who are of unsound mind at the time of their production for examination. (2) Children under ten years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly. * * *"

There is no contention that Joe Farnesaro was of unsound mind at the time of the trial, and it is apparent from his testimony upon the voir dire, as well as upon direct and cross-examination, that he was not incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts or of relating them truly. The real basis of the complaint of the defendant Cazares in this respect, as well as of the contention of the defendant Mendez, that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, rests upon the contention that the facts as testified to by Joe were not facts which he actually remembered, but were things which had been told to him by others and which he thought he remembered; in other words, that his testimony was the product of suggestions which had been made to him by peace officers and others engaged in investigating the crime and preparing the case for trial. There is some apparent basis for this contention in the record. There were material contradictions in his testimony, and it was shown that he had made various statements shortly after the crime which were completely at variance with his testimony at the trial. The same thing is true to some extent with respect to the testimony of Mrs. Farnesaro. By way of explanation thereof it was shown by the testimony of the attending physician that Joe, by reason of the injuries he had received, did not fully recover mentally until two weeks after the crime, and that Mrs. Farnesaro did not return to complete mental normalcy until about six weeks after the crime. But in any event these objections go only to the weight of the testimony of these witnesses, not to its admissibility or to its legal sufficiency, and the question of the weight and credibility of this testimony was solely for the jurors. The trial court accorded the widest latitude to the defendants in their efforts to discredit the testimony of these witnesses by showing that it was the product of suggestion, and the conclusion of the jurors thereon cannot be disturbed by this court.

[14] The court did not err in admitting in evidence and refusing to exclude therefrom the butcher knife found upon the person of defendant Cazares at the time of his arrest. It may be conceded that this was not properly admissible if it had been objected to. However, counsel, for this defendant not only failed to object to its introduction, but when it was offered in evidence stated to the court, "there is no objection to it being introduced." Having thus received it with the express acquiescence of counsel, the court committed no error in denying the motion to strike it out, which was made some days later.

[15] There was no error in admitting the testimony of Gillett and Spencer as to damaging statements made by defendant Cazares. These statements were in no sense confessions. Spencer was not a peace officer at the time. Gillett, who was sheriff, first informed the defendant of his legal rights, and the foundation was laid by showing that his statements were freely and voluntarily made, without any threats or promises, and by a showing, at least prima facie, that this defendant knew enough English to understand what was said to him and to express himself intelligently.

We come now to what is, perhaps, the most serious contention raised upon this appeal. It is that the court erred in excluding testimony which, in the language of counsel, "would have proved that the deceased had been, just prior to his death, involved in difficulties with (1) Mike Amarillas, an employee, who threatened to kill deceased two weeks before the homicide; (2) with Giorgio Brokerage Company, whom deceased had sued for $3,000; (3) with Vasquez et al. over the tomato crop and purchase of a heifer which deceased by force took from the possession of Vasquez et al. after part of purchase was paid; (4) with four Mexicans who lived on deceased's ranch one-fourth of mile from the house of the homicide, at the time of killing, with whom deceased had serious trouble a few days before his death; * * * that on New Years day at noon hour the deceased came to the shack occupied by the four Mexicans on the Farnesaro ranch just across the road from the Sample ranch-house and demanded pay from one of the Mexicans for damages done by a horse breaking into barley, and failing to collect the money deceased confiscated the horse, leading it home with him; that while at the shack deceased laid claim to two horse blankets, upon which two Mexicans slept; that upon leaving the said shack, deceased ordered all the occupants to move from said house immediately; that four men quit work on the Sample ranch at 9 o'clock a. m. on the 3d day of January, 1923, demanded their pay, and went across into Mexico, and when later searched for could not be found; that the description of three of said men was identical as to person and clothing with the description of the three at the homicide," and that on January 2d the deceased turned the flow of irrigating water into the field in which the shack was situated, with the result that the Mexicans were flooded out of the shack some time during the night following. The trial court did in fact admit the evidence offered in support of the contentions numbered 1, 2, and 3, supra, and admitted some of the evidence offered in support of No. 4, but rejected much of the latter. Evidence was received showing that at the time of the homicide and for some time prior thereto sixteen Mexicans were occupying a shack upon the Farnesara ranch a quarter mile north of the place where decedent was living and were employed upon the Sample ranch, which was across the road therefrom; that on the morning of January 2d deceased turned the irrigating water into the field wherein this shack was located, with the result that some time during that evening and night the field became flooded to an extent which rendered the shack untenable. The court excluded the offered testimony relative to controversies over the horse and the horse blankets and testimony offered to show that at 9 a. m. on January 3d four Mexicans employed at the Sample ranch quit work, and that the descriptions of three of them corresponded with the descriptions previously given in evidence of the three Mexicans who committed the assault. The trial court expressed the view that evidence tending merely to show that persons other than the defendants may have had a motive for the commission of the crime was inadmissible unless coupled with other evidence having an inherent tendency to connect such other persons with the actual commission of the crime. He excluded the testimony as to the descriptions of the three men who quit work upon the following morning, upon the ground that the proffered descriptions were so general and indefinite that they would apply equally to hundreds of persons. Defendants' counsel conceded this to be the fact.

[17-20] We are inclined to agree with these conclusions of the trial judge. We do not find any California case directly in point upon the question whether evidence of motive upon the part of some one other than the defendant for the commission of the crime charged is admissible, in the absence of other evidence tending to connect such other persons with the commission thereof. "It is always proper to show that some other person, and not the defendant, committed the crime with which he is charged." People v. Mitchell, 100 Cal. 328, 333, 34 Pac. 698, 700. The question herein is what kind and quality of evidence is essential to that end, and upon this question we have received no assistance from counsel. It seems clear that a defendant, in order to exculpate himself, should not be required to establish the guilt of a third person with that degree of certainty requisite to sustain a conviction of the latter. On the other hand, it seems equally clear that evidence which simply affords a possible ground of possible suspicion against another person should be inadmissible. The decisions in other states are not completely harmonious upon this question. But they are substantially unanimous in holding that mere evidence of motive in another person, or of motive coupled with threats of such other person, is inadmissible unless coupled with other evidence tending to directly connect such other person with the actual commission of the crime charged. See notes to 1 Wigmore on Ev. (2d Ed.) §§ 139-142. The learned author criticizes the rationale of these decisions somewhat severely, but concedes that they are substantially unanimous upon this point. It seems to us that there is a sound basis for this rule and that it rests fundamentally upon the same consideration which led to the early adoption of the elementary rules that evidence to be admissible must be both relevant and material. It rests upon the necessity that trials of cases must be both orderly and expeditious, that they must come to an end, and that it should be a logical end. To this end it is necessary that the scope of inquiry into collateral and unimportant issues must be strictly limited. It is quite apparent that if evidence of motive alone upon the part of other persons were admissible, that in a case involving the killing of a man who had led an active and aggressive life it might easily be possible for the defendant to produce evidence tending to show that hundreds of other persons had some motive or animus against the deceased; that a great many trial days might be consumed in the pursuit of inquiries which could not be expected to lead to any satisfactory conclusion.

[21] This brings us to the inquiry whether the claimed circumstances of flight above referred to would constitute such additional evidence as would render the evidence of motive admissible. We do not think so. Circumstances of flight are in the nature of confessions by such third persons and are, therefore, in the nature of hearsay evidence. Evidence, even of express confessions of third persons, is generally held inadmissible, in the absence of other evidence tending to connect such other persons with the crime. See cases in notes cited supra. Confessions, threats, and circumstances of flight on the part of third persons are all in the nature of declarations or admissions of such third persons, and are therefore hearsay, unless they come within the res gestæ exception to the hearsay rule. It does not seem to us that they may be justly regarded as a part of the res gestæ unless and until evidence is produced which has an inherent tendency to connect such persons with the actual commission of the crime.

[22] In the instant case the trial judge expressed the opinion that the mere circumstance that four Mexican laborers quit work upon the morning following the homicide, and that some weeks later they could not be found, could not be considered as an indication of flight on their part. He stated, in substance, apparently as a matter of common knowledge, that there were at that time in Imperial valley thousands of itinerant Mexican laborers, who were continually seeking work, obtaining work, quitting and moving on, and who were constantly passing and repassing the Mexican boundary line, which was but a short distance away. The truth of this statement was not challenged by the defendants either in the court below or in this court. But whether or not those facts were of such common knowledge as to be judicially cognizable, we are of the opinion that the trial court committed no error in rejecting the proffered testimony.

There is no merit in the contention that the proffered evidence sufficiently connected the three Mexicans with the commission of the crime by showing that they were "in the vicinity thereof" at the time of its commission. No evidence was proffered showing that they were in such vicinity except the evidence that they had been occupying the shack a quarter mile away. If, for example, it had been shown that these men lived ten miles away and had been seen on the evening when the crime was committed within a quarter of a mile from the place of its commission, with nothing to explain their presence there, this might perhaps be regarded as tending sufficiently to connect them with the crime to render evidence of their animus admissible. But such is not the case here.

[23] We have examined the instructions given and find no substantial error therein. Nor do we think that the jurors could have been misled by anything said therein when all of the instructions are considered together in the light of the issues and the evidence. We do not think that the defendants could have been prejudiced by the rejection of the proffered instruction defining the different elements of the crime charged. It is, generally speaking, the duty of the trial judge to state clearly to the jury the separate elements essential to constitute the crime charged. But, as pointed out above, in the instant case the fact that Farnesaro had been murdered was substantially conceded, and the only real issue which the jury was called upon to resolve was whether the crime had been committed by these defendants or by some one else. Under these circumstances, defendants cannot be held to have been prejudiced by the failure of the court to instruct as to the separate elements constituting the crime. The remaining instructions rejected were sufficiently covered by the instructions given.

We cannot conclude that there has been any miscarriage of justice herein, and the judgments and orders appealed from are hereby affirmed.

HADACHEK v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.
(S. F. 10968.)

Appeal and error  607(1)—Notice to prepare record held given in proper time.

Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, held to permit filing of notice to prepare a record at any time after notice of the entry of judgment, and before the expiration of 10 days after notice of decision on motion for a new trial, so that a notice given during that period was sufficient.

In Bank.

Original application for writ of mandate by Amos F. Hadacheck against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and C. P. Vicini as Judge thereof. Writ granted.

James W. Bell, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Fred W. Morrison, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the settlement of a transcript under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. The failure of respondent to certify the transcript in this case is based upon the proposition that the notice to prepare a record under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure was given after judgment and before the decision of the trial court upon the motion for a new trial. The statute in that regard provides that—

The "said notice must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment, order or decree, or if a proceeding on motion for a new trial be pending, within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or of other termination thereof."

We think the proper interpretation of the section permits the filing of the notice at any time after notice of the entry of the judgment, and before the expiration of ten days "after notice of decision" on motion for a new trial. The notice was given during that period, and was sufficient. The respondent should have certified to the transcript.

Let a peremptory writ issue.

LANGDON et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR RIVERSIDE COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 4309.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 21, 1923.)

1. Jury $\Leftarrow$ 34(3)—Direction of verdict held usurpation of functions of jury.

In an action for damages arising out of an automobile collision where it was stipulated that the jury should find for plaintiff in the amount of $248.32 if at all, and where after some deliberation the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $1, the court's action in directing the jury to go back and bring in the verdict for the amount stipulated, notwithstanding its protest that it could not agree to such amount and its request for permission to reconsider, held an unauthorized usurpation of the functions of the jury, rendering the verdict returned in accordance with such directions invalid.

2. Certiorari $\Leftarrow$ 29—Will lie to review proceedings wherein right to trial by jury has been improperly denied.

Though certiorari will not lie for the correction of a mere error, it is a proper remedy to review proceedings wherein defendants have been deprived of their constitutional right to jury trial by improper conduct of the court.

3. Trial $\Leftarrow$ 134—Judge may not substitute personal opinion for that of jury or compel action by it against its judgment.

Though a judge sitting with a jury has plenary rights with reference to the orderly conduct of the case and application of the law to the facts, he may not substitute his personal opinion for that of the jury or compel it to act against its judgment.

Application by A. Alice Langdon and another for a writ of certiorari to review a judgment of the Superior Court in and for the County of Riverside and William H. Ellis, Judge thereof. Judgment annulled.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Sarau & Thompson, of Riverside, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Certiorari. The purpose of this proceeding is to review the action of the superior court in a case appealed therefrom to the justice's court. From a judgment rendered in a cause of action for damages arising out of a collision between two automobiles, the unsuccessful party to the action appealed to the superior court. In the course of the trial before a jury in the superior court, it was stipulated that there was expended by the plaintiff for repairs upon its automobile the sum of $248.32. No further stipulation with reference thereto was entered into between the respective parties either personally or by their counsel. The jury was instructed that if it found for the plaintiff, damages should not exceed $248.32. After some deliberation, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $1. By the direction of the court the clerk of the court entered the verdict. Thereupon counsel for plaintiff moved the court "to direct the jury that, having found for the plaintiff, their verdict must be in the sum of $248.32, for the reason that that was the stipulation made between counsel during the trial of this case." Over the objection of defendants' counsel and against the protest of the jury, the court granted the motion and directed the jury to return a verdict in the sum of $248.32. Judgment was entered on the verdict, and a motion for new trial was denied. The colloquy among the judge, the respective attorneys, and several members of the jury leading up to the rendition of the final verdict was somewhat extended and is too long to be here inserted; but it clearly appears therefrom that in no uncertain terms was the jury peremptorily ordered to so change the verdict that instead of the damages in favor of plaintiff being in the sum of $1 they should be for the sum of $248.32; that different members of the jury explained to the judge that the original verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $1 "was rendered as a compromise measure"; that they "finally agreed upon a compromise verdict, but they were not willing to agree for the whole amount"; and that "several of the jurors agreed to vote for the plaintiff on condition that the sum be fixed according to the judgment of the jury, for $1"; that the jury requested leave to recall the verdict in favor of plaintiff for $1 in order that they might more fully consider the question of the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff and, if so determined, render a verdict for defendants, or otherwise alter the verdict; but the judge refused to decide what their powers were in that regard.

The attitude of the court is illustrated by the following excerpts from the transcript of the court reporter's notes on the proceedings:

"The court will direct you to go back. The court is going out for his dinner, but I will wait for you here five minutes. * * *

"But the court just told them to do it (bring in a verdict for $248.32). Now, if the court has no authority or power here, then of course we might as well shut up shop here. * * *

"The law tells the court what he may do when persons will not obey the order of the court. * * *

"The court has told them to go back and bring in a verdict for $248.32. Why don't you do it?"

And as a final admonition:

"When I issue an order directing a verdict, you cannot get away from it, if you will observe your oath; that is all there is to it."

[1] It will thus be seen that by means of thinly veiled threats and by intimidation the jury was coerced into returning a verdict to which otherwise it would not have agreed. The functions of the jury in determining the facts of the case were usurped by the judge. The verdict purporting to be that of the jury was not at all of its volition, but represented only the express order of the court; the so-called verdict of the jury was in reality but a "verdict" by the judge.

[2, 3] While certiorari will not lie for the correction of mere error, the action of the court in the instant case amounted to a great deal more than that. It deprived the defendants of their constitutional right under the law to a jury trial; it took away from the jury every freedom of action and converted it into nothing more than a piece of legal machinery, useful only for the one purpose of fashioning its output under the hand and direction of the master mechanic. The one great power of the jury was absolutely destroyed; not a vestige of its power remained; there was a total obliteration of any authority which it lawfully possessed. The natural and only possible result was the destruction of defendants' fundamental rights by a process of law not countenanced by authority or legal precedent. Such an attempted encroachment by one arm of the judicial department upon the guaranteed prerogatives of another member thereof, if permitted as a precedent in the administration of justice, might lead to disastrous consequences. As well might the jury assume judicial powers to the exclusion of the judge therefrom, as for the judge to usurp the functions of the jury in its right to pass upon questions of fact. An innovation of that character would threaten the very foundations of our institutions and present a positive menace which in the exercise of diligent foresight ought to be quashed at its very inception. The judge sitting with a jury has plenary rights with reference to the orderly conduct of the case on trial, including the duty of declaring the law applicable to the facts and the legal effect thereof; but in no circumstances, in litigation of the character here in question, has the judge any warrant in the law for a substitution of his personal opinion for that of the jury, nor lawful authority to compel action by the jury as against its judgment. The operation by which the jury was compelled to abdicate the rightful exercise of its historic functions was an excess of power by the judge; the jurisdiction of the court was overreached; and a judgment was thereby rendered which was of no force or effect.

"Any departure from those recognized and established requirements of law, however close the apparent adherence to mere form in method of procedure, which has the effect to deprive one of a constitutional right, is as much an excess of jurisdiction as where there exists an inept lack of power." *McClatchy v. In re MOORE'S ESTATE. (Civ. 4774.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 21, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 18, 1924.)

1. Husband and wife $\S$ 274(1)—Provision for distribution of community property among descendants of deceased spouse on death of surviving spouse without issue inapplicable where inseparably mingled with survivor's other property.

If community property is so mingled with the surviving spouse's other property that it cannot be traced to its origin, Civ. Code, $\S$ 1386, subd. 8, providing for division of the community property among decedent's descendants, on the death of the surviving spouse without issue does not apply.

2. Husband and wife $\S$ 274(4)—Evidence held insufficient to justify finding as to right of descendants of testatrix's deceased husband to community property.

In a will contest by descendants of testatrix's husband, who predeceased her, evidence held insufficient to justify the inference that testatrix preserved in kind community property received from her husband's estate or invested or reinvested it in any particular security, so as to permit its being separated from her other property and traced to its origin as part of the community property.

3. Evidence $\S$ 595—Conflicting inferences equally justified present nothing for jury or court.

When conflicting inferences equally justified may be drawn from the proof, there is nothing for the jury or court sitting without a jury but mere guesses and conjectures, on which no verdict or decision can be founded.

4. Evidence $\S$ 75—Court may presume stronger evidence not offered would be unfavorable.

Where parties content themselves with introducing weaker and less satisfactory evidence than they might, the court may presume that the omitted evidence would be unfavorable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Proceeding by Anna B. Moore, as executrix of the estate of George A. Moore, deceased, and others, contesting the will of Mary Ellen Moore, deceased, opposed by Harry W. Lobb, individually and as executor of testatrix's estate. From a judgment of dismissal, contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Robert L. McWilliams, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, and Earle Warren, of Oakland, for respondent Lobb.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal by the contestants in a contest of a will where the proceeding was commenced after the will had been admitted to probate. George A. Moore was married twice. By his first wife he had several children, George J., Herbert B., Harry T., Mary F., and Jane W. By his second wife, Mary Ellen, he had no children.

George A. Moore died testate in the year 1916, and by the terms of his will he left his property to his second wife, Mary Ellen. After due proceedings had, she received $16,000, which the record shows was community property. His widow, Mary Ellen, continued to live on until the 14th day of August, 1920, when she died testate, leaving her surviving at least one sister, and one nephew residing in Humboldt county. After her death her will was admitted to probate, and the proponent and respondent, Harry W. Lobb, was, on September 2, 1920, appointed, in accordance with the provisions of her will, sole executor thereof. Thereafter this proceeding was commenced, and on March 13, 1922, the second amended petition was filed. Later the respondent interposed a demurrer, the demurrer was overruled, he filed an answer, and a trial was had. The trial of the issue, interest in the estate, was had by the trial court sitting without a jury. When that issue was on trial, both parties having submitted their evidence, the trial court decided the issue against the contestants, discharged the jury, and dismissed the proceeding.

The contestants are either the children of the husband of the decedent or the children of a deceased child of the husband. By their contest they claim that their stepmother, Mary Ellen Moore, inserted a residuary clause in her will which was invalid by reason of the undue influence practiced on the decedent by the respondent Harry W. Lobb; that under the alleged invalid clause upwards of $80,000 was therefore left undisposed of by will; and that said sum remains to be administered upon as though the decedent had died intestate. In this connection the contestants claim that the decedent, had received from her husband's estate $16,000, and that the whole thereof was community property, and that she retained the whole of said sum intact until the date of her death, and that the said sum was included in and covered by the $80,000, which was so left undisposed of by will, and to which the contestants were entitled to assert their claim. All of these facts the contestants conceded in the trial court and now concede that they were bound to prove as showing their interest in the estate. Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8. But, so conceding the burden resting on them, they claim that they made the proof in the trial court, and that the trial court erred in determining that they had not shown an interest. The respondents make several replies to the claim of the appellants, and, as we view this case, it becomes necessary to consider only one. That reply is that, if we give to the evidence received and the evidence not received its full legal effect, the proof was insufficient on the issue as to interest, on the part of the contestants, in the estate.

[1] The appellants proved that Mary Ellen Moore received from the estate of her deceased husband something over $16,000, and that the whole was community property. As stated by the Supreme Court in the Estate of Brady, 171 Cal. 1, on page 5, 151 Pac. 275, on page 276:

"It may also be conceded that if such community property is by the husband (the surviving spouse) so mingled with his other property that it cannot be traced to its origin as a part of the community property, subdivision 8 could not be applied." (Parentheses ours.)

To meet that rule and to avoid the consequences of it, the appellants attempted to show that Mrs. Moore retained the said $16,000, and the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and was possessed of the same at the time of her death. However, to prove the fact they did not attempt to introduce any direct evidence. They attempted to prove the fact by indirect evidence. Moreover, this evidence included two different theories:

(1) They attempted to show that from the date of her husband's death until the date of her own death that Mrs. Moore suffered no losses and lived within her income. In following along this line of proof they called to the stand her nephew, Frank A. Brown, and examined him as to his knowledge of Mrs. Moore's affairs. They showed that Mr. Brown was a favorite nephew of Mrs. Moore and down to 1910 was a member of her family household; but none of the matters with which we are concerned in this case occurred before the year 1910. After that year Mr. Brown occasionally visited his aunt and occasionally had conversations with her, and it suffices to state that he did not claim to know nor to testify regarding the many things that may have happened when he was not by the side of his aunt.

(2) Taking up another line of proof, the appellants produced the inventory filed in the estate of Mary Ellen Moore. That inventory is a long one, and includes over 40 items of real and personal property. Some of the items, in turn, consisted of a bunch of bonds or a bunch of stock, and in each bunch there were from 10 to 40 or even more indentures of similar tenor. Thereupon the appellants undertook to introduce proof as to when each piece of property was acquired and with what moneys it was purchased. It is not necessary to repeat the testimony, but it will suffice to say that the appellants did not so account for investments that could have been made, in whole or in part, consuming the entire $16,000, and, in fact, many times more than the $16,000. Although every certificate of corporate stock was presumably dated when the same was issued to Mary Ellen Moore, the record does not disclose such dates nor any reason why the proof was not made. Although the corporate bonds were presumably purchased from some person, natural or artificial, no attempt was made to introduce evidence to prove the date of the purchase. Although several items were appraised at less than the face value, showing on the face thereof an apparent loss, no evidence was introduced showing the purchase price, and therefore, whether there was an actual loss, and, if so, how much, and whether the loss was incurred by the decedent after she received the moneys from her husband's estate, or before.

During the progress of their case the appellants produced and offered in evidence a book that is marked "Cash." The book purports to cover a period of time from September, 1912, to a part of the year 1918. The respondents objected to the offer, the objection was sustained, and the appellants assign the ruling as erroneous. The writing in the book is conceded to be almost wholly in the handwriting of the decedent. The left-hand page consists almost wholly of items concerning the arrival and departure of and short remarks concerning the servants; the right-hand page purports to state the household expenses and the personal expenses of the decedent. It is minutely itemized. The right-hand page, however, does not purport to state the investments made by the decedent, and the attention of the trial court was not called to a single entry in that behalf. The book does contain some disjointed entries regarding dividends received, but neither party claimed those entries were material in this case. Conceding without deciding that the book should have been received in evidence, it will suffice to remark that the contents of the book were evidence of no fact except to show that Mary Ellen Moore was most frugal in her habits, and of that fact there was no dispute.

The appellants produced and offered in evidence individual income tax returns for the years 1917 and 1918. The trial court sustained an objection, and the ruling is assigned as error. We think it may be conceded that similar papers might be admissible under some circumstances on the trial of such an issue as was involved in the instant case; but the appellants do not point out to us any particular fact contained in any one of the papers that was particularly helpful to either party. The return for the year 1917 showed a total net income of $6,389.53; it further showed that during that year the decedent contributed to charitable organizations $15. The return for the year 1918 showed a net income of $2,137.88; it showed no losses by fire or storm; it showed contributions in the sum of $40.

[2-4] Assuming without deciding that the rejected evidence should have been received, and considering all of the evidence which the appellants offered, we think it is clear that the appellants did not offer evidence sufficient to justify the trial court in holding that they had proved an interest in the estate of the deceased. In the first place, if we view all of the evidence mentioned and give it all of the force which it is entitled to, it does not carry the inference that after Mary Ellen Moore received the $16,000 from her husband's estate that she preserved the same in kind, or that she invested the same in any particular security, or reinvested the same in any particular security. It may equally be inferred that she so mingled those moneys with her other properties that they cannot now be traced to their origin as a part of the community property. When such conflicting inferences may be drawn from the proof, then there is nothing for the jury, or the trial court sitting without a jury, but mere guesses and conjectures, and upon these no verdict or decision can be founded. Puckhaber v. Southern Pacific Co., 132 Cal. 363, 366, 64 Pac. 480. Moreover, the appellants had before them the itemized inventory of the investments of which the decedent died possessed. They did not show whether a profit or a loss was made on any one. They did not show, if a loss, whether the loss was, in whole or in part, funds received from the estate of the husband. They did not show whether any one of the investments was made, in whole or in part, with the funds received from the estate of the deceased husband. But the appellants contented themselves with introducing weaker and less satisfactory evidence. Under those circumstances the trial court was entitled to presume that the omitted evidence would be unfavorable and, for that reason, was not offered. Stedman v. Stedman, 179 Cal. 288, 291, 176 Pac. 437.

The ruling of the trial court was, in effect, holding that the evidence produced by the appellants did not present to the trial court the inference which the appellants would have had the trial court draw. We cannot say that the trial court erred in so holding.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONDADA V. BORDENAVE. (Civ. 4607.)

1. Trusts ☞107—Burden not on mother to show that son had independent advice in conveying property to her.

In an action by son against his mother, old and infirm, to have declared a trust on realty conveyed by him to her for valuable consideration, the burden was not on the mother to show that plaintiff had independent advice, notwithstanding the deed was drawn by her attorney.

2. Appeal and error ☞1011(1)—Judgment on conflicting evidence as to whether property was conveyed in trust affirmed.

A judgment against a son, suing to have a trust declared in realty conveyed by him to his mother, affirmed, as based merely on conflicting evidence as to whether the property was conveyed in trust, or free and clear of all equities for a valuable consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Thomas Mondada against Marie Bordenave. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. More and E. B. Mering, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ralph Starke, of San Francisco, and E. B. Martinelli, of San Rafael (Jordan L. Martinelli, of San Rafael, of counsel), for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action in which he sought to have a trust declared upon certain real property in Marin county, Cal. The legal title to said property was vested in the defendant, who is the mother of the plaintiff. Plaintiff alleged that prior to April 27, 1909, he was the owner of said real property, and that on that date he deeded the same to the defendant upon the oral agreement that the defendant would reside upon said property and keep the same as a home for both plaintiff and defendant, and that, if defendant should leave said home, she would reconvey the said property to the plaintiff. Defendant denied the making of any such oral agreement, and alleged that the property was conveyed to her absolutely and free from any trusts in payment of an indebtedness of approximately $1,000, which amount was due to defendant from the plaintiff at the time of the said conveyance. Thus were presented the only questions, which are ones of fact, involved in the case.

The trial court found the allegations of the complaint regarding the oral agreement to be untrue, and found that the plaintiff conveyed the property in question to the defendant "for and in consideration of the sum of $1,000, in which amount plaintiff was indebted to defendant, said indebtedness being made up by and evidenced by a promissory note bearing date of October 14, 1907, for the sum of $500 and the additional sum of $500 which defendant had loaned to plaintiff."

At the time of the trial the defendant was 79 years of age. The plaintiff was evidently a man of mature years, who had been working and earning his living for many years prior to the time he acquired the real property in question in 1902. It is true the evidence in the record is conflicting, and that there is considerable evidence upon which the trial court might have based findings in favor of the plaintiff's contention. However, the defendant told a story which supports the findings in her favor, and the trial judge stated he was inclined to believe her testimony, and found accordingly.

[1] The contention upon the appeal is that, as the parties were mother and son, and occupied a confidential relation one to the other, the burden was upon the defendant to show that no trust attached to the property; that as the record shows that the deed to the property was drawn up by the attorney for the mother, and that the son had no attorney representing him, the transaction is presumably void, and the burden was upon the mother to show that the son had independent advice upon the question of deeding the property to her. Reliance is placed upon the case of Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 20, 93 Pac. 289. In that case the donor of the property was old and feeble in mind and body, and the court found her to have been mentally incompetent at the time of the execution of the deed to her son. It was there said:

"When, therefore, he [defendant] obtained from her [plaintiff], under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, valuable property—in fact, practically her entire estate—admittedly without a valuable consideration, the burden rested upon him to show that the fructification of the transaction was not attained through fraud or undue influence."

The circumstances disclosed by the evidence in the present case are exactly the reverse of those disclosed in the case last cited. In the present case the grantee was the mother. She was old and feeble, according to the testimony. The grantor was the son, so far as the record shows, entirely competent mentally and active physically. And one of the distinguishing features of the case of Nobles v. Hutton, and one which is stated as a part of the rule announced therein, is that in that case there was no valuable consideration paid for the property, while in the present case the court has found upon substantial evidence that a valuable consideration was paid by the grantee.

Two other cases are relied upon by appellant. They are: Mead v. Mead, 41 Cal. App. 280, 182 Pac. 761, and Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 324, 27 Pac. 186. Both of these cases are distinguishable from the instant case in two important particulars. In the Mead Case the property was conveyed by a father to a son without any consideration. The grantor was a man of 83 years of age, quite deaf, stricken with paralysis, feeble in body and mind at the time of the trial, and the deed had been made by him 5 years earlier. In the case of Brison v. Brison the conveyance was from the husband to the wife without any consideration whatsoever, and the trial court found that the conveyance was made with the understanding that the property would be reconveyed later.

[2] There are no other matters requiring consideration upon this appeal. The record merely presents a case of conflicting evidence upon the vital question involved, i. e., was the property conveyed to the defendant upon a trust or was it transferred to her free and clear of all equities for a valuable consideration, and the trial court, after seeing the witnesses, accepted as true the statement of the mother, and found accordingly.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ABBOTT. (Cr. 1141.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 2, 1924.)

1. Criminal law ☞351(3)—Evidence of forfeiture of bail and apprehension on bench warrant held admissible on issue of flight.

In a prosecution for having obtained money by false pretenses, evidence that defendant had failed to appear at the time first set for his trial, that he was arrested some six months later upon a bench warrant, and that his bail had been declared forfeited for the purpose of showing that he had attempted to evade the consequences of a trial by flight, held proper.

2. False pretenses ☞22—Defense that prosecuting witness not entitled to rely on false representations not sustained.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by "false pretenses," in that defendant had sold to the prosecuting witness a number of barrels containing colored water upon representations that they contained whisky, held, that defendant could not avoid liability on the theory that there was no longer any property rights in the whisky, and that the prosecuting witness must be presumed to have known such fact and was not entitled to rely on the false representations, since such representations were of fact and not of law, and the basis of the charge being a misrepresentation of a material fact with knowledge thereof and intent to defraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, False Pretense.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Herbert Abbott was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was convicted upon an information charging him with the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses made with an intent to defraud. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order of the trial court refusing his motion for a new trial.

[1] The appellant assigns as error the admission of evidence showing that the bail bond of defendant had been declared forfeited by the court prior to the trial, and that a bench warrant had issued for his apprehension. It is admitted by the appellant that this evidence was offered for the purpose of showing that he had attempted to evade the consequences of a trial by flight, but he contends that the record evidence of the proceedings had by the court prior to the trial of the cause was not admissible for this purpose. Some authorities from other jurisdictions are cited to the point that this evidence was not admissible, as it covered an ex parte proceeding had in the absence of the defendant. But in the case before us evidence had previously been offered to show that the defendant had failed to appear at various times when his case was called before the trial court, and that six months after the date upon which his case was set for trial he was arrested in another county after considerable search. It was then shown that he was arrested upon a bench warrant, which was issued by the trial court a few weeks previous to the time when his bail was declared forfeited. The introduction of the evidence relating to the issuance of the bench warrant upon which the appellant was subsequently arrested in another county was clearly admissible as evidence of flight. The evidence relating to the forfeiture of his bail was merely a part of the general story and was not prejudicial to the trial of his case.

[2] The second point urged is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, because the false pretenses upon which the money was fraudulently obtained from the prosecuting witness consisted in representations that a number of barrels contained whisky, whereas, as a matter of fact, said barrels contained colored water. It is then argued that, inasmuch as "there are no longer any property rights in whisky," the prosecuting witness must be presumed to have known the law to be such and could not therefore be deemed to have relied upon the false representations of the appellant.

Accepting for the time being appellant's general statement of the law as to property rights in whisky, we cannot accept his conclusion as to the legal effect of the representations made in this case, because those representations were of a matter of fact and not of law. The basis of the charge upon which appellant was tried was that he had made a misrepresentation of a material matter of fact, with knowledge of the true facts and with the intention to defraud, that the injured party, relying upon the false representations, was induced to part with his money, and that the appellant obtained this money as a result of the fraud. These were the necessary elements to be proved by the prosecution, and a review of the record satisfies us beyond any doubt that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the charge to the information.

Criticism is also made of the instructions relating to the evidence tending to show the flight of the defendant, but the argument here is practically the same as that advanced upon the first point considered.

We find no error in the record, and from our examination of it we are satisfied that the appellant was legally convicted on substantial evidence.

RANDOLPH MARKETING CO. v. WOOD
et al. (Civ. 3718.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 28, 1923.)

1. Sales — Evidence held insufficient basis for finding as to value of mixed grapes delivered under contract for a particular variety.

In an action for damages for the delivery of four carloads of grapes of mixed varieties, under a contract for Zinfandel grapes, testimony that it would be impossible to say what a mixed car would be worth, that it would be worth "approximately $30 a ton, maybe more," and that if it contained a large percentage of a certain variety witness would probably give full price for it, held insufficient to support a finding as to the value of the grapes delivered as a basis upon which to determine damages.

2. Sales — Evidence of price obtained on resale held properly excluded on issue of damages for failure to perform as to quality.

In an action by a purchaser for damages for delivery of mixed grapes under contract for a particular variety, proof of the amount for which the mixed grapes were sold as a basis for determining the damages sustained held properly excluded; such damages, under Civ. Code, § 3313, being determinable from their actual value, rather than the price for which they were sold.

3. Sales — Damages for delivery of goods other than those ordered held not recoverable because of failure to show value.

Under Civ. Code, § 3313, the measure of damages for delivery of mixed grapes under a contract for a particular variety is the excess, if any, of the value of the variety ordered over the actual value of those delivered; so that, in the absence of any showing as to the actual value of grapes delivered, the purchaser is not entitled to recover, although he establishes a contract for the resale at a profit of the goods ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Randolph Marketing Company against H. L. Wood and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Miller, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. J. Carlson, of Modesto, and D. H. Laubersheimer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Action to recover damages for breach of contract in the sale of four carloads of Zinfandel grapes. The grapes were purchased by the plaintiff from the defendant Wood through defendant Ely as a broker acting for Wood. The purchase price was $45 per ton, which was paid at the time the cars were loaded by Wood at stations near Modesto, in Stanislaus county. Two cars were consigned to Walla Walla, Wash., one to Portland, Or., and one to El Paso, Tex. On the arrival of the grapes at their respective destinations the four cars were found not to contain Zinfandel grapes only, but each car contained a mixed variety of grapes, principally Tokay, Mission, and Zinfandel varieties. The consignees refused to accept the grapes, for the reason that they contained varieties other than Zinfandel. There was no evidence of the amount of each variety of grapes shipped in any one car, nor was there any evidence of the amount of each variety of grapes shipped as a whole in the four cars. The only evidence of the value of the grapes shipped was that given by the defendant Ely. He stated that Mission grapes were worth $5 per ton more than Zinfandel, and that other varieties were worth from $5 to $15 per ton less than Zinfandels, but that it would be impossible to say what a mixed car, that is, a car containing a number of varieties of grapes, was worth, without knowing what percentage of the different varieties were in the car. In answer to a question as to what he would give for such a car of grapes, the witness testified:

"Probably $30 a ton; maybe more. I would have sized it up. If I thought it contained 60 or 70 per cent. of Missions in there, I would have probably given the full price for it."

At the close of plaintiff's testimony, upon the motion of defendants, the court granted a nonsuit. This motion was granted on the ground that there was no evidence of any damage having been sustained on behalf of plaintiff, for the reason that the evidence failed to show the value of the grapes shipped, or that the grapes actually shipped were of any less value than the grapes ordered and paid for by plaintiff.

[1] We are not favored with any brief or points and authorities on behalf of respondents. Appellant contended that the evidence shows that the grapes as loaded in the cars at the points of shipment were worth only $30 per ton, and that as it paid $45 per ton for the grapes, its damage would be the difference between the amount paid and the value of the grapes delivered, or $15 per ton. This would undoubtedly be true if there was any evidence that the value of the mixed cars was only $30 per ton. It will be noted that the witness Ely in the first place stated that it would be impossible to state the value of a mixed car of grapes without knowing the percentage of the different varieties of grapes in the car. It is true he stated that he would probably give $30 or more per ton for such a car of grapes, but what a person might give for an article is no evidence of its value. He might, for reasons good and sufficient to himself, be willing to pay a price far in excess of its actual value. On the other hand, he might have but little or no use for the article, and be unwilling to pay even a fraction of its real value. It would be an extremely unsafe rule that would permit the value of property to be so established. Furthermore, the testimony of the witness, even if competent to prove the value of the grapes, was so indefinite and uncertain as to render it worthless as evidence in the case. He testified that he probably would give $30 per ton, and maybe more, for a mixed car of grapes without knowing the amount of each variety of grapes in the car. How much more he does not state. He does say, however, if he thought there was a large percentage of Mission grapes in the car he would give the full price for it. It is apparent that testimony of this character would not support any finding which the court might make relative to the value of the grapes sold. As we have before noted, this was the only testimony before the court upon this issue of the case. The trial court, therefore, rightly granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

[2] Plaintiff offered to prove at the trial the actual amount received by it for the grapes at their respective destinations, under the claim that the measure of its damage was the difference between what it paid for the grapes and what, in the exercise of its best skill in reducing the damage as much as possible, it was enabled to realize from the sale of the grapes at their destinations. Defendants objected to such proof, and their objection was sustained by the court. There was no error in the court's ruling. The measure of damages in cases of this character is fixed by section 3313 of the Civil Code.

[3] There was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had contracted to sell the grapes ordered from the defendants for $50 per ton. Plaintiff contends that in view of this evidence it was entitled to recover in this action at least the difference between that price and the purchase price of said grapes, which would be $5 per ton. In support of this last contention plaintiff has called our attention to a citation found in 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) page 1156, and to a number of cases there referred to in support of the text. These authorities are all from jurisdictions other than our own. As before stated, in our opinion the measure of damages in this case is covered by the provisions of section 3313 of the Civil Code of this state. By this section plaintiff would be entitled to recover the excess, if any, of the value of Zinfandel grapes at the time of their purchase over the actual value of the grapes delivered. Plaintiff therefore would not be limited to the purchase price of $45 per ton paid for the grapes, but, in fixing the amount of its damage, would be entitled to show the market value of the grapes agreed to be purchased. This market value might be $50 per ton, or any other amount which the evidence might establish. In this case there is testimony tending to show that the value of Zinfandel grapes at the time these grapes were ordered was at least $50 per ton, but plaintiff can recover only the excess of such value over the actual value of the grapes delivered. As we have already shown, we believe, plaintiff failed to establish the actual value of the grapes delivered, and as a result of such failure it has not shown that it sustained any damage whatever.

Judgment affirmed.

FARRAR et ux. v. WHIPPLE et al.
(Civ. 4506.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, Division 2. Jan. 2, 1924.)

1. Highways — 175(1)—Duty of driver as relates to use of right-hand portion of highway stated.

Under Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, as amended by St. 1919, p. 215, § 12, subd. (a), requiring motor vehicles to "travel upon the right-hand side of such highway unless the road ahead on the left-hand side is clear and unobstructed for at least 100 yards ahead," and also requiring the operator of a motor vehicle to use the right-hand side of a highway "wherever practicable," it is the duty of the operator of an automobile to use the right-hand side of the highway if clear and passable, but if blocked or impassable he may use the left-hand side, giving way at all times to traffic from the opposite direction.

2. Highways — 184(2)—Negligence of one towing car of another held not shown in action for injuries caused by towed car.

In an action for personal injuries and for damages to an automobile from a collision by plaintiff's car with the car of one defendant, which was being towed by another defendant, which occurred as the two were passing each other at a point on the highway where it was partially blocked by cars parked at the edge of the road because of another accident, where there was no showing that defendant, whose car was towing the other, had violated the Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, as amended by St. 1919, p. 215, § 12, subd. (a), requiring use of the right-hand side of a highway whenever practical, held as to him there was no showing of negligence constituting a proximate cause of the injury.

3. Action — 50(1)—Action for damages to husband's property may be joined in action by husband and wife for injuries to wife.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 427, subd. 8, a cause of action for damages to personal property of a husband may be joined in the same action with a cause of action on the part of the husband and wife for personal injuries suffered by the wife alone.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by J. C. Farrar and wife against A. S. Whipple and L. A. Gielow. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Louis V. Crowley, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Thos. D. Johnston, of Martinez, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment entered against both of them for damages arising out of personal injuries to the plaintiff Josephine Farrar and for damages to the property of plaintiff J. C. Farrar, her husband.

The facts of the case are that the two plaintiffs were riding in an automobile owned and operated by plaintiff J. C. Farrar upon one of the public highways in the county of Contra Costa. The defendant Gielow was operating his automobile on the same highway in an opposite direction, and at the time of the collision hereinafter referred to was towing an automobile owned and steered by the defendant Whipple. The car of the defendant Whipple had broken down a short time before, and the defendant Gielow, at the former's request and without compensation, was towing his car with an ordinary tow line of about 15 feet in length. A short time before the collision another accident had happened on the highway in question, and a number of cars were parked along the west side of the highway with their left-hand wheels standing about 1 foot within the paved portion of the highway. As the defendants approached these parked cars the defendant Gielow turned to the left, and continued his course along the highway at a rate of speed of about 10 or 12 miles an hour. At the same time the plaintiffs, approaching in another direction, passed Gielow's car as they proceeded upon their right-hand side of the paved portion of the highway as far to the right as it was possible for them to travel without getting off the highway. The defendant Whipple, while steering his car at this point, directed his attention to the scene of the former accident, and was looking at a man and woman who were lying upon the ground at the time. In doing this he failed to follow the line of the towing car but turned his wheel directly to the left and into the car of the plaintiffs, causing the injuries which are the basis of the action. The paved portion of the highway at that point was about 16 feet, while the dirt road beyond the paved portion of the highway extended about 8 feet. At the time of the collision the plaintiffs' automobile was almost entirely off the paved portion and running slowly upon the dirt side road. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, making an award for personal injuries suffered by the wife and also for the cost of repairing the automobile of the husband.

But two points raised on the appeal require consideration: First, whether there is any showing of negligence on the part of the appellant Gielow; and, second, whether the cause of action for damages to the personal property of the husband could be joined in the same action with the cause of action on the part of the husband and wife for personal injuries suffered by the wife alone.

[1, 2] Upon the first point respondents rely upon the provisions of section 20 of the Motor Vehicle Act as amended (Stats. 1919, p. 215, subd. [a]), which reads:

"On all occasions the driver or operator of any vehicle in or upon any public highway shall travel upon the right half of such highway unless the road ahead on the left-hand side is clear and unobstructed for at least one hundred yards ahead and in all cases while crossing an intersecting highway."

The same subdivision, however, requires an operator to travel upon the right-hand side of a highway "wherever practicable." The clear meaning of the section is that, if the right-hand side of the highway is clear and passable, it is the duty of the operator of an automobile to use that portion of it, but, if the right-hand portion of it is blocked or impassable, the operator may use the left-hand portion of it, giving way at all times to the traffic which is approaching in the other direction. Here the uncontradicted evidence is that the paved portion of the highway was 16 feet wide; that beyond the paved portion was a dirt road 8 feet wide; that the right-hand portion of the highway was blocked by machines which were parked thereon, making it necessary for the appellants to turn slightly to their left. These parked machines occupied about 1 foot of the paved portion of the highway, leaving for traffic in both directions a space of 15 feet. It further appeared that these cars were all standard width, to wit, about 6 feet. There was, therefore, even upon the paved portion of the highway, ample room for the cars of both appellants and respondents to pass, and there was no attempt to show that Gielow was traveling to the left of the center of the paved portion of the highway. So far as this appellant was concerned, he was, therefore, proceeding strictly within the terms of the statute, and no act of his was the proximate cause of the resulting injury. It stands in the record without conflict that the injuries were caused solely by the careless and negligent manner in which the appellant Whipple steered his car, and that but for this negligence the accident would not have happened. There is, therefore, nothing in the record to show negligence on the part of the appellant Gielow, and for that reason the judgment as to him must be reversed.

[3] On the second point it is argued that an action for damages to personal property of the husband cannot be joined with an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by the wife alone. Subdivision 8 of section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure is cited. This reads in part that in any action brought by the husband and wife all consequential damages suffered or sustained by the husband alone may be alleged and recovered without separately stating them, and "that causes of action for injuries to person and injuries to property, growing out of the same tort, may be joined in the same complaint, and it is not required that they be stated separately." By the terms of the section the husband may be joined with his wife in suing for consequential damages resulting from personal injuries sustained by the wife alone. His action then becomes an action for damages for personal injuries, and as such is within the terms of that portion of the section which has just been quoted and which authorizes the joinder of an action for injuries to person and property growing out of the same tort.

Criticism is also made as to the want of proof of the injuries to the automobile, but upon the whole record we believe that the trial court had sufficient competent evidence to sustain the finding as to the respondents' damage in that particular.

The judgment against the defendant Whipple is affirmed, and that against defendant Gielow is reversed.

KINNEBERG v. FIREMAN'S INS. CO.
(Civ. 2644.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 29, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 25, 1924.)

1. Insurance — 668(5) — Delivery of bill of sale of insured automobile held question of intent for trial court.

In an action on an automobile fire insurance policy, requiring that insured's interest be that of unconditional and sole ownership, delivery of an alleged bill of sale of the property to a creditor held a question of intent for the trial court.

2. Insurance — 665(3) — Findings as to unconditional and sole ownership held justified.

In an action on an automobile fire insurance policy containing an unconditional and sole ownership clause, evidence held sufficient to justify the trial court's findings that plaintiff never lost control of an alleged bill of sale of the car to a creditor, that the latter never accepted or received the bill, and that no lien on the car was created thereby.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by M. J. Kinneberg against the Fireman's Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for appellant.

William V. Cowan and J. M. Inman, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This an action by plaintiff to recover the sum of $1,600 on an automobile fire insurance policy. Plaintiff had judgment and the defendant appeals.

The only question presented for consideration upon this appeal is whether the plaintiff had an insurable interest in the automobile covered by the policy issued by the defendant at the time of its destruction by fire. It appears that some time prior to the fire, and after the issuance of the policy sued upon in this action, the plaintiff borrowed from one Thomas Byrne the sum of $1,266 and gave his promissory note therefor. The policy in question contains the following provisions:

"If the interest of the assured in the property be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or if the subject of this insurance be or become incumbered by any lien or mortgage except as stated in warranty No. 3 or otherwise indorsed hereon."

Warranty No. 3 is as follows:

"The automobile described is fully paid for by the assured and is not mortgaged or otherwise incumbered."

A few days after the execution of the note above referred to, Thomas Byrne called at the place of business of the plaintiff, Kinneberg, not, however, in connection with the loan herein referred to, or for the purpose of obtaining any security therefor. However, at the time of said call, the plaintiff, Kinneberg, went into his office and wrote out the following document:

"Superior Motor Sales Co., 1910 M Street. Phone Main —. Sacramento, Cal., Aug. 1, 1921. Sold to T. Byrne, Sacramento, Calif., 1 Pan-American touring car No. 3176. 1,266.00. Received payment.

"[Signed] M. J. Kinneberg.

"The above car is given as security on a $1,266 note, in favor of T. Byrne, and said car is to remain the property of said T. Byrne until said promissory note is paid, together with interest thereon as specified in said note.

"[Signed] M. J. Kinneberg.

"[Signed] Thos. Byrne."

This paper was made out in duplicate; plaintiff signed both copies and handed them to Byrne. Byrne at first declined to sign the paper, stating that he did not care for the instrument; but, upon further request by the plaintiff, Byrne signed both copies and handed them back to the plaintiff, stating that he did not want the same. The circumstances of what took place in this transaction are shown by the testimony set out in the transcript which is as follows:

"Q. Mr. Kinneberg, didn't you, at the time you borrowed the money from Mr. Byrne, execute a bill of sale in the form of a promissory note covering this, in—a promissory note in the form of a mortgage on this car? A. All I gave him was a note for the money. That is all he asked. Q. You never signed any bill of sale of any kind? A. I made out a bill of sale subsequently to that, and offered it to him; but it was never accepted, because he didn't want it. Q. Mr. Kinneberg, you signed a bill of sale, didn't you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And Mr. Byrne signed it? A. Yes, sir. Q. You signed two copies, didn't you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you kept one, and he kept the other? A. No, sir; he did not. Q. Who kept the original copy? A. I kept it, and it was destroyed, simply because he didn't want it. Q. Well, why did Mr. Byrne sign it? A. He signed it before he realized what he was signing. He came down to my place to tell me that he had two or three people that he thought he could sell that car to, and I merely offered this to him, and he signed it, and after we got through, he said, 'What is this?' And I said, 'Well, it is simply a bill of sale, and I feel that you are entitled to it as additional security;' and he said, 'I don't want it;' and he left it on my desk, and after he went away I destroyed it. Q. You didn't destroy this one, did you? A. No. It was simply left there and mixed up with the rest of my papers when I delivered them to Mr. Cowan. Q. He signed both of them, didn't he—Mr. Byrne? A. He did; yes, sir. * * * Q. This was a week after you loaned him the money you went down there to borrow a car? A. Yes, sir. Q. And did this question of a bill of sale come up? A. He asked me to sign it. Q. Did he have it prepared? A. No; he did not. Q. Who prepared it? A. He did. Q. While you were down there? A. Yes. Q. Now state what he said. A. Well, I don't know. The only thing is, he just told me to sign it, and it would make it solid for me, security for me, that is all. Q. Well, was this before he made it out? A. Before he made what out? Q. The bill of sale. A. No; it was afterwards. Q. After he made it out? A. Yes. Q. Well, when you got down there, the bill of sale wasn't made out? A. No. Q. Did he sit down and make it out in front of you? A. Yes. Q. What did he say when he was making it out? A. Didn't say anything until he got it made out. Q. You didn't know what he was doing? A. No. Q. After he got it made out, he turned to you and said: 'Sign this'? A. No; he told me to sign that, and it would make it more secure for me, and then I read it, and handed it back to him, and told him I didn't want it. Q. Why didn't you want that? A. Why, because it is no good. Q. Why do you say that, 'No good'? A. That is no bill of sale. Q. Well, you objected to signing it, because you didn't like the form of it; is that it? A. No; because I didn't want to take it, because I didn't believe it was any bill of sale. Q. Well, why did you sign it? A. I signed it because he asked me to. Q. Well, why didn't you take it? A. Well, because I didn't want it. Q. But you signed it? A. Yes, and left it there, because I didn't want it. * * * Q. He didn't say anything about it until he went to give it to you? A. No; he just told me to sign it; it would make the note more secure for me. Q. And you said, 'No'? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then what happened? A. That is all. I signed it, and told him to keep it; I didn't want it. Q. You told him to keep it, you didn't want it? A. Yes, sir. Q. And he kept it? A. Yes, sir. Q. The two copies? A. Yes; he kept them. Q. He offered you one copy, though, didn't he? A. He offered it to me, and I didn't want it. Q. You just said, 'You keep it'? A. Yes. Q. Is that all you said? A. That is all I told him. I says: 'I don't want it, you can keep it.' * * * A. No; I just signed it for him. He asked me to sign it. He told me it would make it safer for me. Q. Did you or did you not at that time ask Mr. Kinneberg to take care of it as your agent? A. I told him he could keep it and take care of it."

The witness Byrne also stated that he did not consider the paper any good as a bill of sale and did not want it. The foregoing testimony was repeated several times, as appears by the transcript, but the substance and effect thereof remained unchanged by the repetitions. The trial court found that the interest of the insured in the automobile in question was unconditional and sole ownership at the time of its destruction by fire on the 21st day of November, 1921; that the policy was in full force and effect; and as a conclusion of law from the facts found that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the insurance and entered judgment accordingly.

The writing referred to as a bill of sale was excluded from the testimony and therefore from consideration by the trial court on the ground that it was never delivered, and that no title to the automobile ever passed from Kinneberg to Byrne, and that no lien upon the automobile was created by the transaction just referred to. The testimony shows that the plaintiff handed the paper to Byrne with the request that he sign the same and that after the two copies were signed they were handed back by Byrne to the plaintiff. No further or other attempted delivery was made by Kinneberg and the papers thereafter remained in his sole custody and control; that in the beginning of the transaction the plaintiff intended by the writing referred to, to give Byrne security for the money theretofore borrowed from him seems clear. It is also evident that Byrne did not want any security in addition to the promissory note then held by him evidencing the amount of the indebtedness owed by the plaintiff. The evidence shows that one copy of the paper in question was destroyed and the other remained in existence with the papers belonging to the plaintiff.

[1] Under the circumstances which we have set forth and the testimony which we have copied, the question of delivery in this case is a pure question of intent to be found by the trial court. While a number of cases might be cited, the following excerpt from Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 4 Pac. 473, 8 Pac. 46, 56 Am. Rep. 726, covers the question fully:

"The act solemn and authentic, done in writing in form apt for the conveyance of land, with signature and seal, does not take effect as a deed until delivery with intent that it shall so operate. The elements going to make up such a paper all constitute an act factum or deed, but not complete until the paper has been delivered with the intent above mentioned. The intent with which it is delivered is all important. This restricts or enlarges the effect of the instrument. It may be delivered to another person as a mere custodian, or to such person to be kept by him and delivered to a third person on a condition performed, or the happening of a certain event, or it may be delivered that it may have full operation as the deed of the party delivering it. This may be done in various modes. It is impossible to state a priori in exact terms what shall or shall not constitute a delivery, that the paper may have its full operation as a deed. It is to a great extent a matter of fact depending upon intent, and under such circumstances the intent as evidencing what the maker of the instrument meant to do, must be found from the circumstances of the transaction, the res gestæ, and while some general rules may be and are laid down in regard to it to ascertain such intent, the intent must be found as a fact, and can not always be determined as matter of law. There are some cases in which the intent is so plainly indicated by the res gestæ that but one conclusion can be deduced. Take the case of the delivery of such an instrument to a third person as a mere custodian for the party giving it, its solution is plain that there is no delivery of the paper to make it operative as a deed. Take another case of such a paper handed by the grantor to the grantee, with the declaration this is my act and deed, a delivery would be so plainly intended that no other conclusion could be reached. A third case of the delivery of such an instrument by the maker to a third person with directions to keep it and hand it to a person named as grantee in it, on the payment by him of a sum of money, the payment of the sum of money, and the tradition of the paper as directed having been made, no other result could be reached than that the paper became by such delivery an operative conveyance. These cases are simple, but in other cases where the intent is to be inferred from circumstances in their very nature equivocal, the solution as to delivery or not becomes one of difficulty, and depends so much on the subjective state of the mind of person or persons trying the issue produced by the evidence of the attending circumstances, that the law can lay down no certain rule on the subject. It then becomes a question of fact, and if there is evidence tending to sustain the finding of the court a qua, this court will not disturb it. This is settled, that delivery is not complete until the person delivering [grantor] has so dealt with the instrument delivered as to lose all control over it. And whether he has so dealt with the instrument depends upon the intent to be deduced from all the surrounding circumstances, the res gestæ."

[2] As we read the testimony we conclude that the trial court was justified in finding that there was no time when the plaintiff had lost control of the writing called the bill of sale or when it was legally beyond his power to make any disposition thereof that he saw fit, and also that the trial court was justified in concluding that Thomas Byrne had never accepted or received the same or so acted in relation thereto, that title to the automobile destroyed by fire had passed to him, and also that no lien thereon had been created by the transactions referred to in this opinion.

We conclude that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

BOEHM et al. v. SPRECKELS. (Civ. 4812.)

Principal and agent —36—Good-faith sale of subject of agency held equivalent to revocation of agency.

Where contract with publisher for a route for delivery of a newspaper created an agency, rather than relation of seller and buyer, publisher's sale of the subject of the agency, made in good faith, operated as a termination of the agency, and was equivalent to revocation thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by M. Boehm and others against John D. Spreckels. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; LAW-LOR, Acting C. J., and WASTE, SEAWELL, MYERS, and RICHARDS, JJ., participating.

Wm. M. Abbott, Wm. M. Cannon, K. W. Cannon, Fabius T. Finch, Paul F. Fratessa, and Geo. B. Keane, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Samuel M. Shortridge, of San Francisco (T. J. Sheridan, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against plaintiffs upon sustaining a demurrer to their third amended complaint. The action was commenced by the filing of the complaint on January 8, 1914, and after the demurrers to the complaint and to three amended complaints were sustained judgment was entered on the last demurrer September 30, 1915. The amended complaint contains fifty-four separate causes of action, all involving claims of individuals who held paper routes and agencies for the selling and delivering within the limits of such routes of the "San Francisco Call," a daily morning newspaper, which prior to the commencement of the action had been published by the defendant, Spreckels, in the city of San Francisco. During the pendency of the action the plaintiffs commenced a new action in the same court upon the same cause of action set forth in what is designated as the second cause of action in the complaint in the instant case. This new action was commenced on October 22, 1914, and, after demurrers were sustained to the complaint and amended complaints, judgment was entered in favor of the defendant and an appeal was taken therefrom on November 15, 1915, the same day on which the appeal here under consideration was taken. That appeal, which was numbered San Francisco No. 7692, was carried to the Supreme Court and decided adversely to the appellants on June 22, 1920. The case is reported as Boehm v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 239, 191 Pac. 5. At the same time Otten v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 252, 191 Pac. 11, involving the same subject-matter, was heard and determined by the Supreme Court.

On this appeal it is frankly conceded by the appellants that in order to prevail the two opinions of the Supreme Court just referred to must be overruled. In fairness to appellants' counsel, we should point out that their briefs were filed while the record on appeal remained with the Supreme Court to which the appeal was properly taken.

In the Boehm Case, Justice Shaw, speaking for the majority of the court, held that the contract with the publisher for a route for the delivery of the newspaper created an agency and did not declare a sale of property. The court further held that the sale of the subject of the agency, made in good faith by the principal, operated as a termination of the agency, and was equivalent to a revocation thereof. The case, therefore, is completely determinative of the issues raised in the case before us, and upon the authority of that case the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

JENNINGS v. CLEARWATER SCHOOL DIST. OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4255.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Dec. 28, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 25, 1924.)

1. Schools and school districts —97(4)—Proposition submitted to electors for issuance of bonds for certain purposes held to control any prior understanding as to use of proceeds.

Where the trustees of a school district submit to the electors the question of the issuance of bonds to raise money for "purchasing school lots," etc., the site to be purchased not being more definitely designated, and the bonds are accordingly voted, a contention that the trustees cannot use the proceeds of the bonds to purchase a site not adjoining the old school building because of an understanding entered into prior to the election between the trustees and the electors is untenable; the proposition submitted to the electors, later evidenced by the bonds, constituting the only contract between the parties.

2. Schools and school districts —97(4)—Bond proposition submitted to electors held to sufficiently describe its purpose.

In an election to authorize issuance and sale of bonds for purchase of school property, a proposition submitted to the electors for "raising money for purchasing school lots" sufficiently described its purpose without designating the actual lots to be purchased.

3. Schools and school districts ☞50—Trustee's notice to electors of consultation meeting held to sufficiently state purpose.

A notice by school trustees to electors called for a consultation meeting, specifying the subject, "instructing the board of trustees with respect to the purchase of a school site, and the erecting thereon of a schoolhouse," sufficiently designated the matter to be discussed, under Political Code, § 1611, and failure of the notice and resolution adopted at the consultation meeting to specify that the schoolhouse was to be financed from the proceeds of bonds voted at a prior election was immaterial; the bonds being the sole source of such funds.

4. Schools and school districts ☞70—Majority vote held sufficient to support resolution of electors as to purchase of school sites.

Where neither the proposition for the issuance of bonds to purchase "school lots," etc., voted on at an election, nor the resolution adopted by the electors at a later consultation meeting as to the use of proceeds of the bonds to purchase school sites, mentioned the disposition of any school property owned by the district, and there was nothing to show that purchase of a new site involved sale of the old site, a majority vote sufficiently supported the resolution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Suit by Clarence Jennings against Clearwater School District of Los Angeles County and others. From a judgment dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Fuller, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Jerry H. Powell, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The board of school trustees of Clearwater school district caused notice to be given that an election would be held therein for the purpose of voting upon the question as to whether or not said district should issue and sell bonds to the amount of $45,000, as a means of "raising money for purchasing school lots, for building one or more school buildings, for making alterations and additions to said school building or buildings, for insuring school buildings, for supplying school buildings with furniture and necessary apparatus, and for improvement of school grounds." The election was held on July 12, 1921, pursuant to such notice, and, two-thirds of the votes cast being in the affirmative, said bonds were issued and sold, and the proceeds thereof are in the hands of the county treasurer. Subsequently to the sale of said bonds the trustees gave notice that—

"In accordance with the provisions of section 1611 of the Political Code, notice is hereby given that a meeting of the qualified electors of Clearwater school district, county of Los Angeles, state of California, will be held on the 13th day of January, 1922, between the hours of 1 p. m. and —, at Literary Hall, in said school district, for the purpose of consultation on the following: Instructing the board of trustees with respect to the purchase of a school site and the erecting thereon of a schoolhouse."

A meeting was accordingly held, and by a vote of 391 to 145, the following resolution was adopted:

"Moved that board of trustees be authorized to purchase a school site of not less than 4 acres fronting 20 rods in width on Ocean avenue from the property of L. D. Glock or John Thompson in said school district, and the erection on said school site a school building containing not less than 5 classrooms."

No question is raised as to the legality of any of the steps taken prior to this meeting, but appellant instituted proceedings against the respondents, praying that said purchase be enjoined, and that the trustees be restrained from using any part of the funds for the purchase of a school site which does not adjoin the present school property. The principal ground for injunction alleged in appellant's amended complaint is that—

"It was understood by and between the district and the trustees of said district and the electors of said district that the proceeds of said bonds, if voted, should be used for the purpose of purchasing lots adjacent to and adjoining said district's school site and for building one or more school buildings upon the lots so purchased, and for making alterations and additions to said school building or buildings, and for insuring buildings, for supplying school buildings with furniture and necessary apparatus, and for improving the school grounds of said district situate as hereinbefore described, and for no other purpose; that said bonds would not have been voted by the electors of said district had they known it was the intention of said trustees to use the proceeds of the sale of said bonds to acquire lots that do not adjoin the district's present school site and to build a schoolhouse on such lots."

It is further alleged that upon two occasions previously to the meeting above mentioned the trustees called meetings for the purpose of obtaining instructions to purchase a site not adjoining the present school grounds, and that upon each such occasion the proposition was defeated. It is argued therefrom that this action of the electors is evidence of such previous understanding and agreement, and is conclusive, and that the third meeting and resulting resolution were void, because the board called a meeting for consultation upon the purchase of a school site over a mile south of the present school site; that the trustees were bound by the understanding and agreement which they are alleged to have had with the electors preceding said election, and are therefore without legal authority to purchase a site or to construct school buildings which shall not adjoin the old school property.

Upon the trial objection was sustained to the introduction of any evidence upon the ground that the amended complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for injunction, and the case was ordered dismissed. This appeal is taken upon the judgment roll.

[1, 2] The contention which appellant urges most strongly is that prior to the election an understanding was entered into between the electors of the school district and the trustees that the proceeds of the bonds, if voted, would be used to purchase a site adjoining that of the school owned by the district. This proposition is not worthy of serious consideration. The law makes no provision for informal understandings of this character. On the contrary, the authorities cited by appellant expressly hold that the proposition submitted to the electors, and upon which bonds are voted, and which is later evidenced by the bonds themselves, constitutes a contract, and necessarily the only contract between the parties. In addition to this the electors may, if called together by the school board for the purpose of consultation, make recommendations as to the selection of the school site, which the board may not disregard. But there is no place in the entire procedure for understandings, except such as are expressed in the submission upon which the electors vote. None of the authorities cited by appellant upon this phase of the appeal sustain his position, but, as we have indicated, practically preclude the acceptance of this view. This is true of Peery v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 753, 203 Pac. 992, 19 A. L. R. 1044, and Hollywood High School Dist. et al. v. Keyes, 12 Cal. App. 172, 107 Pac. 129. In the instant case the amended complaint shows that the electors voted bonds for the purpose of "raising money for purchasing school lots," etc. It is nowhere alleged that the site to be purchased was more definitely designated, and this without doubt was a sufficient description to present the proposition to the voters.

[3] But the law expressly authorizes the school trustees to call a meeting of the electors of the district for purposes of consultation. This they did, specifying in the notice that the subject of the consultation should be "instructing the board of trustees with respect to the purchase of a school site and the erecting thereon of a schoolhouse." This notice sufficiently designated the matter to be considered and acted upon by the electors.

It informed everyone interested of the general subject to be discussed and determined. The meeting was held, and a resolution was adopted directing the board of trustees to purchase certain property, which action upon the part of the board the petitioner now seeks to enjoin. In addition to the argument based upon the claim that an understanding existed, to which we have adverted, it is further urged that neither the notice of the meeting held on January 13, 1922, nor the resolution adopted at that meeting specified that the school site to be purchased and the schoolhouse to be erected thereon were to be financed from the proceeds of the bonds which had been voted on July 12, 1921. We think this contention is devoid of merit. The record discloses that there was but one source supplying Clearwater school district with the funds needed for the purposes in question. The history of the entire proceedings as disclosed by appellant's amended complaint shows that all of the meetings which were held, of which the one held January 13th was the third, had to do with the disposition of the money derived from the sale of the bonds voted on July 12, 1921. In numerous cases cited by respondent language equally general in character embodied in notices for similar purposes was held sufficient. Among these are Sherman v. Torrey, 99 Mass. 472, 473; Dix v. School Dist. No. 2, 22 Vt. 309; South School Dist. v. Blakeslee, 13 Conn. 227.

[4] Appellant insists that the resolution adopted at the meeting of July 13, 1922, was void, because passed by only a majority of the electors present. It is claimed that to give the resolution validity as authority to bind the trustees it must have been passed by a two-thirds vote, because, it is asserted, the effect of the action taken would be to change the site of the school existing in the district. There is nothing in any fact alleged in the amended complaint which would justify the claim that the purchase of a new site and the erection of a new schoolhouse would result in the sale or abandonment of the one already maintained. Neither the proposition voted upon at the election nor the resolution adopted by the electors mentioned the disposition of any school property owned by the district.

It is further contended by appellant that the proposition authorized in the resolution just mentioned had been refused approval by the electors at two previous meetings called by the trustees. However, the amended complaint shows that both of the meetings which preceded that of January 13th were called for the purpose of considering the double question of the disposition of the present school site and the purchase of another, which joint proposition had been voted down; but the proposition for the meeting which was last held involved only the purchase of the new site, without any reference to the sale of the old one.

The judgment is affirmed.

ATKINS v. BOUCHET et al. (Civ. 4634.)

Municipal corporations — 705(10)—Pedestrian, injured by automobile, held guilty of contributory negligence.

One struck by an automobile, who, while crossing street, glanced neither to the right nor the left, and with an umbrella held down to her waist line had her view of traffic completely cut off, and did not see the automobile until after the collision, although the accident occurred in the middle of the day, held guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Anna D. Atkins against J. B. Bouchet, Charles White, and William Green, copartners doing business under the firm name of the Clean Cleaners, and Joseph H. Meiss. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and J. E. Reardon, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ostrander & Carey, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them for the sum of $2,600, damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, who was struck by an automobile owned by the defendant Bouchet and operated by defendant Joseph H. Meiss. The only issue upon the appeal is as to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff; appellants contending that, under the facts admitted by the plaintiff in her testimony, she was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and that the trial court erred in failing to grant defendants' motion for a nonsuit and in failing to direct a verdict in their favor.

We think the plaintiff in this case was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, and we base our conclusion upon the case of Finkle v. Tait, 55 Cal. App. 425, 203 Pac. 1031, reconsidered and approved by our Supreme Court in a most learned and comprehensive review of cases of this character. Burgesser v. Bullock's (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 649. The undisputed facts in the instant case show that the plaintiff, while crossing the street, glanced neither to the right nor the left, and with her umbrella held down to her waist line had her view of traffic on her left completely cut off, and did not see the automobile at any time until after the collision, although the accident occurred in the middle of the day. This situation makes peculiarly applicable the language of Finkle v. Tait, wherein it was said:

"There was evidence that he was carrying a box of raisins 23 inches long, 13 inches wide, and 10 inches thick on his shoulder, in such a position that it may have obscured his vision. If that was the case, then it was negligence for him to attempt to cross the street with his vision obstructed in that manner."

In the case of Burgesser v. Bullock's, supra, relied upon by the respondent, our Supreme Court said, in commenting upon the case of Finkle v. Tait, supra:

"We sustained the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal solely for the reason that the pedestrian was crossing the street without looking and under such circumstances that he could not see in the direction from which traffic might be expected."

The foregoing statement is precisely applicable to the situation disclosed, without conflict, in the instant case. On December 9, 1920, at about 2 o'clock p. m., the defendant Meiss, as employee of the defendant Bouchet, was driving a Ford delivery car for Bouchet in a westerly direction on the north or right-hand side of East Fourteenth street in the city of Oakland, Cal. East Fourteenth street, at this point, runs in a general easterly and westerly direction, and at right angles intersects Eighth avenue, which runs in a general northerly and southerly direction. As Meiss was thus traveling westerly on East Fourteenth street, he was proceeding at a speed variously estimated by the witnesses as from 15 to 25 miles an hour. As he approached Eighth avenue he was traveling in the roadway between the northerly street car rail on East Fourteenth street and the curb.

Plaintiff, just prior to the accident, according to her own testimony, had been walking in an easterly direction on the northerly sidewalk on East Fourteenth street with an umbrella well down over her head, to protect herself from the rain which was being blown from the east, thereby obstructing completely her view of west-bound vehicular traffic. She testified that when she was 2 or 3 feet from the corner, and just before turning to the south, she lifted her umbrella slightly and peeked beneath it in an easterly direction. She was near-sighted, but stated she could see to the east for a distance of about a block. As she glanced under her umbrella she saw no vehicles approaching from the east. She then stood at the corner and turned and faced in a southerly direction, with her left side to the east and toward the approaching west-bound travel, and with her umbrella well down over her head and toward the east. She stood in this position while the east-bound street car traveling on East Fourteenth street came to a stop and its passengers alighted. She estimated the time at about one or two minutes, and while appellants make the most of this, we think that matter is neither conclusive nor material.

It is beyond question that plaintiff stood at the corner during the time the street car was discharging its passengers and until it was about to start again, and that during all of that time she was either watching the street car or looking to the south across the street, and that she did not glance toward the east after "peeping" under her umbrella a few feet before she reached the corner, because she did not think it necessary. When the street car started up, plaintiff stepped from the curb, still without a glance to the east, from whence traffic was to be expected, and with her umbrella well down to protect her from the rain from the east, and proceeded in a southerly direction. Before she reached the car track she was struck by the rear end of the automobile, which, according to the testimony, skidded when the driver attempted to turn sharply to his left to avoid a collision with the plaintiff. Plaintiff did not know of the presence of the automobile upon the street until it struck her.

Under these facts, we see no escape from the rule applied in the case of Finkle v. Tait, supra. The judgment is reversed.

RICIOLI v. LYNCH et al. (Civ. 2651.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 24, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 21, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error §909(2) — Payment of annual fees for other purpose than use of road assumed in support of findings of ownership of easement by prescription.

It must be assumed, in support of findings that plaintiff was the owner and entitled to possession of an easement in a road over defendant's land by prescription, that annual fees paid were not for the use thereof but for the maintenance of gates as contended by plaintiff.

2. Easements §36(3)—Open and unmolested use of road for over 40 years held shown.

Evidence held sufficient to establish open, visible, continuous, and unmolested use of a road over another's land for more than 40 years before commencement of an action to quiet title to an easement therein.

3. Easements §36(1)—Open and unmolested use for requisite period presumed adverse and under claim of right.

It will be presumed that an open, visible, continuous, and unmolested use of a road over another's land, for more than 40 years before commencement of an action to quiet title to an easement therein, was under a claim of right, and adverse, and the burden is on the landowner, claiming that such user was permissive, to rebut such presumption.

4. Appeal and error §1001(1)—Court's determination as to insufficiency of rebuttal testimony held conclusive on appeal.

The court's determination that a prima facie case made by proof of open, visible, continuous, and unmolested use of a road for more than 40 years before commencement of an action to quiet title to an easement therein was not overcome by a witness' testimony as to what was said in a conversation between the parties' predecessors in title 45 years before the trial, when the witness was only 15 years old, held conclusive on appeal.

5. Licenses §58(3)—License to travel road held irrevocable.

Where landowners accepted a proposition of the owner of land, through which a road leading from their lands ran, to "come over and help gravel the road and all travel it," and worked for 2 or 3 months thereon with men and teams, the license became irrevocable.

6. Easements §7(2)—Adverse use of road for 5 years after license becomes irrevocable sufficient to establish title.

Adverse use of a road over another's land for 5 years, after a license to travel it became irrevocable, is sufficient to establish title by prescription.

7. Easements §48(6)—Right to use road held not affected by change in course.

That a tenant of one suing to quiet title to an easement in a road over another's land by prescription, and a tenant of the landowner, with the latter's permission, had recently changed the course of the road for a short distance to avoid a steep hill, held not to have affected plaintiff's right to use the road, including the new section.

8. Evidence §129(3)—Evidence of terms on which landowner gave right of way to others held admissible in subsequent user's action to quiet title.

While the terms on which a landowner gives another a right of way through his land is not, considered as an isolated fact, evidence that he made the same terms with a third person using the way, admission of testimony, in an action to quiet title by prescription to an easement in a road, that defendants' predecessor in title, who was dead, had proposed to the witness and others that they help gravel the road and all travel it, was not error, though plaintiff's predecessor, also deceased, was not present at the time, in view of evidence that he was included in the proposition, and, with the others, graveled the road, used it in common, made repairs as needed, and paid annual fees for maintenance of gates.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by A. Ricioli against J. A. Lynch and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Gil P. Hall, of Petaluma, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendants appeal.

The complaint alleges:

"That for more than 40 years last past continuously the predecessors in interest of plaintiff and this plaintiff have been and are now the owners and entitled to the possession of an easement which is annexed and appurtenant to the lands of plaintiff of a road leading from the said lands of plaintiff across the lands of defendants, and that the lands of the said defendants are subservient to the said way and easement, * * * (here follows a description of the road by courses and distances), and for more than 40 years last past the said way and easement has been open, laid out, and used by the plaintiff and his predecessors in interest continuously and under a claim of right and with right openly, notoriously, uninterruptedly, and adversely to the said defendants and their predecessors in interest and each and every one of them."

The answer denies the foregoing averments of the complaint, and alleges that the road is a private road maintained by the defendants "for their special and particular use and not otherwise," and that plaintiff and his predecessors in interest, upon payment of an annual fee of $10, have been allowed to use the road "by the permission and courtesy and consent" of defendants and their predecessors in interest and not otherwise. The court found in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, and, further, that for more than 5 years prior to the commencement of this action the plaintiff had used said road.

The defendants and their predecessors in interest, at all times herein mentioned, have owned two tracts of land, known as their upper and lower ranches. Since the year 1876 the plaintiff and his predecessors in interest have owned a large tract of land above defendants' lower ranch, and during all that time, up to October, 1921, have traveled the road in controversy. The road enters the lower ranch from a county road and runs past the defendants' residence up to that of plaintiff and to the residence on the upper ranch. The road has always been used also by defendants and their tenants and by a few others owning land above the lower ranch. The lands of defendants were owned by their father, John Lynch, at all times herein mentioned, up to his death in 1915, and defendants have been the owners thereof since. Plaintiff's land was acquired by Nick Nisson in the year 1876, and at his death in 1899 it passed to his heirs who, in 1913, sold the land to plaintiff. The road in controversy is about 3 miles in length, two miles thereof being below the Lynch residence on the lower ranch and 1 mile above. It was in existence from the residence down to the county road prior to the year 1876. In that year Nick Nisson put a gate in the line fence between his land and the lower ranch, since which time the road has been traveled for its entire length as stated. The course of the road is through adobe soil, and about 1887 or 1888 John Lynch requested the persons living above the lower ranch who used the road to help gravel it. One witness, Mark Harden, testified:

"Mr. Lynch himself came to all of us and asked us to come over and help gravel that road, and all travel it. And we went over there, and we worked that road, we worked for 2 or 3 months the first year with men and teams, and we graveled every bit of that road, Mr. Nisson and us, * * * and all of us turned out and traveled that road. * * * And we have traveled that road ever since, and we have worked it every year except the last couple of years, * * * and kept it up and kept it in good condition. * * * Mr. Nisson and myself and my brother, all of us, we went to Mr. Lynch and talked to him, and got him to put those patent gates up, and we agreed to pay so much a year towards keeping those gates up. * * * We settled on $5 a year on the start, and, as the gates grew older, Mr. Lynch charged us more. * * * I really never held any claim to the road, but still I always felt as though I had the right to travel it because I have done an awful lot of work on there. Three years ago we furnished men and horses for 2 weeks on that road to help fix it and haul gravel over it, and I always felt as though I was entitled to travel it, but I did not claim to own it. * * * Before this road was graveled we traveled through there; we hauled blocks through there 10 years before that, * * * without consent and without objection, and without paying anything, and without any opposition in the world. * * * I don't know of anybody that has ever asked permission, and I don't know of anybody that has been refused. As long as Mr. Lynch lived, he never said a word, and nobody else had ever said a word to me."

Other witnesses for plaintiff gave similar testimony. The evidence shows without conflict that plaintiff and his predecessors in interest and their tenants helped to gravel the road and keep it in repair.

Eric Nisson, a brother of Nick, testified that at one time Nick said he had "permission" to travel the road, had the "privilege to go through"; that witness did not know whether Nick said "he had the privilege to go through or the right to go through." Defendant J. A. Lynch, who was born in 1861, testified that in the year 1876 Nick Nisson "asked father's permission to go through and use the Lynch road, * * * and told him how he would care for the road and put in gates, and that father would suffer no loss from his going through. * * * He (Lynch) at last consented. * * *

And father says, 'Very well, Mr. Nisson, I will object to your hauling in the heavy season, for if I did, I would soon have no fields.' * * * He (Nisson) commenced (using the road) the second day afterwards. * * * He had to do a little work to get over the line fence, where he put in a gate. * * * Mr. Layton Harden and Mr. Mark Harden began to use it, I think in 1883 or 1884. Permission was first asked by Layton Harden, and a little while after that by Mark Harden. * * * I remember Mr. Thorp making blocks * * * on the Jeff Harden place * * * in the early '80s. * * * He used the Lynch road. * * * It was outside teams that were hauling the rock, * * * and father, for protection, charged for hauling the rocks, I think by the thousand." The witness further testified that he never heard his father say anything about using the road except to Nisson, as stated, but that the neighbors above the lower ranch who used the road paid an annual road fee for the privilege. Witnesses for plaintiff testified that such annual fees were not paid for the use of the road but for the maintenance of the patent gates. This annual fee was first fixed at $5 for each user of the road and later raised to $10, and after the death of John Lynch it was increased to $15 for at least some of the users.

[1-4] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings, in that it shows respondent and his predecessors in interest were mere licensees. It must be assumed in support of the findings that the annual fees referred to were paid for the maintenance of the gates and not for the use of the road. The evidence amply establishes that there was an open, visible, continuous, and unmolested use of the road for more than 40 years prior to the commencement of the action. As said in Fleming v. Howard, 150 Cal. 28, 30, 87 Pac. 908:

"Under these circumstances it will be presumed that the use was under a claim of right and adverse, and a prima facie title by prescription is thereby established. * * * 'A presumption that the use was under a claim of right and adverse arises from an undisputed use of an easement for the established period of prescription; and the burden is upon the party alleging that the use has been by virtue of a license or permission, to prove that fact by affirmative evidence. * * * Where an open and uninterrupted use of an easement for a sufficient length of time to create the presumption of a grant is shown, if the other party relies on the fact that these acts or any part of them were permissive, it is incumbent on such party, by sufficient proof, to rebut such presumption of a nonappearing grant; otherwise the presumption stands as sufficient proof, and establishes the right.' Jones on Easements, § 186."

[5, 6] The determination by the trial court that such prima facie case was not overcome by the testimony of a witness as to what was said in a conversation which took place 45 years before the trial, at a time when the witness was but 15 years of age, is conclusive on appeal. If it be contended that the proposition of John Lynch in 1887 or 1888 that the landowners above the lower ranch "come over and help gravel the road, and all travel it" constituted a mere permission to use the road, the obvious answer is that, when those persons accepted the proposition and worked for 2 or 3 months on the road with men and teams, the license became irrevocable. Miller & Lux v. Kern County, etc., Co., 154 Cal. 785, 99 Pac. 179; Stoner v. Zucker, 148 Cal. 516, 83 Pac. 808, 113 Am. St. Rep. 301, 7 Ann. Cas. 704; Irrigated Valleys L. Co. v. Altman, 57 Cal. App. 413, 207 Pac. 401; Stepp v. Williams, 52 Cal. App. 237, 193 Pac. 661. Adverse use for 5 years after the license thus became irrevocable is sufficient to establish title by prescription. Irrigated Valleys L. Co. v. Altman, supra; Cairns v. Haddock (Cal. App.) 212 Pac. 222; Myers v. Berven, 166 Cal. 484, 137 Pac. 260.

[7] A tenant of plaintiff and a tenant of defendants, with the permission and consent of defendants, recently changed the course of the road for a distance of about 200 yards to avoid a steep hill. It is not perceived that the plaintiff's right to use the road, including the new section, is affected by such change.

[8] Nick Nisson was not present when in 1887 or 1888 John Lynch proposed to Mark Harden and others that they "help gravel that road and all travel it" Appellant urges that it was prejudicial error to admit the testimony. Considered as an isolated fact, the terms upon which an owner of land gives one person a right of way through it is not evidence that he made the same terms with another person who is shown to have used the way. The fact in question here, however, was not isolated. From the whole testimony of the witness, and the subsequent conduct of all the parties concerned, it is apparent that Lynch had in mind the graveling and use of the road by all the neighbors above the lower ranch. After relating the conversation with Lynch, Harden testified as follows:

"Q. Did Mr. Lynch at that time mention Mr. Nisson? A. Yes. * * * He said: 'Now, supposing we all turn in, we are all neighbors here, and we all turn in and gravel this road of mine, and have one good road out.' And we said all right, we would do that, and he went to see Nisson, and the Nisson came out, and our team came out, and Mr. Lynch's teams came out, and we graveled that road."

The evidence shows that such neighbors, including Nisson, together with Lynch, graveled the road, used it in common, and made repairs thereon from year to year as needed, until the defendants closed it shortly before the trial. Nisson and his successors in interest paid the same annual fees for maintenance of the patent gates across the road as Harden and other neighbors. Nisson and Lynch are both dead, and there is no direct evidence of what was said when the latter went to see the former relative to graveling and using the road. Under such circumstances it was not error to admit the evidence of which complaint is made. It is not to be presumed that Nisson furnished men and teams for 2 or 3 months to gravel the road without some understanding as to his right to use it.

The judgment is affirmed.

PADDON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, et al. (Civ. 4790.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Dec. 21, 1923. Rehearing Denied Jan. 19, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 18, 1924.)

1. Certiorari §5(1)—No relief against mere error.

In certiorari proceedings, the single question involved is whether the lower court has exceeded its jurisdiction, and if not, no matter how grievously it erred to the prejudice of the petitioner either in matters of fact or in matters of law, relief cannot be given, the writ of review not being a writ of error.

2. Certiorari §68—Court bound by finding of fact on conflicting evidence.

In certiorari to review and annul an order of court directing issuance of warrant of attachment to answer for contempt in disobedience of a subpoena duly served, a finding of fact by the court as to the petitioner's residence, upon conflicting evidence, is binding.

3. Contempt §54(1)—Disobedience of subpoena held contempt in presence of court requiring no supporting affidavit.

Where defendant on date set by judge for taking of his deposition before such judge filed an affidavit admitting that he was served with a subpoena, and that he refused to attend because he came within the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. 1989, relating to attendance of witnesses outside of the county of residence, he thus placed himself in contempt, committed in the presence of the court, requiring no supporting affidavit, in view of sections 1209, par. 10, 1211, 1991.

4. Depositions §71—Defendant held not entitled to contend contempt proceedings for refusal to testify must fail because subpoena duces tecum void.

Defendant who refused to attend and testify at all in obedience to a subpoena issued under Code Civ. Proc. § 1985, requiring him not only to attend as a witness, but to produce certain documents, cannot contend that contempt proceedings must fail because subpoena duces tecum was void in that the affidavit upon which the order for taking the deposition was based made no showing of materiality, since the requirements of the statute as to attendance as a witness and as to bringing documents are severable, and he must purge himself of the contempt in refusing to testify before he can be heard to rely upon a secondary proposition.

Application by William Locke Paddon for certiorari to review an order of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Walter Perry Johnson, Judge, directing petitioner to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. Writ dismissed.

J. L. Smith, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Preston & Duncan, of San Francisco, and William Anthony Andrews, of Oakland, for respondents.

ST. SURE, J. This is a proceeding to review and annul an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco directing the issuance of a warrant of attachment to answer for contempt in disobedience of a subpoena duly served. Petitioner, together with several corporations, is defendant in two actions brought by his wife, Una Margaret Locke Paddon, to secure a divorce from him; also to set aside a certain property settlement agreement between the parties, and also to set aside certain alleged transfers of property to other defendants. Other defendants named are principally corporations of which, it is alleged, petitioner is the alter ego.

Petitioner alleges that he is a resident of Santa Cruz county, more than 50 miles distant from San Francisco; that on May 11, 1923, respondent judge, on affidavit of the attorney for plaintiff in said action, issued an order for the taking of the deposition of petitioner before himself at 4 o'clock p. m. May 21, 1923, and directing the clerk of the court to issue a subpoena commanding petitioner to appear before respondent court and testify in said action, and also requiring petitioner to produce books, records, etc., of said defendant corporations; that the subpoena was issued and served on petitioner the same day (May 11th); that on May 21st, and prior to the time set for the taking of the deposition, petitioner, by his attorney, served on the attorneys for plaintiff and on the respondent judge an affidavit showing that his residence was not in San Francisco, but at Palm Beach, Santa Cruz county; and thereupon petitioner declined to appear and testify in said cause; that thereafter, and on the same day (May 21st), respondent judge made an order directing the clerk to issue an attachment directed to the sheriff of any county in the state, directing that petitioner be attached and brought before respondent court to answer for his contempt in not obeying said subpoena and in refusing to testify and give his deposition in said cause; that on August 10, 1923, after notice to plaintiff, petitioner moved to set aside the order of May 21st on the ground of lack of jurisdiction of the court to order petitioner's appearance and the taking of his deposition.

From statements contained in the affidavits filed in the lower court, and part of the record before us, we gather the atmosphere of the case. It appears from the affidavit of W. A. Andrews, one of the attorneys of record for Mrs. Locke Paddon:

That defendant William Locke Paddon is a resident of the city and county of San Francisco; "that heretofore, on the 19th day of December, 1922, plaintiff duly gave notice of the taking of defendant Locke Paddon's deposition. * * * and, although subpoena issued forthwith upon the giving of said notice, yet, nevertheless, after due and diligent search and inquiry, the said defendant witness was not found until the 2d day of January, 1923, and thereafter, and on the 4th day of January, 1923, when said witness was directed by the said subpoena to appear, the said witness did not appear, but on the contrary wholly failed to attend said deposition or to obey said subpoena in any way or manner whatsoever, on the contrary disobeying said subpoena in every particular; that effort has continuously been made since the 4th day of January, 1923, to locate said defendant for the purpose of serving process upon him; * * * that affiant is informed and believes, and therefore alleges the fact to be, that said defendant is now and has been continuously for a period of months last past, in hiding, and concealing himself for the purpose of avoiding the giving of a deposition."

Under this affidavit the respondent court, on May 11, 1923, made the order for the subpoena in question here, which subpoena was issued and served upon the petitioner in the city and county of San Francisco on said 11th day of May. Upon the hearing to set aside the order of May 21st, petitioner filed five affidavits, two by himself, one each by his two brothers, and one by J. L. Smith, his attorney, each affiant stating upon oath that petitioner is a resident of Santa Cruz county. Mrs. Locke Paddon filed a "reply affidavit" in which she sets forth in detail the abodes of her husband in numerous hotels and apartment houses in San Francisco at various times during the past seven years. She also states that petitioner at one time adopted an alias for the purpose of concealing and hiding his identity so as to avoid the service of process upon him by the court; that on or about the 10th day of June, 1923, he "left the jurisdiction of this court and departed from the state of California to a foreign country, to wit, the province of British Columbia, Dominion of Canada, and ever since continued and now continues to remain away from the state of California and from the jurisdiction of this court, with the intent and purpose to avoid the service upon him of any and all orders or processes of this court." Mrs. Locke Paddon further states that her husband, petitioner herein, is the equitable owner and holder of all capital stock, and all the property and assets of the said defendant corporations. There are further similar allegations, all of which, of course, are denied by petitioner.

Upon said hearing, regularly had, respondent court denied the motion to set aside the order of May 21st upon which the attachment was issued, and said order is still in full force and effect.

Petitioner contends that the order in question is void because it seeks to compel him to give his deposition more than 50 miles from his place of residence, contrary to section 1989 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He asserts that the evidence contained in the affidavits presented at the hearing sustain such contention.

[1, 2] Nothing is better understood than that on this proceeding the single question involved is whether the lower court has exceeded its jurisdiction. If it has not, no matter how grievously it may have erred to the prejudice of the petitioner either in matters of fact or in matters of law, this writ will not afford an avenue of relief. White v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 60, 64, 42 Pac. 480, and cases cited therein. If the order is one which the court had power to make, it is not for us to inquire whether its power was properly exercised or not. The writ of review is not a writ of error. Von Roun v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 358. However, we may say in passing that the issue upon the question of petitioner's residence appears to have been determined by the respondent court upon conflicting evidence, when it denied the motion to set aside the order of May 21st and quash the attachment issued thereunder. The question was one of fact, and we are bound by the finding of the respondent court in that regard.

[3] Petitioner further contends that the order for attachment is void on its face. He calls our attention to section 1211, Code of Civil Procedure, providing that, where a contempt is not committed in the immediate presence of the court, an affidavit must be presented to the court or judge of the facts constituting the contempt. The section also provides that—

"When a contempt is committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, or judge at chambers, he may be punished summarily."

Section 1209, par. 10, Code of Civil Procedure, in its enumeration of the acts which are contempts, includes "disobedience of a subpoena duly served." Section 1991 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that disobedience to a subpoena may be punished as a contempt by the court issuing the subpoena. In his affidavit, filed on the date set by respondent judge for the taking of petitioner's deposition before said judge, petitioner admits that on the 11th day of May, 1923, he was served with a subpoena to appear before the respondent court on the 21st day of May, 1923, for the purpose of giving his deposition in said action in which he was a defendant. In his affidavit petitioner further said that the court had no jurisdiction to require his attendance for the purpose of taking his deposition because he came within the provisions of section 1989, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the attendance of witnesses outside of the county of residence, and he further said: "He declines to submit himself for the taking of said deposition." Petitioner thus placed himself in contempt. Thereupon respondent court made its order of May 21st stating the facts, and directing an attachment to issue "directing that said William Locke Paddon be attached and brought before this court to answer for his contempt in not obeying said subpoena," etc. Upon this order an "attachment for disobeying subpoena" was issued. Such procedure was proper. In his said affidavit presented to the court, petitioner stated that he refused to obey the subpoena. This was a contempt committed in the presence of the court requiring no supporting affidavit. Lamberson v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 458, 461, 91 Pac. 100, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 619. The procedure followed in the case last cited was similar to that adopted by respondent superior court herein. The Supreme Court, at page 461 of the opinion in Lamberson v. Superior Court, says:

"The court could have proceeded upon it summarily, or by citation to show cause—the course here adopted—and could have allowed a showing in defense, extenuation, or mitigation. * * * While conceding to the Legislature the fullest power in the matter of contempts to lay down rules of procedure, we repeat what was said in In re Shortridge, 99 Cal. 526, 34 Pac. 227, 37 Am. St. Rep. 78: 'No authority has been found which denies the inherent right of a court, in the absence of a limitation placed upon it by the power which created it, to punish as a contempt an act—whether committed in or out of its presence—which tends to impede, embarrass or obstruct the court in the discharge of its duties. It is a doctrine which is admitted in all its rigor by American courts everywhere. * * * It is founded upon the principle—which is coeval with the existence of the courts, and as necessary as the right of self-protection—that it is a necessary incident to the execution of the powers conferred upon the court, and is necessary to maintain its dignity, if not its very existence. It exists independent of statute. The legislative department may regulate the procedure and enlarge the power, but it cannot, without trenching upon the constitutional powers of the court, * * * fetter the power itself.'"

[4] The further contention is made that the contempt proceeding must fall because the subpoena duces tecum is void. It is argued that the affidavit upon which the order for taking the deposition is based makes no showing of materiality. Section 1985 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows:

"The process by which the attendance of a witness is required is a subpoena. It is a writ or order directed to a person and requiring his attendance at a particular time and place to testify as a witness. It may also require him to bring with him any books, documents, or other things under his control which he is bound by law to produce in evidence."

It will be noted that the section unequivocally provides that a person may be required to appear and testify as a witness. Then follows an additional provision that the subpoena may also require the person to bring with him any books, documents, etc. The two propositions are severable. It may well be that a court has no power to order the production of books and papers by one party to be used as evidence for the other party without an affirmative showing that they contain evidence that is competent and material to the cause of action or defense of the party requiring them (5 Cal. Jur. § 17), but here it appears the petitioner refused to appear and testify at all. He must purge himself of this contempt before he can be heard to rely upon a secondary proposition. Weeks v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 620, 203 Pac. 93.

We are of the opinion that the proceedings had in the court below, in the action entitled *Una Margaret Locke Paddon, Plaintiff, v. HUNTINGTON et al. v. PERRIN et al.

1. Mortgages ⇨534—Purchaser at foreclosure sale substituted for mortgage debtor subject to right of redemption.

In sales of real property on foreclosure of mortgage, the provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 700, that the purchaser is substituted to and acquires all the title and interest and claim of the judgment debtor is qualified by and subject to section 703, which provides that, if no redemption be made within 12 months after the sale, purchaser or his assignee is entitled to a conveyance, but judgment debtor shall have 12 months from date of sale to redeem.

2. Tenancy in common ⇨19(4)—Purchase by one tenant at sale under mortgage given by former owner inures to benefit of all.

Title cannot be acquired by an owner of an undivided interest in land against his cotenants by purchase at a foreclosure sale under a mortgage created by a former owner through whom tenants in common derive title.

3. Tenancy in common ⇨1—Other than as between cotenants tenancy in common is a single entity.

While several owners of shares of a tenancy in common have severable interests as between themselves, the entire tenancy constitutes a joint estate in all dealings affecting it as a whole, and other than among themselves it is a single entity.

4. Tenancy in common ⇨19(4)—Purchase by one tenant in common of equity of redemption from foreclosure sale held to inure to benefit of cotenants.

Since mortgage on estate held by tenancy in common applies to the property as a whole, and when foreclosed purchaser acquires title subject to equity of redemption as a whole, in absence of agreement between the tenants the relation of cotenants toward one another remains the same in respect to the interest remaining in them after foreclosure, as existed in the legal title out of which the equity of redemption arose, and where on foreclosure of the mortgage the mortgagee becomes the purchaser and assigns the certificate of sale, prior to the expiration of the period of redemption, to one of the tenants in common, the latter does not become the absolute owner of the right of redemption free and clear of the claims of his cotenants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Partition by Howard Huntington and others against Edward Perrin, Jr., and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Stuart M. Salisbury, of Los Angeles, and Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jefferson P. Chandler, C. P. Ward, of Los Angeles, Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, John F. Bowie, of New York City, and Jared How, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The plaintiffs sought partition of the real property involved in this action, alleging that they and the defendant E. E. Hewlett, trustee for Edward Perrin, Jr., and Edward Perrin, Jr., individually, were the owners and in possession as tenants in common of said property; that prior to the commencement of the action one J. C. Anderson had a mortgage thereon, given him by a common grantor of all the parties interested, which said mortgage was foreclosed by Anderson, and judgment rendered April 10, 1917; that a commissioner appointed pursuant to such judgment sold the property to the mortgagee on April 12, 1917, and the equity of redemption would expire 1 year thereafter. Plaintiffs averred that E. E. Hewlett, as trustee for Edward Perrin, Jr., had an interest in the equity of redemption to the extent of an undivided one-fifteenth interest in the fee of said property, and that plaintiffs Howard Huntington and Flora Dean Hobart had interests in the equity of redemption of eleven-fifteenths, and three-fifteenths, respectively; and alleged that it was for the best interest of the plaintiffs and the defendants that a partition be made as to the interest of E. E. Hewlett, trustee for Edward Perrin, Jr., and the interest of Edward Perrin, Jr., whatsoever it might be, as beneficiary under said trust; that it was not for the best interest of plaintiffs that the property be partitioned as between them, but that it should remain undivided, and that they continue to own their share as tenants in common.

Appellant answered, alleging that the plaintiffs and Hewlett, as his trustee, were not the owners or in possession as tenants in common or otherwise of said property, and denied that Hewlett's interest as his trustee was one-fifteenth, but alleged that such interest was three-fourteenths. By way of affirmative defense appellant alleged that since 1907 he had been, and at the time of answering herein was, the owner of an undivided three-fourteenths interest in and to all the real property described in the plaintiffs' complaint. The property here in controversy constitutes but a portion of the whole for which partition was sought, and it is not denied that appellant and the other parties were tenants in common from 1907 until the time of Anderson's foreclosure. Appellant alleged that on March 27, 1918, and prior to the expiration of the period of redemption from said foreclosure sale, Randolph V. Whiting, attorney for appellant, purchased from said Anderson the certificate of sale for the benefit of appellant, and that Whiting at the time of the trial of this action was the owner and holder of such certificate as his attorney and agent.

It is stated in the briefs on behalf of appellant that the uncontradicted evidence shows that the plaintiffs Huntington and Hobart and the defendant Hewlett, as trustee for Edward Perrin, Jr., were the owners of said property as tenants in common, and that appellant, in thus purchasing the certificate of sale prior to the period of redemption having expired, did so with the intention of holding it for himself, individually, and not for the benefit of any other person claiming to be interested therein.

The court found as to the property sold under foreclosure that it was the intention of said Edward Perrin, Jr., in so purchasing the certificate of sale from said J. C. Anderson to purchase the same for himself individually, and not to purchase the same for the benefit of himself and his former cotenants, and that said Whiting, as attorney and agent of said appellant, was at the time of the trial of the action the owner and holder of said certificate of sale. It was further found by the trial court that the plaintiff Huntington was the owner of an interest in said equity of redemption and said certificate of sale to the extent of an undivided nine-fifteenths interest in the fee thereof, and that the plaintiff Hobart was the owner of three-fifteenths interest in the fee thereof, and by a general finding it was held that said plaintiffs and the defendant Hewlett, trustee for appellant, are the owners of and in possession as tenants in common of the property described.

It is appellant's contention that there was no redemption of the property as provided by sections 701 and 702 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that both the legal and equitable title to the property vested in Anderson upon his purchase at the foreclosure sale, and that consequently no title remained in any of the parties as tenants in common. It is argued that, had Anderson held the certificate of sale until the period of redemption had expired, his title would have become absolute; that the tenancy in common had terminated with the sale of the property by Anderson, and therefore Randolph V. Whiting, as trustee for appellant, stands in Anderson's position as successor in interest.

Respondents contend that the purchase by appellant of the certificate of sale constituted no more than a redemption; that the purchaser at a foreclosure sale does not acquire the judgment debtor's title to the land, and can only do so by obtaining a sheriff's deed, as was provided by section 232 of the Practice Act, and now by section 703 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is argued that one tenant in common will not be permitted to purchase an outstanding incumbrance and assert it against his contents in interest, even though his design be so to do, but that he must hold it for the common benefit of all. Respondents admit that this general rule does not apply in the case of a judicial sale, but assert that this has reference to absolute sales, which convey the complete title, and not to sales made subject to redemption; that the former sever the relationship of cotenancy, whereas the latter is not a consummated sale during the period of redemption, and therefore do not affect tenants in common until the happening of a certain event.

The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relied upon by the respective parties recite that a redemptioner or judgment debtor may redeem from the purchaser at any time within 12 months after the sale upon conditions prescribed by the statute. The provisions which here control appear as subdivisions of section 703, and are as follows:

"If no redemption be made within twelve months after the sale, the purchaser, or his assignee, is entitled to a conveyance; or if so redeemed, whenever sixty days have elapsed, and no other redemption has been made, and notice thereof given, and the time for redemption has expired, the last redemptioner, or his assignee, is entitled to a sheriff's deed; but, in all cases, the judgment debtor shall have the entire period of twelve months from the date of the sale to redeem the property."

[1] It cannot be successfully contended that had appellant been the owner of the fractional interest of his cotenants he would have been unable to redeem from Anderson's foreclosure; nor is it claimed in his behalf that one of several tenants in common may not legally redeem for all the parties in interest. It is difficult to agree with appellant that his intention can be considered as the controlling factor in determining the issues in this case, and particularly as to whether or not the purchase by Anderson at the foreclosure sale destroyed the common character of the original tenancy, and enabled him to convey to appellant during the redemptionary period all the right, title and interest of the mortgagor. In proceedings of this kind, the provisions of section 700, Code of Civil Procedure, that "the purchaser is substituted to and acquires all the right, title, interest and claim of the judgment debtor," are qualified by and subject to the condition above quoted from section 703. Leet v. Armbruster, 143 Cal. 663, 667, 77 Pac. 653. This principle is one of long standing in California, and is so held in the cases cited by appellant. In Duff v. Randall, 116 Cal. 226, 48 Pac. 66, it is said that:

"The sale is simply a conditional one, which may be defeated by the payment of a certain sum by certain designated parties within a certain limited time. If not paid within the time the right to a conveyance becomes absolute without any further sale, or other act to be performed by anybody."

In Leaver v. Smith, 47 Cal. App. 476, 190 Pac. 1050, this court said:

"The effect of this provision is to confer upon the purchaser full title, except that within the ensuing period of 12 months after sale an equity of redemption is possessed by the judgment debtor. When the full period of 12 months has elapsed there no longer exists any equity in the judgment debtor; hence the purchaser becomes possessed of an absolute title at that time."

Appellant also cites McNutt v. Nuevo Land Co., 167 Cal. 459, 140 Pac. 6, holding:

"The effect of the foreclosure sale 'is of itself to extinguish the right and claim of all the defendants in the action acquired subsequent to the date of the mortgage, and to vest in the purchaser the title of the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage, discharged of all such right and claim.' * * * It is only when the judgment debtor redeems that the effect of the sale is terminated and he is restored to his estate."

But by the latter statement the opinion so qualifies the beginning of the quotation as to leave its entire purport in harmony with other decisions, and in effect to say that a purchaser's title is not absolute, but subject to the mortgagor's right to redeem, and to be entirely divested thereby. Appellant furnishes no authority nor are we able to find one holding that a purchaser at foreclosure sale acquires the absolute title.

[2] Appellant insists that the tenancy in common was terminated by the sale to Anderson, citing Smith v. McNutt, 156 Cal. 769, 106 Pac. 70, and McNutt v. Nuevo Land Co., supra. The former recognizes the general equitable principle "applicable in such cases as those of joint tenants, tenants in common, and generally persons placed in a situation of trust or confidence," that "it is not consistent with good faith, nor with the duty which the connection of the parties, as claimants, of a common subject, created, that one of them should be able, without the consent of the other, to buy in an outstanding title and appropriate the whole subject to himself and thus undermine and oust his companion," and holds that the one acquiring such outstanding title will not be allowed to retain it for his own exclusive benefit. The Supreme Court points out, however, that such relationship did not there exist. In the second case cited the same rule is recognized, but it is said that under the trust there in controversy there was no community or privity of interest between the beneficiaries.

Respondents quote in their brief from decisions of the Supreme Court as to the nature of a purchaser's estate acquired at foreclosure sale, both under the Practice Act and under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that the dry, naked, legal title remains in the judgment debtor, with authority in the sheriff to divest it by execution of a deed to the purchaser. But we are not cited to any case in this state wherein the question of the effect upon the interest of tenants in common of a foreclosure of an incumbrance created by their predecessor in interest was involved. However, it has been settled by the courts of many other states, and with but the single exception of Jackson v. Baird, 148 N. C. 29, 61 S. E. 632, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 591, the authorities unanimously hold that title cannot be acquired by the owner of an undivided interest in land against his cotenants at a sale under a mortgage created by a former owner through whom tenants in common derived title. McPheeters v. Wright, 124 Ind. 560, 24 N. E. 734, 9 L. R. A. 176; Tisdale v. Tisdale, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 596, 64 Am. Dec. 775; Oliver v. Hedderly, 32 Minn. 455, 21 N. W. 478; Moy v. Moy, 89 Iowa, 511, 56 N. W. 668; Barnes v. Boardman, 152 Mass. 391, 25 N. E. 623, 9 L. R. A. 571; Montague v. Selb, 106 Ill. 49; Savage v. Bradley, 149 Ala. 169, 43 South. 20, 123 Am. St. Rep. 30; Richards v. Richards, 75 Mich. 408, 42 N. W. 954; Wyatt v. Wyatt, 81 Miss. 219, 32 South. 317; Dillinger v. Kelley, 84 Mo. 561; Knolls v. Barnhart, 71 N. Y. 474; Carpenter v. Carpenter, 131 N. Y. 101, 29 N. E. 1013, 27 Am. St. Rep. 569.

In McPheeters v. Wright, supra, the Supreme Court of Indiana quotes with approval from the opinion of Chancellor Kent in Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 409, as follows:

"I will not say, however, that one tenant in common may not, in any case, purchase in an outstanding title for his exclusive benefit. But when two devisees are in possession, under an imperfect title, derived from their common ancestor, there would seem naturally and equitably, to arise an obligation between them, resulting from their joint claim and community of interests that one of them should not affect the claim to the prejudice of the other. It is like an expense laid out upon a common subject, by one of the owners, in which all are entitled to the common benefit, on bearing a due portion of the expense. It is not consistent with good faith, nor with the duty which the connection of the parties, as claimants of a common subject created, that one of them should be able, without the consent of the other, to buy in an outstanding title, and appropriate the whole subject to himself, and thus undermine and oust his companion. It would be repugnant to a sense of refined and accurate justice. It would be immoral, because it would be against the reciprocal obligation to do nothing to the prejudice of each other's equal claim, which the relationship of the parties, as joint devisees, created. Community of interest produces a community of duty, and there is no real difference, on the ground of policy and justice, whether one cotenant buys up an outstanding incumbrance or an adverse title to disseize and expel his cotenant. It cannot be tolerated, when applied to a common subject in which the parties had equal concern, and which created a mutual obligation, to deal candidly and benevolently with each other, and to cause no harm to their joint interests."

"The general rule is that a cotenant's purchase of an outstanding title inures to the benefit of all, whether the several interests of the different tenants accrue under the same instrument, under different instruments, or by acts of law, and in some states this rule seems to apply, however the tenancy may have been formed, whatever the relation of the cotenants with each other may have been and from whatever source the outstanding title may have been acquired." In addition to the authorities cited already, the following are cited: Clements v. Cates, 49 Ark. 242; Olney v. Sawyer, 54 Cal. 379; Boskowitz v. Davis, 12 Nev. 446; Grimm v. Wicker, 80 N. C. 343; Threadgill v. Redwine, 97 N. C. 241; Page v. Branch, 97 N. C. 97; Braintree v. Bottles, 6 Vt. 395; Rountree v. Denison, 59 Wis. 522. * * * Our own state is in accord with the general rule. Wilson v. Peelle, 78 Ind. 384; Bender v. Stewart, 75 Ind. 88; Elston v. Piggott, supra. [94 Ind. 14.]"

[3, 4] It is elementary that, while the several owners of the shares of a tenancy in common have severable interests as between themselves, the entire tenancy constitutes a joint estate in all dealings affecting the tenancy in common as a whole, and other than among themselves, it is a single entity. The mortgagor has not dealt with the shares constituting the tenancy in common separately; the mortgage applies to the property as a whole, and the tenancy in common as a whole. When the mortgage is foreclosed the purchaser also acquires his title, subject only to an equity of redemption in the whole. No holder of a fractional interest in the tenancy in common could come forward and offer to pay his share and demand a redemption of a proportional part of the property from the mortgage. The entire amount due and to which the purchaser is entitled in order that a redemption may be accomplished must be paid. Again, before foreclosure the tenancy in common held the legal title to the property, and any benefit secured for the estate inured to the benefit of all cotenants. The equity of redemption can have no other source than the former legal title from which it sprang. Having that source, it follows that, in the absence of agreement between the parties or some statutory provision of law to the contrary, the relation of the cotenants toward one another remains the same in respect to the interest remaining in them after foreclosure called the equity of redemption, as existed in the legal title out of which that equity arose. If before foreclosure an outstanding interest of any kind acquired by one of the tenants in common would inure to the benefit of the entire estate, it necessarily follows that the same rule would apply after foreclosure and as long as any vestige of the joint estate, known as the tenancy in common, remain.

It results, therefore, that the tenants in common were not disseised of their respective interests in the right of redemption by the foreclosure sale, and that appellant is not the absolute owner free and clear of the claims of his cotenants.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

HALTERMAN et al. v. FELLENCER et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 31, 1923.)

1. Adoption ⇨10—Jurisdiction of adoption proceedings acquired when statutory requirements complied with.

A court acquired jurisdiction of adoption proceedings where all the jurisdictional facts required by statute in force at the time of the adoption were shown.

2. Evidence ⇨82—Proceedings of inferior court presumed proper when jurisdiction acquired.

When jurisdiction has been acquired by an inferior court, all proceedings in the exercise thereof are presumed to have been lawfully done, unless the contrary is shown.

3. Evidence ⇨89—Presumption of similarity of laws between different states held rebutted.

Proof that a statute of another state was the only law on a particular subject held to rebut the presumption of similarity existing between the laws of the different states.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1051(4)—Admission of parol evidence to prove adoption, if error, held harmless.

Where the validity of adoption proceedings were contested, and the record evidence of the adoption was complete, and nothing was presented to overcome such proof, admission of parol evidence to prove the adoption, if error, was harmless.

5. Adoption ⇨21—Natural relation of parent and child not restored upon death of adopting parent.

The death of the adopted parent prior to that of the natural parent does not restore the natural relation of parent and child so as to enable the child to inherit from the natural parent, there being nothing in the statute relating to adoption, which limits the effect of the adoption to the period of the lives of the adopting parent and the adopted child.

6. Trial ⇨377(2)—Granting, after setting aside order of submission, held not error.

In proceedings for the distribution of a decedent's estate, the court did not err, after the case had been argued and ordered submitted, in setting aside the order of submission and in granting a continuance for the introduction of additional evidence, where it did not appear that the rights of the defendants were in any manner affected by the course pursued, except that it permitted plaintiffs to produce evidence material to the issues involved.

7. Adoption ⇨21—Testator's omission to provide for children of adopted daughter in will held not to entitle them to inherit from him.

Where the will of testator failed to mention the children of his only daughter who had been legally adopted by others prior to his death, such omission would not, by reason of

Civ. Code, § 1307, entitle her children, she being still living, to inherit his estate, they not being the "issue of any deceased child," and, since their right of succession came through their mother, and her right to inherit decedent's estate was lost by adoption, her children had no such right.

Hunsicker, his wife, and their only child, Stella May Hunsicker, then of the age of about 3 years, were residents of Monroe county, Pa., as was also Andrew S. Hinton. In that year, by a proceeding in the court of common pleas in that county, and with the consent of the parents of the child, Hinton duly adopted said Stella May Hunsicker as his child and heir, the decree of the court providing "that the said child shall assume the name of Stella May Hinton, and have all the rights of a child and heir of the said Andrew S. Hinton, and be subject to the duties of a child." It appears from the record, at least inferentially, that Hinton was married and living with his wife at the time of the adoption proceedings. It does not appear whether she consented to the adoption by her husband of the child. The child lived with the Hintons as their adopted child until her marriage in the year 1902 to Ralph A. Halterman. Mary E. Halterman and Ralph A. Halterman, hereinafter mentioned, are the only issue of such marriage. The Hintons had no child of their own blood, and, from certain evidence admitted in the instant case, it is to be inferred that upon their deaths Mrs. Halterman succeeded to the estates of her adopted parents.

Hunsicker and his wife were divorced, whether before or after the adoption proceedings does not appear. He came to California, where he died November 25, 1918, leaving an estate consisting of personal property of the appraised value of $5,535.52, situate in this state. By his last will, executed in this state, he gave all of his property to strangers in blood, except $1 each to his brothers and sisters. The will does not mention Mrs. Halterman or her children, nor does it contain any language to indicate that the omission to mention them was intentional.

In due course of administration a petition for distribution of the estate was filed by the beneficiaries under the will, whereupon Mrs. Halterman appeared in opposition to the petition, and prayed that the whole estate be distributed to her as a pretermitted child and the only surviving child of decedent. A separate opposition was filed by the guardian ad litem of the two Halterman children, alleging that their mother "was adopted in the state of Pennsylvania in the year 1884," and praying that the whole estate be distributed to them as the pretermitted grandchildren of decedent. The court found in favor of the beneficiaries under the will, and distributed the estate to them. Both Mrs. Halterman and the guardian ad litem of her children have appealed.

[1-3] In support of the appeal of Mrs. Halterman it is urged that "there is an utter and complete lack of some of the jurisdictional facts required" in the adoption proceedings; that it does not appear that Hinton was 10 years older than the child adopted, that his wife gave her consent to the adoption, or that any of the parties to the proceedings were residents of the county where such proceedings were had. The written assent of Hunsicker to the adoption, duly acknowledged by him, recites that he and Hinton were both residents of Monroe county, Pa. This written assent was attached to the verified petition of Hinton, which recited that he and Hunsicker were both residents of Monroe county, and that the petition was signed by Emma J. Hunsicker, and prayed for a decree of adoption. This petition was signed by Emma J. Hunsicker. The decree recites that it was made "with the consent of the parents of said Stella May Hunsicker." The foregoing are the only jurisdictional facts required by the Pennsylvania statute in force at the time of the adoption, as appears by the evidence introduced at the hearing herein in the trial court. A witness for the beneficiaries under the will testified that the following law was the "only one pertaining to adoption" in force in the state of Pennsylvania at the time of the adoption:

"That it shall be lawful for any person desirous of adopting any child as his or her heir * * * to present his or her petition to such court in the county where he or she may be resident, declaring such desire, and that he or she will perform all the duties of a parent to such child; and such court, if satisfied that the welfare of such child will be promoted by such adoption, may, with the consent of the parents or surviving parent of such child, * * * decree that such child shall assume the name of the adopting parent, and have all the rights of a child and heir of such adopting parent, and be subject to the duties of such child, of which the record of the court shall be sufficient evidence. Provided, that if such adopting parent shall have other children, the adopted shall share the inheritance only as one of them in case of intestacy; and he, she or they shall respectively inherit from and through each other, as if all had been the lawful children of the same parent." Act Pa. May 4, 1855, § 7 (P. L. 431).

It will be observed that the statute contains no provision to the effect that the adopting parent must be 10 years older than the child adopted, and, if it did so provide, it would not be a violent assumption, after the lapse of so many years, that Hinton was more than 13 years of age when he adopted the 3-year old child. The statute is silent, also, as to whether the consent of the adopting parent's spouse is necessary. Proof that the statute quoted was the only Pennsylvania law on the subject of adoption in the year 1884 rebuts any presumption that the laws of that state were the same as those of California relative to the respective ages of the adopting parent and the child adopted or to the necessity of a wife's consent to an adoption by her husband. Whether or not the construction given the statute by the courts of Pennsylvania is other than persuasive, it may be interesting to note that the decisions of that state seem to recognize that one parent may adopt a child without the consent of the other. In re Carroll's Estate, 219 Pa. 440, 68 Atl. 1038, 123 Am. St. Rep. 673; Nulton's Appeal, 103 Pa. 286. Since everything required by the statute is made to appear, it must be held that the court acquired jurisdiction. When jurisdiction has been acquired by an inferior court, "all proceedings in the exercise thereof are presumed to have been lawfully done, unless the contrary is shown." Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 458, 177 Pac. 288.

[4] It is contended that the court committed error in admitting parol evidence to prove the adoption. The record evidence of the adoption was complete, and nothing was presented to overcome such proof. The necessary conclusion from such evidence is that the child was regularly adopted by Hinton, and, since the exclusion of the parol evidence could not have changed the result, its admission, if error, was harmless.

[5] It is urged that upon the death of Hinton the natural relation of parent and child between Hunsicker and Mrs. Halterman was restored, and that therefore, upon the subsequent death of Hunsicker, Mrs. Halterman became his sole heir. In support of this contention the dissenting opinion in Estate of Jobson, 164 Cal. 312, 318, 128 Pac. 938, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062, is cited. The majority opinion and the decision of the court in that case, however, are contrary to appellant's contention. In the majority opinion, page 317 of 164 Cal., 128 Pac. 938, 939 (43 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1062), it is said:

"There is nothing in the statute which limits the effect of the adoption to the period of the lives of the adopting parent and the adopted child. To sustain the appellant's contention, we should have to hold that, although the relation of parent and child, existing between him and the decedent, was supplanted by the new relation created by the adoption, it was again revived by the death of the foster parent. Such a holding would be to make, rather than to construe, a statute."

The same observation may be made relative to the Pennsylvania statute in question.

[6] After the case had been argued and ordered submitted, the court of its own motion set the submission aside "for the purpose of allowing either side to introduce further evidence." Thereafter several continuances were granted and additional evidence was introduced, all over the objections of appellants. It is urged that the court erred in so setting aside the order of submission and in granting such continuances. It does not appear that the rights of appellants were in any manner affected by the course pursued, except that it permitted respondents to produce evidence material to the issues involved. Appellants' contention is without merit. Badover v. Guaranty Trust, etc., Bank, 186 Cal. 775, 200 Pac. 638.

[7] It is contended that the Halterman children are the legal heirs of decedent, and that, since they are not mentioned in the will, they are entitled to have the estate distributed to them under the provisions of section 1307 of the Civil Code. That section provides:

"When any testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, such child, or the issue of such child, has the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate."

These children are not "the issue of any deceased child," their mother being now living. It is argued that "the logical reasoning for the courts to pursue would be to hold that the adopted child would be considered civilly dead so far as the rights of her children are concerned." To so hold would be to make a statute rather than to construe the one made by the Legislature. Appellants say that adoption proceedings have "nothing to do whatever with the rights of any persons except parties to the adoption proceedings, that is, the natural parents, the adoptive parents and the child." If by this statement it is intended to imply that the children of an adopted child are not heirs of the adoptive parent, it may be said in reply that the courts have held to the contrary. Estate of Winchester, 140 Cal. 468, 74 Pac. 10; In re Darling, 173 Cal. 221, 225, 159 Pac. 606. A statute of Pennsylvania, enacted in 1889 (P. L. 168), provided, as does the statute herein quoted, that an adopted child "shall have all the rights of a child and heir of such adopting parent." In construing that statute, it was held that it invested the adopted child with the right to become the heir at law of the adopting parent, including the right of succession in the children of such adopted child. In re Webb's Estate, 250 Pa. 179, 95 Atl. 419. Since the Halterman children's alleged right of succession comes through their mother, it seems to follow logically that if their mother did not have the right to inherit the decedent's estate the children did not have the right.

McFEELY v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 4502.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Dec. 21, 1923.)

1. Master and servant §417(4)—Objection to evidence in compensation proceedings held too late on review.

In proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act, it is too late on application for writ of review to annul an award to complain that letters and reports admitted in evidence by the Industrial Accident Commission were inadmissible.

2. Trial §76—Objection must be made known to tribunal at time it is sought to be introduced.

A party who considers making an objection to the admission of testimony must make such objection known to the court or tribunal before whom such evidence is sought to be introduced at the time it is offered by the opposite party.

3. Master and servant §404—Letters and reports held admissible in compensation proceeding.

In a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission, evidence of physicians and X-ray specialists in the form of letters and written reports are admissible, in view of Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, § 19, subd. (c), and section 60, subd. (a).

4. Evidence §574—Positive testimony of physicians as to cause of death held not conclusive against opinions of others.

Positive testimony of physicians, in proceeding for compensation, who made autopsy that decedent's lungs were normal and free from disease, and that death resulted from cancer in vertebra, was not conclusive against opinions of other physicians who were not present at the autopsy that death resulted from cancer in lungs.

5. Trial §143—Weight of expert testimony for jury or trial court.

When there is a conflict between scientific testimony and testimony as to facts, the jury or trial court must determine the relative weight.

6. Master and servant §405(4)—Finding death did not result from injury held sustained by evidence in compensation case.

In proceeding to obtain compensation for death of employee, a finding that death did not result from injury complained of held sustained by evidence.

Writ of review to annul an order of Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding by Effie McFeely, under the Workmen's Compensation Act to obtain compensation for the death of John H. McFeely her husband, opposed by the Federal Construction Company, the employer. There was an award, and the applicant petitions for writ of review to annul the order. Award affirmed.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Petitioner seeks by this proceeding to have annulled an award of the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California, the respondent herein, made on the 13th day of June, 1923. Said award was based upon findings of said Commission made on the date thereof, and thereafter amended by said Commission on August 1, 1923, at which latter date said award of June 13, 1923, was confirmed. Petitioner is the surviving wife of John H. McFeely, deceased. The latter was in the employ of the Federal Construction Company on or about the 20th day of July, 1922, on which date the Commission finds that he "sustained an injury arising out of and in the course of said employment, consisting of a bruise upon the left side in the region of the tenth rib, from the blow of a short bar." The Commission also found that the employer had legal notice of said injury, but that said injury caused no disability. By finding 4, the Commission further found:

"The employee worked continuously from and after the date of said injury to and including the 30th day of September, 1922, at which time he became ill, and was later found to be suffering from metastatic carcinomæ of the liver and spine, which condition proximately caused his death on the 30th day of January, 1923, but the evidence herein is insufficient to establish as a fact that said disease or death were in any wise proximately or at all caused or exacerbated by the aforesaid injury."

The proceeding before the Commission was instituted by the said John H. McFeely and Effie McFeely, his wife, on December 8, 1922, for the purpose of obtaining an award for compensation during the period of disability alleged to have been caused by said injury. A hearing therein was held on January 4, 1923, at which time the testimony of the said John H. McFeely and his wife, Effie McFeely, and other witnesses was taken. The further hearing therein was continued for the purpose of securing additional medical testimony and to determine the insurance carried by the said employer. On February 23, 1923, the hearing was resumed before the Commission. In the meantime the said John H. McFeely had died. Prior to his death he had been examined by a number of physicians and X-ray pictures had been taken of his lungs, back, and other parts of his body. His death occurred on January 30, 1923, on which day an autopsy was made by Doctors Veon and McLean. The testimony of one witness at the hearing was taken on February 23, 1923, and a further continuance was then had until March 23, 1923, when a final hearing was held. At this hearing, after the appointment of Mrs. McFeely as the guardian ad litem of her minor children, and an order made joining said children as parties to the proceeding, the two doctors who performed the autopsy gave their testimony, and written reports were received in evidence from a number of other doctors and X-ray specialists, to whom had been submitted the history of decedent's case, together with the X-ray pictures heretofore mentioned, and which had been previously taken of the decedent's lungs, back, and other portions of his body.

Doctors Veon and McLean testified at the final hearing that the autopsy showed that the decedent's lungs were free from any disease. They found, however, that the second lumbar vertebra had been almost destroyed by a cancer, and that the liver was affected by the same diseased condition. They gave as their opinion that the cancer of the vertebra was the result of the blow received by the deceased on July 20, 1922; that it was a primary cancer, while the cancer in the liver was metastatic, that is, it was caused by, and was secondary to, the cancer in the spine. The conclusion of these physicians was that the death of the deceased was directly and proximately the result of the injury received by him on July 20, 1922.

On the other hand, the other physicians and X-ray specialists to whom had been submitted the history of decedent's case, and who had examined the X-ray pictures of his lungs, back and other portions of the body taken prior to his death, and whose evidence was before the Commission only in the form of letters and written reports, were of the opinion that the injuries received by the deceased on July 20, 1922, contributed in no way to the development of the cancer found at the second lumbar vertebra, and was not directly or indirectly the cause of decedent's death. In the main they gave as their opinion that the decedent died of a cancer in the left lung, and that the cancers in the spine and liver were secondary, and were caused by and resulted from the primary cancer in the lung. In this opinion they were in a measure corroborated by Dr. Moore, who examined the decendent a short time prior to his death, and who assisted in taking the X-ray pictures. Dr. Young, who acted with Dr. Moore in making the examination of the patient and in the taking of the X-ray pictures testified that he found a diseased condition of the lung, and that he could not connect the injury of July 20th with the lung condition. Further than this he expressed no opinion as to the cause of the patient's ailment.

Petitioner now seeks to have said award annulled, upon the ground that there was no evidence before the Commission to support the same. It is first contended by petitioner that the only legal evidence before the Commission as to the cause of decendent's death was that of Doctors Veon and McLean, who performed the autopsy, and who testified that they found the lungs normal and free from any disease, but that they found cancers in the spine and liver of said deceased, which caused his death, and that the cancer in the spine was a primary cancer, and was the direct result of the injury of July 20th; that this testimony was opposed by certain incompetent testimony contained in letters and reports erroneously admitted in evidence at the hearing before the Commission. In other words, that the only conflict in the evidence was that between the legal and competent evidence submitted by the petitioner, and the illegal and incompetent evidence admitted in behalf of the defendants in the proceeding before the Commission.

[1, 2] The record in this proceeding discloses the fact that these letters and reports were admitted in evidence without any objection on the part of petitioner herein and without any request on her part to cross-examine the authors of said letters and reports. In view of this fact, the objection, now made by the petitioner for the first time, that said letters and reports are incompetent comes too late, and cannot be taken advantage of by her in this court. No rule of procedure is more firmly established than that which requires a party who considers making an objection to the admission of testimony to make such objection known to the court or tribunal before whom such evidence is sought to be introduced, at the time it is offered by the opposite party. It would be manifestly unfair and unreasonable to permit one party to remain silent, and by his silence to tacitly acquiesce in a proceeding, and thereafter to allow him, after an adverse decision, to nullify this decision by insisting upon an objection which he refused to make when the opportunity was afforded him at the original hearing. This rule is too well known to require any citation of authorities, and applies with equal force both to trials in courts and proceedings before special tribunals, similar to the respondent herein.

[3] What we have said in answer to this contention of respondent has been under the assumption that the objectionable testimony was incompetent, and therefore should not, had a proper objection been made thereto, have been admitted by the Commission. We think, however, that there cannot be any question of the competency of this testimony in the light of the statutory law and decisions of this state. Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, § 19, subd. (c), and section 60, subd. (a) Stats. 1917, pp. 849, 871; Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 174 Cal. 315, 163 Pac. 60; Employees' Liability Assurance Corporation v. Industrial Accident Commission, 179 Cal. 432, 443, 177 Pac. 273; Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 180 Cal. 497, 499, 81 Pac. 788.

[4] The further contention is made by the petitioner that this evidence, although competent, is not sufficient to raise a conflict in the testimony as against the positive, undisputed evidence in behalf of petitioner. The testimony of Doctors Veon and McLean, who performed the autopsy, as we have already seen, was that decendent's lungs were normal and were free from disease. As opposed to this testimony, we have the opinions of the doctors and X-ray specialists that decendent at the time of his death had a cancer in his left lung, and that his death was due primarily to this condition of the lung. They based their whole theory that decendent's death was not the result of the injury received by him on July 20, 1922, upon the fact that he had a cancer in the left lung. Petitioner claims that the positive testimony of the two physicians who performed the autopsy that no cancer was found in the lungs effectually and conclusively establishes that fact as against the mere opinions of the doctors and specialists who were not present at the autopsy, and whose testimony therefore would be nothing more than a conclusion.

[5] This question seems to be conclusively decided against petitioner by the decisions of this state. When there is a conflict between scientific testimony and testimony as to facts the jury or trial court must determine the relative weight. 10 Cal. Juris. p. 972.

In the late case of Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, at page 469, 191 Pac. 913, 914, we find the law upon this subject enunciated as follows:

"Whatever the individual opinion as to the value of expert testimony, it has been clearly settled in this state that, as regards the preference or weight to be given the testimony in any particular case, the law makes no distinction between expert testimony and evidence of other character, and that, when there is a conflict between scientific testimony and testimony as to the facts, the jury, or trial court, must determine the relative weight of the evidence. Estate of Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 89 Am. St. Rep. 135, 68 Pac. 827; Watson v. Watson, 58 Mich. 507, 25 N. W. 497."

The case of Rolland v. Porterfield, supra, is cited with approval in the Estate of Nelson (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 368.

[6] In view of these decisions of our Supreme Court we are constrained to hold that there was a conflict in the evidence as to the cause of decedent's death, and the Commission having found that the injury received by him from the blow on the spine was not the cause of his death, the award must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

In re LITTLE'S ESTATE.

LITTLE et al. v. CURSON.

(Civ. 4246.)

1. Wills ⚡278—Petition for revocation held sufficient to charge undue influence.

A petition to set aside a will, while not directly alleging that it was procured by undue influence, was sufficient to justify submission of questions as to undue influence and instructions thereon, where facts and circumstances were set out which, if true, would be tantamount to a direct allegation of undue influence; it appearing that defendant so considered such allegations, and that the case was tried on the theory that undue influence was alleged.

2. Wills ⚡384—Proponent could not complain of failure to submit issue of fraud in will contest where issue of undue influence found adversely to her.

Where a will was attacked on the ground of undue influence and of fraud, and the issue of undue influence alone was submitted to the jury, which found in favor of the contestant, proponent could not complain of failure to submit also the issue of fraud, since a finding for contestant on either issue would be fatal to the validity of the will.

3. Wills ⚡166(1)—Finding of undue influence sustained.

In a contest of a will executed by testatrix when she was 89 years old, and of a codicil executed when testatrix was 94 years old, the ground of contest being undue influence exerted by her daughter and her attorney, and it appearing that testatrix was alone and of limited education and of practically no business experience, held, that the finding of undue influence was sustained by the evidence.

4. Wills ⚡333, 384—Form of verdict finding undue influence in will contest held not contrary to statute.

Where a will and codicil were contested on the ground of undue influence, a form of verdict requiring answers by the jury as to whether the instruments were procured by the undue influence of four persons named or either or any of such persons, was not in violation of Code Civ. Proc. § 1314, as failing to find that the undue influence of a particular named individual had been exerted; proponent not having objected to the form of the questions, and objection, even if meritorious, being too late when first made on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Proceedings by Samuel M. Little and others against Anna F. Curson, executrix of the last will and testament of Mary D. Little, deceased, to contest the will. From an order vacating an order admitting the will to probate, and from an order denying a new trial and refusing to vacate judgment, the executrix appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied; Myers, J., disqualified.

Randall, Bartlett & White, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clement L. Shinn and John L. Fleming, both of Los Angeles, and Percy Hight, of Long Beach, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment vacating and setting aside an order admitting to probate the will of Mary D. Little, deceased, and from an order denying a new trial, and also from an order refusing to vacate and set aside said judgment.

The contest of said will was instituted by respondents, and was based upon fraud, unsoundness of mind, and undue influence of Anna F. Curson, Samuel T. Curson, Albert E. Curson and W. I. Foley. At the conclusion of respondents' testimony and upon their motion the court dismissed the contest as to the issue of unsoundness of mind of decedent.

Mary D. Little died February 3, 1920, at Los Angeles, California. At the time of her death she was, and for many years prior thereto had been, a resident of said city. She left surviving her as her heirs at law the appellant, Anna F. Curson, her daughter; and the respondents Samuel M. Little, her son, and Victor Thompson, Mary L. Knapp, Ruby Harris, Jane R. Spencer, Adah F. Dolson, and Emma J. Held, grandchildren of said deceased and children of her deceased daughter, Mary M. Thompson; also Lewis P. Ferguson, her great-grandson by Mary D. Ferguson, deceased, daughter of Emma J. West, deceased, daughter of said Mary D. Little, deceased; and also a daughter, Lula M. Scott, who was a beneficiary under her mother's will. Neither Lula M. Scott nor Lewis P. Ferguson is a party to this proceeding.

On February 20, 1920, after the death of the said Mary D. Little, there was filed for probate two documents—one bearing date October 30, 1913, and purporting to be her last will and testament, and the other bearing date November 7, 1918, purporting to be a codicil to said last will and testament. The said Anna F. Curson was named in each of said documents as the executrix thereof, and with said documents filed a petition for the probate of the same as the last will and testament of Mary D. Little, deceased. Upon the hearing of said petition said documents were admitted to probate as the last will and testament of said deceased, and the said Anna F. Curson appointed executrix thereof, and letters testamentary were issued to her. Thereafter this contest was instituted by respondents, and resulted in a verdict by the jury finding that the purported will and codicil were executed under undue influence. On this verdict the court rendered judgment vacating and setting aside its order previously made, admitting the will to probate, and adjudging said purported will and codicil to be null and void and of no effect. The court did not submit to the jury the issue of fraud.

The deceased, Mary D. Little, was the wife of Samuel W. Little, deceased, who died January 30, 1911, and from whom she received a large amount of property. Prior to his death, appellant, Anna F. Curson, had lost her husband, and about the year 1905, with her two sons, Samuel T. and Albert E. Curson, took up her residence at her father's house, and they so lived until the time of her father's death. After his death they continued to live in the family residence with Mrs. Little, the mother of appellant. The sons lived there until their marriage, and the appellant until the date of the death of her mother. Mary D. Little, at the date of her husband's death, was 87 years old, and at the time of the execution of said purported will was 89 years of age, and at the date of the execution of said codicil was of the age of 94 years. She was a woman of limited education, and at the time of the death of her husband had had practically no business experience. Her daughter, Mrs. Curson, after the death of Samuel W. Little, acted for her mother in practically all business matters. We are not informed as to the terms of the will of Samuel W. Little, deceased, but it appears that there was considerable dissatisfaction with his will on the part of his heirs at law, and particularly on the part of appellant, Anna F. Curson. The evidence shows that when the will was read for the first time, a few days after the death of Samuel W. Little, Mrs. Curson was greatly disappointed with the manner in which she had been treated in her father's will, and turning to her mother said, "Oh, mother, what am I going to do, who is going to keep me?" To which statement the mother replied, "I will look after you, Annie." Some time thereafter a contest was filed of the will of Samuel W. Little, deceased; the contestants being the said Mary D. Little, his daughter Anna F. Curson, his son Samuel

M. Little, a daughter, Mary M. Thompson, the mother of the respondents herein, with the exception of Samuel M. Little, another daughter, Lula M. Thompson (who later became Lula M. Scott), and said Lewis Ferguson, a grandson. The attorneys for the contestants in this proceeding were Messrs. Henry T. Gage and W. I. Foley, and they were brought to the Little home shortly after the death of Samuel W. Little and introduced to Mrs. Little and Mrs. Curson by the son of the latter, Samuel T. Curson. Mr. Foley had direct charge of this litigation, and from the date of his employment, which was prior to April, 1911, until her death he was the legal advisor of Mrs. Little. He was also during this time the attorney of Mrs. Curson. The evidence does not show the exact date of the institution of the contest of the will of Samuel W. Little, deceased, but it was probably in April, 1911. Respondent Samuel M. Little states that he became one of the plaintiffs in the contest of his father's will shortly after the latter's death. In October, 1913, and while this contest of the will of Samuel W. Little, deceased, was pending, and two years and a half after its commencement, Mrs. Little and Mrs. Curson, with Samuel T. Curson, and possibly Mary M. Thompson, went to the office of W. I. Foley. Mrs. Curson testifies that on this occasion Mr. Foley suggested to Mrs. Little:

"Now we will withdraw the contest and you remember the children their father did not remember."

On another occasion Mrs. Curson states that Mr. Foley at this time said to Mrs. Little:

"You and Mrs. Curson withdraw from the contest and you remember your daughters Mrs. Anna F. Curson and Mrs. Lula M. Thompson, and that will make it equal."

Mrs. Curson further testified that the following conversation took place on this occasion:

"At the time this will was under discussion in the presence of my mother, I told Mr. Foley about the long time I had lived with my mother and cared for her. I think Mr. Foley at that time said to my mother, 'Mrs. Little, you ought to remember your daughter, Mrs. Curson, well because she has been faithful to you.'"

Following this conversation the decedent and Mr. Foley repaired to the private office of Mr. Foley while Mrs. Curson remained in the reception room. On that day, or very soon thereafter, the will was prepared by Mr. Foley and brought to the home of Mrs. Little, where it was signed by her. Mrs. Curson testified that she saw the will in Mr. Foley's office the day it was signed and also at the residence of Mrs. Little, and read it before it was signed. The will was left with Mrs. Little and afterwards taken by Mrs. Curson and placed in a safe deposit box.

None of the other heirs knew of the contents of the will. Some time after its execution they learned of its existence, and Samuel M. Little requested his mother for permission to read it. She referred him to Mr. Foley, who denied his request.

The will provided that after a bequest of $100 each to Samuel M. Little, Mary M. Thompson, and Lewis P. Ferguson, an undivided three-fifths of all the rest and residue of the property of said deceased should go to Anna F. Curson, and an undivided two-fifths thereof to Lula M. Thompson. The bequest to Mrs. Lula M. Thompson was for life, with the remainder over to her children. It was further set forth in the will that it was the intention of the decedent to provide in part by deeds and conveyances of property to her daughters Mrs. Curson and Mrs. Lula M. Thompson. Thereafter the decedent executed four deeds as follows: One on November 4, 1913, in favor of Anna F. Curson to the home place on Burlington avenue, Los Angeles, Cal., for which the decedent had paid $8,500, and one on September 29, 1914, in favor of Anna F. Curson to property situated in Lincoln, Neb., valued at about $75,000; one in June, 1917, in favor of Lula M. Thompson for five-twelfths interest in property situated at the southeast corner of First and Broadway, and five twenty-fourths interest in a lot in Moreno Tract, Los Angeles, Cal.; and one in July 1917, in favor of Lula M. Thompson to property situated at Brooklyn Heights, Los Angeles, Cal. Mrs. Curson testified that her mother discussed with Mr. Foley and herself the disposition of her property by means of deeds at the time they went to Mr. Foley's office on the first occasion when the will was prepared. These deeds were all prepared by Mr. Foley, with one possible exception, which was the deed to the property in Lincoln, Neb. This deed was either prepared by Mr. Foley or by an attorney in Lincoln, Neb., at the request and under the direction of Mr. Foley. Mrs. Curson further testified as follows:

"After the conversation in Mr. Foley's office, in which it was agreed to withdraw the will contest and make a will and certain deeds, we got the consent of Samuel M. Little and the guardian of Lewis Ferguson to the withdrawal of the will contest. I never told Mary M. Thompson or Samuel M. Little or Lula M. Thompson or the guardian of Lewis Thompson that mother had agreed that when the contest was withdrawn that she would make a will leaving her estate to me and Mrs. Scott, or would deed me her property."

On November 7, 1918, the codicil to this will was prepared by Mr. Foley and sent to Mrs. Little at her home, where the same was signed by her. Mrs. Curson testified that at the request of her mother she telephoned to Mr. Foley and he came out to the house and Mrs. Little talked with him. Mrs. Curson had informed Mrs. Griffith, one of the subscribing witnesses, that a codicil was to be made; and asked Mrs. Griffith if she would sign as a witness. After the preparation of the codicil, it was brought by Mrs. Curson into the room where the subscribing witnesses and Mrs. Little were. Mr. Richards, the other subscribing witness, then said:

"Now, Mrs. Griffith, we are not supposed to know anything that is in this codicil. We are simply to witness here that Mrs. Little is well and of sound mind."

The codicil was not read to Mrs. Little nor by her in the presence of either of the subscribing witnesses. There is no evidence that Mrs. Little ever read the codicil or had it read to her before she signed it. By this codicil the decedent increased the bequest of $100 to Samuel M. Little to $500. Mary M. Thompson having died in the meantime, the bequest of $100 to her was revoked, and a bequest of $100 was made to each of the six children of the said Mary M. Thompson, deceased. In her codicil the decedent refers to the four deeds executed by her and requested that the same be respected by her children and grandchildren. The residue of her estate, in the codicil, was given to Mrs. Curson and to Mrs. Lula M. Thompson in the same proportions specified in the original will. It does not appear what the value of the estate finally left by Mrs. Little was, but in the petition for the probate of the will it is given as $8,000. The value of the three pieces of property conveyed to Mrs. Thompson was approximately $40,000.

We have already referred to the fact that Mary D. Little was at the date of the death of her husband of the age of 87 years, and from that time until the date of her death Mrs. Curson resided with her and transacted all her business, and that during this time Mr. Foley was her legal advisor. Mrs. Curson testifies that whenever any question arose of any serious moment, her mother would say, "Let us go and ask Mr. Foley," and that during this time she looked to Mr. Foley for direction in all legal matters concerning her property. The evidence further shows that between the date of the death of Mr. Little and that of the decedent the latter referred almost everything in the nature of business to her daughter, Mrs. Curson. Whenever she was asked by other members of the family anything about her property or her business, she invariably replied, "I don't know, ask Annie" (meaning Mrs. Curson). The evidence also shows that when Mrs. Lula M. Thompson discovered that Mrs. Curson had received deeds to certain property from her mother, she called upon her mother and insisted upon the latter deeding property to her. The mother replied that she would do so, but that she would first have to see Mrs. Curson. Upon seeing Mrs. Curson about the matter, the latter replied,

"Sure, you can have it." The result was that Mrs. Little executed in favor of Mrs. Lula M. Thompson the two deeds before referred to. The evidence in the controversy was voluminous, but the above recitals contain, in our opinion, the salient points brought out at the trial.

Appellant advances three reasons why the judgment should be reversed: (1) That the court erred in submitting to the jury the question of the exertion of undue influence upon the decedent by W. I. Foley. (2) That the jury did not find upon the issue of fraud. (3) Insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

At the conclusion of the evidence the court submitted to the jury the following questions:

"Was the execution of the will dated October 30, 1913, procured by undue influence of Anna F. Curson, Samuel T. Curson, Albert E. Curson, and W. I. Foley, or any or either of them?"

"Was the execution of the codicil dated November 7, 1918, procured by undue influence of Anna F. Curson, Samuel T. Curson, Albert E. Curson, and W. I. Foley, or any or either of them?"

The answer of the jury to each question was "Yes."

The court also gave to the jury the following instruction:

"If you believe from the evidence that the deceased in making her will or codicil was unduly influenced so to do by Anna F. Curson, Samuel T. Curson, and W. I. Foley, or any or either of them, and that but for such influence unduly exercised as in these instructions defined, she would not have made or executed the said will or codicil in controversy, your verdict should be that the execution of such will and codicil so procured was the result of the undue influence of such person or persons."

[1] It is now insisted by appellant that there is no allegation in the petition for the revocation of the will charging undue influence on the part of W. I. Foley, and therefore it was error for the court to submit to the jury either of the above questions in so far as they related to the exertion of undue influence on the part of W. I. Foley. For the same reason appellant complains of the giving of the foregoing instruction. It is true that there is no direct allegation in said petition that said will and codicil were procured by the undue influence of W. I. Foley, yet there are facts and circumstances set out in said petition which if true would be tantamount to a direct allegation of undue influence on the part of W. I. Foley. It would appear that appellant so considered these allegations, as they are specifically denied by her in her answer to said petition, and from the evidence it is apparent that the case was tried upon the theory that undue influence was alleged to have been exerted over the decedent by the said W. I. Foley. We therefore are of the conclusion that the court committed no error in the submission of these questions to the jury, nor in the giving of the above instruction.

[2] It is next claimed by the appellant that the jury did not find upon the issue of fraud. We have already noted the fact that the contest was based originally upon fraud, undue influence, and unsoundness of mind, and that contestants dismissed as to the issue of unsoundness of mind, leaving two issues to be decided by the jury, namely, fraud, and undue influence. In the two questions above set out, the court submitted to the jury the issue of undue influence. These were the only questions submitted to the jury. The question of fraud, as will be readily seen, was not included in either one of these questions. In the Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 Pac. 598, the issue of undue influence and the issue of fraud were submitted to the jury. The jury in their verdict found in favor of the contestant upon the issue of undue influence, but failed to find upon the issue of fraud. On appeal the judgment based on said verdict setting aside the will was affirmed. The finding of the jury in favor of the contestant upon either issue would be fatal to the validity of the will; therefore, after a finding on one issue adverse to the will, a failure to find on the other issue would not constitute an error prejudicial to the rights of the proponent. A finding by the jury upon the second issue, either for or against the proponent, would not in any way be of any benefit to her. Therefore she cannot complain of such failure on the part of the jury.

In support of her contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, appellant relies upon Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. 700, 198 Pac. 407. Quoting from page 708 of 185 Cal., 198 Pac. 407, 411, of this decision, we find that—"The outstanding features of the case are simply: That the testatrix was a mature and intelligent woman of sound mind; that she was married to a man of wealth very much older than herself; that she was devotedly attached to her aunt, whom she regarded as her mother; that she had a little property of her own given her by her husband consisting almost entirely of stock in the corporation managed by her aunt's husband; that she was expecting a child and was fearful of the result of her confinement; that she wished to make provision as to the disposition of her estate and the care of her possible child in case she should die; that under the circumstances she made a will after consultation with a lawyer, and when she and the aunt were away from their home together; and that the will provided for the division of her estate between the aunt and her child, if there should be one, and otherwise for its all going to the aunt, requested that the aunt be appointed guardian of the child, and stated that no provision was made for her husband as he had ample means of his own."

It will readily be seen that the facts in the Estate of Anderson, supra, are materially different from those in the case before us. Here we have a woman past the age of 80 years, left with considerable property by the death of her husband, inexperienced in the conduct of business, and dependent wholly upon the advice and assistance of others. The proponent, her daughter, living with her, assumed to advise and assist her mother, and the latter accepted this advice and assistance in the management of her business affairs. An attorney represented them both in a will contest then pending. The decedent and proponent were in the office of the attorney. There is no evidence that decedent went to her attorney's office on this occasion with any intention of making a will, but while there the attorney suggested to her, not only that she make a will, but that she make it in favor of the proponent and her sister, Mrs. Thompson. Following immediately this suggestion of the attorney, and without any intimation on the part of the decedent as to whether she would act favorably upon the suggestion, the proponent, in the presence of her mother, reminds the attorney of the long time she had lived with her mother and cared for her. Whereupon, the attorney again, addressing the mother, says to her, "Mrs. Little, you ought to remember your daughter, Mrs. Curson, well because she has been faithful to you." Following this conversation the decedent and the attorney repaired to the private office of the latter, where the will was prepared and later signed by the decedent.

In the opinion of the Estate of Anderson, supra, is to be found an extended reference to the authorities of this state wherein the Supreme Court has held that the evidence was insufficient to set aside a will upon the ground of undue influence. In none of these cases, in our opinion, do the facts present so strong a case against the validity of the will as is found in the facts before us. Probably the strongest case of all these against the validity of the will is the Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 Pac. 932, wherein it was sought to set aside a will on the ground of undue influence of three beneficiaries named therein. The Supreme Court held that a confidential relation existed between the decedent and these beneficiaries, but refused to set aside the will for the reason that "there is no evidence that either of them suggested to her (the decedent) any of the provisions contained in the will." How different are the facts in the case before us from these facts. The relation existing between the decedent on one hand and Mrs. Curson and her attorney on the other was no doubt of a confidential nature, and the testimony of Mrs. Curson herself is to the effect that the will in her favor was the result of the suggestion of the attorney, aided and supported by the supplication and importunities of herself.

[3] In our opinion there is ample authority to sustain respondents' contention that the evidence in this case is sufficient to support the verdict. In the Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 307, 107 Pac. 598, 601, the court said:

"The sum and substance of contestants' evidence was that the testatrix was unable to resist the importunities of her daughter and made the will under the influence thereof, so that, so far as provision for H. H. Snowball was concerned, the will was in reality the will of the daughter and not that of the testatrix. There is nothing in the claim that the undue influence was not exercised directly upon the testamentary act. There was sufficient in the evidence of contestants to support a conclusion that it was used purely for the purpose of procuring the will, and that the will was the direct result thereof. While it is true that there must be proof that the influence was used directly to procure the will, general influence not brought to bear upon the testamentary act not being undue influence, * * * such proof exists where the evidence is of such a nature as to warrant the inference that the will was the direct result of the influence exerted for the purpose of procuring it, and was not the natural result of the uncontrolled will of the testatrix. (See Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 589, 82 Pac. 252; Estate of Welch, 6 Cal. App. 50, 91 Pac. 336.)"

In Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252, upon the motion of the proponent of the will, the court granted a nonsuit, but on appeal the Supreme Court reversed the case and held the evidence sufficient to require the submission of the case to the jury. The evidence upon undue influence was entirely circumstantial, but the court held it sufficient and further intimated that, had the case been submitted to the jury and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the contestant, the Supreme Court would not have disturbed the verdict.

In Estate of Gallo, 214 Pac. 496, the appellate court set aside an order of nonsuit in favor of the proponent of the will, and held that—

"The mere existence of a confidential relation between a testator and one who unduly profits by the will is not sufficient to overturn it, but, when such beneficiary 'has actually participated in procuring the execution of the will, the burden is on him to show that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud.' Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 381, 384, 168 Pac. 561; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532; Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 536, 119 Pac. 915; Estate of Packer, 164 Cal. 525, 129 Pac. 778."

In the Estate of Ramey (Cal. App.) 217 Pac. 135, the contest was based upon undue influence. This also was a case in which the evidence of undue influence was entirely circumstantial. The proponent of the will was a nephew of the deceased and attended to her business for some time prior to her death. One of the subscribing witnesses to the will, an attorney, testified that before he would act as a witness to the will he examined the decedent privately and went over all of the terms of the will with her; that she thoroughly understood its contents and executed it voluntarily and without the exercise of undue influence over her by any person. The attorney who prepared the will corroborated the subscribing witness, and there was no direct evidence to contradict the testimony of either of these witnesses, yet the jury found against the validity of the will and the appellate court affirmed the judgment.

Viewing the facts in this case in the light of these authorities and of others that could be mentioned, we are unable to say that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict.

What we have heretofore said applies entirely to the execution of the will. The codicil was signed some five years thereafter and under somewhat different circumstances. During the time, however, intervening between the signing of these two documents, the relation of the parties had not changed. Mrs. Little, however, was 94 years of age at the date of the codicil. It had been prepared and sent to her home. The subscribing witnesses, or at least one of them, had been called in by Mrs. Curson, who produced the codicil for her mother's signature. Mrs. Little did not read it, nor was it read to her, nor were its contents made known to her in the presence of the subscribing witnesses before she signed it, or at any other time. Nor is there any evidence by any witness that Mrs. Little had ever read the codicil or knew of its contents before she signed it. We think it but reasonable to infer, as there was evidence sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the will itself had been executed by the decedent while under the undue influence of Mrs. Curson, and the evidence further showed that the relation of these parties at the time of the signing of the will continued up to and existed at the time of the signing of the codicil, that the latter document was the result of the efforts exerted by Mrs. Curson over her mother, and therefore must be held to be void as executed under the same undue influence that invalidated the will.

The deeds executed by Mrs. Little in favor of Mrs. Curson and those in favor of Mrs. Thompson are not involved in this proceeding. The circumstances, however, of their execution may shed some light upon the issues involved herein. In the purported will of Mrs. Little is found an expression of an intention on her part to execute deeds in favor of these two daughters, and the evidence shows that immediately after the will was signed, that is, some four days thereafter, Mrs. Little deeded to Mrs. Curson the home place, and in September, following the signing of the will, she also deeded to Mrs. Curson the property situated in Lincoln, Neb. Nothing, however, was done toward executing deeds in favor of Mrs. Thompson until June, 1917, and then only after Mrs. Thompson had discovered that her mother had made deeds in favor of Mrs. Curson. Upon learning this fact, Mrs. Thompson called upon her mother and asked for deeds to the property which her mother was to give to her. Mrs. Little, while intimating that she wanted Mrs. Thompson to have her share of the property, referred Mrs. Thompson to Mrs. Curson, and the latter, on being approached by Mrs. Thompson in regard to the matter, replied, "Sure, you can have it." The result was that the two deeds in favor of Mrs. Thompson were executed during the months of June and July, 1917, almost four years after the will was signed. We think it is only reasonable to infer from this testimony that Mrs. Little, in her advanced years, acted in business matters at least only upon the suggestion of others, and that during this time she relied so completely upon Mrs. Curson that she was unable without the assistance of the latter even to carry into effect her expressed intention to provide for Mrs. Thompson. We are of the opinion that from this testimony the jury could reasonably draw the conclusion that Mrs. Little during this time was under the influence and domination of Mrs. Curson to such an extent that she acted in important business matters only upon the advice and direction of Mrs. Curson, and that whatever matters were transacted by her, even to the signing of her purported will and codicil, were done at the suggestion and under the direction of Mrs. Curson.

[4] In addition to the grounds for reversal which we have already discussed, appellant criticizes the form of verdict rendered in this proceeding and claims that it is in violation of section 1314 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It will be noted that the questions submitted to the jury required answers from them as to whether the will and codicil were procured by the undue influence of four persons named therein, or either or any of said persons. Appellant insists that she was entitled to a finding as to whether or not the will was secured by the undue influence of a particular individual, and not such a finding as that which was rendered in this action, which she claims is merely a general verdict and therefore prohibited by the terms of section 1314, Code of Civil Procedure. There is nothing in the record of this case that suggests that the appellant, in the trial court, made any objection to the form of the questions submitted to the jury or that she requested any other or different form of questions for the jury's consideration than that which the court submitted. The objection in our opinion, even if meritorious, comes too late when first made in this court. As to its merits, the only authority submitted by appellant in support of her contention is the Estate of Hewitt (Cal. App.) 218 Pac. 778. In that case the verdict was a general verdict and bore no resemblance to the verdict in the case before us. In our opinion the verdict as rendered by the jury meets the requirements of section 1314 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The order denying appellant's motion for a new trial and the order refusing to vacate and set aside the judgment, being nonappealable orders, the appeals therefrom are dismissed. Judgment affirmed.

HINDS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 4604.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 9, 1924.)

1. Judgment  153(2)—Application for relief from default for mistake, excusable neglect, etc., must be made within 6 months.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, an application for relief from a default judgment taken through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect must be made within 6 months after default was taken.

2. Judgment  131—Clerk's inadvertent filing of proof of service with papers in another case held not to affect right to enter default.

Where the necessary affidavit of proof of service of an amended complaint on which the right to enter default judgment was based had been left with the clerk of the court for filing, but he inadvertently filed it with papers in another case, he had the right to enter the default, and this right was not affected by the misplacement of the affidavit, and, having been regularly entered, the judgment could not be affected by the erroneous act of the clerk in attempting to cancel the same.

3. Judgment  153(2)—Six-month limit for making motion to open default held applicable to judgment regularly entered.

Where a default judgment not void on its face was regularly entered after the clerk had received for filing an affidavit showing service of the amended complaint, though affidavit had been misplaced, the 6-month limitation of time under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for making a motion to open default on the ground of mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect, was applicable.

4. Pleading  336 — Service of proposed amended complaint at time of giving notice of application for permission to file same held sufficient.

Where a proposed amended complaint was served on defendants with notice of application for permission to file same, it was not necessary for plaintiffs to serve another copy thereof after the order granting the application had been made, especially as defendant's attorney contested the order granting the motion.

Application for certiorari by Hugh H. Hinds to review an order of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, setting aside a default judgment in an action by petitioner against Charles M. Johnson and another. Order annulled.

Alfred E. Dennis, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

C. M. Johnson, of Gridley, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is a proceeding on writ of review in relation to an order made by respondent court granting an application to set aside the default of the defendants in an action wherein petitioner, Hinds, was plaintiff and Charles M. Johnson and Donald Johnson were defendants. The default had been entered on the 4th day of January, 1923. The motion to set aside default was made upon the ground that the default of the defendants was taken and entered by reason of mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect of the defendants to file their appearance in said action, and on the ground that neither of the defendants nor their attorneys were served with copies of the notice of motion to file an amended complaint, filed on November 28, 1922, and upon the ground that neither of the defendants was served with notice of the order of the court made on December 5, 1922, granting permission to file an amended complaint, and on the ground that neither of the defendants nor their attorneys were served with a copy of the amended complaint filed on December 6, 1922.

The application of the defendants for an order to set aside said default was presented to the court on the 21st day of September, 1923, pursuant to notice thereof served and filed on the 14th day of that month.

[1] An application for relief from a default taken against a party through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect must be made within six months after such default was taken. Code Civ. Proc. § 473; McLain v. Llewellyn Iron Works, 56 Cal. App. 58, 204 Pac. 869. In the cited case it was held, in accordance with an earlier decision by the Supreme Court, that the clerk's entry of the default, and not the entry of the judgment, fixes the beginning of the six months within which the application must be made.

[2] Counsel for respondent contends that the entry of default as made by the clerk on January 4, 1923, was void because the clerk did not at that time have before him proof of service of the amended complaint, upon which service the right to enter the default depended; that the clerk, having discovered this defect, later destroyed and erased the entry; that the clerk did not again enter the order for default until July 23d, and then attempted to enter the order nunc pro tunc as of January 4th; that a clerk has no authority to enter an order nunc pro tunc. From the affidavit of the clerk who entered the default, which affidavit was used on the motion now under review, it appears that the necessary affidavit of proof of service on which the right to enter the default depended had been left with the clerk for filing, but inadvertently had been filed with the papers in another case. On this condition of the record we are of the opinion that the clerk had authority to enter the default on January 4, 1923, and that his right and obligation so to do on demand of the plaintiff was not affected by such misplacement of the document proving service of the amended complaint. "It is the fact of service which confers jurisdiction." Spaulding & Co. v. Chapin, 37 Cal. App. 573, 577, 174 Pac. 334, 335. The default thus having been regularly entered, its validity could not be affected by the erroneous act of the clerk in attempting to cancel the same.

[3] Respondent further contends that on the motion to open default there were affidavits on file denying personal service on the defendants of the amended complaint; that the court had jurisdiction to pass on this question, and that the court had a right to find and presumably did find that the amended complaint had not been served on the defendants; that, this being so, the court had authority under the provisions of said section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, to set aside the judgment and allow the defendants to answer at any time within one year after the rendition thereof. In this connection it should be noted that this contention of respondent is based upon a claim that there was a total absence of service of the amended complaint, and not on the ground that the default rested upon constructive service only. But since, as we have held, the default was regularly entered by the clerk after he had received for filing an affidavit showing service of the amended complaint, and since the judgment was not void on its face, it follows that the six months' limit of time for making the application was applicable to the case. Jacks v. Baldez, 97 Cal. 91, 31 Pac. 899; Spaulding & Co. v. Chapin, 37 Cal. App. 573, 578, 174 Pac. 334; Young v. Fink, 119 Cal. 107, 50 Pac. 1060.

[4] It has been further suggested that the proof of service of the amended complaint was insufficient to authorize the entry of default because the affidavit on which the clerk relied only proved personal service of the amended complaint at the time of giving notice of application to the court for permission to file such amended complaint, and that there was no proof of a subsequent personal service of the amended complaint after the court made its order allowing plaintiff to file the same. We are of the opinion that the one service of the proposed amended complaint at the time of giving notice of the motion was sufficient, when followed by filing of the same amended complaint after the order had been made. The court minutes of December 5th, of the hearing at that time, showed the presence in court of defendants' attorney, contesting the motion, which motion was then and there granted.

The order of respondent court setting aside the default of the defendants in said action is annulled.

BOARD OF PUBLIC SERVICE COM'RS OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. SPEAR.
(Civ. 4465.)

1. Landlord and tenant §216—Court must exercise legal discretion as to trebling rent.

A court must exercise its discretion as to trebling the rent under Code Civ. Proc. § 1174, in case of forcible entry or detainer, in a sound, fair, and reasonable manner, in conformity with the spirit of the law, to serve the ends of justice; such a discretion not being a mental one to be exercised ex gratia, but a legal discretion.

2. Landlord and tenant §216—Trial court held bound to render judgment for treble amount of rent found due, in view of willfulness in holding over.

Assuming that Civ. Code, § 3345, providing that when a tenant willfully holds over after demand and notice in writing he must pay treble rent, was repealed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1174, providing that for forcible entry or unlawful detainer judgment may be entered in the court's discretion, either for the amount found due, or for three times such amount, where tenant willfully remained in possession, deliberately and obstinately, with knowledge that the tenancy was terminated, the court was bound to treble the rent found due, and a judgment for less than this sum would have been an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by the Board of Public Service Commissioners of the City of Los Angeles against Joseph Spear. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Grant Jackson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

CRAIG, J. The only question raised upon this appeal is whether or not the trial court had discretion under the facts presented to render a judgment against a tenant holding over for rental only, without trebling the amount. Respondent purchased certain premises of which appellant held possession under a verbal agreement which respondent alleged was a tenancy from month to month, and served upon him a 30-day notice to vacate; upon his failure to do so, it served the statutory 3-day notice, and subsequently brought this action for possession of the premises and treble rents. Appellant's answer alleged that he was in possession under a parol lease for one year, and that his term had not expired. The findings of the trial court were in favor of the owner for all demands, and among other things recited:

"The court having found that the defendant willfully held over the premises involved in this action after demand made and one month's notice in writing given requiring the possession thereof, now finds that such willful holding over was deliberate, intentional, and obstinate, with knowledge that the tenancy was terminated and that defendant was holding over without and against the consent of the landlord, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff, as a matter of law, is entitled to have judgment for treble rent during the time the defendant continued in possession after such notice; but the court, in so finding and in ordering judgment for treble damages, is not doing so in the exercise of its discretion, but because it is of the opinion that it cannot under the law exercise any discretion in the premises, and is compelled under the law to give judgment for treble damages."

Appellant's contention is that section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure afforded the court discretion to enter judgment for the rent due, or for treble such amount, basing his argument upon the following provision thereof:

"Judgment against the defendant guilty of the forcible entry, or forcible or unlawful detainer may be entered in the discretion of the court either for the amount of the damages and rent found due, or for three times the amount so found."

Section 735 of the Code of Civil Procedure also provides that:

"If a person recover damages for a forcible or unlawful entry in or upon, or detention of any building or any cultivated real property, judgment may be entered for three times the amount at which the actual damages are assessed."

The finding referred to and respondent's position are based upon section 3345 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"Tenant Willfully Holding Over. If any tenant, or any person in collusion with the tenant, holds over any lands or tenements after demand made and one month's notice, in writing given, requiring the possession thereof, such person holding over must pay to the landlord treble rent during the time he continues in possession after such notice."

[1, 2] It is contended by the appellant that inasmuch as the Codes were adopted in 1872, with the last two quoted sections as they now appear, and since section 1174, Code of Civil Procedure, was since amended to include the provision as herein set forth, it effected a repeal in this respect of section 3345, Civil Code. Although this argument presents an interesting question, we think it is one which we are not required to pass upon in the instant case. The facts of this case place it squarely within the provisions of section 3345, Civil Code. If it be conceded that this section was repealed, and that the provisions of section 1174, Code of Civil Procedure, are applicable here, we think the trial court would still have been bound to render judgment for treble the amount of rent found due. When a court is given discretion in the exercise of authority it must exercise that discretion in a sound, fair, and reasonable manner; it may not arbitrarily render judgment for either treble the amount or for the actual amount of rent found due; the facts must warrant the decree rendered.

"It is not a mental discretion, to be exercised ex gratia, but a legal discretion, to be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law, and in a manner to subserve and not to impede or defeat the ends of substantial justice. In a plain case, this discretion has no office to perform, and its exercise is limited to doubtful cases, where an impartial mind hesitates." Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 424.

In Alden v. Mayfield, 33 Cal. App. 724, 166 Pac. 382, it was contended that the court was not justified in assessing treble rents. It was there said, quoting from the opinion of the Supreme Court in passing upon a former trial of the same case, that:

"The defendant was informed before the deposit of money, both by the principal and by her attorney, that Haile no longer had anything to do with the matter, and we repeat that defendant's endeavor under those circumstances to re-establish the relationship of tenancy with the landlord who had repudiated him and terminated the tenancy was but a shallow bit of subterfuge and trickery. * * * Still further in this connection it is to be noted that the defendant does not deny, as it was incumbent upon him to deny, the allegation that he was holding over against the will and consent of the plaintiff."

It is then said:

"All these things seem to show conclusively a willful withholding of the premises on the part of respondent. Doubtless the word 'willful' is used in different statutes with various shades of meaning, but herein the conduct of defendant in refusing to surrender possession was deliberate, intentional, and obstinate, with knowledge that the tenancy was terminated, and that he was holding over against the will and consent of the landlord. We think nothing more is required to constitute willfulness on the part of the tenant." (Italics quoted.)

It is true that the provision there under consideration was section 3345, Civil Code. Nevertheless, if appellant's contention is correct, section 1174, Code of Civil Procedure, includes all that was within the scope of section 3345, Civil Code, and it is clear that the case at bar is one within that portion of section 1174, Code of Civil Procedure, which was included in section 3345, Civil Code. (The assumption that the latter section has been repealed being indulged here merely for the sake of argument.) Hence what is said in Alden v. Mayfield applies by analogy to the instant case. Authorities to which our attention is directed do not hold that the rents should be trebled where the conduct of the tenant is characterized by good faith and a reasonable belief in his right to remain, but that if his conduct be intentional, with knowledge of the termination of the tenancy, and the holding over is against the will and without the consent of the landlord, section 3345 of the Civil Code is mandatory. Alden v. Mayfield, supra; Vatuone v. Cannobio, 4 Cal. App. 422, 426, 88 Pac. 374. The trial court, having found that appellant in the instant case leased the premises from month to month until notified in writing of the change of ownership, and demand was made upon him for possession, and that thereafter he willfully remained in possession, deliberately, intentionally, and obstinately, with knowledge that the tenancy was terminated, it would have been an abuse of discretion had the judgment been other than for treble the amount of the rent found due. The judgment is affirmed.

NAKAMURA v. KONDO. (Civ. 4383.)

1. Partnership § 344—Debts must be paid and assets reduced to money before personal judgment for one partner against other.

Where partnership property consists of assets other than money, and there are partnership debts, until such debts have been paid and the assets reduced to money there can be no definite basis for a division between the partners which could be the basis of a judgment that one pay to the other any specific sum of money.

2. Partnership § 344—Personal judgment cannot be rendered for one partner against other for advances till the partnership assets exhausted.

On sale of partnership assets, the proceeds constitute a partnership fund from which, after paying firm debts, the claims of the partners for money advanced as capital must be paid before any other division of the fund among the partners, and as long as such fund is in existence no personal judgment should be rendered in favor of one partner against the other.

3. Judgment § 194—Ordering sale of partnership assets and division of proceeds and personal judgment for one partner against other held not final determination under statute.

A judgment, ordering the sale of partnership property and a division of the proceeds, and granting personal judgment for one partner against the other for the amount of his contribution to capital in excess of other partner's, could not be sustained, since it did not finally determine all the rights of the parties under Code Civ. Proc. § 577.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Shiro Nakamura against Masaharu Kondo. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ingle Carpenter and M. J. Finkenstein, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Marion Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. In this action the plaintiff sought a dissolution of the partnership between himself and the defendant, and an accounting. The copartnership had been conducted under the name of M-K Fisheries Company. After a hearing the court rendered an interlocutory judgment, which provided:

"(1) That the partnership heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, under the name of M-K Fisheries Company, be and the same is hereby dissolved. (2) That the plaintiff is entitled to an accounting, and an accounting is hereby ordered, showing the accounts of each of the parties hereto in the said partnership. (3) That the interests of the partners, amounting to $100,000 in the Mexican Industrial Development Company, be sold, and that all just debts and demands against said copartnership be paid, and the balance, if any, be divided among the copartners in the following way: Four-fifths to the defendant, Masaharu Kondo, and one-fifth thereof to the plaintiff, Shiro Nakamura."

The matter of accounting was then referred to a referee, who in due time rendered a report. To this the defendant filed objections, and the court approved the report, except as to an item of $500, and subsequently rendered final judgment. After reciting that the plaintiff's contribution to the partnership in addition to his original investment was $1,595.87 in excess of the contribution of the defendant, of which sum the defendant owed the plaintiff four-fifths, or $1,195.88, this judgment decrees:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed, in addition to the interlocutory judgment heretofore rendered in this matter, that plaintiff Shiro Nakamura have and recover judgment of and against the defendant Masaharu Kondo for the sum of $1,195.88, and for costs of suit amounting to $472.50."

This last provision is the portion which is the basis of dispute upon this appeal.

[1, 2] It is contended by appellant that no personal judgment should have been rendered against him until all of the assets of the copartnership had been disposed of, and that the judgment is erroneous on that account. It is the general rule that, where the property consists of assets other than money, and where there are partnership debts, until such debts have been paid and the assets reduced to money there can be no definite basis for a division between the partners which could be the basis of a judgment that one pay to the other any specific sum of money. But respondent argues that where, as in the present instance, an accounting had already been ordered and completed, and no debts remain to be paid, and a portion of the partnership property consists of money which is in the hands of one of the partners, the judgment may and should be made in favor of the other partner for his share of such money.

The weakness of this position lies in the fact that the claim of a partner, even for money advanced by him in respect to capital of the partnership, is to be paid out of the assets of the partnership before there is a division among the partners of the proceeds of any residue after paying all debts and liabilities of the firm, either to persons who are not partners or to the partners themselves. Hyre v. Lambert, 37 W. Va. 26, 16 S. E. 446; Bates on Partnership, § 971. In the instant case the partnership owned an interest in the Mexican Industrial Development Company. The interlocutory decree directed that this be sold and divided between the partners. Upon its sale the proceeds would constitute a partnership fund from which the claim of respondent for money advanced as capital should be paid, and as long as such partnership fund is in existence with which to liquidate a debt due one of the partners no personal judgment should be rendered against the other partner.

[3] Another reason why the judgment cannot be sustained is that it does not finally determine all the rights of the respective parties. Code Civ. Proc. § 577. The judgment is not one for division of partnership property as was that in the case of Shuken v. Cohen, 179 Cal. 279, 176 Pac. 447, but is one ordering the sale of the property and thereafter the division of the proceeds. It is apparent that further litigation between the parties is possible, and might be necessary, before their respective rights are finally determined.

BROWN et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF IMPERIAL COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4576.)

1. Prohibition — 11—Defeated party held not entitled to complain of judgment failing to state amount of costs.

Even if a judgment for defendants was defective in that the amount of costs recoverable was not stated therein as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 896, a valid judgment remained as respects negating plaintiff's right to recover from defendants, and the defect, being entirely in plaintiff's favor was not one of which he could complain on writ of prohibition.

2. Justices of the peace — 155(1)—Notice of entry of judgment held substantially to comply with statute.

A notice of entry of judgment which omitting the title of the action and of the cause, recited: "1923. Judgment. In the Justice Court of El Centro Township, County of Imperial, State of California, before I. Mayfield, Justice, March 9th, 1923, judgment rendered and entered denying plaintiff his claim, and assessing cost against plaintiff. [Signed.] I. Mayfield, Justice of the Peace, El Centro Township" held to be substantially in the form provided by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 893, 897.

3. Appeal and error — 798—Appellant's contest of motion to dismiss appeal waives defect in notice.

Appellant's appearance at the hearing of motion to dismiss the appeal and his contest thereof is a waiver of objection to the sufficiency of notice to dismiss.

4. Appeal and error — 798—Finding of service of notice of appeal held warranted by evidence outside record.

Where, the record of the hearing of a motion to dismiss an appeal contained no evidence of the service of notice of rendition of judgment on appellee, but affidavits and oral testimony by moving party clearly established such service without contradiction, the court properly determined that service was actually made.

5. Justices of the peace — 160(4)—Notice of appeal condition precedent to superior court's jurisdiction.

Service of notice of appeal from justice court within 30 days of rendition of judgment is a condition precedent to giving the superior court jurisdiction of the appeal.

Application for writ of prohibition by John N. Brown and another against the Superior Court of Imperial County and another, to prevent further proceedings in an appeal from justice's court. Writ granted.

E. R. Simon, of El Centro, for petitioners.
Harry W. Horton, of El Centro, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Prohibition. A judgment in a justice's court was entered in the docket on March 9, 1923, as follows:

"March 9, 1923. After due and careful deliberation upon the evidence adduced in the above-entitled action, the court finds for the defendants, and denies plaintiff his claim. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that plaintiff take nothing from said defendants, and that said defendants recover their costs herein expended."

On the same day, to wit, March 9, 1923, plaintiff's attorney was served with a notice that judgment had been rendered against plaintiff which, omitting the title of the court and the cause, was as follows:

"1923. Judgment. In the Justice Court of El Centro Township, County of Imperial, State of California, before I. Mayfield, Justice, March 9th, 1923, judgment rendered and entered denying plaintiff his claim, and assessing cost against plaintiff. [Signed.] I. Mayfield, Justice of the Peace, El Centro Township."

Within the time prescribed by the statute plaintiff filed with the justice's court his notice of appeal to the superior court of Imperial county from the judgment of said justice's court made and entered against plaintiff; and on April 13, 1923, which was 35 days after the entry of the judgment in the docket of the justice's court, plaintiff served a copy of the notice of appeal upon the attorney for one of the defendants. The other defendant was never served with any notice of said appeal. On the 18th day of April, 1923, defendants filed with the clerk of the superior court their motion to dismiss the appeal taken by plaintiff on the ground "that said appeal had not been perfected within time—notice of appeal not having been served upon the defendants or upon the attorneys for the said defendants within the time required by law"; that said notice was originally noticed for hearing on April 20, 1923, but by order of the court was continued until April 27, 1923. On April 24th a new notice was served of the hearing of the motion on April 27th, and with the notice were served copies of certain affidavits. The new notice contained the statement that the motion to dismiss would be heard "upon the files, pleadings and papers in the said cause," together with affidavits therein referred to, "and oral testimony." On April 27, 1923, the attorney for plaintiff filed a counter affidavit in answer to the affidavits which had theretofore been interposed by the attorneys for defendants. But such answering affidavit merely denied, on information and belief, that notice of the rendition of the judgment was given as required by law. When the matter came on for hearing the plaintiff objected to the introduction of the affidavits and the oral testimony interposed by defendants, as well as to the introduction of anything other than the records and files as they were as of date April 18, 1923, when the original notice of motion to dismiss was filed; but, notwithstanding such objection, said affidavits and oral evidence were inroduced at such hearing. Thereafter, and on the 30th day of June, 1923, the superior court denied said motion to dismiss the said appeal. In the petition for prohibition herein it is stated that said action "is now pending in the superior court of Imperial county, Cal., and the said court and the attorney for said plaintiff therein are threatening to set said cause down for trial, and will set said cause for trial unless prohibited by the order of this honorable court." The purpose of this proceeding is to arrest such proposed action by said superior court.

[1, 2] As a matter of form it is possible that the judgment of the justice's court might bear some improvement; but its legality is not seriously questioned except as to that part thereof which purports to carry costs as against plaintiff. As to the judgment itself, counsel for the respondent here makes the admission that "the judgment entered herein is probably sufficient in form to make the judgment a basis for appeal." Section 896 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "the justice must tax and include in the judgment the costs allowed by law to the prevailing party." Assuming (without deciding) that the judgment is defective in that the amount of costs recoverable by defendants from plaintiff is not included therein, there would remain a valid judgment as far as negating plaintiff's right of recovery on his claim against defendants is concerned. The alleged defect being entirely in plaintiff's favor, is not one of which he should be heard to complain. Neither is it apparent that the notice of the entry of the judgment was insufficient. It was substantially in the form required by the provisions of sections 897 and 893 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] Respondent herein contends that, because of the alleged insufficiency of the notice of motion to dismiss the appeal, in that said notice contained the statement that said motion would be made on "all the files, pleadings and papers in said cause," evidence as to the service by the justice of the peace of the notice of the rendition of the judgment should not have been received on the hearing of such motion. But the motion also contained the further notification to appellant therein that it would be heard on certain affidavits and oral testimony; and, as hereinbefore stated, a counter affidavit was filed by appellant. That the appearance of said appellant at the hearing and his contest of the motion to dismiss the appeal is a waiver of the sufficiency of the notice to dismiss is settled by the following authorities: Acock v. Halsey, 90 Cal. 220, 27 Pac. 193; Bell v. Thompson, 8 Cal. App. 483, 97 Pac. 158; Naylor v. Adams, 15 Cal. App. 353, 114 Pac. 997; Bohn v. Bohn, 16 Cal. App. 179, 116 Pac. 568. It is held in Dalzell v. Superior Court, 67 Cal. 453, 7 Pac. 910 (syllabus), that, where the record of a case on appeal is silent as to the service of the notice of appeal, the fact of service may be proved by an affidavit filed pending the motion to dismiss the appeal on that ground.

[4] Respondent here also urges that, because on the hearing of the motion to dismiss the appeal a question of fact arose as to the service on the attorney for the plaintiff of the notice of the rendition of the judgment, it might have been determined by the court that no such service was made, and consequently that the motion to dismiss should be denied. Affidavits and oral testimony adduced by the moving party clearly established such service, and there was no contradiction thereof. The "files, pleadings and papers in the cause" referred to in the notice of motion to dismiss contained no evidence of the service of the notice of the rendition of the judgment; hence it became necessary to determine that fact by evidence outside the record. There being no evidence to the contrary of that produced showing such service, no conclusion other than that such service was actually made could have been reached by the judge by whom the motion was heard.

[5] Section 974 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an appeal from a justice's court may be taken at any time within 30 days after notice of the rendition of the judgment, and that the appeal is taken by filing a notice of the appeal with the justice of the peace and by serving a copy of the notice on the adverse party. The notice of the appeal herein was not served on either of the defendants until after the time prescribed by the statute had expired. Such service within the time limited was a fact without the establishment of which the superior court could not acquire jurisdiction. Coker v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 177; Dalzell v. Superior Court, 67 Cal. 453; McCracken v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 74, 24 Pac. 845; Niles v. Gonzales, 152 Cal. 93, 92 Pac. 74; Crowley, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 10 Cal. App. 344, 101 Pac. 935.

It follows that the writ should be granted. It is so ordered.

MAGGINI v. McBAIN et al. (Civ. 4770.)

1. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Judgment affirmed if evidence supports particular finding in turn supporting judgment.

If there is any evidence to support any one of the court's findings, which in turn is sufficient to support the judgment, it must be affirmed.

2. Vendor and purchaser §44—In purchaser's action to rescind evidence held to support finding of nonreliance on representations.

In purchaser's action for rescission because of misrepresentations as to acreage planted to fruit trees and previous production of the property, evidence that plaintiff, instead of talking with the owners personally, relied upon what she learned when inspecting the property and talking with her servants, and that the acreage planted to trees was plainly visible, held to support a finding that she did not rely upon defendant's alleged misrepresentations.

3. Contracts §94(5)—Proof of reliance upon misrepresentations essential to rescission.

To entitle one to succeed in action for rescission because of false representations, it is not sufficient to show merely that the representations were false and made with intent to deceive, but that they actually misled and deceived the plaintiff, and were relied upon by her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action for rescission by Lucille J. Maggini against John McBain and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph C. McComish, of San Jose, for appellant.

Maurice J. Rankin, of San Jose, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action based upon fraud. The complaint contains two causes of action, one for rescission and the second for damages; but the second cause was abandoned, and plaintiff elected to rely solely upon her claim for rescission. The controversy arises out of the sale of certain real property in the county of Santa Clara, and the basis of the action is that defendants, as owners, induced the plaintiff to purchase the property through two material misrepresentations of fact—one in regard to the acreage planted to trees and the other in regard to the previous production of the property. The trial court found that all the allegations of paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 of plaintiff's complaint were untrue. These allegations covered the making of the false representations, the falsity of the representations made, the intent to deceive, and the reliance of plaintiff upon the representations. On these findings judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

[1, 2] The sole ground urged for the reversal of the judgment is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings hereinbefore referred to. In support of the judgment respondent quotes at length from the evidence upon which the trial court based its findings. Under the well-known rule, if we find that there is any evidence in the record to support any one of the findings which in turn was sufficient to support the judgment, it is our duty to affirm the action of the trial court. On this basis we may direct our attention to the finding that the appellant did not rely upon the alleged misrepresentations, and that she did not believe them to be true, but that she did rely upon the representation of her own servants and her own agents, and went upon and inspected the land herself and investigated the truth of all representations or statements made in regard to the same. In support of this finding the evidence is that the appellant did not talk with the owners personally, but that she formed her judgment as to the value of the property and made her determination to complete the purchase upon representations of her own agents and what she saw herself when she visited the property; that prior to the sale she went with her agents for a personal inspection of the property, and walked among the trees and took a general view of the entire property. It also appeared that the only portion of the land which was planted to trees was west of or below the public road running through the property, and that the land east or above the road was used entirely for pasture. It further appeared that a portion of the land west of the road was entirely bare, and that this could be easily seen upon a casual inspection of the property. Evidence was then offered to show that the portion of the land west of or below the road consisted of forty-five acres only, and that there was no misrepresentation as to this fact. Seven or eight acres of the land below the road were not planted, and it was a small matter, therefore, to ascertain the number of acres which were actually planted in bearing fruit trees. Upon the second charge of misrepresentation, that relating to the previous production of the property, the only evidence in the record is that no such representations were made by the respondents.

[3] There is therefore sufficient evidence in the record to support the finding that the appellant did not rely upon the alleged misrepresentations and was not induced thereby to enter into the contract, but that, on the other hand, she relied entirely upon her own judgment and upon the advice and representation of her agents. This finding covers an essential element of appellant's right of action. To entitle one to recover in rescission because of false representations, it is not sufficient to show merely that the representations were false and made with intent to deceive, but it must also be shown that the false representations actually misled and deceived the party seeking rescission, and that they were relied upon by such party. Maxon-Nowlin Co. v. Norswing, 166 Cal. 509, 511, 137 Pac. 240; Hallidie v. First Federal Trust Co., 177 Cal. 600, 603, 171 Pac. 431;

Hackleman v. Lyman, 50 Cal. App. 323, 195 Pac. 263. Thus the finding of nonreliance went to an essential element of the case which the appellant was required to prove before she could have rescission. This being so, that finding in itself is sufficient to support the judgment in favor of the respondents.

Judgment affirmed.

BORKHEIM v. BORKHEIM. (Civ. 4684.)

1. Divorce ⇐184(6)—Conflict in evidence is decided by trial court, not by appellate court.

In an action for divorce for extreme cruelty, in which defendant set up a cross-complaint, the conflict in the evidence offered by the parties, to support their theories, was for determination of the trial court, and not of the appellate court.

2. Divorce ⇐127(4)—Wife's testimony supporting allegations held sufficiently corroborated.

In action for divorce based on extreme cruelty, consisting of alleged communication by defendant to plaintiff of venereal disease, contracted, as alleged, by defendant in adultery, wife's testimony held sufficiently corroborated.

3. Evidence ⇐99—Testimony to be admitted if admissible for any reason.

Evidence, if it is admissible for any reason, should be admitted.

4. Divorce ⇐116—Evidence relevant to issue of cruelty was not inadmissible merely because it proved another offense.

In an action for divorce based on extreme cruelty, consisting of an alleged communication by defendant to plaintiff of venereal disease, contracted, as alleged, by defendant in adultery, evidence that defendant committed adultery, and in so doing contracted a venereal disease which he later communicated to plaintiff, was not inadmissible, though it tended to prove the offense of adultery.

5. Evidence ⇐548—Testimony of doctor as to what he saw was not opinion.

A doctor's testimony naming and describing certain objects which he saw in his physical examinations of plaintiff and defendant was not opinion or hearsay.

6. Trial ⇐85—Overruling objection to hypothetical question held not error in absence of proper objection separating objectionable from nonobjectionable parts.

If plaintiff's hypothetical question to an expert commingled statements of facts as testified by another doctor with statements of some matters which were matters of professional opinion as distinguished from matters of fact, defendant should have so framed his objection to the hypothetical question as to separate the objectionable from the parts not objectionable, and in failing to do so it was not error to overrule the objection.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward Butler, Judge.

Action by Grace Watson Borkheim against Milton Borkheim, who set up a cross-action. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lucius L. Solomons and Fred C. Peterson, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thos. P. Boyd, of San Rafael, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal by the defendant husband from a decree awarding a divorce to his wife.

The complaint charged extreme cruelty, and specified as one of the circumstances that the defendant communicated to the plaintiff a venereal disease, gonorrhea. The defendant interposed an answer and cross-complaint. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint and a trial was had by the trial court sitting without a jury, and thereafter it made findings in favor of the respondent and against the appellant on nearly all of the issues tendered by the pleadings.

[1] It was the theory of the plaintiff that in the summer of 1920 the defendant committed adultery and at the same time contracted the disease mentioned, and that thereafter he communicated the disease to the plaintiff. On the other hand, it was the theory of the defendant that he never had the disease, although, about the time mentioned, he was afflicted with a catarrhal discharge of a prostatic origin, and that he did not communicate to the plaintiff the disease complained of. Each party offered evidence to support its theory. The conflict was a matter to be decided by the trial court, and not by this court.

The appellant contends that plaintiff had no cause of action unless she proved that defendant had gonorrhea, and, knowing that to be the fact, that he communicated the disease to the plaintiff. The respondent does not question the importance of the element of scienter, but claims that every person is supposed to know whether he is sick or well, and that we may therefore assume that at all times the defendant knew whether he was sick or well. The appellant also claims that the mere fact that one spouse was found to have a venereal disease raised no presumption that it was communicated to him or her by the other spouse. Conceding that to be the rule, we fail to find any part of the record presenting the point. The plaintiff in the trial court did not rest her case on any presumption. On the other hand, she was the first witness called to the stand, and testified fully as to her health from the day she was married down to the date of the trial, and stated all facts from which the trial court could infer, or not infer, that the defendant had communicated to the plaintiff the disease complained of.

[2] The appellant argues that a divorce may not be granted upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of the parties; but the decree in the instant case does not rest on that basis. The plaintiff stated facts showing that she was not suffering from any disease until after her intercourse with the defendant; she stated facts showing or tending to show that at the time of the intercourse, and for a short period of time prior thereto, the defendant was suffering from some sickness affecting his procreative system; and she stated facts showing that shortly after a certain act of intercourse with the defendant she was suffering from the disease above mentioned. The very nature of the case caused several doctors to see, hear, and know facts and circumstances which enabled them, at least in part, to corroborate the story told by the plaintiff. Furthermore, the plaintiff called Russell I. Wisler, who was the husband of the plaintiff's sister. The witness testified that in June the defendant admitted to him that he had had sexual intercourse with another woman about a year prior thereto. No want of corroboration appears to us, and the appellant does not specially call our attention to any element of the charge which was not corroborated.

[3, 4] Appellant objected in the trial court and now contends that the testimony of the witness Wisler tended to prove the commission of adultery, and that the issue on trial was not adultery, but was extreme cruelty. Counsel seems to claim that, if evidence is objectionable for any reason, it should be excluded. On the contrary, if it is admissible for any reason it should be admitted. Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 583, 108 Pac. 506. If the defendant wronged the plaintiff by committing adultery, and, in so doing, contracted a venereal disease, and if later he communicated that disease to the plaintiff, all of the facts were open to proof, and no one of the facts should be excluded merely because it proved an additional wrong.

[5, 6] After the date on which the plaintiff claimed that she became infected with the disease complained of, she and the defendant were treated by Dr. Hartman. For the purpose of the treatment of each case Dr. Hartman made at least one examination of the diseased parts of each patient. Later, and after this action was commenced, Dr. Hartman's deposition was taken. On the trial of the case the plaintiff read the deposition in evidence. A little later on she called Dr. Duffy as an expert witness. To him the plaintiff's attorney propounded a long hypothetical question. To that question appellant's attorney interposed a long objection, interspersed with argument. The objection contained, among other things, these passages:

"It is asking this witness as an expert to diagnose the case of Mr. Borkheim upon the diagnosis of another physician. * * * This hypothetical question, if it were based entirely upon the history given to Dr. Hartman or upon Dr. Hartman's answers, would be * * * hearsay upon hearsay."

The trial court overruled the objection and the witness answered the question. The defendant now argues vigorously that the ruling was error. The point is not supported by the record. The question did not include an opinion stated by Dr. Hartman; or, if it did, that part of the question which did involve an opinion testified to by Dr. Hartman was not specifically called to the attention of the trial court. When Dr. Hartman made his examination he saw certain objects. Later, in his testimony, he named and described them. In doing so he was not necessarily expressing an opinion, but was stating facts. If the question commingled such statement of facts with statements of some matters which were mere matters of professional opinion, as distinguished from matters of fact, then the appellant should have so framed his objection as to call to the attention of the trial court the objectionable parts—separating the objectionable parts from the parts not objectionable. This he did not do. There was no reversible error in the ruling.

The judgment is affirmed.

FREEMAN v. DONOHOE et al.
(Civ. 2589; Sac. 3308.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Dec. 26, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 21, 1924.)

1. Partnership §53—Finding of relationship held sustained by evidence.

In action for accounting in partnership affairs, evidence held to sustain a finding that the relation of partners had existed between the parties.

2. Action §32—Distinction still exists between equity and law action.

It is a mistake to say that under our system of Code pleading there is no longer a distinction between actions of a legal and those of an equitable character such as formerly prevailed when separate courts of law and equity obtained.

3. Partnership §313—Action for settlement of affairs equitable.

An action for settlement of partnership and its affairs is an equitable action and is to be considered as such in the courts of the state.

4. Equity §87(1)—Statutes of limitation not specially favored in equitable cases.

While statutes of limitation must be heeded in actions in equity and the period of time therein specified within which actions may be brought regarded as in legal actions, they are not specially favored and esteemed as are those great principles of equity which have developed through the centuries.

5. Limitation of actions §53(4)—Accounting between partners may extend back further than period specified by statute of limitations for equitable actions.

Statute of limitations does not run between partners until the accounts are settled and the balance agreed on, and items can be included in a partnership account which precede the period prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 343, relating to equitable actions.

6. Appeal and error §1008(1)—Determination of sufficiency of evidence in partnership accounting peculiarly within province of trial court.

The determination of the sufficiency of the evidence in an action for partnership accounting was a matter peculiarly within the province of the trial court.

7. Evidence §177—Report of expert accountant based upon partnership books admissible.

In an action against copartners after dissolution for an accounting, an account prepared by an expert accountant based on partnership books and books of other companies controlled by defendant partners was admissible, where the books of the firm both before and after dissolution were kept entirely by the defendants or under their supervision and plaintiff had nothing to do with their keeping nor with the management of the properties.

8. Partnership §282—Partners in possession of properties after dissolution, trustees.

Partners who, upon dissolution of the copartnership, held possession and control of its properties, became trustees for another partner and were at all times bound to such other partner in the highest good faith.

9. Trusts §289, 325—Duties of trustee as to keeping proper books of account.

Trustees are under the obligation to render to their beneficiary a full account of all their dealings with the trust funds, and, where there has been a negligent failure to keep true accounts or a refusal to account, all presumptions will be against the trustee upon a settlement.

10. Partnership §306—Value of lands of partnership on account, based on value when disposed of by defendant partners.

Where, after dissolution of partnership, defendant partners put it out of their power to deliver to the plaintiff partner, on the settlement of the partnership affairs, real estate held by the firm by selling it, the proper and only method of determining what was the interest of plaintiff in the properties was the value thereof at the time of the sale.

11. Appeal and error ☞1013—Province of determining valuations within jurisdiction of trial court.

The province of determining the valuations to be fixed upon land of partnership sold by defendant partners for the purpose of ascertaining plaintiff's interest as a partner was one within the jurisdiction of the trial court, where the evidence was conflicting.

12. Partnership ☞333—Duty of defendants in action for accounting to report dealings and transactions, and effect of failure as to credits not allowed stated.

In action by partner after dissolution for an accounting, it was the duty of defendants who were in control of the business at all times after dissolution to report an account of their dealings and transactions on account of the partnership affairs, and having claimed that there was no partnership, and having failed to so account, cannot complain because court did not allow credits to which they were entitled.

13. Partnership ☞333—Expenses incurred by partners as trustees not credited in absence of honesty.

Necessary expenses incurred by partners and trustees in relation to the management of property intrusted to their care, or over which they had control, are ordinarily allowed in proper cases; but this rule is applicable in cases of accountings made by honest and faithful members of a copartnership, and not where defendants in action for accounting absolutely denied under oath that there had ever been a partnership, maintaining this position at all times during the trial and until the filing of their brief on appeal.

14. Partnership ☞344—Joint judgment against defendants in partnership accounting held proper.

In action for partnership accounting after dissolution where all the books and properties of the partnership had been in the hands of the defendants, who denied that there was any partnership, the latter cannot complain of that joint judgment against both defendants was erroneous, in that there was no showing that defendants jointly received or were jointly responsible for the amount in respect of which the judgment was rendered.

15. Partnership ☞70—Copartners "trustees" for each other.

Partners are trustees for each other within Civ. Code, tit. Trusts, c. 1 (sections 2215-2244), and their obligations as such trustees are defined by that chapter.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trustee.]

16. Trusts ☞240—Cotrustees jointly and severally liable for breach of trust.

Where a breach of trust has affected two or more or all cotrustees with a common liability, they are liable jointly and severally, and each is liable for the whole loss sustained or the whole amount due and a decree obtained against them jointly may be enforced against any of them.

17. Partnership ☞321—Partner suing for accounting not guilty of laches.

Partner who failed to sue for an accounting for about four years after mutual dissolution held not guilty of laches, in view of evidence disclosing attempts on his part for over a year to bring about an amicable settlement and concealment by the defendants.

18. Equity ☞67—Rule as to determination of laches stated.

The question of laches must be determined by a consideration of all the facts and circumstances of the particular case; laches being a question of fact on the evidence, and each case becoming largely a law unto itself, and the matter reposing in the sound discretion of the chancellor.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

19. Limitation of actions ☞24(2)—Action held not one upon instrument in writing.

Where partnership was formed under instrument in writing and subsequently one partner surrendered his copy of the contract to a third party, who was permitted to become partner in his place, an action for an accounting by the substituted partner cannot be regarded as one upon a contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing under Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1.

20. Limitation of actions ☞39(9)—Time for suit for partnership accounting.

Code Civ. Proc. § 343, is the statute of limitation applicable in all cases involving the settlement of all the affairs of a copartnership whose existence is denied and an accounting required.

BARTLETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. By this action the plaintiff seeks an accounting and settlement of a copartnership between himself and defendants, alleged to have been entered into on or about January 1, 1907, and dissolved by mutual consent on or about the 1st day of June, 1910. The complaint in the action was filed in the superior court of Glenn county, Cal., on May 26, 1914. An amended answer to the complaint was filed on May 1, 1915. On May 19, 1915, the trial of the action began before the late Judge J. E. Prewett of Placer county, and on July 25, 1921, findings of fact and conclusions of law and judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendants were filed in the superior court of Glenn county. An appeal from this judgment has been taken by defendants to the Supreme Court and the matter has been assigned for hearing to the Appellate Court of the Third Appellate District.

As alleged in the complaint, a finding was made by the court that a copartnership was entered into between these parties in Glenn county, Cal., on or about January 1, 1907, with the object and purpose of buying and selling real estate in California, and particularly in the county of Glenn in said state, and the sale of lands and city lots on commission, and, in general, engaging in the conducting of a real estate business therein; and all profits and properties of the copartnership should be acquired equally; that it was agreed by the parties that the partnership business should be conducted under the name of H. J. Barceloux & Co.; that in accordance with the agreement a real estate business was opened in the city of Willows, Glenn county, state of California, and business continued therein until on or about June 1, 1910, at which time the partners, by mutual consent, dissolved the copartnership; that no copartnership since said dissolution has existed between the parties; and that no accounting of the partnership business has ever been had between the copartners, save and except the accounting involved in this action.

The trial court found that during the existence of the copartnership its business affairs were conducted continuously by the defendant without consultation on their part with plaintiff; that after the dissolution of the partnership, defendants denied that the relation of partners had ever existed between them and plaintiff, and from the time of dissolution continuously denied such relationship, and retained in their possession all the property of the copartnership, claiming to own the same themselves and claiming plaintiff had no interest therein; and that he had never been a member of the copartnership; and that though requested so to do after the dissolution, appellants refused to recognize plaintiff as a partner, and refused to account to plaintiff for any of the business and transactions that had been had, and excluded plaintiff from any participation in the affairs and business, and any enjoyment of any of the profits and properties of the copartnership.

The trial court also found that plaintiff, after the dissolution, repeatedly demanded an account of the receipts and disbursements of the copartnership, and a one-third part therein which plaintiff claimed to be his, and that defendants at all times refused to in any manner account to plaintiff, or to deliver any part of the properties of the copartnership to plaintiff.

By their amended answer defendants, after denying all the allegations of the complaint, set forth, as separate answers and defenses: One, alleging that the cause of action set forth in the complaint, and the whole of the same, was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure; another, that the cause of action set forth in the complaint, and the whole thereof, was barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure; another, that the cause of action set forth in the complaint, and the whole thereof, was barred by the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, another, that plaintiff was guilty of laches and unreasonable delay in bringing the action.

The trial court found against defendants on each of the separate defenses interposed, as well as upon the main cause of action.

At every stage of the trial in the superior court the defendants vigorously resisted respondent's claim that a copartnership of any kind ever existed between the parties, as alleged in the complaint; but that such a copartnership existed they now admit in the briefs, both opening and reply, which they have submitted on this appeal. In the opening brief (pages 4 and 5) defendants say:

"We do not propose to challenge the findings of the court as to the existence of the alleged partnership and will confine ourselves to the points hereinafter set forth."

"We expressly stated in our opening brief that we did not intend to dispute such finding, although we disputed, and still dispute, that certain properties included in the accounting did not form a part of the partnership assets."

This admission of the defendants simplifies, in great degree, the solution of the question presented by this appeal.

The trial of the cause was conducted by Judge Prewett on these lines: First, evidence showing the partnership relation, both oral and documentary, was taken. At its close, an interlocutory decree directing an accounting before a referee was made. The referee was appointed, and thereupon he heard evidence, oral and documentary, and said referee secured the services of an expert accountant to examine and submit a report on the business transactions from the beginning of the partnership to the time of accounting. The findings of the referee were then reported to the court, after which the court heard evidence, and a number of objections interposed by defendants to the referee's findings and made and filed an order directing the findings and judgment in favor of the plaintiff involved herein. The interlocutory decree and opinion of the court before referred to will assist in an understanding of the matters and evidence involved in this action, they being as follows:

"Interlocutory Order.

"* * * In this case it is ordered that the motion of defendants for a nonsuit (having been made after the submission of the case) be and the same is hereby dismissed.

"By this interlocutory order, it is further ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff is entitled to an accounting of the affairs of the partnership described in the complaint, and it is further ordered that such accounting be had.

"It is further ordered that such accounting be had before John Graves, hereby appointed as a referee for that purpose.

"It is further ordered that said referee take evidence and report a finding of facts as to the following properties:

"The Hastings Land, section 16; Deveny tract; Bailey tract; Dixon tract; Watt land; Barceloux 320 acres; Igllick land; Rice land; Reager or Rogers land and commissions thereon under contract with Armstrong, Quatman & Co.; also other commissions due from said firm; Glenn county irrigated farms and commissions; Kelly lands; Willows Land & Improvement Company's lands; Selby lands; Cartenberg lands, as follows; to wit:

"(a) As to lands heretofore sold, the amount of proceeds arising from such sales;

"(b) As to commissions earned by H. J. Barceloux & Co. or by any of the parties to this action, the amount thereof;

"(c) As to any of the above-mentioned lands that yet remain unsold, the value thereof and the amounts contributed by each party to the purchase and handling thereof; the amount received by each party in the way of rents or other profits;

"(d) A division of the unsold lands in three parts of equal value and a memorandum of office fixtures and personalty.

"(e) Independently of the matters embraced in the subdivisions of this order marked or designated 'd' the amount due from the two remaining partners to the plaintiff, as may be shown by items 'a' and 'b'.

"It is ordered that the said reference be completed at the earliest practicable date, and duly reported to this court.

"Done in open court this 22d day of October, 1915. J. E. Prewett, Judge.

"Filed October 25, 1915."

"Opinion and Order.

"The complaint avers the formation of a partnership between Frank Freeman, C. L. Donohoe, and H. J. Barceloux, commencing about the beginning of the year 1908, and terminating about June 1, 1910.

"The above parties from time to time in various real estate transactions—sometimes each singly, at other times two participating, and at other times all three. Whether those transactions in which all three participated constituted partnership transactions or merely joint ventures constitutes the principal question for the determination of the court.

"The relations of the parties appear to be exceptionally strained, and the case itself has developed much bitterness. The case is replete with charges of fraud, forgeries, mutilations, erasures, perjury, suppression of evidence, and destruction of books. This court will make no attempt to determine those matters save as they may necessarily arise in the course of the decision of the case.

"In the year 1907, C. L. Donohoe, H. J. Barceloux, and Mr. Gutman formed a copartnership for the purpose of dealing in real estate. Each partner contributed a small sum for the purpose of starting the business. Near the close of the year, Mr. Gutman retired from the business and turned his interests over to Frank Freeman, delivering to the latter his copy of the copartnership agreement. Mr. Gutman inquired of the remaining copartners whether or not it was satisfactory for Mr. Freeman to enter the partnership, and was informed by them that it was. Thereupon he informed Mr. Freeman of this fact, and Mr. Freeman claims that he thereupon and thereby entered the partnership.

"Mr. Donohoe and Barceloux insist that upon the retirement of Mr. Gutman the copartnership was dissolved and was never reorganized. This contention, however, cannot be sustained. Whether or not Mr. Freeman became a member of the partnership, there seems to be no question whatever, and that the firm of H. J. Barceloux & Co. continued to do business for a number of years. It kept a set of books, employed and paid a bookkeeper, rented and maintained an office, paid rent, displayed signs, used letter heads, and handled a vast volume of business. I take it that every resident of Willows during the years 1908 and 1909 would have stated without hesitation that there existed a well-known firm transacting business under the firm name of H. J. Barceloux & Co.

"That Mr. Freeman was a member of this firm is not quite so certain, yet the burden of proof very largely predominates in favor of that conclusion. If the evidence of the parties to this action be eliminated, there is scarcely a doubt of it. It seems that practically every fact in the case which does not in any way depend upon the oral testimony of the litigants tends to show that he was such a partner.

"Exhibits 2, 3, and 4 (copies) if genuine, establish the plaintiff's case. That they are genuine must be held by the court. It is true that they emanate from unfriendly sources, but the manner of their production, and especially the testimony of Miss Pierce, tends to show that they are genuine. (Copies of Exhibits 2 and 3 and 4 follow this opinion herein.)

"Exhibit 1 was written on the typewriter usually used by Mr. Donohoe. Examination of the characters '08,' 'a,' 'bar,' and especially the bottom of the letter 'x' show this. The fact that it was so written is not by any means conclusive, but it is a circumstance of much weight. Even if it was written at the instance of the plaintiff, it was written at a time when the parties were very warm friends, and when there existed no temptation to fabricate a case.

"The loss by the defendants of their copartnership books is an unfortunate circumstance and must be permitted to weigh to some extent against them. It seems quite certain that these books would throw much light upon the question now under review.

"The correspondence between the parties tends to show that the copartnership existed. Out of the 30 or 40 exhibits, letters offered in evidence, almost all of them emanate from the plaintiff.

"The contention that a settlement was arrived at between the parties in June, 1910, is clearly a mistake. This conclusion seems to be almost mathematical in its certainty, since many of the items included in it did not transpire until long after that date. At most, the defendants are mistaken in their remembrance of the fact.

"Exhibit 15 was given by defendants to plaintiff as a memorandum showing the probable profits of their joint efforts. This exhibit is a very important document in this connection. Not only does it go far to establish the existence of a partnership, but it purports to contain a résumé of its transactions and properties. (A copy of Exhibit 15 follows this opinion.)

"Upon the whole, the conclusion seems to be fully established that the copartnership set out in the complaint was formed at the time stated and that it handled the properties enumerated in Exhibit 15.

"The motion to strike out the answer must prevail for the reason that it was filed without leave of the court. The evidence as to the stipulation is so conflicting that it must be held that the burden (which admittedly rests upon the defendants) has not been sufficiently overcome.

"Moreover, courts are very loath to permit amendments whose purpose it is to plead the statute of limitations.

"Let an order be entered striking out the amended answer.

"The case is perhaps in condition for final judgment. Still, if either party wishes to offer any further evidence upon the point as to the properties and values, such party may so indicate within five days and the case will be set down for further hearing as to said point.

"If no such wish be indicated, then the plaintiff will prepare, serve, and file proposed findings and decree. Prewett, J."

Nothing appears in the record showing that either of the parties availed themselves of the opportunity to offer further evidence after Judge Prewett made his order as to findings and judgment, as above set forth.

The judgment entered and from which this appeal is taken adjudges that plaintiff have and recover from defendants jointly and severally the sum of $31,504.85, in lawful money of the United States, with interest thereon from the date of the institution of the action, May 26, 1914, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, making a total of $47,260.31.

The judgment adjudges and decrees that plaintiff and defendants were copartners doing a general real estate business in Glenn county, state of California, during the times stated in the complaint and until the dissolution of the partnership on June 1, 1910; that a number of parcels of real properties, particularly described in paragraph 8 of the judgment, was and is the property of the copartnership, and that plaintiff, when the action was instituted and when the judgment was rendered, was the owner of an undivided one-third of these real properties, and that defendants were and are the owners of the remaining two-thirds thereof; that all of the debts and obligations of every kind of said copartnership from its organization to the time of the accounting and from that time to the giving of the judgment are fully paid, satisfied, and settled; that the partnership did not have when the action was commenced, nor has it had since, nor is it now the owner of any other property, real, personal, or mixed, other than its profits in the lands above referred to, save and except certain interests in properties which are described in subdivision 6 of the judgment, to which properties described in said subdivision 6 of the judgment plaintiff filed a relinquishment of any right and interest which he might have, renouncing all claims of every kind and nature thereto and consenting that the same be awarded by the judgment to the defendants, and the same were so awarded.

The judgment further created a lien against the defendants in favor of plaintiff upon and against all the right, title, and interest of the defendants, and each of them, in and to the unsold real property, which was undisposed of and described in paragraph 8 of the judgment, to secure the payment of the money judgment in favor of the plaintiff rendered in the action.

The unsold partnership real property is fully described and set forth in paragraph 8 of the judgment, and these properties are directed to be sold, either as a whole, or in separate parcels, by the sheriff of the county of Glenn, who is appointed a commissioner and invested with the legal title to said real property and directed to sell the same as a whole, or in separate parcels as he might determine to be to the best interests of the parties at public sale, at a time to be fixed by the commissioner within 90 days from the entry of the judgment, upon notice of at least 15 days, and that at the sale any of the parties to the action might become a purchaser of any part thereof, and directing the commissioner to acknowledge and deliver deeds by the commissioner, conveying to the purchasers of the properties all the right, title, and interest of the copartnership and of the plaintiff and defendants in and to said properties upon receipt of the purchase prices from the purchasers and directing that the commissioner retain out of the proceeds received by him costs, charges, and expenses paid out and due him and the payment of the remainder of said proceeds to the clerk of the trial court, said clerk to pay to the plaintiff one-third of the net proceeds for and on account of his one-third interest in such properties and so much of the remaining two-thirds of these proceeds as may be necessary to the liquidation of any liens remaining unpaid at that time on the judgment; said clerk to thereupon enter in the judgment book of the court in which the judgment is recorded a credit of the amount of money paid to plaintiff representing the two-thirds interest of the defendants, and the clerk to pay to the defendants any proceeds remaining after the payment ordered made to the plaintiff. The judgment also adjudges and decrees that the plaintiff recover his costs, which were taxed at the sum of $731.85. The judgment is dated July 19, 1921, and signed by J. E. Prewett, as judge, and indorsed as filed July 25, 1921, by W. H. Sale, county clerk.

Exhibit 15, referred to in the opinion and order of Judge Prewett, hereinbefore set forth, is as follows:

Plaintiff's Exhibit 1.

"Know all men by these presents: That H. J. Barceloux, G. A. Gutman, and C. L. Donohoe, all of the county of Glenn, state of California, have this day associated themselves together as copartners, and by these presents do agree to become copartners in business together, under the firm name and style of H. J. Barceloux & Co., in the business of buying and selling real estate and personal property in the state of California, and in doing a general insurance business in the county of Glenn, state of California. This partnership is to commence on the date hereof and to continue until hereafter dissolved by mutual consent, operation of law or judgment of a court, and it is agreed that at all times during their copartnership that they shall and will bear, pay and discharge equally between them all rents and other expenses that may be required for the support and management of the said business; that all gains, profits and increase that shall come, grow, or arise from or by means of said business shall be divided between them share and share alike, and that all loss that shall happen to their joint business by bad debts or otherwise shall be borne and paid equally between them.

"In witness whereof, the parties have hereunto set their hands and seals this 2d day of March, 1907.

Charles L. Donohoe.

"G. A. Gutman.

"H. J. Barceloux."

[1] The statement of Judge Prewett, "In the year 1907 C. L. Donohoe, H. J. Barceloux, and Mr. Gutman formed a copartnership for the purpose of dealing in real estate. Each partner contributed a small sum for the purpose of starting the business. Near the close of the year Mr. Gutman retired from the business and turned his interests over to Frank Freeman, delivering to the latter his copy of the copartnership agreement. Mr. Gutman inquired of the remaining copartners whether or not it was satisfactory for Mr. Freeman to enter the partnership, and was informed by them that it was. Thereupon he informed Mr. Freeman of this fact, and Mr. Freeman claims that he thereupon and thereby entered the partnership,"—is a clear and concise statement, fully supported by the evidence as to the inception and creation of the formation of the copartnership involved herein.

G. A. Gutman was examined as a witness at the trial of the action, and his evidence shows that, prior to the transfer to Mr. Freeman of his interest, some business in the way of insurance and commissions had been transacted by himself and the defendants under the copartnership.

In their able and elaborate opening brief on this appeal, appellants urge the following grounds for reversal: (1) The plaintiff's right to an accounting was barred by the statute of limitations; (2) even if the plaintiff's right to an accounting was not barred by the statute, the accounting could not extend backwards for a period of more than two years prior to the commencement of the action; (3) the accounting improperly included therein transactions not the subject of accounting between the parties; (4) evidence was improperly admitted to ascertain the figures upon which the accounting was made; (5) the referee and the expert accountant considered and passed upon matters not within the scope of their authority; (6) the court erred in not allowing defendants credits to which they were entitled; (7) the court failed to charge the plaintiff with moneys with which he was properly chargeable; (8) the valuation of certain properties disposed of after dissolution should have been made as of the time of the same being acquired or of dissolution and not as of disposition, and the values found by the referee were against the weight of the evidence; (9) the judgment is erroneous in that it is a joint judgment against both defendants based upon an accounting which fails to show that such defendants jointly received or were jointly responsible for the amount in respect of which the judgment was rendered; (10) the judgment is erroneous in that it is a joint judgment against both defendants, whereas the evidence shows that some of the moneys included in the judgment were received by one of the defendants alone; (11) the judgment is erroneous in that there is no finding that either defendant was a constructive trustee; (12) the findings of the court and referee were erroneous and also fail to justify the judgment; (13) plaintiff was guilty of laches.

[2, 3] Because of this being an action in equity, and not one at law, much of the argument of counsel for appellants and the authorities cited do not uphold the positions which they urge as reasons for the reversal of the judgment. A mistaken idea is often entertained and asserted that, under our system of Code pleading, there is no longer a distinction between actions of a legal and those of an equitable character, such as formerly prevailed when separate courts of law and equity obtained. The provisions of section 4, art. 6, of the Constitution of the state, providing that the Supreme Court should have appellate jurisdiction of appeals from the superior court in all cases in equity, except such as arise from justice's courts; that the District Courts of Appeal "shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases, matters and proceedings pending before the Supreme Court which shall be ordered transferred by the Supreme Court to the District Courts of Appeal for hearing and decision," and section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, providing that "the superior court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity and in all cases at law which involve the title of real property, etc.," of themselves, show the recognition of a distinction in the legal and equitable proceedings in actions brought on for trial in the superior courts of the state. There can be no question that an action for the settlement of a partnership and its affairs is an equitable action and to be considered as such in the courts of this state. In the case of Marston v. Kuh- land, 2 Cal. App. 316, 84 Pac. 357, the court said:

"This is an action for the enforcement of a trust and for an accounting. The appeal is taken directly to this court. By section 4, article VI, of the Constitution of the state, 'appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts in all cases in equity, except such as arise in justice's courts,' is given to the Supreme Court. By the same section and article of the Constitution it is provided that 'no appeal taken to the Supreme or to a District Court of Appeal shall be dismissed for the reason only that the same was not taken to the proper court, but the cause shall be transferred to the proper court upon such terms as to costs or otherwise as may be just, and shall be proceeded with therein as if regularly appealed to.' In perfecting the appeal, these provisions of the Constitution were doubtless overlooked by appellant. When the cause was argued and submitted here it was assumed by the court that it was here by order of reference of the Supreme Court, the notice of appeal not having been called to our attention. The case is clearly one 'in equity' and is appealable only to the Supreme Court, which alone has jurisdiction in the first instance."

It is clear that an action for an accounting of a partnership is an action in equity, for it is beyond question that it is an action to carry out a trust arising because of the provisions of section 2410 of the Civil Code, "the relations of partners are confidential. They are trustees for each other within the meaning of chapter 1 of the title on trusts, and their obligations as such trustees are defined by that chapter."

"Where a fiduciary relation exists between parties, and the duty rests upon the defendant to render an account to the plaintiff, equity will entertain jurisdiction of a suit for an accounting, although the account is neither mutual nor complicated. The most common of such cases are those involving trustees, guardians, executors and administrators, partners, agents and cotenants. Although it is the trust relation involved in such cases which gives jurisdiction to a court of equity, the relation need not be the strictly technical relation of trustee and cestui que trust, a quasi relation being sufficient." Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) § 2358.

" * * * The equitable jurisdiction is also practically exclusive in proceedings for an account and settlement of partnership affairs, including suits for an accounting and settlement of the firm affairs between the copartners themselves; suits for a settlement of the firm affairs between the survivors and the executors or administrators of the deceased, when a partner has died; and suits to settle the affairs of an insolvent firm, and to adjust the demands of the firm creditors and the creditors of the individual partners. The equitable jurisdiction over partnerships is a necessary outgrowth of the jurisdiction over accounting, and the remedies of dissolution, injunction, and receivership are incidents necessary to a final and complete relief." Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) § 2362.

Subdivision 1 of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, under which appellants claim plaintiff's action is barred which reads: "Within two years, (1) an action upon a contract, obligation or liability, not founded upon an instrument of writing, other than that mentioned in subdivision 2 of section 337 of this Code," does not authorize defendants' contention that plaintiff is barred from any relief by the provisions of this section. Neither can his contention be upheld that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of subdivision 4 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an action must be commenced within three years where it seeks relief upon the ground of fraud or mistake and that a cause of action in such case is not deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake. It is clear that the section regarding limitations applicable towards actions such as that now before the court is section 343, Code of Civil Procedure, which is as follows:

"An action for relief not hereinbefore provided for must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued."

While this court is satisfied that the only statute of limitations that can be pleaded as a bar to an action seeking an accounting and settlement of a copartnership is the above section, where an accounting and settlement is refused one of the partners, there is the further statute of limitations contained in section 337, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that any action upon any contract, obligation, or liability founded upon an instrument in writing may be brought within four years, which, under the facts in this case, would overcome any pleas of the action being barred, as the original agreement out of which this case arises was the partnership agreement in writing made among Gutman, Donohoe, and Barceloux, the organization thereunder of the firm of H. J. Barceloux & Co., and the subsequent transfer of the interest of Gutman in such partnership to the plaintiff with the consent of the two other members, Donohoe and Barceloux, the defendants herein.

The distinction between cases at law and those in equity has been drawn in a number of instances by the Supreme Court of this state from a very early period. In Barnstead v. Empire Mining Co., 5 Cal. 299, it was held that one partner could not sue the other in an action at law. The remedy is by bill in equity for a dissolution and an accounting. In Wheeler v. Farmer, 38 Cal. 203, it was held that no action at law can be maintained, nor can an attachment be sued out by one partner against another for any money involving partnership affairs. In Ross v. Cornell, 45 Cal. 133, it was held that one partner retiring from a firm cannot be sued for money alleged to be due in partnership transactions until there has been a final settlement of firm accounts and a balance has been struck. In Gleason v. White, 34 Cal. 258, it is held that the relation of debtor and creditor between the surviving partner and the representative of a deceased partner does not arise until the affairs of the copartnership have been wound up and the balance struck, and this balance is to be struck after all the partnership affairs have been settled and not while they are being wound up. In Pico v. Cuyas, 47 Cal. 174, it is said:

"If the lessor of a hotel, after the lease is made, enters into a contract of partnership with the lessee in keeping the same, the lessor cannot sue at law for the rent reserved in the lease, but must sue in equity for a partnership accounting."

In Fisher v. Sweet, 67 Cal. 228, 7 Pac. 657, it is held that a partner cannot maintain an action against his copartner to recover his proportion of the partnership proceeds until the accounts of the firm have been settled.

In Dukes v. Kellogg, 127 Cal. 563, 60 Pac. 44, it was held that a partner cannot sue his copartner in an action at law unless an accounting and settlement of the partnership accounts is alleged in the complaint.

The issuance of the writ of supersedeas in the case at bar by the Supreme Court of California, reported in 188 Cal. 170, 204 Pac. 593, and the suspension thereby of the bond in double the amount of the money judgment to stay the issuance and levy of an execution as would be required in the case of the ordinary legal action, has arisen through this case requiring a special equitable procedure to carry out the judgment and strongly illustrates the distinction which obtains between actions of a legal and equitable nature.

[4] While statutes of limitation must be heeded in actions in equity and the period of time therein specified within which actions may be brought regarded as in legal actions, they are not specially favored and esteemed, as are those great principles of equity which have developed through the centuries. Statutes of limitation have well been denominated "statutes of repose." There are actions where it is salutary to invoke their aid. But, as said by the trial court in this case, in his order for findings and judgment, hereinbefore set forth, "moreover, courts are very loath to permit amendments whose purpose it is to plead the statute of limitation." That section 343, Code of Civil Procedure, is the statute of limitation applicable in the courts of this state in all cases involving the settlement of all the affairs of a copartnership whose existence is denied and an accounting required, is clearly established by the decisions in a number of instances by the appellate courts of California.

The case of Piller v. S. P. Co., 52 Cal. 42, is considered and discussed by counsel for both appellants and respondent in their briefs. That was a personal action for negligence, brought over two years after the injuries were suffered. Claim was made that section 343, Code of Civil Procedure, applied instead of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, subdivision 1. The court held that the action, being one at law, subdivision 1 of section 339 governed, saying:

"We are of opinion that the two years' limitation found in the first clause of the first subdivision of section 339 is applicable to all actions at law not specifically mentioned in other portions of the statute. We say actions at law advisedly, since section 343 fixes the time within which certain bills in equity may be filed. In arriving at the intent of the law-makers, as expressed in the statute, it is proper to consider the history of legislation in respect to the same subject in our own state, and in the country from which our laws in the main derived. The English statutes of limitations were not, by their terms, applicable to suits in equity, because the words used applied only to particular legal remedies. It was at one time much discussed whether courts of equity acted in analogy to, or were within the spirit of, the statutes, and so, in a sense, acted in obedience to them; it is certain, however, that, except in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, courts of equity acted only in analogy to the limitations at law.

"While by our Code all distinctions in pleading between suits at law and in equity are abolished, the different forms of declaration at the common law existed so long, and became so ingrained in the legal habit of thought, that the very codifiers themselves have been contented to copy the provisions of the English statutes in respect to personal actions, sometimes substituting for the technical names employed in those statutes what was supposed to be their equivalent in ordinary English. Thus reading the statute, the four years' limitation of section 343 applies to all suits in equity not strictly of concurrent cognizance in law and equity."

In Dore v. Thornburgh, 90 Cal. 64, 27 Pac. 30, 25 Am. St. Rep. 100, which was a case brought upon a foreign judgment, it was held that it was not barred by the statute of limitations within two years under section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, but falls within the provisions of section 343, representing actions not otherwise provided for, and is not barred by the statute until four years after the cause of action has accrued. In West v. Russell, 74 Cal. 544, 16 Pac. 392, which was an action brought by the administrator of an estate against the administrator and heirs of an estate for an accounting of property and for a judgment directing the delivery of certain properties to the plaintiff, it was held that the statute of limitations under which the demurrer to the complaint was sustained was section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the same barred the relief asked; many years in excess of four years having elapsed before the commencement of the action. In the case of Rowe v. Simmons, 113

Cal. 688, 45 Pac. 983, which was an action to dissolve an alleged partnership, the statute of limitations was pleaded, and the court found that the cause of action set forth in the amended complaint was barred by the provisions of section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In McArthur v. Blaisdell, 159 Cal. 604, 115 Pac. 52, an action for an accounting, alleging the existence of a partnership between parties and in which the trial court found that the cause of action set forth in the amended complaint, was barred by the provisions of sections 337 and 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In reversing the same it was held that, as the complaint alleged that the contract was completed on July 21, 1899, which was the basis of the action, and which was not denied, the cause of action having been begun on July 20, 1903, it was not barred, citing Code of Civil Procedure, § 343. In Allsopp v. Joshua Hendy Machine Works, 5 Cal. App. 228, 90 Pac. 39, an action for an accounting between the agent and the principal, it was held that the statute of limitations applicable was section 343, Code of Civil Procedure.

It is clear that plaintiff's right to an accounting in this case is not barred by any statute of limitation of the state of California.

[5] The contention that "even if the plaintiff's right to an accounting was not barred by the statute, the accounting could not extend backwards for a period of more than two years prior to the commencement of the action," cannot be sustained.

The doctrine in this regard is as given in the case of Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 566, 17 Pac. 702:

"The statute of limitations does not run between partners until the accounts are settled and the balance agreed upon."

It must be borne in mind that the accounting in this case is an accounting of the affairs of a copartnership in an equitable proceeding, and that in the term "accounting" in such action is included many things that would not be included in that term if the account were a legal one based upon the transactions of merchants in the ordinary affairs of trade, or on a mutual, open, and current account in which the charges and credits might consist of something other than mere money charges. Here the matters in dispute were not only moneys, but of interests in lands and other matters for adjudication and settlement. The trial court, in the interlocutory decree directing an accounting, orders and adjudges that the plaintiff is entitled to an accounting of the affairs of the copartnership described in the complaint, and orders that such accounting be had. It does not limit the account to any fixed period of time preceding the bringing of the action. The purpose of the account was to arrive at a balance ascertained from the time of the creation of the partnership to the time of the conclusion of the taking of evidence by the referee, or by the court, if further evidence were required.

Appellants' authorities which they cite do not support their claim that no items can be included in a partnership account which precedes the period prescribed by the statute for the recovery on ordinary accounts. Great reliance is placed by them on Flynn v. Seale, 2 Cal. App. 665, 84 Pac. 263, and Hamilton Brass Co. v. Barr Cash, etc., 38 Canada S. C. R. 216. In the case of Flynn v. Seale, supra, the partner defendant, Seale, had paid out moneys to a bank for the purpose of liquidating and discharging an obligation of his to the bank, which was his individual obligation under the terms of the partnership contract. The court held:

"An individual obligation is not a matter of set off to a partnership claim or to a claim by the plaintiff in a representative capacity; nor can a partnership debt be a set-off to a claim by one of the members of the partnership."

In the case of Hamilton Brass, etc., Co. v. Barr Cash, etc., supra, an examination of the decision discloses that the relation of the parties was that of agency instead of partnership, and that quarterly reports and accounting of sales were agreed to be made, and divisions of the profits made thereon, and the right to sue existed from the time these profits were determined at the end of each quarter. The court holds the relation was not in the ordinary sense a partnership, and it also holds that if questions of fraud were involved the statute of limitations would not be applicable even in the action on the account the Supreme Court of Canada was discussing.

The case of Carter v. Canty, 181 Cal. 749, 186 Pac. 346, has no application, as the action involved merely the ascertaining of a balance of account on a claim for legal services and payments, in money made on the claim. No partnership matter was involved.

[6] The appellants' contention that "the accounting improperly included therein transactions not the subject of accounting between the parties" cannot be upheld under the evidence introduced before the referee and the court. The determination of the sufficiency of the same was a matter peculiarly within the province of the trial court. The evidence in regard to the ownership and disposition of what are described as "Willows Land & Improvement Company's Lands," the "Bailey" land, the "Rogers" land, and "Cartenberg" land, is conflicting; but there is evidence showing transactions in relation to these lands prior to the dissolution of the partnership, and it has been determined by the trial court on the evidence introduced that they were properties of the partnership and subject to an accounting in this action.

was improperly admitted to ascertain the figures upon which the account was made" cannot be sustained. The evidence shows that the preparation of the accounts was referred to an expert accountant, and in the trial court objection was made to the admission of the account on the various grounds of irrelevancy, immateriality, and incompetency, and these objections were heard and considered by the trial court and overruled and the report admitted and almost entirely adopted by the referee and the court. The records used by the expert from which he made his report were the books of Barceloux & Co. and those of the Armstrong-Quatman Company. The Armstrong-Quatman Company conducted the San Francisco end of the business, in which they were interested with the firm of H. J. Barceloux & Co.

The books which the accountants examined were the books of the partnership during the time of its existence and after its dissolution up to the time of the accounting. Also the books of the Sacramento Valley Realty Company, which were controlled entirely by the defendants in this case from the time of its incorporation up to the time of the accounting, also books of the Armstrong-Quatman Company, in which were kept a good portion of the accounts as to land subdivisions involved in this action and commissions earned and which accounts were balanced and compared by Barceloux & Co. and relied upon by Barceloux in all such matters, Barceloux being the member of the firm in charge of the books of account of H. J. Barceloux & Co. The books of the firm both before and after the dissolution of the partnership were kept entirely by the defendants, or under their supervision, the plaintiff had nothing to do with their keeping nor with the management of the properties, and all the properties, both real and personal, of the partnership, were after the dissolution of the copartnership held in the possession and control of the defendants.

[8] The two defendants upon the dissolution of the copartnership became trustees for the plaintiff, and being trustees, were at all times during the existence of the partnership and after its dissolution bound to the plaintiff in the highest good faith.

[9] The rule relative to the duties of trustees as to keeping proper books of account and the rendering of full accounts of their dealings with the trust funds is clearly announced in the case of Purdy v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 521, 163 Pac. 893, where it is said that—

"Trustees are under an obligation to render to their beneficiaries a full account of all their dealings with the trust fund, and where there has been a negligent failure to keep true accounts, or a refusal to account, all presumptions will be against the trustee upon a settlement."

The case of Roberts v. Eldred, 73 Cal. 394, 15 Pac. 16, which was a case for dissolution of a copartnership and accounting, disclosed a condition of the books of account such as compelled the preparation of books prepared by experts who were employed by the referee and which books were made up of imperfect books kept by the defendant in the case. Speaking of the books kept by the defendant, the court, on page 396 of 73 Cal., 15 Pac. 17, said:

"Many of the accounts which he did keep were false, and credit was not given to plaintiff in cases where it ought to have been. It will not do for defendant to take refuge behind such books as these. If the result which the referee and the court arrived at was not correct, the record should have made the error appear. The only thing which is clearly apparent from this record beside the misconduct of the defendant is hopeless confusion in the accounts. It is eminently a case where the action of the court below should not be disturbed."

[10-12] The contention of appellants that "the referee in the said accounting considered and passed upon matters not within the scope of his authority" cannot be sustained. They insist that under the interlocutory decree specifying the respective portions of land in respect to which the account was to be made limited the referee to the taking of evidence and reporting simply an account of the money proceeds from sales. The report of the referee shows that his valuations on some of the lands involved was based upon evidence taken before the referee showing what the value of the land was at the time of the making of the sales. The sales made by the defendants after the dissolution put it out of their power to deliver to the plaintiff on the settlement of the partnership affairs his share of the property sold, and it would appear that the only methods of determining what was the interest of plaintiff in those properties, of which he was deprived through the sale, would be the value thereof at the time of the making of the sale. As to the evidence taken for the purposes of determining the value of these lands sold, the province of determining the valuations to be fixed was one within the jurisdiction of the trial court; it being based on conflicting evidence. Appellants urge that the court erred in not allowing defendants credits to which they were entitled. Had defendants, in response to plaintiff's complaint, appeared in the action and by their answers submitted a report and account of their dealings and transactions on account of the partnership affairs, as it was their duty to so do, they would then be in a position to complain of the action of the trial court. This they did not do, but, on the contrary, denied there were any partnership affairs to adjudicate.

[13] In relation to the contention of defendants that the necessary expenses incurred by partners and trustees in relation to the management of property intrusted to their care, or over which they had control, are ordinarily allowed in proper cases, it may be said that this rule is applicable in cases of accountings made by honest and faithful members of a copartnership. These defendants absolutely denied under oath that there had ever been any partnership existing between them and the plaintiff, and they maintained this position at all times during the trial of this case and until the filing of their brief in this court. From the time of the dissolution of the copartnership they denied that plaintiff had any interest whatever in any of the properties included in the accounting. The report of the expert set forth in the appendix to appellants' opening brief shows that no exceptions were taken to the expert's report on the Deveny tract, in which there were net profits of $4,750.34, of which plaintiff's share was $1,583.45, of the Dixon tract on the property of which there was due plaintiff $509.43, of the Watt tract, in which the plaintiff was entitled to profits of $1,177.54, of the Rice land, in which plaintiff's share of profits was $424.00, of the Kelly land, in which plaintiff's share of profits was $423.17, and the Selby lands in which plaintiff's share of profits was $1,238.89, and net commissions from various transactions, of which plaintiff's share of profits was $917.98. Their answer to plaintiff's complaint denied the having of any moneys or properties of plaintiff in their hands.

Having failed to present anything in any way of an answer to plaintiff's complaint requiring an examination by the court into the transactions on behalf of the defendants with the partnership which would show the amount of moneys expended by them and with which they should be charged in the settlement of any account, they are not now in a position to claim error on behalf of the trial court in not allowing defendants credits to which they were entitled, if there are any to which they were entitled. They did not even avail themselves of the opportunity afforded to offer any evidence they desired to produce by virtue of the order allowing further time to submit further evidence, if they so desired, made by the trial judge when he directed findings and judgment in this case.

[14] There is no merit in the contention of appellants that the judgment is erroneous because it is a joint judgment against both defendants based upon an accounting which fails to show that such defendants jointly received or were jointly responsible for the amount in respect of which the judgment was rendered. The matter of showing how the moneys were received by defendants, and the amounts and disposition of the same, was peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants. They handled the partnership properties and proceeds therefrom, had charge of the partnership accounts, and plaintiff had nothing to do with this function of the partnership business. If defendants desired in this action a settlement of its affairs between themselves, they could have secured such adjudication through proper pleadings admitting the partnership relation and setting forth the transactions and asking the proper relief. The only relief they sought by their answer was "that the prayer of plaintiff's complaint be denied in whole and that the defendants have judgment for their costs."

The case of Eisentraut v. Cornelius, 134 Wis. 532, 115 N. W. 142, 126 Am. St. Rep. 1027, cited by defendants, does not uphold the contention, but, on the contrary, shows that the procedure taken and followed in that case was along the lines above suggested.

The contention that the trial court failed to charge plaintiff with moneys with which he was properly chargeable is not sustained by the evidence. Defendants claim that at the time of the dissolution of the partnership there was due from one C. M. Wooster $15,737.24 commissions earned by the partnership, and that defendants sued to collect this sum, making plaintiff a party defendant because he would not join with them in the action. Plaintiff afterwards, defendants claim, compromised the action and accepted $7,240.80 as a consideration of the compromise. Defendants dismissed the action, plaintiff paid part of the moneys received by him to the defendant Donohoe, and a settlement and adjudication as to these moneys is contained in finding No. XI of the trial court. As to whether the amount of these commissions was $15,737.24, as claimed by defendants, or $7,240.80, the evidence was conflicting, and the statement (Exhibit 16) made by the defendant Donohoe to plaintiff makes as the estimate of profits in this matter $9,000 instead of $15,737.24. Under the rules applying to findings of trial courts on conflicting evidence, it cannot be said that the matter of the Wooster commissions was not properly settled by the trial court.

The claim that the judgment is erroneous because of being a joint judgment against both the defendants, and that the evidence shows that some of the moneys included in the judgment were received by one of the defendants alone, cannot be upheld. Defendants, had they admitted the partnership in this action and alleged by appropriate allegations in separate answers, if there was a dispute between them, or in a joint answer if they were agreed upon the balances as to moneys and properties of the partnership in their hands, might have obtained a decree settling all the affairs of the partnership between the individual partners. By their answer denying a partnership they precluded the determining of the liabilities of defendants Donohoe and Barceloux each to the other. What is adjudged by the decree to belong to plaintiff is his share of the properties of the partnership, determined to be in the custody and control of both defendants; they did not at the trial of the action by any pleading ask that the court determine the condition of the partnership moneys and properties as between the defendants Donohoe and Barceloux; and if there exist any differences in these regards, those are matters for settlement either in proceedings after the partnership properties are sold in this action regarding any proceeds, if any there be, after settling the plaintiff's judgment or by any such action as may be proper between the defendants Donohoe and Barceloux relating to the properties and moneys in their hands.

The rule as to when it is proper for the rendering of a joint judgment against partners in suits for accounting is clearly stated in Bloomfield v. Buchanan, 14 Or. 181, 12 Pac. 238:

"In an ordinary accounting between partners, where neither is guilty of such acts, omissions or concealments as involve a breach of legal or equitable duty, trust or confidence justly reposed, and which are injurious to another, or by which an undue or unconscientious advantage is taken of another, the rule of liability is that each partner is liable to account to each other severally, but not jointly. * * * But an examination of the evidence in this case has satisfied us that the rule could not * * * be applied here. Whatever may be the general relations between parties, the facts developed in this case made it fiduciary, and the principles of law applicable to that relation must be applied."

[15, 16] In this state partners are trustees for each other within the meaning of chapter 1 of the title on Trusts contained in the Civil Code, and their obligations as such trustees are defined by that chapter.

"A trustee is responsible for the wrongful acts of a cotrustee to which he consented, or which, by his negligence, he enabled the latter to commit, but for no others." (Civ. Code, § 2239; Perry on Trusts, § 848; Birmingham v. Wilcox, 120 Cal. 467, 52 Pac. 822.

"The rule is firmly settled that where a breach of trust has affected two or more or all of cotrustees with a common liability, they are liable jointly and severally; each is liable for the whole loss sustained or the whole amount due, and a decree obtained against them jointly may be enforced against any one of them." Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. (4th Ed.) § 1081; In re Thompson, 101 Cal. 349, 35 Pac. 991, 36 Pac. 98, 508; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 474, 111 Pac. 360.

As a trust relation between the parties was created by the provisions of the Civil Code hereinbefore set forth, the argument of the appellants that the court should have made a finding that the defendants were constructive trustees is without merit in view of the facts shown by the evidence in this case.

[17, 18] The contention of appellants that plaintiff was guilty of such laches as should defeat his action cannot be sustained. The evidence discloses attempts on the part of plaintiff for over a year after the dissolution to bring about an amicable settlement of the partnership affairs and division of its properties; of a written request for a report of the partnership affairs; of the writing soon thereafter by the defendant Donohoe to one W. S. Armstrong, who was in charge of the Armstrong-Quatman Company, in San Francisco, a letter as follows:

"Henry and myself are having some difficulty in effecting an adjustment of our affairs with Freeman, and I wish you would refrain from giving Freeman or anyone else any information concerning our past transactions should they apply to you in the way of oral statements, written statements or copies of papers or inspection of papers which you may have"

—and the absence of the reasons generally for which the refusal of relief because of laches is sometimes given in equity.

Delay in bringing the action is the main reason urged by defendants for applying the doctrine of laches.

"There is no artificial or hard and fast rule either as to the lapse of time or the circumstances which will justify the application of the doctrine of laches. The question must be determined by a consideration of all the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Laches is a question of fact, on the evidence, and each case becomes largely a law unto itself. In other words, the matter is one which reposes in the sound discretion of the chancellor." 10 Cal. Juris. § 64.

Speaking of this rule and its application, it is said in Pratt v. Pratt, 43 Cal. App. 261, 184 Pac. 956:

"A large discretion is confided to the trial judge, and the disposition of an appellate court is, and should be, to respect that discretion and not to interfere with his conclusion unless manifestly an injustice has been done."

In all matters involved in this appeal the determination of the questions presented were peculiarly within the hands of the trial judge for the solution of the facts. The findings and decree are supported by the evidence introduced.

No sufficient reason has been presented by appellants for a reversal of the judgment appealed from in this action, and said judgment is therefore affirmed.

PHILLIPS v. STARK et al. (Civ. 4486.)

1. Trial $\Rightarrow$ 397(5)—Court's failure to find on question, made immaterial by other findings, held not error.

In an action on a contract, in which the defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and set up a contract different from that alleged by plaintiff, and pleaded the rescission thereof, court's failure to find on issue of rescission held not error, in view of findings that the parties had entered into the contract pleaded by plaintiff, and that defendant had violated such contract, since the court, in making such findings, found by implication that the contract alleged in the answer was not made, and the question of whether such contract was rescinded therefore became immaterial.

2. Trial $\Rightarrow$ 397(5)—Findings necessarily decisive of case render unnecessary other findings.

Where issues on which findings are made are necessarily decisive of the case, it is unnecessary that the findings should dispose of any further issues, as all other issues thereby become immaterial.

3. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 1071(6) — Failure to find on issue not reversible error, if finding would have been adverse to appellant.

The failure to find on an issue raised either by answer or cross-complaint is not reversible error, where the finding, if made, would have been adverse to appellant.

4. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 92—Evidence held to sustain finding that contract for sale of business was not rescinded by mutual agreement.

In seller's action for breach of contract to purchase business, evidence held to sustain finding that defendant procured check, given plaintiff in part payment of purchase price, after defendant had taken possession, by artifice, and destroyed check, and refused to be bound by the contract, as against defendant's contention that the contract was rescinded by mutual agreement.

5. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 181(11)—Evidence held to sustain finding that buyer had taken possession.

In seller's action for breach of contract to purchase business, evidence held to sustain finding that defendant had taken possession of the property as owner.

6. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 383—Evidence held to sustain finding that seller was forced to make resale after buyer's refusal to consummate transaction.

In seller's action for breach of contract to purchase business, it appearing that seller had sold business to third party on defendant's refusal to consummate transaction, evidence held to sustain findings that plaintiff was forced to sell business to third party, and that he ex-exercised good faith in making sale, and was ready and willing to follow any proper instructions defendant might give as to the time and manner in which the sale should be made.

7. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 181(11)—Evidence that buyer of business was placed in possession held to prove seller's ability to perform.

In seller's action for breach of contract to purchase business, evidence that the merchandise was delivered to the buyer and that he was placed in complete possession thereof at the time of the transaction held to sustain judgment for seller, as against contention that seller should not be allowed to recover, because he could not have performed the contract.

8. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 52(5)—Evidence held to prove meeting of minds of parties as to terms of contract.

In seller's action for breach of contract to purchase business, evidence held to sustain finding as to meeting of minds of parties on terms of contract.

9. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 50—Buyer held precluded from claiming rescission on ground of mistake.

Buyer could not claim a right to rescission of contract for purchase of bakery business because of a mistake in not including ovens built into building, where receipt dictated by him excluded "anything attached to building."

10. Sales $\Rightarrow$ 51—Particular facts held not to show acquiescence by seller in rescission by buyer.

The fact that an employé of seller of business accepted from buyer proceeds of sales made while buyer was in possession of the business did not preclude seller from recovering damages for buyer's breach of contract on buyer's refusal to consummate the transaction, where seller, on discovery that his employee had accepted such money, kept it as a part of the receipts of the sale, and not as his (seller's) property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by A. Phillips against B. Stark and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 186 Cal. 369, 199 Pac. 509.

E. F. Gerecht and C. W. Hall, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lester William Roth, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHORT, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant B. Stark from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $3,920.50 as damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the alleged failure of the defendants to complete the purchase of a certain grocery and bakery business, which plaintiff claimed he sold to defendants for the sum of $10,000. A motion for a new trial was denied by the trial court. The appellant desires a review of the ruling of the court on said motion, and a consideration of the judgment as a whole. The testimony in the case developed the following facts:

The plaintiff was the owner of a grocery and bakery, and sold it to the defendants for the price of $10,000. The defendants, at the time, gave plaintiff a check for $500 on account, agreed to pay the balance the next day, and received immediate possession. The next day the plaintiff called upon the defendant Stark to obtain the balance of $9,500, and in the course of the interview was tricked into giving him temporary possession of the check for $500. As soon as he got the check, the defendant had it torn up, refused to pay anything on the purchase price, and told the plaintiff that the sale was off; that he would have nothing to do with the property, and he could do with it as he pleased. The defendants then abandoned the bakery, and the plaintiff retook possession and sold it at public auction, but without giving the notice to the defendants required by the Code for a sale in enforcement of a vendor's lien. Defendant and appellant purchased the business in question primarily for the purpose of selling the same to another auctioneer on a quick turnover at a profit of $500, or, failing in this, of auctioning the place of business to the public. Appellant admitted that he never intended to run the place as a going business, and further admitted that, although offered to him as a part of the same bargain, and with no increase in the purchase price, he did not want the 10-year lease which respondent held on the premises. Early in the morning following the evening on which the sale was made, appellant called up an auctioneer and expert appraiser, one Kohn, and requested said Kohn to go to the place of business in question, look the same over, and make him an offer on the same. Kohn made his appraisal at appellant's request, and was accompanied by appellant's agent while he was making the same. Although his attention was directed to various kinds of portable machinery, nothing at all was said to him about ovens, either by appellant's agent or by appellant himself. On Kohn's returning to appellant's place of business, appellant asked Kohn what he would give him for it. Kohn responded that he was not spending his time appraising stock for appellant, and that, if appellant wanted to do business, he would have to name the price he had paid, and tell Kohn how much profit he wanted. Appellant stated that he paid $10,000 and wanted a profit of $500. Kohn told appellant that, if he paid $10,000, he could not pay him a profit thereon. It was only during the conversation between Kohn and appellant that the question of ovens came up for the first time, and appellant thereupon turned to Singer, his brother-in-law, and said, in the language of Kohn, "That that would be a point they would claim on; whatever he meant by that, I don't know."

[1] The first point made by appellant is that the findings are insufficient in this:

"That the trial court failed to find upon certain material issues raised in the affirmative defense set forth in the answer of defendant B. Stark to plaintiff's amended complaint;" that one of the affirmative defenses set forth in the answer is that there was a mutual rescission of any and all contracts entered into by and between plaintiff and defendant in regard to the sale of said grocery and baking business; that said defense was a material issue, and that the trial court's failure to find on said issue should entitle him to a new trial.

The amended complaint in the case at bar pleads the following contract:

"Plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell, transfer, and deliver, and the defendants agreed to buy and take possession of, all stock and fixtures and bakery fixtures and machinery, exclusive of fixtures attached to the building then located and on the premises at said place of business."

Appellant in his amended answer denies specifically all of the allegations of the amended complaint, and then sets up a new and different contract, as follows:

"Plaintiff agreed to sell, transfer, and deliver to defendant B. Stark all the stock and fixtures, including bakery fixtures and machinery, and also bakery ovens and fixtures attached to the building, with exception of shelving in front store room for the sum of $10,000."

And then he pleads an alleged rescission of said contract alleged in his amended answer and insists that there should have been a finding upon his contract and the rescission thereof. The trial court found for the plaintiff in the identical language of the amended complaint.

The trial court having found that the contract alleged in the amended complaint was made and breached, it necessarily found, by implication, that the contract alleged in the amended answer was not made, then there could be no contract to rescind, and the question of rescission became immaterial. Parker v. Power, 28 Cal. App. 332, 152 Pac. 935; Black v. Black, 74 Cal. 520, 16 Pac. 311; Churchill v. Baumann, 95 Cal. 541-545, 30 Pac. 770.

[2] Where issues upon which findings are made are necessarily decisive of the case, it is unnecessary that the findings should dispose of any further issues as all other issues thereby become immaterial. Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. 738; McCourtney v. Fountain, 57 Cal. 617; Porter v. Woodard, 57 Cal. 535; Shank v. Blackburn, 53 Cal. App. 620, 200 Pac. 762; Spaulding v. Dow, 118 Cal. 424, 50 Pac. 543. The trial court having decided and found, in the language of the complaint, that the contract pleaded by the amended complaint was the contract made and breached, by necessary implication, found against the contract set up in the amended answer. Parker v. Power, 28 Cal. App. 332, 152 Pac. 935; Black v. Black, 74 Cal. 520, 16 Pac. 311; Churchill v. Baumann, 95 Cal. 541-545, 30 Pac. 770.

[3] Failure to find on an issue raised either by answer or cross-complaint is not reversible error where, if the finding had been made, it would be adverse to appellant. Reveal v. Stell, 56 Cal. App. 463, 205 Pac. 875; Cross v. Thiele, 51 Cal. App. 780, 197 Pac. 974; Arrelano v. Jorgensen, 52 Cal. App. 622, 199 Pac. 855; Thresher v. Lopez, 52 Cal. App. 219, 198 Pac. 419; Kendrick v. Gould, 51 Cal. App. 712, 197 Pac. 681; Furlong v. White, 51 Cal. App. 265, 196 Pac. 903. The trial court in the case at bar, having found each and every allegation of the amended complaint to be true, must necessarily have found adversely to the affirmative defense set up in said amended answer, even had findings been made on the issue complained of.

The appellant alleged in his answer that plaintiff returned to B. Stark the said check of $500, and that the defendant and plaintiff agreed to cancel said sale and purchase of said stock and fixtures, and defendant returned to plaintiff his receipt for the $500, and that the said receipt was destroyed and canceled by mutual consent of plaintiff and defendant. Upon this subject the court found:

"That on the following day, more particularly, to wit, on Monday, November 24, 1919, at or about 10 o'clock a. m., plaintiff went to the place of business of defendant B. Stark to receive, in accordance with aforesaid contract, the balance of the purchase price of nine thousand five hundred dollars ($9,500.00), and said defendant B. Stark did then and there, by trick, misrepresentation, artifice, and fraud, obtain possession of said check for five hundred dollars ($500.00), and destroyed the same, and refused to make a repayment of the said five hundred dollars ($500.00), or any sum at all, and refused to pay the balance of nine thousand five hundred dollars ($9,500.00), or any sum at all, on account of said contract; and, further, defendant B. Stark, who was then the owner and possessor of all the aforesaid personal property, did then and there tell plaintiff that, so far as he was concerned, the deal was off, and refused to have anything further to do with the same; that plaintiff thereupon demanded the return of said receipt which he had given to defendant B. Stark, and defendant B. Stark did then and there, and in the presence of plaintiff and others, destroy said receipt"

—which completely contradicts the claim that plaintiff voluntarily surrendered the check, and agreed to a rescission, or agreed to have said receipt torn up, and, the trial court having also found that the contract alleged in the complaint was the true one, there was no necessity for further findings on said affirmative defenses. The findings support the judgment and are sufficient.

[4] The appellant claims that certain findings are not supported by the evidence. He contends that there is no evidence from which the trial court was justified in finding that the defendant B. Stark obtained possession of the $500 check from the plaintiff by means of trick, misrepresentation, artifice, or fraud, or that the defendant B. Stark was then the owner or in possession of the said personal property involved in said action as set out in finding III. The evidence shows that, the morning after the agreement, defendant called a Mr. Kohn, who was an auctioneer and an appraiser of stocks of goods in stores, and sent him over to look at the stock in the store of plaintiff, and, when he returned, tried to sell it to said Kohn at a profit of $500, but Kohn, after ascertaining the price defendant had agreed to pay, told him that it was not worth what he asked, and declined to purchase; that defendant mentioned the ovens in the store, and Kohn told him he could not figure on them; that then the defendant addressed Singer, his brother-in-law, and said, "That would be a point they could claim on; * * * that would be the point upon which he could recall the bargain."

Thereafter defendant had plaintiff called, and asked him to come to his place of business, and after his arrival appellant testified:

"* * * 'Are you ready to settle?' He said, 'Yes.' I asked him, 'I can make out a check for $10,000, and see Mr. Smith, the attorney, to make out a bill of sale.' I asked Mr. Phillips, 'Have you got the check for $500 I borrowed from Mr. Singer?' 'Yes.' 'If you don't mind, I will take that check and give it to Mr. Singer, and he will give you a check for $10,000.' He took out the check, giving it to me. I gave it to Mr. Singer, and Mr. Singer destroyed it."

Again the appellant testified as follows:

"Q. Didn't you tell him, when you asked him for the check to give—'Give me the check for $500, and I will write it out for you?' A. I didn't say that right there; I said, 'I will give you one for $10,000.'"

The attention of the appellant was then called to testimony given in his deposition taken prior to the time of trial, in which he testified as follows:

"Question by Mr. Roth: When I came, I found him in the office waiting for me. I said, 'Are you willing to do business?' A. 'Perfectly willing.' I said, 'I am ready myself.' I went down to my safe and got a check to give him for $10,000. I said, 'Mr. Phillips, have you got that check last night you got from Mr. Singer?' He said, 'Yes.' I said, 'If you don't mind, give me the check for $500, and I will make a check for $10,000, as per contract.' He took out the check for $500, and gave it to Mr. Singer, and I and Mr. Singer and Mr. Phillips and his manager went to Smith the attorney. Q. You testified that way? A. I don't testify any different. I said I would give him a check according to the contract."

The evidence further shows that, as soon as he had secured and had destroyed the $500 check, he began to talk of a new agreement, and raised the question about the ovens for the first time, and then repudiated the agreement made the previous evening. This, with other evidence contained in the record, fully supports the finding complained of.

[5] As to the objection there is no evidence which sustains that part of finding III "that defendant B. Stark was the owner and in possession of all the aforesaid property": The evidence shows that appellant took possession of the premises, and every part and portion thereof, on the night the sale was made, and, further, that immediately, after he had paid the deposit of $500, he also agreed to pay the workmen in the bakery shop for that evening, so that he could have the results of the evening baking; that he nailed down all the doors with a hammer, and then locked the front door with a lock; that he hired a watchman to guard the premises all night, and that he sent Singer to the place early the next morning to take charge of the same; and that he remained in charge of same until about 11 o'clock of the morning after the sale, after which he ordered his man to leave the place purchased, and completely abandoned the property he had bought, which evidence was not seriously disputed by appellant. The evidence sustains the finding objected to.

[6] Appellant objects to finding VIII, in that the evidence does not show "that plaintiff was forced to sell his business." The evidence upon this subject shows that appellant or his agents told respondent's customers the next day not to wait for bread, to buy somewhere else; that they could not get any more there, because they had stopped baking, and that the bakers and milkmen were sent away, saying that they were going to close the store, and it would not be opened up until there was an auction sale; that he had to sell, because the creditors were alarmed, and they all came to Phillips' place of business and thought he was going bankrupt, and they all wanted their money; that his business was ruined, because they had turned away bakers and his business. The above evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding objected to; in fact, under the circumstances shown it was his best remedy.

The next finding complained of is that plaintiff exercised good faith in making said sale, and was ready and willing to follow any proper instructions defendant B. Stark might give as to the time and manner in which said sale should be made. No notice was given appellant of the sale, but there was evidence that respondent called appellant several times on the phone; that each time the person who answered immediately put up the phone as soon as he heard respondent's voice. Though no notice was given of the sale, the parties stipulated in open court and the court found that the sum of $6,079.50 was the market value of said property at said time and place, and we think the evidence sufficient to sustain said finding, taking it altogether.

[7] Appellant asserts that respondent should not be allowed to recover because he could not have performed the contract. The evidence shows, and the court found as a fact, that the merchandise in question and every part thereof was delivered to appellant and that he was placed in complete possession thereof the night the transaction was made, and, as the court said in Phillips v. Stark, 186 Cal. 369, 370, 199 Pac. 509, 510:

"The delivery of possession to the defendants, of course, operated to pass title, there being nothing to indicate a contrary intent."

Thus it appears that he not only could perform, but that he did perform.

[8] Appellant claimed there was no meeting of minds of the parties as to the terms of the contract. A receipt was introduced in evidence for the $500 payment, which receipt sets forth the terms on which the parties agreed, and is as follows:

"I hereby sell stock and fixtures, including bakery fixtures and machinery, and anything attached to building not included, for the sum of $10,000. Received $500 deposit; the balance to be paid in escrow Monday, November 24th"

—which receipt was dictated by appellant and written by the daughter of respondent. This receipt and the oral evidence amply supports the finding that:

"On or about the 23d day of November, 1919, at or about 8 o'clock p. m., at the plaintiff's place of business, located at No. 910 West Temple street, in the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, plaintiff and defendant B. Stark entered into an agreement whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell, transfer and deliver, and the defendant agreed to buy and take possession of, all stock and fixtures, and bakery fixtures and machinery exclusive of fixtures attached to the building then located and on the premises at the said place of business, and defendant B. Stark promised to pay the sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) therefor, in the manner as follows, to wit: Five hundred dollars ($500) down and nine thousand five hundred dollars ($9,500) at defendant B. Stark's place of business at No. 114 North Spring street, in the said city and county, on Monday, November 24, 1919."

It is conceded by all parties to the action that the ovens mentioned in this case were built into the walls of the building and were attached thereto, and in view of the foregoing receipt and finding of the trial court it would be a useless waste of time to discuss that subject further, as the matter has already been heretofore determined in favor of respondent on conflicting evidence; for, as it has hereinbefore been held, the finding that the contract set out in the complaint was made, by implication, was a finding that the one set out in the answer was not made.

[9] Appellant maintains that there was a rescission of the contract: Because of mistake about the ovens which he claims were included in the contract. Appellant himself testifies that the ovens were built right into the building, and were a part of the building, yet the receipt dictated by him said: "* * * And anything attached to building not included." In view of the above, we think he should not be allowed to claim a mistake even if pleaded as a defense, which it was not.

Again, appellant insists that no possession of the property was ever taken by him. The court found that possession was taken by him, and said finding is supported by the evidence.

[10] The next point made by appellant is that respondent accepted the return of $5.20 taken in for sales while appellant was in possession of the stock. The evidence shows that the money was given to an employee of respondent without respondent's knowledge, and, upon his informing respondent about it, he immediately asked him why he took it, and took the money and placed it in the cash register with other money there, and it was kept as a part of the receipts of the sale, and not as respondent's property.

As to the effect of respondent's retaking possession of the property, the Supreme Court said:

"As to the retaking of possession, if the plaintiff had done so under such circumstances as to show an acquiescence on his part in the position taken by the defendants that the sale was off, there would at once have been a rescission by mutual consent. * * * But when the defendants not only refused to pay, but repudiated the contract and abandoned the property, the plaintiff's act in retaking possession of it certainly cannot be said to indicate any acquiescence on his part in the repudiation or any intent to end the sale. Whether he intended to insist upon the contract or not, the only sensible thing for him to do was to retake possession. He either had to do so for the protection of the property or allow it to be lost or destroyed for want of protection. He could, of course, have left it to its fate, but he was not required to follow any such hazardous and unreasonable course. The defendants thrust the necessity of taking possession upon him, and very plainly against his will, and without any thought on his part of acquiescing in their repudiation or himself terminating the contract of sale. Under these circumstances, there was no rescission." Phillips v. Stark, 186 Cal. 369, at page 372, 199 Pac. 509, 511.

And finally, as to the effect of the resale of the property by respondent after he had retaken possession, the Supreme Court said in the same case:

"For much the same reasons, the second act of the plaintiff, that of reselling the property, did not amount to a rescission. The defendants had repudiated the contract and abandoned the property. The plaintiff had it on his hands. Was he, in spite of the defendants' absolute and unequivocal repudiation of the contract, to be required to hold it for them indefinitely under penalty of otherwise acquiescing in their repudiation and losing any right of recovery against them? That question has been answered in this state in cases exactly similar, except for the fact that title to the property had not passed to the vendee. It has been held a number of times that a resale by a vendor whose vendee has repudiated the contract does not work a rescission. See Tomboy Gold, etc., Co. v. Marks, 185 Cal. 336, 197 Pac. 94, and cases there cited. Upon this point we can see no difference between them and such a case as the present, where the title has passed before the repudiation, but the vendee by the repudiation has left the property upon the vendor's hands. The actual situation of the parties is exactly the same. The vendees wrongfully refuse to consummate the sale, and the vendor has the property on his hands. In fact, we see no reason why the plaintiff may not insist that the defendants, by thrusting the property back upon him and thereby undoing the delivery by reason of which title passed, have in effect estopped themselves from claiming that their rights are any different than they would have been if the delivery had not been made." Phillips v. Stark, 186 Cal. 369, at page 373, 199 Pac. 509, 511.

From the foregoing, it appears that there was no rescission.

We think that, because of the conclusions already reached in the foregoing opinion, the question regarding the supplemental findings becomes immaterial.

For the reasons herein given, we think that the order denying the new trial and the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; ST. SURE, J.

PEOPLE v. MIDDLETON. (Cr. 1132.)

1. Criminal law $\S$ 785(16)—Not error to instruct witness false in one part of testimony is to be distrusted in other.

There was no error in charging that a witness false in one part of his or her testimony is to be distrusted in other, especially where the court further instructed that "If you believe any witness examined before you during the trial of this case has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, it is your duty to distrust his entire evidence."

2. Criminal law $\S$ 781(6)—Refusal of instruction as to admissions or confessions held not error.

The court did not err in refusing to instruct at defendant's request, "If you believe from the evidence of this case that the defendant has at any time made any admissions or confessions concerning the offense he is charged with, then I instruct you that evidence of confessions or admissions should be carefully scrutinized by the jury and received with great caution; though a witness is perfectly honest, it is impossible for such witness in most cases to give the exact words in which the admissions were made, and sometimes in the transposition of the words of a party may find a meaning entirely different from that which was intended to be conveyed by the witness," especially where the court instructed, "You are instructed that it is your duty to view with caution evidence of parol admissions of the defendant."

3. Criminal law $\S$ 519(9)—Conclusion that confession voluntary sustained.

Where there was testimony that the defendant stated when asked about the crime that he did not want to talk "unless he had a hearing," but that, after making that remark, and being told that his companions in the crime had confessed, he told the story without any more persuasion, and without either threats or inducements being used by the officer, it cannot be said that the confession was not voluntarily made, and that the trial judge erred in admitting evidence of it.

4. Homicide $\S$ 166(4)—Commission of robbery held admissible to show motive.

In prosecution for murder, evidence of a robbery before the killing of the deceased, a police officer, was admissible as showing a motive for the killing.

5. Homicide $\S$ 169(1)—Police blotter held properly admitted in evidence.

In prosecution for murder of police officer, the trial court did not err in admitting in evidence the police blotter which the deceased had read before leaving the police station on the night upon which he was killed, the document containing information regarding a robbery at another place and the description of an automobile which had been stolen, and of men who had participated in the robbery; such blotter indicating that the officer had reasonable grounds for believing that a felony had been committed by the occupants of the automobile in which defendant was riding when he killed the police officer.

6. Witnesses $\S$ 277(4)—Permission of inquiry held not error as against objection that it was not proper cross-examination of accused.

Where defendant upon his direct examination denied that he had shot deceased, or that he was present at the time the crime was committed, or that he had any connection with the crime whatsoever, the court did not err in permitting the prosecution to inquire into his whereabouts and wanderings after the commission of the crime, as against the objection that it was not proper cross-examination, in that defendant had been asked nothing concerning such matters on his direct examination.

7. Criminal law §730(1)—Remarks of district attorney cured by instruction to disregard.

Improper remarks of district attorney in argument held cured by instruction to the jury to disregard them.

8. Homicide §253(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for first degree murder.

In prosecution for homicide, evidence held to sustain a conviction for first degree murder.

LANGDON, P. J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of the crime of murder.

[1] The first objection urged is that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that "a witness false in one part of his or her testimony is to be distrusted in others." It is true that a similar instruction was criticized in the case of People v. Plyler, 121 Cal. 160, 53 Pac. 553. However, in a later decision, our Supreme Court, after discussing the Plyler Case, said:

"But nowhere has it been decided, nor indeed could it with reason be held, that it is error for the court to instruct in the language of our written law. This is substantially what the court here did, and so, while the instruction cannot be commended as a full or clear exposition of the meaning of the section of the Code, still it cannot be said that it was error for the court in giving the law to have conformed to the language of the Code, and to have omitted what that Code itself omits." People v. Dobbins, 138 Cal. 694, 698, 72 Pac. 339, 341.

See, also, People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226, 238, 10 Pac. 502.

The objection urged by the appellant to the instruction above set forth is that the jury would be compelled under its language to construe a false statement regarding some minor or unimportant matter as a reflection upon the truth of all the testimony given by the same witness. In the instant case such a possibility was lessened by the fact that the trial court, at the request of the defendant, also gave the following instruction to the jury:

"You are instructed that if you believe any witness examined before you during the trial of this case has willfully sworn falsely as to any material matter, it is your duty to distrust his entire evidence."

[2] Complaint is made of the refusal of the trial court to give the following instruction at the request of the defendant:

"If you believe from the evidence in this case that the defendant has at any time made any admissions or confessions concerning the offense he is charged with, then I instruct you that evidence of confessions or admissions should be carefully scrutinized by the jury and received with great caution; though a witness is perfectly honest, it is impossible for such witness in most cases to give the exact words in which admissions were made, and sometimes in the transposition of the words of a party may find a meaning entirely different from that which was intended to be conveyed by the witness."

In the case of People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 391, 77 Pac. 169, the court held that the refusal to give an instruction substantially the same as the one we are now considering was not error, as such instruction went far beyond the language of subdivision 4 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Upon this point it is also to be noted that the court gave the following instruction:

"You are instructed that it is your duty to view with caution evidence of parol admissions of the defendant."

[3] It is contended that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the testimony of certain police officers concerning the alleged confessions of the defendant. The asserted basis of this contention is that the confessions of the defendant were not made voluntarily, and this position is predicated upon testimony that the defendant stated, when asked about the crime, that he didn't want to talk "unless he had a hearing." But it also appears from the testimony in the record that, after making that remark and being told that his companions in the crime had confessed, he told the story without any more persuasion, and without either threats or inducements being used by the officers. Upon these facts we do not think it can be said that the confession was not voluntarily made, and the following language from People v. Grafft (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 273, seems appropriate:

"The question whether the confession was 'free and voluntary,' or the result of inducement, coercion, intimidation, or duress exerted by the officer, was one peculiarly within the province of the trial judge to decide upon the facts. His conclusion thereon has substantial support in the evidence, and we are of the opinion that we should not interfere with it."

[4] It is contended that error was committed in admitting evidence of a robbery committed by the defendant prior to the murder of the police officer, the crime for which he was being tried. The objection is without merit. The evidence of the prior crime was admitted because the commission of the other crime was directly connected with the murder of the police officer, and clearly showed a motive for the latter deed. According to testimony appearing in the record, on July 30, 1922, the defendant met two boys who had escaped from the Preston School of Industry, and the trio took possession of a Ford automobile that was standing upon one of the streets of Lodi, Cal., and drove to the city of Stockton. While there they stopped the driver of a Buick automobile, robbed him, and took his automobile, in which they drove to Fresno. Early the next morning, upon entering Fresno, they were pursued by police officers in an automobile, and forced to stop. One of the police officers got out of his automobile and approached the automobile in which the defendant was riding. The defendant ordered him to put up his hands, and when the officer reached for his revolver the defendant fired several shots which resulted in the death of the police officer. The robbery was closely connected with the killing of the officer. Fear of arrest for this crime furnished a powerful motive to the defendant to kill the police officer, who was pursuing him. To establish a motive for the crime with which the defendant was charged, the evidence complained of was admissible. People v. Pool, 27 Cal. 572; People v. Wilson, 117 Cal. 688, 49 Pac. 1054; People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 720, 106 Pac. 65.

[5] Appellant urges that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence the "blotter" or daily police record, which the deceased officer had read before leaving the police station on the night upon which he was killed. This document contained information regarding the robbery at Stockton and a description of the automobile which had been stolen and of two of the men who had participated in the robbery. The paper was admitted for the limited purpose of showing what the deceased had read before starting on duty on the day of his death, and not for the purpose of proving the truth of the facts therein stated. For such limited purpose, we think it was properly admitted in evidence. It indicated that the officers had reasonable grounds for believing that a felony had been committed by the occupants of the Buick automobile and were therefore justified in stopping them upon the highway.

[6, 7] Complaint is made of the rulings of the trial court by which the prosecution was permitted to inquire into the whereabouts and wanderings of the defendant after the commission of the crime of which he was charged. It is contended by the appellant that these questions, to which objection was made, were not proper cross-examination, as the defendant had been asked nothing concerning these matters upon his direct examination. The defendant, upon his direct examination, denied that he had shot the police officer, denied that he was present at the time the crime was committed, or that he had any connection with the crime whatever. We think that under these circumstances a broad latitude was properly permitted upon cross-examination. People v. Teshara, 141 Cal. 633, 638, 75 Pac. 338. In the case of People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 12, 87 Pac. 1016, the prosecution was permitted to ask the defendant as to his whereabouts at the time the crime was committed, although the defendant had not testified upon his direct examination as to where he was at that time, but had merely testified to the fact that he was not present at the scene of the crime. True, the cross-examination in the instant case goes beyond that discussed by the opinions in the cases cited; nevertheless, if we should concede to the appellant that the record in the present case discloses a broader range of questions upon the cross-examination of the defendant than is warranted by legal precedents, we should not be warranted in reversing the judgment for this reason, because the facts disclosed by the record in this case show clearly that justice has been done by the verdict and judgment rendered, and this decisive remark applies also to the other assignments of error urged by the appellant concerning alleged misconduct of the district attorney in his argument to the jury. It is also to be added, in response to the objections of the appellant to certain remarks of the district attorney which were assigned as error, that with respect to some of these matters, at least, the trial court instructed the jury to disregard the remarks, and this, in contemplation of law, cured the error.

[8] The contention that the record does not support the verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree is without merit. There is testimony from which the jury was justified in believing that the defendant shot the police officer through the heart when he approached the automobile in which defendant was riding. There was no evidence of any circumstances which would constitute the crime of murder in the second degree.

HIRSHFELD v. DANA. (L. A. 7386.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 2, 1924.)

1. Trial ⚡74—Person asking question only one that can object that answer is not responsive.

Though opposing party may move to strike out testimony that is for any reason improper to be admitted, or may move to strike out an irresponsible answer in order that an objection, though not well taken, may be saved, the only person who can make the objection that the answer is not responsive is the person who asks the question.

2. Depositions ⚡75—Objection to certificate properly overruled.

The objection that certificate of notary certified that the deponent had read the deposition instead of certifying that it had been read to him was properly overruled, being highly technical.

3. Appeal and error ⚡1056(4)—Province of court in determining whether exclusion of evidence reversible.

While it is not the province of the Supreme Court, in appraising error under the constitutional rule of decision on appeal, to weigh the evidence, as would the triers of the facts, to determine whether exclusion of evidence was reversible, still such court is required to some extent to weigh the evidence and form conclusions upon its weight.

4. Appeal and error ⚡1056(1)—Exclusion of evidence held reversible.

In action on notes which defendant claimed he did not execute, and where estoppel was involved on account of an alleged initialing in consideration of an extension of time, it was reversible error to exclude evidence of holder of other notes that defendant had stated that she had been granted an extension of time on the notes in suit.

5. Bills and notes ⚡502—Evidence tending to contradict execution held admissible.

In an action on notes claimed by defendant to be forged, court properly permitted person having knowledge of defendant's handwriting to testify under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 9, and section 1943, as against plaintiff's objection that an estoppel on the part of defendant to assert that the notes were forged had been proved; plaintiff having introduced evidence tending to prove the notes were executed by the defendant, and the issue of execution having been raised by the pleadings and plaintiff not having offered a stipulation conceding that the notes were not executed by defendant.

6. Evidence ⚡368(1)—Searches and seizures ⚡7—Party held improperly required to produce letters.

In action on notes claimed by defendant to be forged, held, that the court erred in compelling the plaintiff to produce all letters in his possession signed or purporting to have been signed by the defendant or by plaintiff's transferor, no foundation having been laid for the production of the letters, in view of Const. art. 1, § 19, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1000.

7. Trial ⚡194(5)—Instruction as to expert testimony held erroneous.

An instruction "that the opinions of the witnesses as experts are merely advisory, and not binding on the jury," is erroneous as detracting from the effect of expert evidence.

8. Trial ⚡235(7)—Instructions as to evidence held erroneous.

The phrases "You are at liberty to reject it," and "If the testimony of experts is opposed to the jury's conviction, it is their duty to disregard it," and "They are presumed to have special or unusual knowledge," held erroneous in instructions as to expert testimony.

9. Evidence ⚡570—Duty of jury to weigh expert testimony with other evidence and then determine where truth lies.

It is the duty of the jury to consider and weigh the opinions of the experts with the other evidence in the case, and then determine upon all the evidence where the truth lies.

10. Appeal and error ⚡1064(2)—Trial ⚡183—Statute as to instruction unconstitutional but instruction thereon not prejudicial.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 4, providing that the jury should be instructed that the testimony of an accomplice ought to be viewed with distrust, and the evidence of the oral admissions of a party with caution, is unconstitutional, and in violation of Const. art. 6, § 19, providing judges shall not charge the jury with respect to matters of fact; but an instruction framed under such statute is not prejudicial, since it states merely commonplace matter within the general knowledge of the jury.

11. Trial ⚡194(5)—Instruction as to value or manner of determining expert testimony erroneous as on matters of fact.

An instruction to the jury as to the value of or manner of determining expert testimony is in violation of the constitutional provision (art. 6, § 19) as to instructing on matters of fact.

12. Trial ⚡206—Statutes held not to authorize instruction as to expert testimony.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, does not, in terms, at least, authorize the court to charge the jury as to expert testimony.

13. Witnesses ⚡388(3)—Evidence concerning conversation with party held admissible as against objection to impeaching questions as having no proper foundation.

In an action on notes which defendant claimed were forged, where plaintiff had given evidence of statements by defendant in the nature of admissions of execution of the notes, the defendant could testify to such conversations as against plaintiff's objections to "impeaching questions" as having no proper foundation laid under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052; no foundation being necessary, as the testimony went to the merits of the question of defendant's responsibility for the notes.

14. Evidence ⚡151(2)—Testimony of intent in initialing notes claimed to be forged held admissible.

In an action on notes which defendant claimed were forged, but which she initialed, the court did not err in overruling plaintiff's objection to questions put to defendant covering her intent at the time she initialed the notes; the inquiry apparently calling for evidence of a fact of which the witness had primary knowledge.

15. Evidence — 567—Interrogation of handwriting expert on cross-examination should be permitted.

Where a handwriting witness testified under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 9, and section 1943, the court should permit him on cross-examination to be interrogated as to his opinion, though the matter rests largely in the discretion of the trial court.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. J. Norton, Judge.

Action by Emil Hirshfeld against Rosé Dana, also called Rosalia Dana. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lucius L. Solomons and Fred C. Peterson, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Paul M. Gregg, of San Luis Obispo, Charles N. Douglas, of San Francisco, and Albert Nelson, of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiff sued to recover from defendant the amount of four promissory notes in varying sums. The complaint is in four counts, each setting out as a cause of action a promissory note. The first note was for $500, dated January 19, 1918; the second for $600, dated February 4, 1918; the third for $1,000, dated February 4, 1918; and the fourth for $700, dated June 20, 1918. Each count alleges that defendant made, executed, and delivered for a valuable consideration the said note to the payee thereof, William J. Murphy; that it was by the payee indorsed, assigned, and transferred before maturity to the plaintiff. The prayer asks for judgment for the total amount due on each and all of the said four notes. Defendant filed a verified answer, and denied that she made, signed, executed, or delivered any of the said notes, or that they were made for a valuable consideration, that they were genuine, or that she authorized any person to sign her name, or to make, or to execute the said notes or to deliver them to William J. Murphy. It is also denied that William J. Murphy indorsed, assigned, transferred, or set over to plaintiff any promissory note executed by defendant.

The case was tried by jury. The verdict and judgment were in favor of defendant. A motion for a new trial based on the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, that the verdict is against law, and errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the plaintiff, was interposed by plaintiff and denied. Plaintiff appeals under the alternative method, and relies for reversal on asserted errors in the rulings on evidence and in the instructions given at the request of respondent.

Appellant's position on the trial was that by respondent initialing the notes on the face thereof after they passed into his possession, and by declarations and conduct, she was estopped to deny their execution and her liability. Estoppel was not pleaded, but it was litigated on the trial, and in addition to the evidence of the notes and the acts and declarations of the parties expert testimony as to the signatures was received pro and con. Respondent also offered evidence tending to show the absence of intention to admit the genuineness of the notes or to acknowledge her liability when she initialed them. The evidence will be sufficiently described in the discussion of the points presented on appeal.

1. Appellant contends:

"The court erred in excluding portions of the deposition of the witness Isaac C. Scharff."

The point to the contention is that the excluded evidence tended to contradict respondent's testimony to the effect that she did not execute the notes in controversy, nor initial them in consideration of the extension of the time of payment thereof. Scharff had testified he held certain notes of respondent which were overdue and upon which he was demanding payment. We quote from the record:

"Q. Did you have any conversation with her at any one of these interviews with reference to any other notes than those notes you have just mentioned? A. Yes, sir; the second time when she called at my office I demanded payment. She stated that she had come from Mr. Hirshfeld's office in the Claus Spreckels Building, and stated that he had extended her some time on the payment of the notes he held, and wanted to know if I couldn't do the same thing, and I told her the notes were past due, and we desired to have our notes paid.

"Mr. Nelson (interjecting): Now, we move to strike out as not responsive to the question all after the words 'Yes, sir' in that answer.
* * *

"The Court: Strike it out.

"Mr. Nelson: I would like the court to instruct the jury that anything stricken out is not for their consideration.

"The Court: Yes. When any testimony is ordered stricken out by the court, the evidence is not before the jury, and it is to be entirely disregarded by them, and it is not to be considered by them as evidence in the case.

"Mr. Peterson (continuing to read the deposition): Q. Did she say anything further in that interview on the subject of Mr. Hirshfeld and the notes that he had extended payments on, other than you have just mentioned?

"Mr. Nelson (interjecting): We object to that as assuming to be in evidence that which is not, incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial.

* * *

"Mr. Nelson: The only thing in the record is 'Yes, sir' in answer to this other question, and it assumes that to be in evidence which is not. There is nothing in here about Mr. Hirshfeld.

* * *

"Mr. Nelson (supplementing objection): And no proper foundation.

"The Court: Overruled.

"A. No.

"Q. Did you ever have any other conversation with her on the subject of Mr. Hirshfeld? A. No; not that I can recollect. Yes; in the month of December, when she came up and again stated that Mr. Hirshfeld was going to extend the time, and wanted me to do it also, because she had so many notes she had to take care of. I told her again I couldn't help what Mr. Hirshfeld or anybody else had done in the matter, the party I represented wanted the money paid, which was done in January, 1919.

"Mr. Nelson (interjecting): We move to strike out all of the answer after the word 'December' as not responsive to the question. The question is, 'Did you ever have any other conversation with her on the subject of Mr. Hirshfeld?' Answer, 'No; not that I can recollect. Yes; in the month of December; I think it was December.' Now, we ask that all of that answer after that word 'December' appearing for the second time be stricken out as not responsive to the question.

"Mr. Peterson: Here is a case, if the court please, where counsel was present, where he had a right to make that sort of an objection if he desired, and it could have been cured at the taking of the deposition by a further question, and we submit that the question of not responsive cannot be raised in that manner.

"The Court: Well, I don't understand it is waived; strike it out.

"Mr. Nelson: All after the word 'December' goes out. * * *

Section 2032, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a deposition is "subject to all legal exceptions." The appellant complains of the striking out of this testimony, and states:

"It is a fundamental rule of evidence that the only one who can make the objection that an answer is not responsive is the person who asks the question."

Appellant's contention is supported by the decision of the Supreme Court of Michigan in Merkle v. Bennington, 58 Mich. 156, 163, 24 N. W. 776, 779 (55 Am. Rep. 666). The opinion was written by Mr. Justice Cooley, and upon that subject he states the rule as follows:

"The defense, in attempting to meet the case of the plaintiff as to the bridge being out of repair, called Conrad Dench as a witness and proved by him that he crossed the bridge within the 30 days preceding the time of injury. He was then asked, 'Did you notice the planking?' and replied, 'When I went across, it was all right.' The answer on motion was stricken out. The ruling is now supported in argument on the grounds, first, that the answer was not responsive to the question, and, second, it was an expression of opinion, and for that reason not proper. The objection that an answer is not responsive is one to be made by the party who puts the question; not by his antagonist. If the answer is in itself proper evidence, the party who is examining the witness has a right to take and retain it if he chooses to do so. His doing this merely saves him the trouble of putting another question to draw it out. But in this case it is only on a technical construction that the answer could be held not responsive. The witness was fairly notified by the question put that the purpose was to prove by him the condition of the planking as he found it, and he answered at once that the planking was all right. * * *

The rule is similarly stated by the Supreme Court of Iowa, in re Will of Dunahugh, 130 Iowa, 692, 694, 695, 107 N. W. 925, 926, as follows:

"III. During the examination in chief of a witness for contestant, counsel for proponent repeatedly interrupted with an objection that the answer of the witness was not responsive to the question, and such objections were sustained. It is insisted that herein was error, and this for the reason that no one but the party conducting the examination of a witness can be heard to object to an answer on the ground that it is not responsive. We agree that the rule is as contended for by counsel. If the evidence given by a witness is competent and material, the examining party may adopt it even though not strictly in response to the question propounded. 'The objection that an answer is not responsive is one to be made by the party who does the questioning and not by his antagonist; if the answer is proper evidence, the party who is examining the witness has the right to take and retain it if he desires so to do.' Merkle v. Bennington Tp., 58 Mich. 156, 24 N. W. 776, 55 Am. Rep. 666."

See also, Zenor v. Smith, 150 Iowa, 424, 428, 130 N. W. 382, 384, where it is said:

"The answer was not responsive but that was not a ground for striking it out on defendant's motion, unless it was in itself improper."

It was declared in Hamilton v. People, 29 Mich. 173:

"The objection that the answer was not responsive was one which did not concern the prosecution, if it was relevant. The party examining a witness may sometimes object to volunteered and irresponsible statements made by a witness aside from his questions. But if he is willing to accept the answer, and if it was one he would have had a right to elicit, the opposite party cannot complain. There are cases, as in Greenman v. O'Connor, 25 Mich. 30, where the deposition of a witness is taken on settled written interrogatories, when an answer not called for may be objected to by either party for surprise, inasmuch as, if the question had been so put in writing as to call for it, other interrogatories might have been framed accordingly, which might have led to explanation. But no such difficulty can arise, where the witness is examined openly and orally, and where a question calling for such an answer would have been competent."

The Greenman Case is cited in Week's Law of Depositions, § 404. See 9 Cal. Jur. § 33, p. 432.

[1] It is true that the opposing party may move to strike out testimony that is for any reason improper to be admitted, or may move to strike out an irresponsible answer in order that an objection, though not well taken, may be saved; but no such situation is presented by the record in this case. The second question above quoted, referring back, as it did, to the answer previously given, coupled with the answer thereto, in a sense restored to the record the part ordered stricken out. The court should have ordered the part of the answer restored, in view of the fact it was embodied in the question and answer that followed. It was therefore error for the court to instruct the jury to disregard the evidence thus stricken out when it appeared from the deposition that the witness had adopted the answer to the previous question as a part of his answer to the question which was permitted. A somewhat similar situation was considered by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in the case of Conner v. Standard Publishing Co., 183 Mass. 474, 478, 67 N. E. 596, 597, which the court disposed of in the following manner:

"The jury had before them Roger's testimony that he gave orders not to take any more insurance for the plaintiff. We mention this because his counsel seem to assume the contrary in their brief. The answer was first stricken out as not responsive, but in answer to a subsequent question the witness testified that the explanation that he had made covered his answer better than either yes or no. That put the previous answer in evidence."

[2] The respondent does not attempt to justify the action of the trial court in striking out parts of the foregoing answers, but contends that the whole deposition should have been excluded because of a defective certificate. The point made by the respondent is that the certificate of the notary certified that the deponent had read the deposition instead of certifying that it had been read to him. The trial court properly overruled this highly technical objection. Higgins v. Wortell, 18 Cal. 331; Short v. Frink, 151 Cal. 90, 90 Pac. 200.

[3] It is necessary to consider whether the exclusion of the foregoing evidence calls for a reversal of the judgment. The constitutional provision includes "the improper admission or rejection of evidence." While it is not our province in appraising error under the constitutional rule of decision on appeal to weigh the evidence as would the triers of the fact, still we are required "to some extent, to weigh the evidence, and form conclusions upon its weight." People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042.

itiated them in consideration of an extension of time. It is to be noted that Murphy, who transferred the notes to appellant, did not testify, so that the excluded testimony might have had a vital effect in determining the question of veracity between the parties to the action. In this state of the matter it is readily conceivable that the exclusion of respondent's statements to Scharff that appellant granted her time on the notes he held might have been directly responsible for the verdict. This being so, we are of the opinion that the error resulted in a miscarriage of justice, for which the judgment must be reversed.

We will now consider with reference to a new trial several other points presented on the appeal.

[5] 2. The next ground urged for reversal is that the court erred in admitting any evidence on behalf of the respondent except on the claim of estoppel. We quote from the reply brief of appellant:

"We repeat, there was but one issue to be submitted to the jury. Under the evidence as introduced by the plaintiff that question is, 'Was the respondent estopped to plead a forgery in this case?' The evidence on the subject of the original execution was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial on that issue and should have been excluded."

Appellant testified that he received each note from the payee, William J. Murphy, before maturity, and for a valuable consideration; that in September, 1918, respondent called upon him in his office, and said "she couldn't pay the amount due on those notes at the present time; she wanted a little time for it; and she told me she would be able to pay it on the 15th of January, as at that time she expected some money coming in from the crop." The witness further stated that he agreed to the extension of time but "to avoid any further trouble in the future she should acknowledge the signature by signing 'OK' and 'RD' on each note." According to the evidence, a Mr. Franklin was at his desk in the office at the same time, but did not see respondent initial the notes—"he was sitting back of me and didn't pay any attention to what was going on." The witness also stated that one morning in October, 1918, he met respondent on Market street, and she said: "I am going up to see Mr. Scharff. * * * I am not going to pay your notes, neither; you better collect it from Mr. Murphy." He answered: "Mrs. Dana, how can you ask anything like that when you acknowledged the signatures, and wrote the 'OK' and 'RD'?" Respondent answered: "I don't care; you forced me to do that." It appears that a few minutes later respondent came to his office, and as to this interview appellant testified:

"Mrs. Dana said, 'Why do you leave me standing on the street so abruptly?' I said,

"Mrs. Dana, you made remarks which were very, very uncalled for." She says, "You mustn't take it—I am so nervous, I don't know what I am doing; you don't need to be afraid; I signed those notes and I will pay them."

This conversation occurred in the presence of Sidney H. Abrams, who had desk room in the same office. His deposition was introduced in evidence, in which he stated he overheard respondent say:

"You seem to be very anxious; is my name not attached to the notes; ain't I good for it; have you any doubts?" Mr. Hirshfeld answered that "If I had any doubts I would not take them; but I need my money."

We have already referred to the deposition of Isaac C. Scharff. The appellant then rested.

The first witness called for respondent was Samuel Dana, her brother-in-law, who testified as one having personal knowledge of her handwriting under subdivision 9, § 1870, and section 1943, Code of Civil Procedure. Appellant objected to the witness testifying as to respondent's handwriting upon the ground "we have proven an estoppel on the part of Mrs. Dana to assert that these notes are forgeries under the Negotiable Instrument Law," and cites a number of authorities as to the effect of an estoppel when established. The objection was overruled, and the witness testified. Respondent admitted having initialed the notes, but offered the explanation that it was done at the instance of appellant, in order, as he represented to her, to facilitate the prosecution of Murphy. It appeared that Murphy had borrowed $500 from respondent and $300 from appellant. Respondent testified she had not in the conversations with appellant said Murphy had forged her signatures to the notes, and added: "I believed he had signed these notes." She admitted to appellant the signatures looked like her own. She also stated she wrote the "RD" and appellant the "OK" appearing therewith on each note, but denied she ever admitted their execution or that she ever promised to pay them. Estoppel was only presented by the evidence—to the introduction of which respondent did not object. She claims, however, that as the due execution of the notes was put in issue by the pleadings it was properly submitted to the jury. Her answer to appellant's contentions that the estoppel was established, and that no evidence except on that issue should have been admitted, is that estoppel was not, but the execution of the notes was, pleaded, and therefore the evidence on the execution of the notes was properly received. If appellant failed to establish an estoppel, in order to recover he would be required to prove the due execution of the notes. He had in fact already introduced evidence relevant to that issue. The statements of respondent, above quoted, were in the nature of admissions on her part that she had in fact executed the notes. It was therefore evidence in behalf of appellant tending to prove the allegation of the complaint that the notes were executed by respondent. The circumstances that this evidence was also relevant to the issue of estoppel did not deprive it of its relevance to the issue of execution. The issue of execution having been raised by the pleadings, and appellant having introduced evidence tending to prove it, respondent was entitled to introduce evidence to disprove it. If appellant desired to exclude this evidence, he could have offered a stipulation at the trial conceding that the notes were not executed by respondent. This he was apparently not willing to do, and the evidence was therefore properly received.

[6] 3. A further ground of error is thus stated:

"The court erred in compelling the plaintiff to produce all letters in his possession signed or purported to have been signed by the defendant or by one William J. Murphy."

On the cross-examination of appellant he was asked if he had seen any letters that purported to have been written by respondent to Murphy. It was represented by respondent that such letters were to be used on the cross-examination of appellant. Appellant answered that he had seen such letters and had given them to his attorney. Appellant's attorney was then called, and asked if he had the letters in his possession. He replied he had seen such letters, and that they were among the papers in the case. A demand was then made that he produce them, and, notwithstanding the objection of counsel for appellant on the ground that until their relevancy or character is specified the court has not power to order them produced, the court directed their production. When the letters were produced they were marked for identification. Respondent did not offer them in evidence, and her counsel stated:

"The only letters we have we are going to use by way of exemplars possibly, if we go into that question."

Appellant claims the order for production was a mere fishing expedition, and that respondent "used the opportunity thus afforded her by the order of the court directing the marking of these documents as exhibits and the fact that the papers were then in the custody of the clerk to determine in her own mind those of the instruments which she would admit as having written and those of the instruments which she would deny as having written." It is clear there was no foundation laid for the production of these letters and the order was therefore in violation of the provisions of article 1, § 19, of the Constitution, and section 1000 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

4. Appellant contends that portions of the following instructions, proposed by respondent and given to the jury as modified, are erroneous in several particulars, and constitute a charge with respect to matters of fact:

(1) "(a) The opinions of expert witnesses are entitled to such weight as you deem proper to give them. You may accept or reject such opinions as you may accept as true or reject as false any other facts in the case."

"(b) The jury are instructed that the opinions of the witnesses as experts are merely advisory, and not binding on the jury, and the jury should accord to them such weight as they believe, from all the facts and circumstances in evidence, the same are entitled to receive."

(2) "The opinion of experts who have testified in this cause is testimony which the jury should consider and examine in connection with all the other testimony in this case, subject to the same rules of credit and disbelief as the testimony of other witnesses."

(3) "In regard to the weight to be given by you to the testimony of experts called to testify in regard to the signatures of the promissory notes set out in the complaint, I instruct you as follows: The law permits, in certain cases, a skilled person to give his opinion in testimony in regard to matters in which he is specially skilled; but such testimony should be received by you and you should award to it such value as in your judgment it deserves (with great caution), and you are at liberty to reject it, the same as the testimony of any other witness, if after due consideration you deem it not well founded in fact. And in regard to said signatures, you are at liberty to use your own judgment and knowledge in matters of handwriting, and are not legally compelled to follow the opinion of either of said witnesses. In other words, you should consider their testimony precisely the same as you do any other witness. You are not legally bound to adopt their theory unless you are satisfied that it is correct. If you are satisfied their theory is correct, then it should be adopted, and you should act upon it accordingly."

(4) "I also instruct you in regard to expert testimony that you are to exercise an independent judgment in this case, giving to such expert testimony such weight only as you deem it is entitled to; such expert testimony does not preclude you from exercising your own judgment upon the subject, and, furthermore, such expert testimony, like all opinion evidence, ought to be received by you with scrutiny and (much) caution."

(5) "Expert testimony is the opinions of witnesses on special subjects in which they are presumed to have special or unusual knowledge. In general, testimony is to facts only, but one exception to the general rule is expert testimony, which is as to the opinions of the experts. Such testimony must receive just so much weight and credit as the jury deem it entitled to when viewed in connection with all the evidence, and no more. Upon a jury rests the responsibility of rendering a correct verdict, and if the testimony of experts is opposed to the jury's conviction, it is their duty to disregard it. Such evidence, as all evidence of opinions, ought to be considered with careful scrutiny and with (much) caution."

(5) "Witnesses have testified as to certain oral statements they claim that the defendant in this case made in their presence. In considering such testimony I specifically charge you that you must receive such evidence with caution."

[7-9] It is conceded paragraph (a) of instruction 1 is correct. The phrase in instruction 1 (b) "that the opinions of the witnesses as experts are merely advisory, and not binding on the jury," is claimed to be erroneous. The expression "merely advisory" is not a correct description of the respective functions of the jury and the expert. Their respective functions are entirely independent. When the instruction is analyzed and considered, apart from other instructions, it is open to the objection that it may detract from the effect of expert evidence, in that it might lead the jury to believe it was optional with them whether to weigh such testimony as they would that of any other class of witnesses. It is true the jury were told that the opinion of the expert must be weighed with the other evidence in the case, and, if found satisfactory, to follow it, but the statement "is not binding on the jury" may have had a misleading effect. If the statement that the opinion of an expert is not binding on the jury is not considered with the other instructions, the phrase could well be misunderstood. Instruction 2 is not questioned. The phrases "you are at liberty to reject it" in instruction 3, and "if the testimony of experts is opposed to the jury's conviction, it is their duty to disregard it," in instruction 5, are lacking in accuracy. The words we have italicized inject a false quantity into the instruction. The jury is to keep such evidence, as it would any other, before them until the facts are determined. For the italicized words, "they are presumed to have special or unusual knowledge," in instruction 5, "may have" would meet appellant's criticism. It is the duty of the jury to consider and weigh the opinions of the experts with the other evidence in the case and then determine upon all the evidence where the truth lies. This is not the same as declaring that the jury may disregard the evidence of the expert. All the evidence, including the opinions of the experts, should remain in a state of solution, so to speak, until the facts of the case are finally determined. Moreover, it is only in criminal cases that the jury is to be satisfied to a "conviction." In civil cases a preponderance of evidence will suffice.

We will later state our views on such cautionary phrases as those contained in instructions 3, 4, 5, and 6.

Appellant cites, in support of his contentions that the court charged the jury as to matters of fact, article 6, § 19, of the Constitution, sections 2061 (subdivision 4) and 2101 of the Code of Civil Procedure; Estate of Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 68 Pac. 827, 89 Am.

St. Rep. 135; Estate of Hess, 183 Cal. 589, 192 Pac. 35; Quint v. Dimond, 147 Cal. 707, 714, 82 Pac. 310; People v. Wilkins, 153 Cal. 530, 111 Pac. 612; People v. Hadley, 175 Cal. 118, 123, 165 Pac. 442.

The Constitution provides:

"Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." Article 6, § 19.

In connection with the claim that the court invaded the province of the jury in its charge on expert testimony, the question is discussed in the briefs whether subdivision 4, § 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, is in violation of said constitutional provision. That section reads in part as follows:

"The jury, subject to the control of the court, in the cases specified in this Code, are the judges of the effect or value of evidence addressed to them, except when it is declared to be conclusive. They are, however, to be instructed * * * on all proper occasions: * * * 4. That the testimony of an accomplice ought to be viewed with distrust, and the evidence of the oral admissions of a party with caution."

Subdivision 4 has been considered in a number of cases with reference to the constitutional provision. In Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 282, 29 Pac. 481, 484 (18 L. R. A. 124) the court instructed the jury that—

"The statements of the witnesses as to the verbal admissions of a party should be received by the jury with great caution."

It was held the instruction was violative of the constitutional provision, and that the error was not obviated by the closing sentence therein, to the effect that it was for the jury to give to the evidence the consideration to which it was entitled. The word "great," characterizing "caution," it will be observed, is no part of the statutory provision. People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 237, 46 Pac. 153, however, decided in department that the phrase "great caution" is correct, and should be given on all proper occasions. But see reference to that case in People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 232, 74 Pac. 744. It was held in People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 179, 31 Pac. 45, that the giving of an instruction proposed by the people in the language of subdivision 4 constituted a charge on a question of fact by in effect telling the jury to discredit the accomplice who was called on behalf of the defendant.

The instruction proposed by the defendant and refused by the court in People v. Bonney, 98 Cal. 278, 33 Pac. 98, was in the language of subdivision 4, and it was held that, as the only evidence which would justify a conviction was the testimony of an accomplice of the defendant, the court erred in refusing the instruction. After calling attention to the fact that in People v. O'Brien, supra, the instruction condemned was given at the request of the prosecution, the court said:

"For the court, however, to discredit one of defendant's witnesses before the jury is very different from giving them an instruction in his favor."

An instruction given under subdivisions 6 and 7 of section 2061 was held to be erroneous in People v. Cuff, 122 Cal. 589, 591, 55 Pac. 407, citing Kauffman v. Maier, supra, and People v. O'Brien, supra.

The court, in People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 240, 258, 63 Pac. 351, refused to give an instruction proposed by the defendant as to his oral admissions and referring to two of his witnesses by name. Instead, the whole of section 200, 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, was given to the jury. The decision approved Kauffman v. Maier, supra, but held the defendant would not be heard to complain, since the instruction given was proposed by him.

In People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 231, 74 Pac. 744, the defendant proposed and the court refused to give an instruction:

"The jury is instructed that, in considering the testimony in this case, they will receive with caution all evidence of the oral admissions of the defendant against himself."

It was said that as the former decisions of the court stand, the weight of authority is to the point that the instruction is in violation of the constitutional provision, citing Kauffman v. Maier, supra, but holding it was not necessary to decide the question, saying:

"The proposed instruction states a mere commonplace within the general knowledge of jurors; and we do not think that either the giving or the refusing of such an instruction would warrant a reversal."

In denying the petition for a rehearing it was stated:

"That, so far as the statute requires such an instruction ever to be given, it is unconstitutional, for the reason that such an instruction would be in violation of the constitutional injunction against judges charging as to matters of fact. It has frequently been said by this court that the giving of such an instruction will not be held reversible error where by it the jury are instructed as to mere commonplace matters within their general knowledge (People v. Wong Bin, 139 Cal. 60, 65; People v. Farrington, 140 Cal. 656), but we are satisfied that a judgment should never be reversed for the refusal on the part of the court to instruct upon matters of fact."

The instruction proposed by the defendant and refused in People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 391, 77 Pac. 169, was held to be objectionable on the grounds that the phrase "great caution" was in excess of the language of the statute, and that it was otherwise argumentative. Kauffman v. Maier, supra, was approved in the opinion, and People v. Rodley, supra, cited. It was pointed out that the authorities relied upon by appellant were all cases where the proposed instruction was limited to the language of the statute. Five justices joined in the above conclusion. Lorigan, J., announced he was not disposed to hold that the giving of an instruction as to verbal admissions is violative of the Constitution, and that he is in accord with People v. Wardrip, supra—

"that such an instruction 'states a mere commonplace within the general knowledge of juries; and we do not think that either the giving or the refusing of such an instruction would warrant a reversal.'"

Beatty, C. J., retracted his concurrence in what was said in response to the petition for a rehearing in People v. Wardrip, supra. He placed his concurrence in People v. Buckley, supra, upon the defects in the proposed instruction already indicated, and expressed the view that section 2061 is not unconstitutional, for the reason that the power of the Legislature to determine what is or is not competent in civil or criminal cases is unquestionable; that to require the court to instruct the jury on all proper occasions to view the testimony of an accomplice with distrust, or the evidence of the oral admissions of a party with caution, is not to charge the jury as to matters of fact, "but merely to state the condition upon which the jury is permitted to hear that class of evidence"; that the allowance of such instructions is obligatory in every proper case, and that it is prejudicial error to refuse them when requested by a party against whom such evidence has been given.

The instructions proposed by the defendant and refused in People v. Moran, 144 Cal. 48, 63, 77 Pac. 777, were not in conformity with the language of subdivision 4, and for that reason Beatty, C. J., who wrote the main opinion, justified the refusal. He again declared that section 2061 is constitutional, and that the refusal to give an instruction within the language of subdivision 4 is reversible error. Henshaw, J., concurred with the Chief Justice, but four of the justices, in concurring in the judgment, adhered to the views expressed in denying the petition for rehearing in People v. Wardrip, supra. Lorigan, J., who did not act on the petition for rehearing in that case, stated, in concurring in People v. Moran, supra, that, as far as the constitutional point is concerned he did not wish to go farther than is stated in People v. Wardrip, supra, that such an instruction "states a mere commonplace within the general knowledge of jurors; and we do not think that either the giving or refusing such an instruction would warrant a reversal."

In People v. Ruiz, 144 Cal. 251, 253, 77 Pac. 907, 908, the defendant proposed and the court refused to give an instruction in the language of subdivision 4. It was said:

"The instruction offered is in the language of subdivision 4 of section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but it was definitely held in People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, that a refusal to give such an instruction is not error."

Five of the justices concurred in the decision. Beatty, C. J., in a dissenting opinion, reiterated his former views as to the constitutionality of the section and the necessity of giving an instruction when proposed within the terms of subdivision 4, and that it was a proper occasion for the giving of such an instruction and error to refuse it. In that case the instruction could only have applied to an accomplice of the defendant. We quote from the dissenting opinion:

"The trial judge, however refused the instruction, and the ruling is sustained on the authority of People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229. I concurred in that decision, but have since become convinced that it was erroneous, and in subsequent cases have so stated. People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375; People v. Moran, ante, p. 48. The Wardrip Case and the cases in which it has been followed upon this point leave it uncertain whether the refusal of this instruction is sustained upon the ground that section 2061 of the Code of Civil Procedure is unconstitutional or being constitutional the injunction it lays upon the court may be observed or disregarded at its pleasure."

Henshaw, J., did not participate in the decision.

We cite other cases which follow the decisions holding that the giving or refusal of an instruction in the language of subdivision 4 is violative of the Constitution, but that the giving or refusal to give such an instruction would not warrant reversal, as it states mere commonplace matter within the general knowledge of the jury. Goss v. Steiger Terra Cotta, etc., Works, 148 Cal. 155, 82 Pac. 681; People v. Raber, 168 Cal. 316, 320, 143 Pac. 317; People v. Hill, 1 Cal. App. 414, 417, 82 Pac. 398; People v. Davenport, 13 Cal. App. 632, 636, 110 Pac. 318; People v. Maljan, 34 Cal. App. 384, 389, 167 Pac. 547; People v. Middleton (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 448.

[10] It is clear from the later decisions that subdivision 4 is unconstitutional; but that where an instruction is proposed in the language of that subdivision, the giving or the refusal to give it will not be held to be prejudicial error; and this upon the reasoning that it states mere commonplace matter within the general knowledge of the jury. However, as it is settled law that subdivision 4 is unconstitutional it should never be made the basis of an instruction. In view of the decisions under the constitutional provision (article 6, § 19), the giving of such an instruction is a charge with respect to matters of fact. There is, therefore, ground for concluding that, where it is resorted to, it must be for the purpose of influencing the jury as to the evidence. Appellate courts should be spared the labor of condemning or palliating departures from the settled law of the state, and litigants from the liability of reversal.

We will now review the authorities cited, as well as others which deal with instructions addressed to expert evidence.

It was stipulated that the expression "with great caution," as it appears in parenthesis in instruction 3, was not given to the jury, notwithstanding the indorsement thereon indicates it was. It is shown by the indorsements that the word "much" in instructions 4 and 5 was omitted. The only cautionary matter left are the words "with scrutiny and caution" in instruction 4, "with careful scrutiny and caution" in instruction 5, and "received with caution" in instruction 6.

The instruction in McLean v. Crow, 88 Cal. 644, 648, 26 Pac. 596, 597, containing the phrase "with scrutiny and caution" in relation to medical experts, was rejected. The court said:

"We see no objection to the instruction asked, and the court might well have given it, but it does not necessarily follow that the judgment should be reversed for the refusal."

Haight v. Vallet, 89 Cal. 245, 250, 26 Pac. 897, held it was not error to instruct the jury that the testimony of an expert on handwriting should be received with great caution. The case appears in 23 Am. St. Rep. 465, and was referred to in notes to Hull v. St. Louis, 42 L. R. A. 760n, and State v. Ryno, 64 L. R. A. 318n. The note to Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Co. v. Whitehead, 42 Am. St. Rep. 472, quotes from Haight v. Vallet, supra:

"Expert evidence should be received with great caution, and rejected by the jurors the same as the testimony of any other witness if, after due consideration, they deem it not well founded in fact."

But the note also cites Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company v. Thul, 32 Kan. 255, 4 Pac. 352, 49 Am. Rep. 484, to the effect that in an ordinary case it is error to instruct the jury that medical testimony should be received and weighed with caution. We quote from the syllabus of Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Co. v. Whitehead, supra:

"An instruction that the evidence of expert witnesses is 'to be received with caution, as the opinions of such witnesses, however honestly entertained, may be erroneous,' is fatally erroneous, for the reason that expert evidence is to be received and treated by the jury precisely as other testimony."

The dissenting opinion (the subject was discussed in the department but not in the main opinion) in Beveridge v. Lewis, 137 Cal. 619, 67 Pac. 1040, 70 Pac. 1083, 59 L. R. A. 581, 92 Am. St. Rep. 188, a condemnation proceeding wherein substantially all the proof of values was the testimony of experts, cites the case there in support of an instruction to the effect that in weighing the evidence the jurors may exercise their individual judgment as to the values in the light of their own general knowledge.

The action of the trial court was upheld in People v. Smith, 106 Cal. 73, 79, 39 Pac. 40, 42) in eliminating from two instructions the respective phrases, "caution should be exercised by the jury in accepting the opinion of an expert as a fact proven in the case," and "such evidence should therefore be received with great caution by the jury," and the following given in lieu thereof, approved:

"After considering all these things, and any other circumstances in evidence, you are to give to such testimony (such weight) as you in your judgment think it entitled to. * * * If convincing, and carrying with it a belief in its truth, act upon it; if not, you have a right to reject it."

In People v. Barthleman, 120 Cal. 7, 13, 52 Pac. 112, 114, instructions 5 and 6 related to the testimony of certain medical experts. The instructions contained such phrases as "the testimony was to be viewed with scrutiny" and "received with great caution." The court held:

"* * * The judgment should not be reversed for the giving of these instructions, without reference to the question whether or not it was strictly proper to give them. They merely told the jury to do what they should have done without any instruction on the subject; and therefore the giving of the instructions was not, at least, prejudicial error."

In Estate of Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 68 Pac. 827, 89 Am. St. Rep. 135, an order admitting a will to probate was reversed upon the ground that the following instruction so discredited the testimony of the medical experts as to practically destroy it:

"You are instructed, therefore, that while we receive and you will take into consideration the opinion of experts, such opinions are not entitled to as much weight as facts, especially where there is a conflict between an opinion and a fact; when a fact is established, it is a fact, and cannot be overcome; while an opinion is but an opinion, and it may be true and it may be untrue. Opinions of different experts are often diametrically opposed to each other, even when based upon the same supposed conditions."

The instruction in Quint v. Dimond, 147 Cal. 707, 714, 82 Pac. 310, was held to be substantially an argument to the jury in favor of plaintiff upon questions of fact, but it was not addressed to expert testimony.

It was held in People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 530, 537, 111 Pac. 612, 615, that the trial court did not err in refusing to give an instruction admonishing the jury "to scrutinize opinion evidence or expert evidence with the utmost care."

It was declared in Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 469, 191 Pac. 913, 914:

"Whatever the individual opinion as to the value of expert testimony, it has been clearly settled in this state that, as regards the preference or weight to be given the testimony in any particular case, the law makes no distinction between expert testimony and evidence of other character, and that, when there is a conflict between scientific testimony and testimony as to the facts, the jury, or trial court, must determine the relative weight of the evidence. Estate of Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 89 Am. St. Rep. 135, 68 Pac. 827; Watson v. Watson, 58 Mich. 507, 25 N. W. 497."

The instruction condemned in Estate of Blake, supra, was given in Estate of Hess, 183 Cal. 589, 593, 192 Pac. 35, 40, where it was held to invade the province of the jury. The case, however, did not pass on the contention "that Estate of Blake having been decided prior to the adoption of section 4½, article 6, of the Constitution, is not authority for the reversal of the judgment herein because of the giving of instruction 23." The case was reversed upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show the decedent was mentally unsound.

In Estate of Nelson (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 368, it was declared:

"Appellant contends that the trial court erred in refusing an instruction to the effect that the testimony of expert witnesses should be received with great caution. This instruction was properly refused Quint v. Dimond, 147 Cal. 707, 714, 82 Pac. 310; People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 530, 111 Pac. 612; Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 191 Pac. 913; Estate of Hess, 183 Cal. 589, 192 Pac. 35."

In Wood v. Los Angeles Co., 1 Cal. App. 474, 82 Pac. 547, it was held not to be error to refuse to give a cautionary instruction proposed by the defendant which used the phrase "great caution" with reference to opinion evidence of medical experts. The rule followed in Haight v. Vallet, supra, was considered in connection with the later decisions on the question.

[11] It is clear from what is said on this subject in the later cases an instruction to the jury as to the value of or the manner of determining expert testimony is in violation of the constitutional provision as to instructing on matters of fact (article 6, § 19).

[12] Section 2061 does not, in terms, at least, authorize the court to charge the jury as to expert testimony. Subdivision 4 contains the only provision warranting an instruction as to particular classes of witnesses. There is, therefore, neither constitutional nor statutory warrant for the giving of cautionary instructions. Respondent seeks to excuse the giving of these instructions with the explanation that using the word "statements" instead of "admissions," so as to bring the instruction within the language of subdivision 4, was a typographical error. But this explanation does not meet the point that subdivision 4 is unconstitutional.

It may be remarked in mitigation of the error in the instructions that they did not refer specifically to the different classes of expert witnesses. Appellant called only one expert witness, and he qualified and testified under subdivision 9, § 1870, and section 1944, Code of Civil Procedure. Eight expert witnesses testified for respondent—three of them qualifying and giving their opinions under the same rule as appellant's witness, and five under subdivision 9, § 1870, and section 1943, as having knowledge of the handwriting of respondent. Appellant's expert was shown to be accomplished in the art of handwriting, and of the five who testified from knowledge of respondent's signature four were her relatives and one a friend. Of the three who based their opinion on a comparison of the writings with the signatures on the notes two of them qualified on their experience in the banking business and the other as an instructor in handwriting in a high school. Keeping these features of the case in mind, respondent's suggestion that it is more likely the cautionary instructions were considered by the jury with reference to respondent's witnesses rather than to appellant's expert may be true. However that may be, the trial courts should refrain from giving any instructions that infringe the constitutional provision (article 6, § 19). Since the law authorizes the admission of expert testimony, like all other matters of fact, it should be left strictly to the jury to weigh and determine its effect and value unaided by the court, either by disquisitions on that character of evidence or by directing the mental processes of the jurors as to how they should resolve it into facts. "The court has no right to dictate or suggest the process of reasoning by which the evidence shall be judged." Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 406, 417, 29 Pac. 1101, 1104. It is no part of the function of the court to either extol or disparage the testimony of experts. It is proper in the instructions to the jury to call attention, for instance, to the distinction between expert testimony and the evidence of facts, to explain the office of exemplars in handwriting cases, to charge that the opinion of experts is to be considered with the other evidence in the case in determining the facts. But it is never proper to instruct the jury that expert testimony is or is not reliable or as to how the jury should appraise it.

5. Under point III appellant enumerates numerous rulings in the admission and rejection of evidence which it is claimed were erroneous.

[13] (A) It is contended a proper foundation had not been laid for impeaching questions put to Elisha Dana to elicit a conversation he had with appellant as to certain letters addressed by respondent to Murphy and by Murphy given to appellant, which it was claimed reflected on her character. The witness quoted appellant as saying the best thing respondent could do would be to pay the notes, and that if she did not do so he would expose her. There would seem to be no merit to the objection as to lack of foundation for impeachment. Respondent was entitled in the state of the inquiry to have the conversation established as an independent proposition without regard to impeachment and to prove what appellant did say even though he denied making the statements.

It is also claimed, on the ground no proper foundation was laid within the meaning of section 2052, Code of Civil Procedure, the court erred in overruling appellant's objections to "impeaching questions" put to respondent concerning conversations between them, including one in the lobby of the Palace Hotel in September, 1918. In appellant's testimony he had not given the latter conversation when respondent was examined. But prior thereto he had testified to this and to other conversations, and gave his version of them. The "impeaching questions" followed respondent's examination in chief and related to the above conversations, embracing the statements imputed to her by appellant, including her purported admission of the execution of the notes, her promise to pay them, her request for an extension of time, and other matters. As these conversations, as well as others, went to the merits of the question of the responsibility of respondent for the promissory notes, we do not perceive that a foundation was necessary.

In view of the reversal of the judgment, it will not be necessary to consider appellant's objections as to the type of questions complained of.

[14] (B) It is contended the court erred in overruling appellant's objections to the questions put to respondent covering her intent at the time she initialed the notes. Appellant's repeated objection was that the inquiry was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, calling for the opinion and conclusion of the witness, and being the very question the jury has to determine. The court sustained an objection to each of such questions—that is to say, questions as to whether the witness intended by her initials to ratify the notes—and finally overruled an objection to the question:

"Q. Why was it you put the RD on these promissory notes? A. To help Mr. Hirshfeld lock Mr. Murphy up and put him in jail."

It is not altogether clear whether, if Murphy were to be prosecuted, it was to be for the making and uttering of the notes or obtaining the $800 from the parties. Respondent did not state upon what it was proposed to prosecute Murphy, but when appellant was asked why respondent was angry at him he answered:

"Because he took advantage of her getting her notes and discounting them and using the money, I suppose."

The inquiry apparently called for substantive evidence of a fact of which the witness had primary knowledge—namely, why she initialed the notes.

(C) It will serve no purpose to consider these objections.

(D) We think this proposed evidence was too remote to prove appellant was relying on respondent and not on Murphy to meet the obligations.

(E) On the retrial the question whether respondent should have been allowed, over appellant's objection, to testify she had not engaged Murphy to manage her ranch, which testimony was merely in response to appellant's extrajudicial statement to her that Murphy had so told him, will probably not arise.

[15] (F) Appellant contends the court erred in limiting the cross-examination of Elisha Dana as to respondent's handwriting, by not allowing the witness to make a comparison between the signatures on the notes, which he testified were not in respondent's handwriting, and appellant's exhibit No. 6, an admitted handwriting of respondent. The witness was testifying under subdivision 9, § 1870, and section 1943, and the court sustained the objection on the ground it was not cross-examination. While this is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the trial court, the witness should be sufficiently interrogated as to his opinion.

(G) This specification does not call for comment.

(H) The witness, Samuel Dana, apparently based his opinion in part on his personal knowledge of the controversy, and to an extent on his knowledge of respondent's handwriting. However, he finally placed his opinion on the latter. If he is again called as a witness, his examination may more clearly show the foundation for his opinion.

(I) We have already discussed this point.

(J) It is contended by appellant that the court erred in excluding testimony of a purported conversation between appellant and respondent in 1917 in which it is claimed the latter admitted the execution of certain notes of that year; the extinguishment of which was the consideration for two of the notes in suit—those dated February 4, 1918. The objection to the proffered testimony was that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, not proper redirect examination, and going into collateral matters, and vague, indefinite, and uncertain." The court finally said:

"Well, I will sustain the objection to the question. Of course, I think probably upon rebuttal you would be entitled to bring out the conversation but relating to this transaction here."

The inquiry was not resumed, and in all probability this objection will be obviated on the retrial.

Judgment reversed.

NORTH PAC. S. S. CO. v. SOLEY.

1. Admiralty ⚓20—Injury held without jurisdiction of Industrial Accident Commission.

Injuries to a stevedore while loading a cargo on board a ship lying in navigable waters of the United States and engaged in interstate commerce held within the general maritime law, and not within the jurisdiction of the State Industrial Accident Commission.

2. Master and servant ⚓417(5)—Reviewing court may annul compensation award for want of jurisdiction of Commission.

On review under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67, of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, the court may determine whether the Commission acted in excess of its powers and, if it has, may annul the award.

3. Master and servant ⚓417(5)—Review of compensation proceedings controlled by statute.

The method of review of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission being statutory, the courts can only review questions raised by the record of proceedings before the Commission by the method prescribed by statute.

4. Constitutional law ⚓312—Refusal of injunction not denial of due process.

Denial of an injunction restraining an injured employee from enforcing an award of the Industrial Accident Commission which was concededly in excess of its jurisdiction, but from which no timely appeal had been taken or review had, held not the deprivation of the employer of its property without due process of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by the North Pacific Steamship Company against William T. Soley and the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California. From a decree for the last-named defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Heidelberg & Murasky, of San Francisco, and Herbert N. Ellis, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, J. Plaintiff brought this action to secure an injunction perpetually restraining the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California and William T. Soley from enforcing an award made by the Commission to Soley for injuries alleged to have been sustained by the latter in the course of his employment by this plaintiff. The action was dismissed as to the Commission. The demurrer of defendant Soley to the first amended complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and from the judgment that plaintiff take nothing by its action, it has appealed.

From the allegations of the complaint it appears that plaintiff was engaged in the business of transporting freight and passengers in interstate commerce between various points on the Pacific Coast in the state of California and the states of Oregon and Washington. While so engaged it owned and operated the ocean-going steamer Breakwater. On a day in June, 1916, while the Breakwater was lying in navigable waters of the United States, in the harbor of San Diego, loading a cargo, and at said time actually engaged in interstate commerce, defendant William T. Soley, employed on the vessel as a stevedore, sustained severe injuries by falling down a hatchway. In due course Soley filed an application for compensation for his injuries with the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California. Throughout the proceedings which followed plaintiff protested against any award being made. It denied the jurisdiction of the Commission to entertain the application and alleged that the accident causing the injury arose out of and in connection with, and was exclusively within, the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States courts. Notwithstanding the objection of the plaintiff, and over its protest, the Commission made, entered, and filed its findings in favor of the applicant, and awarded him substantial compensation for his injuries. The order of the Commission making said award is now in full force and effect. A certified copy of the findings and award of the commission has been filed with the clerk of the superior court, and it is alleged that Soley, unless restrained, will cause execution to be issued against the plaintiff for the amount of the award, or as much thereof as may be due and unpaid. Other allegations of the complaint are to the effect that the plaintiff has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. The prayer of the complaint is for an injunction restraining the defendant from seeking to enforce the award of the Commission.

[1-3] Under the facts alleged in the complaint, the liability of plaintiff to Soley for the injuries sustained by him presented a case arising under the general maritime law. Consequently the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California was without jurisdiction in the matter. Alaska Packers' Ass'n v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 561; Zurich, etc., Ins. Co. v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 563; Rolph Co. v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 220 Pac. 669; Sudden & Christenson v. I. A. C., 182 Cal. 437, 188 Pac. 803; Southern Pac. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, 37 Sup. Not having jurisdiction to make an award for the injury complained of, its adjudication was invalid. Tallac Co. v. Pillsbury, 176 Cal. 236, 168 Pac. 17. The Workmen's Compensation Act provided in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), as now, that within 30 days after an application for a rehearing before the Industrial Accident Commission is denied, or, if the application is granted, within 30 days after the rendition of the decision on the rehearing, any party affected thereby may apply to the Supreme Court of this state, or to the District Court of Appeal of the appellate district in which said person resides, for a writ of review for the purpose of having the lawfulness of the order, decision, or award inquired into and determined. In such review the court may determine whether the Commission acted in excess of its powers. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67. It follows, therefore, that if timely application for a writ of review had been made to this court, or to the District Court of Appeal, the award would have been annulled. Tallac Co. v. Pillsbury, supra. But no such proceeding was perfected. Although it does not appear from the complaint that such is the fact, it was admitted at the oral argument that appellant instituted a belated proceeding in certiorari for the purpose of having the lawfulness of this award inquired into and determined. The District Court of Appeal held that notwithstanding the fact that the award showed on its face that it was beyond and in excess of the jurisdiction of the commission, the writ must be dismissed; application therefor not having been made to the court within 30 days, as prescribed by the statute. North Pac. S. S. Co. v. I. A. C., 34 Cal. App. 488, 168 Pac. 30. A petition to have the cause heard in this court after judgment in the District Court of Appeal was denied. North Pac. S. S. Co. v. I. A. C., S. F. No. 8571, December 15, 1917. Appellant was therefore confronted at the outset of this action with the circumstance that although materially affected by the award made by the Commission it failed to avail itself of the only method provided by statute whereby the lawfulness of the action of the Commission might be inquired into. The Workmen's Compensation Act provides that no court of the state, except the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal, by writ of certiorari or review, as in the act specified, "shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any order, rule, regulation, decision or award of the Commission, or to suspend or delay the operation or execution thereof, or to restrain, enjoin or interfere with the Commission in the performance of its duties." Section 67, supra. It was accordingly held in Thaxter v. Finn, 178 Cal. 270, 273, 173 Pac. 163, a case involving a lack of jurisdiction in the Industrial Accident Commission, which is the exact question presented on this appeal, that the sole judicial review contemplated by the Workmen's Compensation Act can be had only where a proceeding therefor is instituted in the proper court within the time specified in the act, and the court granted a writ of mandamus to compel the sheriff to enforce a judgment on an award admittedly made in excess of the jurisdiction of the Commission. The cogent reasons for the conclusion reached by the court in that case need not be repeated here. They dispose of the real point in the case, which is that the method of review of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission being statutory, the courts can only review the questions raised by the record of the proceeding before the Commission by the method pointed out in the statute. Smith-Lohr Coal Mng. Co. v. Ind. Board, 279 Ill. 88, 116 N. E. 656, 658. All other forms of review are excluded. People v. McGoorty, 270 Ill. 610, 110 N. E. 791.

[4] Appellant frankly admits that the purpose of this appeal is: First, to urge this court to recede from the decision announced in Thaxter v. Finn, supra; and, second, to secure a decision of the United States Supreme Court on the question involved if this court should decide to allow its former decision to stand. In order to lay the foundation for a writ of error to the federal court, it advances the contention that as the award of the Industrial Accident Commission in this case was made without jurisdiction it will be a violation of the United States Constitution to permit its enforcement, in that it will be depriving plaintiff of its property without due process of law, and of its right to settle a maritime dispute according to the law maritime. We have given due consideration to appellant's contentions and to the argument and briefs offered in its support.

We are not convinced that the decision in Thaxter v. Finn was erroneous, and the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

SARGENT v. SHUMAKER. (L. A. 7174.)

1. Mortgages ☞356—Notice of trustee's sale in city where property is situated required to be posted only in three public places thereof; "also."

Where sale is in the same city in which the property is situated, notice of time and place of sale under trust deed of land, which Civ. Code, § 2924, provides shall be given in the manner required for sale of real property on execution, need be posted only in three public places of the city; Code Civ. Proc. § 692, as to notice of execution sale, providing by subdivision 1 that, in case of perishable property, it shall be by posting notice of time and place of sale in three public places of the city where the sale is to take place, and by subdivision 3, in case of real property, by posting a similar notice, for 20 days, in three public places of the city where the property is situated, "and also" where the property is to be sold; the quoted word "also" having the meaning of "in like manner," and referring for antecedent to "for 20 days" and "in three public places in the city," and being used as a brief substitute for those two phrases, applying only to a sale in a city other than that where the property is situated, under the rule of construction, expressed by the phrase "reddendo singula singulis," that general words in a statute may, where the sense requires, and in furtherance of the intention, be taken distributively (citing Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, "Also").

2. Mortgages ☞369(3)—Sale by trustee not set aside for mere inadequacy of price.

Mere inadequacy of price is not ground for setting aside a sale under power in trust deed, but there must in addition be shown some element of fraud, unfairness or oppression, though, when the price is greatly disproportionate to the value, very slight evidence of unfairness or irregularity will suffice.

3. Mortgages ☞369(2)—Owner's want of knowledge of sale, made on statutory notice, no ground for setting it aside.

That the owner of land did not know of pending sale under trust deed, standing alone, is no ground for setting aside the sale, no notice other than provided by the statute being necessary.

4. Appeal and error ☞996—Ultimate facts, not necessarily following from facts found, not inferred.

It is not in the province of the appellate court to infer from the findings ultimate facts which would support the judgment when such facts do not necessarily follow from the facts actually found.

5. Mortgages ☞369(3)—Irregularity, which, in connection with inadequacy of price will authorize setting aside sale, must have contributed to inadequacy.

Irregularity which, in connection with great inadequacy of price, will warrant setting aside sale under trust deed, must affirmatively appear to have contributed to such inadequacy;

so the fact that the sale was made in an inaudible tone and a hurried manner would not avail without showing that the purchaser was thereby prevented from making the bids that he desired, or that any other person was ready, able, and willing to bid, or was present.

6. Mortgages ☞369(3)—Inexcusable lack of knowledge of sale coupled with "mere inadequacy of price" not ground for setting aside sale.

Where the amount secured by trust deed had been delinquent for seven months, and no good reason is apparent why the administrator of the deceased landowner should not have expected and anticipated that the beneficiary bank would enforce the trust deed, he not having been led to believe that it would not do so by letter of its attorney, that it would take such necessary action against the estate on the secured notes "as may be desirable," and he not having asked the bank for an extension of time or made effort to procure a loan elsewhere with which to make payment, his ignorance of the sale, though statutory notice had been given, coupled with "mere inadequacy of price," meaning simply an inequality between the value of the property and the price, as distinguished from a price so insignificant as to amount to nothing, is insufficient to warrant setting aside the sale, which was for a price amounting to a third of the value of the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by L. P. Sargent, administrator of E. W. Myers, against S. F. Shumaker. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Ault & Anderson, of Calexico, for appellant.

James W. Glassford, of El Centro, for respondent.

MYERS, J. The defendant appeals herein from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to quiet title and to set aside a trustee's sale under power of sale in a trust deed, and to cancel the deed executed pursuant thereto, or to compel a reconveyance of the property. The essential facts may be stated as follows: On February 15, 1918, one E. W. Myers, who was then the owner of the property involved herein, executed a trust deed conveying the same to Frank D. Hevener, trustee for the International Bank as beneficiary, to secure the payment of principal sums aggregating $5,000, together with interest thereon upon promissory notes executed by said Myers to said bank as payee. Myers died September 12, 1919, and letters of administration upon his estate were duly issued to the plaintiff herein. The promissory notes became due February 15, 1920, and remained unpaid as to the principal thereof, as well as certain installments of interest. April 24, 1920, the bank, as beneficiary, executed and served upon the trustee its declaration of default and its demand that the trustee proceed to sell the property as provided in the trust deed. April 27, 1920, the bank, as beneficiary, executed its written notice of intended sale under the deed of trust, which was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder May 7, 1920. Thereafter in the following August the trustee caused to be posted and published notices of sale under the deed of trust, which was noticed for September 7, 1920, at 10 o'clock a. m. At the time and place specified in the notice the trustee offered the property for sale and sold the same to defendant Shumaker, who was the only bidder therefor at said sale, for the sum of $5,654.69. The purchase price was thereupon paid to the trustee, who executed and delivered a deed of conveyance to said purchaser. Thereafter, in November, 1920, the plaintiff commenced this action by filing a complaint in an ordinary action to quiet title. After the trial of this action he filed a second amended complaint, which was in two counts or causes of action. The first count pleaded the conventional action to quiet title, and the second count set up the facts with respect to the execution of the trust deed and the trustee's sale thereunder; alleged that said sale was void by reason of the alleged failure to post or publish notice thereof in the manner required by law and by the provisions of the trust deed therefor, and in addition thereto alleged certain irregularities in the conduct of the sale, which will be hereafter noted more in detail, and prayed for a cancellation of the trustee's deed, a reconveyance from the purchaser, and a decree quieting plaintiff's title. The trial court found most of the controverted facts in favor of plaintiff and made its interlocutory decree wherein it adjudged the plaintiff, as administrator, to be the owner in fee simple of the described premises, subject to the payment by him to defendant Shumaker of the sum of $5,769.15, and decreed that upon such payment said defendant should execute and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of said premises, and that in default of the execution of such deed upon the payment of said sum that the same be executed by the county clerk, who was appointed a commissioner for that purpose. The sum of $5,769.15 was the balance arrived at by crediting defendant with the amount paid by him as the purchase price, together with additional sums paid by him in discharging delinquent taxes against the property and an attorney fee allowed him by the court, and charging him with all moneys which he had collected as rentals from the property.

dently concurred in by the learned trial judge, that the trustee's sale was utterly void because of the failure to post notice thereof as required by law and by the provisions of the trust deed. It is conceded that the notice of sale was duly published and for the required length of time. It is conceded also that the notices thereof were duly posted and for the required length of time in three public places within the city of Cal-exico, within which the property was situated and was to be sold and was sold. But it is respondent's contention that the trustee was required in addition thereto to post a fourth notice at the precise place where the property was to be and was sold. This contention presents the most important question involved upon this appeal.

The statute required (Civ. Code, § 2924; and the trust deed provided, that notice of the proposed sale should be posted "in the manner and for a time not less than that required by law for sales of real property upon execution." We are thus directed to section 692, Code of Civil Procedure, which prescribes the manner of giving notice of sale under execution. As that section existed at the time with which we are here concerned, it provided that notice thereof must be given as follows:

"1. In case of perishable property: By posting written notice of the time and place of sale in three public places of the township or city where the sale is to take place. * * *

"2. In case of other personal property: By posting a similar notice in three public places in the township or city where the sale is to take place. * * *

"3. In case of real property: By posting a similar notice, particularly describing the property, for twenty days, in three public places of the township or city where the property is situated, and also where the property is to be sold, and publishing a copy thereof. * * *

It is obvious that the provisions of subdivision 3 of the section must have been intended to provide for and apply to two different situations, one where the property is situated in the same township or city where in it is to be sold, and the other where the property is situated in one township or city and is to be sold in some other township or city. It is respondent's contention that the section makes the same requirement as to posting applicable to both situations, and that it should be construed as requiring in either case the posting of four notices, three of which must be posted in three public places within the township or city where the property is situated, and the fourth at the place (meaning the very place) where the property is to be sold. Appellants, on the other hand, contend that the section is to be construed as if it read as follows:

"* * * By posting * * * twenty days in three public places of the township or city where the property is situated, and in three and that the effect thereof, where the property is situated in one township or city and is to be sold in another, is to require the posting of six notices in three public places in each such township or city, and that the effect thereof, where the property is to be sold in the same township or city, is to require the posting of but three notices in three public places within such township or city. Respondent replies that the adoption of such a construction would be judicial legislation, in that it necessitates adding to the section words which were not placed therein by the Legislature. This criticism, however, is equally applicable to the construction contended for by respondent. It is obvious that the phraseology used in subdivision 3 is in condensed form when compared with that used in subdivisions 1 and 2, each of which is complete upon its face. The same conclusion is compelled when we consider that subdivision 3 must have been intended to apply to each of the two different situations above referred to. Our object, then, must be to ascertain the legislative intent, and in this endeavor we may consider not alone the text, but also the context, and these in the light of the purpose to be subserved by the provisions under consideration.

It is an elementary rule in the construction of statutes that some effect must be given to every word thereof if reasonably possible so to do, and the word "also" is of evident importance in this connection. The primary meaning thereof and that in which it is most commonly used is "in like manner" or "in the same manner." See 1 Words and Phrases, Second Series, p. 196; 1 Words and Phrases, p. 359, and cases there cited. It is thus a word of reference, directing our attention to that which antecedes. As used herein it has to do with the posting of notices, and the only specifications of the manner of such posting to be found in the antecedent phraseology which could be adopted by such reference are "for twenty days" and "in three public places of the township or city." It thus seems reasonable to suppose that the word "also" was here used as a brief substitute for the repetition of those two phrases. This conclusion appears the more probable when we consider that the provisions of subdivisions 1 and 2 above quoted may be regarded as evidencing a legislative determination that in so far as notice by posting is concerned the posting in three public places within a township or city is sufficient for the giving of notice to the inhabitants thereof.

It is true that, when we consider this subdivision as requiring the posting of but three notices in cases where the sale is to be made in the township or city wherein the property is situated, the words "and also" seem wholly inappropriate thereto, but this consideration becomes unimportant when we recall that the section is designed to apply to the two different situations above referred to, and that it evidences an attempt at condensed composition.

"General words in a legislative act are often, where the sense requires it, and in furtherance of the intention, to be taken distributively, reddendo singula singulis. They are thus applied to the subject-matter to which they appear by the context most properly to relate, and to which they are really most applicable." Lewis' Sutherland on Stat. Const. [2d Ed.] § 442.

"Such interpretation subjects general expressions of words plainly susceptible of definition or obviously lacking it, because obscure, to the controlling influence of the context, a process or method of analysis widely recognized and adopted by the courts." Hope Natural Gas Co. v. Shriver, 75 W. Va. 401, 83 S. E. 1011.

In the same case it is said:

"A rule of construction sanctions reference of words general in their terms, such as those of the exception, to their places, subjects or connections as shown by other words or provisions in the context. It is briefly and tersely expressed by the Latin phrase, 'reddendo singula singulis,' literally translated, 'by referring each to each,' or 'referring each phrase or expression to its appropriate object.' 34 Cyc. 765. * * * A command or direction to go to London by rail and steamer would not be understood as requiring the use of both railroad and steamer at the same time and on the same portions of the route. The order would be interpreted and acted upon, reddendo singula singulis. In execution thereof, the railroad would be employed to New York, the steamer from New York to Liverpool, and the railroad again from Liverpool to London."

See, also, Building & Loan Ass'n v. Sohn, 54 W. Va. 101, 46 S. E. 222; Wells Fargo & Co. v. Board of Equalization, 56 Cal. 194, 198; Coffin v. Hussey, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 289; Commonwealth v. Jordan, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 228; Commonwealth v. Cooke, 50 Pa. 201; Ludlow v. Bowne, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 1, 3 Am. Dec. 277, 289; Hayes v. King, 37 N. J. Eq. 1; Thornton v. Thornton, L. R. 20 Eq. 599, 604.

Applying this process to the section under consideration and reading its general words distributively, we are led to the construction contended for by appellant as the most reasonable and probable expression of the legislative intent. This conclusion is strongly confirmed by the circumstance that the four leading compilations of legal forms in use in this state have adopted without question the same construction. Cowdery's Legal Forms, p. 623; Church's Forms of Law and Business, p. 1126; 1 Jury's Adjudicated Forms of Pleading and Practice, p. 723; 2 Sutherland's Forms, p. 1423. The fact that the correctness of this construction has never been hitherto questioned, so far as we are advised, strongly suggests that the members of the bar throughout this state have concurred therein with practical unanimity. This circumstance, while in no way conclusive, is most persuasive that the construction so concurred in is correct. We conclude, therefore, that in a case such as this, wherein the property was to be sold in the same city in which it was situated, the law required the posting of but three notices in three public places thereof.

[2] We come now to the question whether, under the facts alleged, proved, and found, the plaintiff was entitled to have the sale set aside on the ground of irregularities in the conduct thereof, coupled with inadequacy of the purchase price. As above stated, it was the evident view of the plaintiff and of the trial judge that the sale was void for insufficient notice, but certain facts were alleged and found by the court which would be relevant to an action to avoid the sale on the ground of constructive fraud, and respondent contends that they are sufficient to sustain the judgment herein, even though it be conceded that the notice of sale was duly given. It was alleged in the second amended complaint and found by the court upon sufficient evidence that the property was of the value of $25,000. It was sold for $5,654.69, to which should be added perhaps an amount equal to the aggregate liens against it for delinquent taxes and tax sales amounting to some $1,300, together with an additional sum for taxes then unpaid, but not yet delinquent. But adding all of these sums to the price actually paid it still represented less than one-third of the actual value of the property, and must, therefore, be said to have been clearly inadequate. There is neither allegation nor finding herein of any actual fraud or fraudulent intent upon the part of either of the defendants. That this omission was intentional is evidenced, as we are told by counsel, by the further fact that the trial judge in his written opinion filed herein expressly stated: "The court finds that both purchaser and trustee acted in good faith. * * *" We are thus relegated to a consideration of the single question of constructive fraud. It is well settled in this state that mere inadequacy of price, however gross, is not in itself a sufficient ground for setting aside a sale legally made. There must in addition be proof of some element of fraud, unfairness or oppression before the court will be justified in depriving the purchaser of his legal advantage. Where, however, the price obtained is greatly disproportionate to the actual value, very slight evidence of unfairness or irregularity will suffice to authorize the granting of the relief. Rauer v. Hertweck, 175 Cal. 278, 165 Pac. 946; Winbigler v. Sherman, 175 Cal. 270, 165 Pac. 943; Bock v. Losekamp, 179 Cal. 674, 179 Pac. 516; Odell v. Cox, 151 Cal. 70, 90 Pac. 194; Baldwin v.

Brown, 42 Cal. App. Dec. 368.¹ The rule is stated in Odell v. Cox, supra, in the following language:

"Where, in addition to gross inadequacy of price, the purchaser has, in the language of the United States Supreme Court, 'been guilty of any unfairness or has taken any undue advantage' resulting in such gross inadequacy and consequent injury to the owner of the property, he will be deemed guilty of fraud warranting the interposition of a court of equity in favor of the owner who is himself without fault." (Italics added.)

The circumstances of claimed unfairness or irregularity relied upon by the respondent herein, in addition to the inadequacy of consideration, are: (1) That the plaintiff did not know of the proposed sale and was given no notice thereof by either of the defendants; (2) that the trustee did not announce said sale or call for bids in an audible tone of voice sufficient to enable persons in the immediate vicinity to know that the trustee was selling the property; (3) that said sale was conducted in a hurried manner to an extent which made it impossible for persons present to bid on said property; and (4) that the defendant bank by a letter to plaintiff had caused plaintiff to believe that the said bank would not proceed to sell the property.

[3] The circumstance that the plaintiff did not know of the pending sale and was not notified thereof by either of the defendants is not, standing alone, of any importance herein. As this court said in Rauer v. Hertweck, supra:

"There was no obligation upon them to give him any such notice. The statute defines how notice of an execution sale must be given. To say that a sale may be set aside because some other notice was not given would be to amend the statute, and this we cannot, of course, do. When the officer conducting the sale has done the acts prescribed by the Code, he has done his full duty. He is not required to search for the debtor and give him any further notice than that which the law exacts. Nor is any such duty imposed upon the judgment creditor. Much less is one who may contemplate bidding at an execution sale called upon to concern himself with the question whether the debtor has actual knowledge of the proceeding."

[4, 5] Plaintiff alleged and the court found:

"That said sale was not made at public auction, as provided by said trust deed, in that the trustee did not announce said sale, or call for bids, in an audible tone of voice, sufficient to enable persons in the immediate vicinity of the place where said sale was held, to ascertain or know that the trustee was selling the property herein described, and that said sale was conducted in a hurried manner, to an extent which made it impossible for persons present at the place of sale to bid on said property, either en masse, or in parcels."

It is not alleged in the complaint or found by the court that any other person actually was present at the place of sale to bid on said property or that any person was prevented from so doing either by the inaudible tone of voice or the hurried manner in which the sale was conducted. It is neither alleged nor found that there was any other person in existence who was ready, able, and willing to bid on said property. These omissions become the more significant when we reflect that the second amended complaint was not filed until the trial had been had and concluded. Respondent now asserts that it appears from the evidence that one Brown was present at the sale for the purpose of bidding thereat, and would have bid the sum of $8,000 for one of the properties included in the sale, but was prevented from so doing by reason of the circumstances above mentioned. Appellants reply that it conclusively appears from the evidence that Brown was neither ready, able, nor willing to bid upon this property for the reason that it appears without conflict that he was unable to make payment therefor, and that under the terms of the trust deed the trustee was empowered to sell only "for cash in gold coin of the United States." Appellants confidently assert that, if the trial court had found that any bidder was prevented from bidding at this sale by reason of the irregularities complained of, such finding would have been contrary to and wholly unsupported by the evidence. It is unnecessary for us to so determine. It is sufficient to say for the purposes hereof that such a finding would be in no way compelled or required by the evidence herein, and "it is not within the province of this court to infer from the findings ultimate facts which would support the judgment when such facts do not necessarily follow from the facts actually found." Rossini v. St. Paul, etc., Ins. Co., 182 Cal. 415, 421, 188 Pac. 564.

While it is true that, where the inadequacy of price is palpable and great, slight irregularities in conjunction therewith will authorize a court to set aside the sale, we are of the opinion that such irregularities, to have this effect, must have conduced to the inadequacy of the price, or in some other way have contributed to the injury of the plaintiff. This conclusion is indicated by the language commonly used in the statement of the rule. Thus in the rule as stated in Odell v. Cox, supra, we find the phrase "'any unfairness or * * * undue advantage' resulting in such gross inadequacy. * * *" (Italics added.) The same phraseology is found in the statement of the rule in Wingbiger v. Sherman, supra. The same thought is indicated in the statement of the conclusion in Rauer v. Hertweck, supra, that—

"The resulting loss can more properly be attributed to his [plaintiff's] neglect of his own interests than to any unfairness on the part of the judgment creditor or the purchasers."

The rule is thus stated in Freeman on Executions, § 309:

"If the inadequacy can be connected with or shown to result from any mistake, accident, surprise, misconduct, fraud or irregularity, the sale will generally be vacated, unless the complainant was himself in fault, or the rights of innocent third parties have become dependent upon the sale." (Italics added.)

The sale en masse of several known lots or parcels, in the absence of special circumstances to justify it, is clearly an irregularity; but this court has frequently held that such an irregularity will not justify vacating the sale, in the absence of an affirmative showing that it operated to the actual injury of the owner. Hudepohl v. Liberty Hill, etc., Co., 94 Cal. 588, 29 Pac. 1025, 28 Am. St. Rep. 149; Meux v. Trezevant, 132 Cal. 487, 489, 64 Pac. 848; Summerville v. March, 142 Cal. 554, 558, 76 Pac. 388, 100 Am. St. Rep. 145. These cases are not conclusive upon the question at bar for the reason that in neither of them was the purchase price inadequate. But the language used in discussing the question is significant. Meux v. Trezevant, supra, involved a foreclosure sale wherein the premises were sold en masse, although the decree of foreclosure required that they be sold in separate parcels. This court said:

"Unless it is made to appear that a larger sum would have been realized from the sale of the property if it had been sold in separate lots or parcels, or that the sale of less than the whole tract would have brought sufficient to satisfy the writ, the sale will not be set aside. Hudepohl v. Liberty Hill, etc., Co., 94 Cal. 591, 28 Am. St. Rep. 149. In this case there is no statement in defendant's affidavits tending to show that the property would have brought more if sold separately, or that the sale of less than the whole would have satisfied the writ. On the contrary, the affidavits on the part of defendant show without contradiction that the property sold for its full cash value, and that it would not have brought as much as it sold for if it had been sold in separate lots. The only pretense of injury set forth in defendant's affidavit is that he was injured by said sale in one lot, because it 'tended to reduce the number of bidders,' and because 'it deprived affiant of the right to redeem either of said colony lots separately.'

"This is clearly insufficient. Defendant does not show that he could redeem, or that he ever desired to or now desires to redeem, any part of said property. Courts will not set aside a sale under foreclosure for light or trivial reasons. It must appear that there has been a material departure from the mandates of the decree, or the law governing such sales, to the injury of the party applying to have the same set aside. Nor can injury be presumed from mere irregularities."

Assuming in the instant case that no bidder other than the defendant Shumaker attended the sale for the purpose of bidding thereat, or would have attended it under any circumstances, then plaintiff could not conceivably have been injured by the low tone of voice or hurried manner in which the sale was conducted, if it was sufficiently audible and sufficiently deliberate to enable Shumaker to make the bids he desired. If such was the case, as we must assume under the findings, plaintiff could not have been injured by these claimed irregularities. We are of the opinion that under these circumstances they afforded no ground for relief. Appellants contend that the findings to the effect that the sale was made in an inaudible tone of voice and in a hurried manner are wholly contrary to and unsupported by the evidence. In view of the conclusion just announced it is unnecessary to consider this contention.

[6] As to the fourth claimed irregularity the plaintiff alleged and the court found:

"That on July 28, 1920, the International Bank through and by its attorney informed the plaintiff in writing, that it, the said bank, would take such necessary action against the estate on the notes secured by said trust deed 'as may be desirable,' and which notice was in reply to a letter written by the plaintiff to the International Bank on the 20th day of July, 1920, in which the plaintiff asked the said defendant bank for an additional length of time to pay the notes secured by said trust deed."

Appellants assert that the concluding phrase of said finding, "in which the plaintiff asked the said defendant bank for an additional length of time to pay the notes secured by said deed of trust" is wholly unsupported by the evidence, and to this we agree. The above-quoted allegation in plaintiff's complaint was immediately followed by the allegation:

"And which letter of July 28, 1920, written by the said bank to plaintiff, caused the plaintiff to believe that the said bank would not proceed to sell the property described in said Exhibit A. * * *"

This allegation was denied by the defendants, and the court made no finding thereon. A consideration of the evidence upon this point makes it apparent that if a finding had been made responsive to this issue it would have been adverse to plaintiff's contention. This leaves the situation wholly inadequate to bring the case within the rule of Winbigler v. Sherman, supra, relied upon by respondent, wherein it was said that by means of a somewhat similar letter written by the holder of the note to the owner of the property the latter had been "lulled into a false security." There is not the slightest evidence herein that the letter here in question had any effect of lulling the plaintiff into a false security. On the contrary, he testified that he couldn't say whether he had ever received the letter or not. He was then shown a copy of the letter and asked to state whether or not he had received the original, and he replied: "No; I don't remember receiving that letter."

Respondent insists that the present case is substantially identical with Odell v. Cox and Winbigler v. Sherman, supra, and must therefore be ruled by those decisions, in each of which a judgment setting aside the sale was affirmed by this court. Appellants assert that those decisions have been rendered inapplicable by the amendment in 1917 of section 2924, Civil Code (St. 1917, p. 300), so as to require as a condition precedent to such a sale that the beneficiary shall first record in the office of the county recorder a notice of his intention to sell the property, which notice shall be recorded at least three months prior to the sale. They argue that, such record being created for the special benefit of the debtor, he is charged in law with notice of its contents, whether he has actual knowledge thereof or not. We are not prepared to go thus far, nor do we deem it necessary to do so in the disposition of the instant case. There are important elements in each of the cited cases which serve to distinguish it from the case at bar.

Odell v. Cox was not a case of "mere inadequacy of price" coupled with irregularities in the conduct of the sale. There were no such "irregularities." Every requirement of the law with respect to the conduct of the sale was fully complied with. Neither was it a case of "mere inadequacy of price," which means "simply an inequality in value between the subject-matter and the price." The price there bid was so insignificant as to amount in practical effect to nothing at all. In the language of the court:

"The amount bid, $26.50, when considered in connection with property having a cash value of $2,000 in the market, was a mere nominal sum, and the purchaser acquired this valuable property for practically nothing."

This fact, which is iterated and reiterated throughout that opinion, was evidently regarded as a controlling factor in that decision. That case may be taken as authority for the conclusion that, where the purchase price at such a sale is so small as to amount to practically nothing, the transaction may be regarded in equity as no sale at all, but rather a device for obtaining the debtor's property without compensation, and may be relieved against at the instance of an owner who was himself entirely without fault or negligence and whose lack of knowledge was "entirely excusable." In the case at bar the purchase price can by no means be regarded as merely nominal, however disproportionate it may have been to the real value of the property.

In Winbigler v. Sherman the purchase price of $500 for property worth $5,000, though much more disproportionate than in the instant case, could not be regarded as merely nominal. But there were circumstances of unfairness and oppression in that case which are absent from the case at bar. It is true that one of the notes secured by the trust deed there in question was past due and unpaid, but it was for only $100, and those notes had been given in payment for certain pumping machinery which was defective, and was not in accordance with the contract and was not properly installed, so that the maker had a good and valid defense to an action upon the notes. Negotiations between the maker of the notes and the holder thereof for a correction of these defects were in progress right up to the time of the trustee's sale. The maker learned of the proposed sale only a half hour before it was to take place. He then went to the trustee and the holder of the notes and pleaded with them to postpone the sale for a reasonable time to enable him to get the money to pay them, which was refused. The sale having taken place, he promptly procured the money and tendered to the purchaser, who was the holder of the notes, the entire amount due upon all of the notes, together with all the costs of making the sale. The court justly concluded that the refusal to grant even a brief postponement of the sale, under the circumstances, could have had but one object and purpose, namely, to obtain the debtor's property for "a mere pittance." This was an act of such evident unfairness and oppression as to amount to a constructive fraud upon the debtor, who was himself without fault.

In each of the two cases last under consideration emphasis is placed upon the circumstance that the debtor's lack of knowledge that the sale was about to take place was not due to his own fault or negligence. In Odell v. Cox, which involved a sale under execution, the fact that the judgment debtor was amply solvent was well known to the creditor, and the former had taken an appeal from the judgment and filed a good and sufficient stay bond. But an execution had been issued, without the debtor's knowledge, between the time of the entry of the judgment and the filing of the stay bond. The court said:

"This lack of knowledge on his part was entirely excusable. Probably neither he nor his attorneys had any reason to anticipate, in view of his solvency and the appeal about to be taken, that an execution would be obtained to enforce the judgment."

In the case at bar no good reason is apparent, either in the findings or in the evidence, why the plaintiff should not have expected and anticipated that the bank would proceed with the enforcement of the trust deed according to its terms. The amount due was in excess of $5,000. It had been delinquent at the time of the sale nearly seven months. In the meantime the taxes had been unpaid, the property had been sold for taxes, and other taxes thereon were delinquent. The plaintiff was collecting the rents, but was making no payments on account of either the indebtedness or the taxes. It is true that the estate was involved in litigation in the sense that a contest was pending therein over an alleged will of the deceased, but it does not appear that the plaintiff as administrator was a party thereto or in any way interested therein or affected thereby. It appears that there were not sufficient funds in the assets of the estate to enable him to pay these notes. But it does not appear that he ever made an effort to procure a loan elsewhere to enable him to make the payment, or even that he ever asked the defendant bank for an extension of time for the payment. These circumstances serve to bring this case fairly within the rule of Rauer v. Hertweck, supra, which was summed up in the following language:

"The attempt to show unfairness in the sale comes down simply to this: That the execution sale was regularly made upon due statutory notice, but that the judgment debtor did not, in fact, know of the sale, and no one gave him notice of it. He did, however, know that a judgment had been entered against him, and must be deemed to have known that his property might be levied on at any time. He failed to pay the judgment, and took no steps to protect his property until many months after the entry of judgment. He then found that a sale had been had, and that the time for redemption had expired. The resulting loss can more properly be attributed to his neglect of his own interests than to any unfairness on the part of the judgment creditor or the purchasers."

POPE v. HALPERN. (S. F. 10187.)

1. Municipal corporations — 705(1)—Obligation to carry lights on motor vehicles partly contingent and partly absolute.

The obligation to carry lighted lamps mentioned in Motor Vehicle Act, § 13 (a), as amended by St. 1919, p. 206, is partly contingent and partly absolute, depending on the hour of the day; during the period comprised within a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise, the obligation is absolute, and at any other time within the 24-hour day it is contingent on condition of light existing within the lateral boundaries of the highway.

2. Highways — 166—Requirement of lights on "motor vehicles" held to apply to motorcycles.

In view of Motor Vehicle Act, § 13 (c), as amended by St. 1919, p. 207, the requirement of lighted lamps on certain "vehicles" was intended to apply to motorcycles and require them at certain times and under certain conditions to carry one lighted lamp showing a white light visible at least 200 feet in the direction toward which they face.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Motor Vehicle.]

3. Appeal and error ⇨930(1)—Assumed on appeal that automobile driver's negligence in cutting corner at street intersection was principal cause of accident.

In action for injury causing death to a passenger on a motorcycle from collision with an automobile at a street intersection, where jury found in plaintiff's favor, it must be assumed on appeal that it accepted testimony of plaintiff's witnesses tending to show that defendant in operating his automobile at time of the collision was cutting the corner of the street, notwithstanding defendant's testimony to the contrary.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨705(1)—Cutting corner at street intersection negligence per se.

If, at the time of collision between defendant's automobile and the motorcycle on which plaintiff's deceased son was a passenger, defendant in fact cut the corner of the street, he was guilty of negligence per se.

5. Negligence ⇨93(1)—Contributory negligence of vehicle driver imputable to passenger only where engaged in common enterprise.

Contributory negligence of the driver of a vehicle is not ordinarily imputable to his passenger or guest; but, where the parties are engaged in a common or joint enterprise, contributory negligence of one bars recovery by the other.

6. Negligence ⇨93(1)—Community of interest rendering contributory negligence of driver imputable to passenger on vehicle.

To show community of interest between the driver of a motor vehicle and his passenger, so as to make them mutually chargeable with the other's contributory negligence, in order that there be a joint enterprise, it is not sufficient merely that the passenger indicate the route or that both parties have certain plans in common, but the community of interest must be such that the passenger is entitled to be heard in control and management of the vehicle.

7. Negligence ⇨93(1)—Passenger and motorcycle driver held not engaged in joint enterprise within imputed negligence rule.

Where the passenger on a motorcycle did not participate in selection of the route or regulation of the speed, but was riding thereon as a guest and not as one entitled as of right to be heard as to route or speed, he was not engaged in a joint enterprise with the driver so as to bring him within the rule of imputed negligence.

8. Municipal corporations ⇨705(10)—Passenger on vehicle must exercise ordinary care.

A passenger in a motor vehicle must at all times use ordinary care for his own safety.

9. Municipal corporations ⇨706(7)—Negligence of motorcycle passenger held for jury.

In action for death of a boy of 14 years while a passenger on a motorcycle which collided with defendant's automobile at a street intersection at 9:30 p. m., when the driver of the motorcycle was carrying a flashlight in his hand which gave one-half the light of an ordinary motorcycle headlight, whether decedent was negligent in riding on the motorcycle under the circumstances was question for trial court or jury.

10. Municipal corporations ⇨705(10)—Passenger on motorcycle operating without headlight not violator of law.

Where a passenger on a motorcycle which collided with defendant's automobile at a street intersection was killed, as affecting the question of whether deceased was negligent in riding on a motorcycle not equipped with adequate lights at 9:30 p. m., the driver of the motorcycle was the violator of the Motor Vehicle Act, and not decedent.

11. Appeal and error ⇨1067—Municipal corporations ⇨706(8)—Refusal of instruction applicable to facts as to motorcycle driver's negligence in driving without proper lights held erroneous and prejudicial.

In action for fatal injury to a passenger on a motorcycle which collided with defendant's automobile at a street intersection at 9:30 p. m., in view of the obligation of the driver to carry a proper headlight not being dependent on conditions of light on the street, refusing defendant's instruction that, if the accident occurred during the period from a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise, the motorcycle was required to be equipped with a headlight visible 200 feet, and giving in its place an instruction to the effect that a motorcycle while on the public highway was required to carry a headlight where the streets were not sufficiently lighted to discern objects for a distance of 200 feet, was erroneous and prejudicial.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Otis Pope against Jacob Halpern. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and J. E. Reardon, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Stella Donovan, of San Francisco, and J. W. Henderson, of Eureka, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure from a judgment following a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $2,044.50 as damages for the death of his minor son, which resulted from a collision between an automobile driven by defendant and a motorcycle driven by one Clarence Garns, upon which the decedent was riding as a guest.

In arriving at their verdict for the plaintiff the jury thereby resolved in his favor any conflict in the evidence, so that the facts disclosed by the record may, for the purposes of the appeal, be stated as follows: The plaintiff's son, Miles, 14 years and 4 months old, was riding on the rear fender of a motorcycle which was driven by his friend, Clarence Garns, westerly along the northerly side of East Twelfth street, in the city of Oakland, at about 9:45 o'clock p. m. on the 23d day of June, 1920. Clarence, who was the owner of the motorcycle, had had some trouble with the light which had been attached to the motorcycle, and a few days before the accident he removed it. On this night, while driving the motorcycle, he was carrying an electric flashlight in his hand at the left handlebar, which flashlight gave one-half the light of an ordinary motorcycle headlight. The deceased was seated on the rear fender, immediately behind the driver's seat, his legs on the left side, his left foot holding on to the rod which supports the seat, his left hand resting in his lap. While thus proceeding, and attempting to cross Fourteenth avenue, the motorcycle and defendant's automobile collided. The defendant, driving easterly along the southerly side of East Twelfth street, had reached the intersection of Fourteenth avenue, and at the time of the collision was attempting to, or had completed, a left turn so as to go in a northerly direction on Fourteenth avenue. When the vehicles came to a stop the motorcycle was lying under the front left wheel of the automobile at a point about 12 or 15 feet west of the middle line of Fourteenth avenue and slightly north of the north curb line of East Twelfth street. As a result of the collision, Miles Pope received injuries causing his death and Clarence Garns' left leg was broken.

The theory upon which plaintiff's case was tried is that the defendant carelessly and negligently operated his automobile by cutting the corner of the intersection of these two streets, in disregard of the express provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397). The defendant's contention is that he did not cut the corner, but that he carefully went out and across the middle line of Fourteenth avenue before turning to his left and north into Fourteenth avenue; that the motorcycle was not equipped with a sufficient headlight; that it was driven at an excessive rate of speed; and that the decedent's position upon the motorcycle interfered with the driver in its operation.

[1] The Motor Vehicle Act, in section 13a, as amended in 1919, provides:

"Where there is not sufficient light within the lateral boundaries of the public highway to reveal all persons, vehicles or other substantial objects within said boundaries for a distance of at least 200 feet, and at all times during the period from a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise, every automobile while on the public highway shall carry at the front at least two lighted lamps. * * *

Stats. 1919, pp. 191, 206.

The dual character of this provision is to be noted. The obligation to carry the lighted lamps mentioned is partly contingent and partly absolute, depending upon the hour of the day. During the period comprised within "a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise," the obligation is absolute; at any other time within the 24-hour day it is contingent upon the condition of light existing within the lateral boundaries of the highway. We call attention to this in passing for the bearing it has upon the instructions given to the jury.

Subdivision (c) of this same section of the Motor Vehicle Act reads as follows:

"At the time and under the conditions in this section hereinbefore specified, every motorcycle while on the public highway shall carry at the front at least one lighted lamp. * * *

The times and conditions before specified were those contained in the opening sentence of section 13 (a), above referred to, so, reading these two subdivisions together, we find that from a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise, every motorcycle while on the public highway must carry a certain kind of headlight, regardless of the condition of the highway with respect to illumination. In passing it is well to note that in subdivision (f) of section 13 an exception is made of a vehicle not in operation on a lighted highway.

The Motor Vehicle Act of 1915, as amended in 1919, specifies the character of headlight which a motor vehicle must carry. The Motor Vehicle Act as enacted in 1915 provided:

"At the times and under the conditions hereinbefore specified in this section, every motorcycle or bicycle while on the public highway, whether in operation or otherwise, shall carry one lighted lamp, showing a white light visible under normal atmospheric conditions at least two hundred feet in the direction toward which such motorcycle or bicycle is faced. * * *

Section 13 (b), Stats. 1915, pp. 397, 405.

In 1919 this subdivision was amended, and as amended it referred to lights on bicycles only, and the distance at which the light on such bicycles must be visible was increased to 300 feet. Stats. 1919, pp. 191, 207. In subdivision (c) of section 13, as amended, it was provided:

"At the time and under the conditions in this section hereinbefore specified, every motorcycle while on the public highway shall carry at the front at least one lighted lamp which shall give a light of sufficient power and so distributed as provided in subdivision (f) and shall also carry at the rear of such motorcycles a lighted lamp, exhibiting a red light plainly visible under normal atmospheric conditions for a distance of at least two hundred feet towards the rear. * * *

Subdivision (f), to which we are referred by subdivision (c), reads as follows:

"At the times and under the conditions in this section hereinbefore specified the headlights of all automobiles upon the highways shall give a light of sufficient power and so distributed as provided herein in addition to and irrespective of any other requirements concerning headlights in this section contained. The term 'headlight' as used herein, shall denote any light, located upon any portion of the said motor vehicle other than on the windshield, the windshield supports or top thereof, the rays of which are projected forward, except side lights of not to exceed four candle power. * * *"

[2] Subdivision (f), just quoted, appears to be a prefatory section to the sections which follow, in which are described the tests to be applied to lights on motor vehicles. It is true that in subdivision (f) the word "automobile" is used and that in subdivisions (g) and (h) the tests refer to a "pair of lamps"; but we feel that the conclusion is inescapable that the Legislature intended that motorcycles should carry at least one lighted lamp giving a light of the same power and so distributed as in the case of automobile lamps. It is certain that the Legislature did not intend to provide that a motorcycle, a heavier and speedier vehicle than a bicycle, could be operated at night with any kind of light, while in the same act it is provided that a bicycle must carry a light visible 300 feet. To the contrary, in subdivision (c), just quoted, the Legislature, showing that it has in mind motorcycles, enacts that they shall carry a certain kind of light, to be described in later sections, and we feel justified in holding that these sections (being subdivision [f] and the subsequent sections which are indirectly referred to in subdivision [f]) apply to a motorcycle. In passing it may not be amiss to say that whatever ambiguity existed on this question has been dispelled by the enactment of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1923, which provides that—

"Every motorcycle at the times and under the conditions specified in section ninety-nine shall be equipped with at least one lighted headlight and not more than two, which shall conform to the provisions of sections one hundred and hundred one, relating to headlights for automobiles." Section 103, Stats. 1923, p. 550.

And section 99 of the same act requires that—

"Every vehicle when upon any public highway within this state during the period from a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise and at any other time when there is not sufficient light to render clearly discernible a person, vehicle or other substantial object on the highway at a distance of two hundred feet ahead, shall be equipped with lighted lamps and lighted headlights as herein respectively provided for different classes of vehicles and subject to such exceptions as are set forth in this act."

[3, 4] As we have already pointed out, the jury having found in plaintiff's favor, we must assume that it accepted the testimony of plaintiff's witnesses tending to show that the defendant in operating his automobile immediately before and at the time of the collision was cutting the corner of the street. While this was contrary to the direct testimony of defendant's witnesses, there is evidence in the record upon which such an inference could well be based. If the defendant in fact cut the corner, he was guilty of negligence per se, and from the record we must assume that the jury found that the defendant did cut the corner and that this negligence was the principal cause of the accident.

[5] The defendant also contends upon this appeal that Garns' negligence, assuming that he was negligent, was imputable to the decedent, and that the decedent was himself guilty of independent negligence in riding upon the rear fender of a motorcycle which was being operated without a headlight and being driven at an excessive rate of speed.

The rule is well established that the contributory negligence of the driver of a vehicle is not ordinarily imputable to his passenger or guest. Bryant v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 164 Pac. 385; Parmenter v. McDougall, 172 Cal. 306, 156 Pac. 460; Bresee v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 149 Cal. 131, 85 Pac. 152, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059. But an exception to this rule is made in those cases where the parties are engaged in a common or joint enterprise, and in such cases it is held that the contributory negligence of one will bar recovery by either. The decisions are not in accord as to what constitutes a joint or common enterprise, but it has been held in this state that the passenger must exercise some control over the driver thereof, or, in law, may be said to possess the right of such control, before it will be held that they are engaged in a joint enterprise. Bryant v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., supra. In St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Bell, 58 Okl. 84, 159 Pac. 336, L. R. A. 1917A, 543, the court said:

"Parties cannot be said to be engaged in a joint enterprise, within the meaning of the law of negligence, unless there be a community of interests in the objects or purposes of the undertaking, and an equal right to direct and govern the movements and conduct of each other with respect thereto. Each must have some voice and right to be heard in its control and management."

[6] It will be seen from these two decisions that in order that there be such a joint enterprise it is not sufficient merely that the passenger of the machine indicate the route, or that both parties have certain plans in common, such as a "joy ride," but the community of interest must be such that the passenger is entitled to be heard in the control and management of the vehicle. In Bryant v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., supra, the court, after referring to the case of Wentworth v. Town of Waterbury, 90 Vt. 60, 96 Atl. 334, where apparently the only basis for the imputation of negligence of the driver of an automobile to the plaintiff was the circumstance that they were both engaged in the common purpose of taking two ladies for an afternoon's drive to view a lake, said:

"In our opinion, the doctrine of imputable negligence should not be so loosely applied. To do so leaves the law in an uncertain state. The better view is expressed by Nonn v. Chicago City Ry. Co., 232 Ill. 378 [122 Am. St. Rep. 114, 83 N. E. 924]: 'There can be no such thing as imputable negligence, except in those cases where such a relation exists as that of master and servant or of principal and agent. In order that the negligence of one person may be properly imputed to another they must stand in such relation of privity that the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se directly applies.' Indeed, no other rule is consistent with section 1714 of the Civil Code, wherein it is declared that every one is responsible for an injury occasioned to another by his want of ordinary care 'except so far as the latter has, willfully or by want of ordinary care, brought the injury upon himself.'" (Italics ours.)

[7] Tested by these principles, we are of the opinion that the decedent and Garns were not engaged in such a joint enterprise as to bring the decedent within the rule of imputable negligence. The circumstances of this case do not show that the decedent and Garns together had such control and direction over the motorcycle as to be practically in the joint or common possession of it. If the decedent did participate in the selection of the route, or the regulation of the speed of the motorcycle, he did so apparently as a guest, and not as one entitled as of right to be heard in such matters.

These views are fully supported by the case of Masterson v. Leonard, 116 Wash. 551, 200 Pac. 320. In that case two boys riding on a bicycle collided with an automobile. Frank, whose father owned the bicycle, was riding on the handlebars, and Edward was sitting in the seat of the bicycle, controlling its movement. Edward was a newsboy, and at the time of the accident he was on his way to get his papers. Frank, who frequently helped Edward on his paper route, was going along to substitute for Edward in case he became ill. The court held that Edward's negligence was imputable to Frank, but the following quotation clearly shows that its decision was based squarely upon the peculiar facts of the case before it, facts which do not appear in the present case. The court said:

"We are of the opinion, in view of the ownership of the bicycle, the general possession of and control over it by Frank, the acquiescing by him in the temporary control over it by Edward for the purpose of conveying them both on this hazardous journey, which we think was their common enterprise or adventure, that the trial court did not err in telling the jury, in effect, that whatever negligence Edward was guilty of, in carrying out this their joint enterprise or adventure, was attributable to Frank and became in law his negligence. * *"

There can be no doubt that the court attached great importance to the fact that Frank had the possession and control of the bicycle, and still had the right to be heard in its control and management even though he had temporarily relinquished control over it.

In the present case the decedent, as already mentioned, did not have such a proprietary interest in the motorcycle as would give him a right to be heard in its management and control, and as there is no evidence that he actually exercised such control, it cannot be said that he and Garns were in the joint or common possession of it. Assuming, therefore, that Garns was guilty of contributory negligence, his negligence was not imputable to the decedent.

[8, 9] Defendant's second contention, that decedent was guilty of independent negligence in riding upon this motorcycle, is worthy of consideration. It is claimed that since Clarence was operating his machine in a negligent manner, the plaintiff was guilty of independent negligence in riding on the motorcycle while it was being so operated. To support this contention defendant relies upon Lynn v. Goodwin, 170 Cal. 112, 148 Pac. 927, L. R. A. 1915E, 588, and Rebillard v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. Co., 216 Fed. 503, 133 C. C. A. 9, L. R. A. 1915B, 953. These decisions are based on the theory that a passenger is negligent if he remains in a dangerous position after having knowledge of the danger. Thus, in Rebillard v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. S. M. Ry. Co., supra, it was held that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in riding in an automobile without lights over a trail with which none of the occupants of the machine were familiar. In Lynn v. Goodwin, supra, it was decided that the conduct of the plaintiff in riding and in continuing to ride in an automobile when he must have known that the driver was intoxicated, established negligence upon his part independent of that of the driver, barring the right of recovery. These cases merely express in another way the general rule that a passenger must at all times use ordinary care for his own safety. In the present case, the decedent being a minor, the question of whether or not he was negligent in riding on this motorcycle under the circumstances of this case was a question for the trial court or jury. Sanders v. Toberman (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 394; Mayne v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 175 Pac. 690, and cases therein cited; Charves v. S. F.-Oakland Terminal Rys., 44 Cal. App. 221, 186 Pac. 154; Carlson v. Leonard, 53 Cal. App. 300, 200 Pac. 40. Here, under instructions as to the degree of care required of a minor, the question of decedent's alleged negligence was left to the jury, who impliedly found that he was not negligent, and that he had exercised the same degree of care as children of his own age and intelligence ordinarily exercise.

[10] In this connection it must be kept in mind that it was the driver, Garns, and not the decedent, who was violating the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, in failing to carry a regulation headlight. The decedent in no wise subjected himself to a penal liability. Section 32 of the act (St. 1917, p. 410) as amended (Stats. 1919, p. 225) provides that any person violating any of its provisions shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. And one of the provisions of the act is that a motorcycle shall be equipped with a headlight. We are of the opinion that if a motorcycle is operated without a headlight, the person violating the law is the driver or operator of such motorcycle. Throughout the Motor Vehicle Act, in discussing various penalties, reference is made to the "driver or operator," or "person in charge or having control" or the "owner"; but nowhere is any language used which would show an intent upon the part of the Legislature to fasten a criminal liability upon a passenger or guest for an infraction of any of its provisions.

[11] The defendant requested an instruction to the effect that if the accident occurred during the period from a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise, the motorcycle was required to be equipped with a headlight showing a light visible 200 feet. This instruction was correct in form and in terms, in that it expressly declared that it was the duty of the driver of the motorcycle to have a lighted headlight during this period. The court refused this instruction, and gave in place thereof one to the effect that a motorcycle while on the public highway was required to carry a headlight where the streets were not sufficiently lighted to discern objects for a distance of 200 feet.

This instruction was inapplicable to the case herein, as it is an undisputed fact that the collision occurred about 9:30 o'clock p. m., and we have already pointed out that the obligation of the driver of a motorcycle operated at that hour to carry a headlight of a certain designated power is absolute and is not dependent upon the conditions of light in the street. By this instruction the jury were given a basis for an inference that Garns was not negligent by reason of not carrying said headlight notwithstanding that the statute expressly makes that requirement. Under proper instructions the negligence of Garns would have been plainly apparent to the jury, which would then have been confronted with the question whether the deceased, in riding with Garns under the conceded conditions, was himself guilty of such negligence as to bar a recovery in the present case. The refusal of the trial court, therefore, of the instruction applicable to the facts of the case in favor of one inapplicable thereto, constituted error which, under the circumstances of this case, must be held to be prejudicial.

The judgment should therefore be reversed, and it is so ordered.

GARNS v. HALPERN. (S. F. 10204.)(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 14, 1924.
Rehearing Denied March 10, 1924.)1. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 706(5)—Evidence held to establish contributory negligence of motorcycle driver.

Evidence held to establish contributory negligence of motorcycle driver in the operation of his machine at an unreasonable speed, in view of the character of illumination used by him on his machine.

2. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 705(10)—Insufficient headlight on motorcycle may require driver to keep below maximum rate of speed.

Under Motor Vehicle Act, §§ 20a, 22a, as amended by St. 1919, pp. 215, 220, prescribing maximum legal speed and requiring that drivers of motor vehicles shall at all times operate in a careful and prudent manner with due regard to the safety of others, the driver of a vehicle unequipped with the amount or character of illumination required by law may not safely proceed at the same rate of speed as he might otherwise.

3. Municipal corporations $\Rightarrow$ 705(10)—Operation of motorcycle without proper headlight negligence.

Failure of plaintiff, the driver of a motorcycle, to comply with Motor Vehicle Act, § 13 subds. (a), (c), and (f), as amended by St. 1919, pp. 206, 207, requiring equipment with a headlight, constitutes negligence.

4. New trial $\Rightarrow$ 74—Error in plaintiff's favor no ground for granting his motion for new trial.

In an action for personal injuries, the error of the jury in finding for plaintiff, who has been guilty of contributory negligence, in the sum of $1, is not one of which plaintiff can complain and furnishes no ground for granting a motion for new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Clarence Garns, by C. D. Garns, his guardian ad litem, against Jacob Halpern. From order granting plaintiff's motion for new trial after verdict for him for nominal sum, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, J. S. Reardon, and Enid Childs, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Justice KERRIGAN prior to his retirement, is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by defendant from an order granting the plaintiff's motion for a new trial based upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

The action was one to recover the sum of $20,000 as compensation for personal injuries, loss of earnings, and damage to property resulting from a collision between the motorcycle of the plaintiff, upon which he was riding, and the automobile of the defendant. Trial was had by jury, which returned a verdict for $1. Being dissatisfied with the verdict, the plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was granted, as above mentioned, and the defendant appeals.

In support thereof the appellant urges: First, that there is no substantial evidence of any negligence on the part of the defendant in connection with the collision; and, second, assuming that the evidence might support a finding of such negligence, it also shows beyond question and as a matter of law that the plaintiff's own negligence proximately contributed to his injury; that the verdict of the jury in plaintiff's favor, although only for $1, was erroneous, but that it is not an error of which the plaintiff can complain, and afforded no ground for the granting of a new trial at his instance.

[1] We are of the opinion that appellant's contention with respect to the contributory negligence of the plaintiff must be sustained.

The evidence in the record shows that on the night of June 23, 1920, at about the hour of 9:40 p. m., the defendant in his automobile was driving on East Twelfth street, Oakland, and was engaged in making a left turn to bring him into Fourteenth avenue, an intersecting street, and that the plaintiff, driving a motorcycle in an opposite direction on East Twelfth street, ran into defendant's automobile before it had succeeded in clearing East Twelfth street and entering the avenue. There is some evidence in the record from which the jury might have inferred that the defendant undertook to make this turn before passing the medial line of the intersection. Assuming that the jury took this view, the evidence further shows without contradiction that before commencing to turn the defendant brought his machine to a complete standstill; that he gave the proper signal that he was about to turn; that he looked in the direction from which the plaintiff's motorcycle was approaching and did not see it, it not being equipped with the headlight required by law; that his automobile was struck by the motorcycle of plaintiff almost immediately after starting up and while making the turn and before his automobile had acquired a speed greater than 8 miles an hour; that his two headlights (which complied with legal requirements) were lighted and visible to the plaintiff had he looked, which in duty he was bound to do; that, on the other hand, the plaintiff's motorcycle was not equipped with the headlight required by law, which would have aided the plaintiff to discover the presence of defendant's automobile, and the defendant to have perceived the plaintiff's approach, but in lieu thereof the plaintiff held in his hand a small flashlight, not capable of revealing objects more than 25 feet distant even if its beams had been directed ahead of the motorcycle; that the plaintiff drove his motorcycle thus unequipped with the legal headlight at a rapid rate of speed across the intersection of the streets in question in the darkness of night; and it is also to be noted (although this circumstance cannot, perhaps, be said to have contributed to the collision with the same certainty as the other negligent acts referred to) that although the motorcycle was constructed for carrying only one person, the plaintiff was carrying a passenger upon it, who was seated upon the rear fender with both legs on the left side of the machine, the testimony showing that his presence in this position interfered with the proper operation of the motorcycle.

As to the speed at which the plaintiff crossed the intersection, the lowest estimate—his own—places it at 14 miles per hour, while one of his witnesses puts it much higher; and he himself, testifying at a previous hearing in which the circumstances of the collision were under investigation, stated, in answer to the question:

"About how fast do you think you were going?" "I can't say positively nowhere near how fast I was going."

[2] While a speed of 14 miles an hour is within the maximum allowed by the Motor Vehicle Act, yet it does not follow that the operator of a motor vehicle may under all circumstances proceed at that rate. On the contrary, the act, both in section 20 (a) and 22 (a) (St. 1915, pp. 406, 409, as amended by Stats. 1919, pp. 215, 220), provides that such driver shall at all times operate his vehicle in a careful and prudent manner and with due regard for the safety of other users of the highway. It follows that a driver, whose vehicle, either through neglect or accident, is unequipped with the amount and character of illumination required by law, may not safely proceed at the same rate of speed as he might otherwise. The amount of illumination of a vehicle has relation not only to the driver's own safety but to that of others, and it is intimately involved with the question of speed.

In Cook v. Miller, 175 Cal. 497, 166 Pac. 316, the driver of a motorcycle on a city street was held guilty of negligence in crossing a city street at the rate of 15 miles an hour where his vision of persons traveling thereon was obstructed; the court saying:

"The ordinance fixing the maximum speed at 20 miles an hour is not a license to go at that speed at all times and places. Irwin v. Judge, 81 Conn. 492 (71 Atl. 572). The care required at any place on a public street is always that of a reasonably prudent person under the circumstances. Scott v. San Bernardino, etc.,

Co., 152 Cal. 610 (93 Pac. 677). There are occasions when a speed far below the maximum would constitute negligence."

[3, 4] The Motor Vehicle Act, §§ 13a, 13c, and 13f, as amended requires motorcycles, when being driven upon a public highway during the period from half an hour after sunset to half an hour before sunrise, to be equipped with a headlight of the character specified in said act. Pope v. Halpern (Cal. Sup.) 223 Pac. 470. The plaintiff's neglect to comply with this provision of the law, designed expressly for the avoidance of collisions, constituted negligence. That plaintiff's operation of his motorcycle at the time in question in this and the other respects noted contributed to the happening of the accident there can be no doubt, and the defendant was accordingly entitled to a verdict in his favor. The jury's error in finding against him is not one of which the plaintiff can complain, and furnishes no ground for the trial court's order granting his motion for a new trial.

The order is reversed.

Criminal law — 1202(6)—Sentence and judgment for robbery after prior conviction for felony held sufficient, though not fixing term.

Since, under Pen. Code, §§ 213, 667, the punishment fixed by law for robbery after a prior conviction of a felony is life imprisonment, the court, under section 13, providing that the sentence shall be fixed by the court whenever the punishment is left undetermined between certain limits, is not required to fix the term of imprisonment; a sentence to confinement according to law being sufficient notwithstanding section 12, declaring it the duty of the court to pass sentence and to determine and impose the punishment prescribed.

Henry V. Heath, in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner is detained in the California state prison at Folsom and seeks a writ of habeas corpus.

The judgment under which he is imprisoned sentenced petitioner to be confined in the California state prison according to law. The petitioner was convicted of the crime of robbery after a prior conviction of a felony. In re Heath, 49 Cal. App. 657, 194 Pac. 68. The punishment fixed by law is life imprisonment. In re Heath, supra; sections 213 and 667, Pen. Code. The petitioner contends that, inasmuch as the indeterminate sentence law does not apply (In re Heath, supra), it was the duty of the trial court, under section 12 of the Penal Code, to have fixed the term of imprisonment. Section 13 provides that the sentence shall be fixed by the court "whenever in this Code the punishment for a crime is left undetermined between certain limits." In the case at bar in view of the fact that the only sentence possible was one for life imprisonment, the sentence and judgment were sufficiently specific. In re Heath, supra.

The petition is denied.

LUCKEHE v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF MARYSVILLE. (Sac. 3445.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 11, 1924.)

1. Principal and agent §105(9)—Agent for collection cannot bind principal by acceptance of anything but actual money.

An agent authorized merely to collect a demand or to receive payment of a debt cannot bind his principal by any arrangement short of an actual collection and receipt of the money except by agreement with the creditor.

2. Banks and banking §171(7)—Principal and agent §60—Agent liable for collecting anything except cash; bank accepting other than cash for instrument held for collection liable if substituted paper not paid.

An agent for collection accepting anything other than cash in payment is liable to his principal for any loss suffered thereby, which rule is applicable to banks acting as collecting agents, so that a bank surrendering an instrument held for collection in return for a check or other paper of the party upon whom it is drawn does so at its own risk, and is liable if that paper is not paid, irrespective of negligence in collection of the substituted paper.

3. Banks and banking §161(1)—Bank's liability in making collection controlled by instructions of creditor if any exist.

Where an instrument is placed by the obligee in the hands of a bank for collection the terms of a special contract, if any exists, relative to the collection or instructions from the obligee relative thereto, furnish the measure of the bank's duty.

4. Banks and banking §161(2)—Bank making collection in customary manner of banks not negligent.

A bank making a collection following the course usually taken by banks under similar circumstances cannot be held to be negligent.

5. Banks and banking §171(6)—Bank not liable for negligence of suitable subagent employed in good faith.

A bank which in good faith has employed a suitable subagent, for the purpose of making a collection, is not thereafter liable for default or negligence of that subagent.

6. Banks and banking §171(7)—Forwarding bank liable for negligence in acceptance of check from correspondent in payment of certificate of deposit.

Negligence of a correspondent bank to which a certificate of deposit has been forwarded for collection in accepting a check in payment rather than actual cash does not relieve the forwarding bank from any negligence on its part in accepting such check from its correspondent rather than demanding the cash and returning the check for further presentation and collection in cash.

7. Banks and banking §171(8)—Bank may absolve itself from liability for unauthorized course in making collection by securing sanction of owner of claim.

A bank to whom a certificate of deposit has been surrendered for collection may absolve itself from liability for negligence in accepting from its correspondent a check drawn by the bank issuing the certificate by notifying the owner thereof and securing his sanction of its unauthorized acceptance of the check in lieu of the cash.

8. Customs and usages §13—Usage or custom deemed part of commercial contract.

As a general proposition every commercial contract is entered into with the understanding that usage in regard to the particular matter of the contract becomes a part of the transaction itself.

9. Customs and usages §5—Custom or usage must be general to be of binding force in contract.

In order to be of binding force in commercial contracts a custom or usage relied upon must be general as to the place.

10. Banks and banking §161(2)—Rule stated as to when custom will relieve bank from charge of negligence in making collection.

It is incumbent upon a bank, seeking to absolve itself from liability for alleged negligence in the acceptance of a check in payment of a certificate of deposit surrendered to it for collection by showing a usage or custom to clearly establish that such a custom existed that it was general and that it was followed in attempting to make the collection.

11. Customs and usages §5, 7—Must be general; must be reasonable.

In order for a custom or usage to bind the parties to a transaction it must not only be general and well known, but must be reasonable.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by C. J. Luckehe against the First National Bank of Marysville. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Clinton W. Johnson, of Gridley, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

WASTE, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,050, with interest, the amount evidenced by a certain certificate of deposit made and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff. Judgment was entered for the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

On the 11th day of December, 1920, appellant held an interest-bearing certificate of deposit for $1,050 issued to him by the First National Bank of Gridley. The certificate became due on that date, and appellant, desiring to transfer his account, indorsed the certificate over to the Gridley bank and received for the one surrendered an ordinary certificate of deposit for the same amount, payable on demand. In the afternoon of the same day, which was a Saturday, appellant took the new certificate to the First National Bank of Marysville, indorsed it to the bank, and received in exchange an interest-bearing certificate of deposit of the Marysville bank, in a similar amount, payable six months after date. Respondent mailed the certificate of the Gridley bank to the Rideout Bank, its correspondent in Gridley, for collection. It was received by that bank on Monday, the 13th of December, and, on the same afternoon, was presented to the issuing bank for payment. Instead of demanding and receiving cash, the Rideout Bank surrendered the certificate of deposit, and accepted from the First National Bank of Gridley an exchange draft on the Anglo & London-Paris National Bank of San Francisco, which it indorsed and mailed to the Marysville bank. Respondent did not notify appellant that it had the check of the Gridley bank but, in turn, indorsed and mailed it to its San Francisco correspondent, the Mercantile Trust Company. The draft was presented by the latter bank, through the clearing house, to the Anglo & London-Paris National Bank, where it was dishonored. It was then returned to respondent, without having been paid, and was received by it on December 17. On the same day respondent notified appellant of the dishonor of the draft, and on the same day the First National Bank of Gridley closed its doors and went into the hands of a receiver at the end of the day's business. After six months had elapsed, appellant presented the certificate of deposit issued to him by the Marysville bank to the respondent for payment. Payment being refused, this action was commenced.

The complaint sounds in contract. It states a cause of action based on the certificate of deposit issued by the respondent to appellant, and the refusal of respondent to pay the amount on demand. The allegations of the complaint and the denials of the answer presented an issue based on the theory that the relation subsisting between appellant and respondent was that of creditor and debtor. Plumas County Bank v. Bank of Rideout, etc., 165 Cal. 126, 138, 131 Pac. 360, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 552. But, at the trial, the case was shifted to one for negligence based on the respondent's liability to the appellant for its failure to collect the amount due on the original certificate of deposit issued to appellant by the First National Bank of Gridley. It was conceded by both parties in the court below that the certificate of deposit issued by the Gridley bank, payable to appellant, and by him transferred to the respondent in exchange for the certificate of deposit set out in the complaint, was received by the respondent for collection, and not otherwise. The relation between appellant and the respondent resulting from the contract for the collection of the amount due on the certificate was therefore admitted to be only that of principal and agent. Henderson v. O'Connor, 106 Cal. 385, 390, 39 Pac. 786; Davis v. First Nat. Bank of Fresno, 118 Cal. 600, 601, 50 Pac. 666.

[1, 2] "It is elementary doctrine that 'an agent authorized merely to collect a demand, or to receive payment of a debt, cannot bind his principal by any arrangement short of an actual collection and receipt of the money.' Ward v. Evans, 2 Ld. Raym. 928; Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. 451; Pitkin v. Harris, 69 Mich. 133; Hurley v. Watson, 68 Id. 531. * * * The law requires payment in money, and, as already shown, nothing else answers the purpose, except by agreement with the creditor, or his agent duly authorized to accept something else." State Bank of Midland v. Byrne, 97 Mich. 178, 179, 56 N. W. 355, 356 (21 L. R. A. 753, 754, 37 Am. St. Rep. 332). It has been repeatedly held that if an agent for collection does accept anything other than cash in payment he will be liable to his principal for any loss the latter may suffer, and this rule is applicable to banks acting as collecting agents; and if such a bank surrenders the instrument in return for a check or other paper of the party upon whom it was drawn, it does so at its own risk, and is liable, irrespective of negligence in the collection of the substituted paper, if that paper is not paid. 3 R. C. L. § 245, pp. 616, 618, and cases cited in notes 18 and 19.

[3, 4] Having no authority to receive, in payment of commercial paper intrusted to it to collect, anything but money, a bank accepting negotiable paper in lieu of currency, for a draft it was employed to collect, does so upon its own responsibility. Bradley Lbr. Co. v. Bradley Co. Bank, 124 C. C. A. 175, 206 Fed. 41; Bank of Antigo v. Union Trust Co., 149 Ill. 343, 36 N. E. 1029, 23 L. R. A. 611; 1 Morse on Banks and Banking (3d Ed.) § 252; Albert v. State Bank, 78 Misc. Rep. 56, 138 N. Y. Supp. 237. If the collecting bank surrenders the check to the bank upon which it is drawn, and accepts a cashier's check or other obligation in lieu thereof, its liability to its depositor is fixed, as much so as if it had received the cash (Fifth Nat. Bank v. Ashworth, 123 Pa. 212, 16 Atl. 596, 2 L. R. A. 493), and it must be held to have immediately become indebted to its depositor in the amount which the paper represents. Midway Five Oil Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 25 Cal. App. 366, 368, 143 Pac. 800. Of course, where there is a special contract between the bank and the holder, or where special instructions are given by the holder, such contract or instructions furnish the measure of the bank's duty. No instructions were given in this case. Therefore, if it were not for another element which enters into the consideration of the case, we would be compelled to say at once that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. But it seems to be now well established in this, as in other jurisdictions, that if, in making the collection, the bank followed the course usually taken by banks under similar circumstances, it cannot be held to be negligent. The authorities which lay down this rule will be presently discussed.

[5, 6] In reaching a determination of the present controversy between appellant and the First National Bank of Marysville, the connection of the Rideout Bank at Gridley with the transaction may be eliminated. Under the accepted rules of law laid down by the authorities, the latter was negligent in the first instance in surrendering the certificate of deposit to the First National Bank of Gridley and accepting the check or draft of that bank on its San Francisco correspondent. The Rideout Bank should have insisted on, and received, nothing but money in return for the surrender of the certificate. Had it done so, we may assume no loss would have resulted in this particular case, for the evidence is uncontradicted that on the 13th day of December, 1920, and for several days thereafter, the First National Bank of Gridley was paying its obligations in cash when demanded, and that, if the Rideout Bank on that day had demanded cash in return for the certificate of deposit, cash would have been paid. It is not disputed here—in fact, we may safely assume from the record—that respondent in good faith employed a suitable subagent at Gridley for the purpose of making the collection. It is, therefore, not liable for the default or neglect of the Rideout Bank Nicoletti v. Bank of Los Banos (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 51. But the negligence of the Rideout Bank does not relieve the respondent from responsibility for the consequent loss, if it was negligent in accepting from its correspondent the check of the First National Bank of Gridley in place of the money which it had engaged to collect. What it did thereafter, it did for itself and not for appellant. Nat. Bank of Commerce v. Am. Exch. Bank, 151 Mo. 320, 330, 52 S. W. 265, 74 Am. St. Rep. 527. It was not required to accept the check in lieu of cash. It could have promptly returned that paper to its correspondent and demanded further presentation and collection in cash. Marysville and Gridley are but 18 miles apart. The evidence shows that the First National Bank of Gridley continued to pay cash until the close of business on December 17.

[7] On the other hand, respondent could have absolved itself from liability by reason of having surrendered appellant's certificate for a check in lieu of the cash, by informing appellant what had been done and securing his sanction of the unauthorized transaction. Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 447, 452, 19 L. Ed. 207. Respondent's position is that the certificate of deposit taken by it from appellant was presented by it for payment without delay, and that the collection was handled by it in the ordinary course of business. It cites the sections of the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Act, which relate to the time within which a check must be presented for payment, and which provide that checks must be presented within a reasonable time, and that in determining what is a reasonable time or an unreasonable time regard is to be had to the nature of the instrument, "the usage of trade or business (if any) with respect to such instruments, and the facts of the particular case." Civ. Code, §§ 3265b and 3266b. Respondent's contention that the certificate of deposit was promptly presented for payment is not disputed. Its position is perhaps better understood when it says in its brief:

"Perhaps the majority of the banks in the interior of the state carry only a limited amount of coin or paper money. They have their correspondent in San Francisco and the matter goes through the clearing house in San Francisco and is adjusted."

In other words, respondent is seeking recourse to a customer or usage of the banking business to relieve it from liability in the present case.

[8] As a general proposition of law, it is, of course, true that every commercial contract is entered into with the understanding that usage in regard to the particular matter of the contract becomes a part of the transaction itself. Nat. Bank v. Burkhardt, 100 U. S. 686, 691, 25 L. Ed. 766; Moore v. U. S., 196 U. S. 166, 25 Sup. Ct. 202, 49 L. Ed. 428. The rule has many times been applied to banking transactions and banks, and this court has held that if a bank in making a collection followed the course usually taken by banks under similar circumstances, and if such usage was reasonable and did not contravene any principle of law, the fact that the bank followed such usage or custom would tend to show that it exercised reasonable care in seeking to collect the draft.

Davis v. First Nat. Bank of Fresno, 118 Cal. 600, 602, 50 Pac. 666. See, also, S. F. Nat. Bank v. Am. Nat. Bank, 5 Cal. App. 408, 90 Pac. 558. In another case in which the contract was for the collection of a draft, the court held that the manner of disposing of the assets was clearly one resting in general usage. It said:

"Proof of such custom is admissible and the general usage, when not in contravention of the law, is of governing force." Gonyer v. Williams, 168 Cal. 452, 456, 143 Pac. 736, 737.

The rule prevailing in California has been stated to be that—

"A principal who selects a bank as his collecting agent, thus availing himself of the facilities which it holds out, in the absence of special direction, is bound by any reasonable usage prevailing and established among the banks at the place where the collection is made, without regard to his knowledge of its existence. Knowledge on the part of the customer is implied conclusively. The fact that one deals with a bank without taking the trouble to inquire as to its system will raise the implication that he already knows and is satisfied with that system. So, where a person hands over a note to a bank for collection without any remark as to the course to be pursued, the bank is not bound to thrust upon him a statement of its intended course. The bank not only has the right to assume, but it is positively bound to assume, that the customer's desire is that the ordinary and established course be pursued." 4 Cal. Jur. p. 263, § 145.

The same rule prevails in many other jurisdictions. 7 Cor. Jur. p. 612, § 273.

[9, 10] In order to be of binding force in contracts, the custom or usage must be general as to place and not confined to any particular bank or banks. S. F. Nat. Bank v. Am. Nat. Bank, supra. The respondent did not plead, by way of defense to appellant's action, that it had followed any general usage or custom in making the collection, or that any such usage or custom existed in the community where it had its place of business, or where the collection was to be made. There is not a particle of evidence in the record that respondent followed any custom or that one exists. The court below made no finding on the subject. This court does not know, therefore, and cannot assume, that there is any such custom or usage as that relied on by the respondent. It was incumbent on the respondent to clearly establish that one existed, and that it was general (Smith v. Nat. Bank of D. O. Mills [O. C.] 191 Fed. 226, 231), and that it followed the usage in attempting to make the collection.

[11] In order to bind the parties to the transaction the usage must not only be so general and well known in the community as to fasten an implied knowledge on the parties, if actual knowledge be denied (Smith v. Bank of D. O. Mills, supra), but it must be reasonable (Davis v. First Nat. Bank of Fresno, supra; Farley Nat. Bank v. Pollock, 145 Ala. 321, 327, 39 South. 612, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 194, 117 Am. St. Rep. 44, 8 Ann. Cas. 370. For instance, and somewhat in point, it has been held that any usage or custom which would tend to relieve a bank from liability in case it surrenders to the maker a draft given it for collection, and accepts in return the check of the maker, would be unreasonable, and could not be invoked as a justification for such course. Bank v. Bank, 151 Mo. 320, 332, 52 S. W. 265, 74 Am. St. Rep. 527; Whitney v. Esson, 99 Mass. 308, 96 Am. Dec. 762. But the effect of these decisions has not been argued on this appeal. Without full proof and a finding of the exact nature and extent of the usage relied on by respondent to defeat appellant's claim, this court cannot say the usage is or is not reasonable.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the lower court for such further proceedings, in keeping with what is said in this opinion, as the parties may determine.

SCHUBERT v. LOWE et al. (Sac. 3416.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 16, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1078(1)—Failure to present point in brief may preclude from insisting on its consideration.

A party neglecting to present a point in his brief may be precluded from insisting on its consideration in deciding the case and from asserting that he has been prejudiced should the court refuse to consider it.

2. Appeal and error ⇨763—Point, first briefed after presentation in argument, considered.

Where a point was fully briefed after presentation in oral argument, and its consideration was necessary to a decision and would not be prejudicial to the other party, it could be considered though not briefed before the argument.

3. Forcible entry and detainer ⇨23—Cross-complaint cannot be interposed.

Under Code Civ. Proc. c. 4, pt. 3, tit. 3, c. 4 (sections 1159-1179), superseding in practice matters in other parts of the Code, and providing that defendant in an unlawful detainer may "on or before the day fixed for his appearance * * * appear and answer or demur," a cross-complaint cannot be interposed in such an action.

4. Forcible entry and detainer ⇨12(1)—Part performance of oral agreement to lease held interposable as equitable defense.

In unlawful detainer, though defendant could not interpose a cross-complaint and get specific performance of an oral agreement to convey under which he took possession in view of Code Civ. Proc. pt. 3, tit. 3, c. 4 (sections 1159-1179), part performance of the agreement could be interposed as an equitable defense.

5. Frauds, statute of §129(2)—Part performance of oral agreement to lease may take case out of statute.

Part performance of oral agreement to execute a lease for a longer period than one year may take the case out of the statute.

6. Appeal and error §1039(5)—Setting up equitable defense by way of cross-complaint held not prejudicial error.

Where, in unlawful detainer, it was proper for the defendant to raise and for the court to consider the effect of part performance of an oral agreement to lease as an equitable defense, the error of defendant in presenting such defense by way of cross-complaint for specific performance of the oral agreement held not prejudicial to plaintiff and not to require a new trial.

7. Appeal and error §907(3)—Particular assumption in support of judgment held proper on appeal on judgment roll alone.

Where, in unlawful detainer, the judgment of the trial court for defendant was based upon his equitable defense of part performance of an oral agreement to lease, on appeal by plaintiff on the judgment roll alone, a finding of the lower court that plaintiff's wife did not agree to execute a lease was treated as immaterial in view of fact that Civ. Code, § 172a, requiring joinder of wife, applies only to community property acquired after the adoption of that section; the appellate court assuming in support of the judgment that the premises in question were acquired before such adoption.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Unlawful detainer by P. M. Schubert against A. A. Lowe, in which Lena M. Schubert was joined as cross-defendant. Judgment for defendant and cross-complainant, and plaintiff and cross-defendant appeal. Judgment so far as it decreed specific performance of agreement to execute lease set aside, and otherwise affirmed.

Barcroft & Barcroft, of Madera, and Lindsay & Conley and Philip Conley, all of Fresno, for appellants.

Fee & Ring, of Madera, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This action in unlawful detainer was instituted by the plaintiff for the purpose of recovering from the defendant the possession of certain real property in the city of Madera. It was alleged that defendant had occupied the premises under a tenancy from month to month; that the tenancy had been terminated and possession of the premises demanded by plaintiff in accordance with the provisions of section 789 of the Civil Code and section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and that the defendant refused to surrender the premises and was holding the same without plaintiff's permission or consent. The defendant by his answer denied that the property in suit was occupied under a month to month tenancy, and then, by way of cross-complaint, proceeded to allege a cause of action for specific performance of an alleged partially executed parol agreement. In this behalf the cross-complaint alleged, in substance, that plaintiff and defendant had entered into an oral agreement whereby plaintiff had agreed to execute a written lease to the premises in suit containing certain terms, specifically set forth in the cross-complaint, and that the defendant entered into possession of the premises pursuant to and upon the understanding and belief that the plaintiff would execute the lease agreed upon, but that plaintiff refused to do so. The property was alleged to be community property and plaintiff's wife was joined as a cross-defendant. The court overruled a general demurrer to the cross-complaint, found against the plaintiff on the issues raised by the pleadings, and rendered judgment for the defendant and cross-complainant, decreeing specific performance by plaintiff of the agreement to execute the lease and appointing a commissioner to perform in the event of plaintiff's refusal. The appeal is taken upon the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] The paramount point presented in support of the appeal is that a cross-complaint of any kind is inadmissible in an action of unlawful detainer. Preliminarily, counsel for defendant interposed an objection to a consideration of the point just stated for the reason that it was first raised upon oral argument when the appeal was heard in the first instance before the District Court of Appeal. In response to this objection it will suffice to say that ordinarily, where a party has neglected to present a point in his brief, he may be precluded from insisting that the court consider the point when deciding the case and from asserting that he has been prejudiced should the court refuse to do so. However, we know of no hard and fast rule which prohibits the court from considering and deciding points of law which may not have been urged and argued in the briefs originally filed if it appears to the court that an important legal principle is necessarily involved in the newly discovered point, and that a proper disposition of the case requires a discussion and decision of that point. But, however that may be, it appears in the instant case that after the oral argument the point in controversy was fully briefed, and we are satisfied that the defendant will in no way be prejudiced by a consideration of the point which we deem to be necessary to a decision.

[3] In Arnold v. Krigbaum, 169 Cal. 143, 146 Pac. 423, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 370, this court said:

"It appears to be thoroughly established both in this state and in other jurisdictions having substantially similar statutes to our unlawful detainer statutes, that neither a counterclaim nor cross-complaint of any kind is permissible in an action in unlawful detainer. This question was discussed by the District Court of Appeal of the First District in the recent case of Knight v. Black, 19 Cal. App. 518, 126 Pac. 512, where many authorities [bearing directly upon the point] are cited."

See, also, Smith v. Whyers (Cal. App.) 221 Pac. 387.

"There is no distinction in the authorities between cases where the subject-matter of the attempted counterclaim or cross-complaint arises out of a violation of the terms of the lease upon which the action is brought, and other cases."

A cross-complaint is not permissible in an action for unlawful detainer for the reason that the provisions of part 3, tit. 3, c. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, are controlling in the summary proceedings, including unlawful detainer, with which the chapter is concerned. In so far as that chapter deals with matters of practice, its provisions supersede the rules of practice contained in other portions of the Code. Sections 1165 and 1177, Code Civ. Proc. The chapter above mentioned prescribes the showing which must be made in a complaint in unlawful detainer and then makes provision for pleadings on the part of the defendant. It provides:

"On or before the day fixed for his appearance, the defendant may appear and answer or demur." Section 1170, Code Civ. Proc.

The section limits the defendant to an answer or demurrer. Obviously, therefore, a cross-complaint is inadmissible in an action in unlawful detainer.

[4] While the defendant was not entitled to a judgment in the present proceedings decreeing specific performance of the agreement to execute the lease, nevertheless the part performance of such an agreement can be interposed as an equitable defense to the plaintiff's attempt to wrest from him the possession of the premises by the summary proceedings in unlawful detainer. In the case of Gray v. Maier, etc., 2 Cal. App. 653, 84 Pac. 280, the court, referring to the right to set up defenses of an equitable nature in such actions, had this to say:

"The power of a court of equity is invoked by plaintiff in every action in forcible detainer, when he seeks in his complaint to have a forfeiture declared on account of default in conditions of the lease. * * * If such an equitable power is in a court in cases of this class, of which we have no doubt, no reason is apparent why such equitable power may not be extended into a full examination of all the equities involved, to the end that exact justice be done."

In the case of Knight v. Black, supra, it was held error on the part of the trial court to strike out the equitable defense there pleaded by the defendant in his answer. In other words, the fact that the defendant cannot obtain specific performance of an oral agreement to execute a lease does not deprive him of the right to have the court examine into the equities existing between the parties in determining whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to evict the defendant.

[5] It is a well-recognized rule of equity that part performance of an oral agreement to execute a lease for a longer period than a year may take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds. McCarger v. Rood, 47 Cal. 138; Manning v. Franklin, 81 Cal. 205, 22 Pac. 550; Laughton v. McDonald (Cal. App.) 215 Pac. 707.

[6] It was therefore proper for the defendant to raise, and for the court to consider, the occupation of the premises under the oral agreement to lease, as an equitable defense to the action to recover possession of the property. While defendant's pleading was called a cross-complaint for specific performance, and as such was perhaps defective in that it failed to state facts showing that the consideration for the lease was adequate, nevertheless it sufficiently presented the agreement to execute the lease as an equitable right in defendant's favor. It set forth defendant's case with more particularity than a simple answer would have been required to do. The issue apparently was considered and carefully tried and the court has made detailed findings thereon. We are therefore of the opinion that plaintiff has not been prejudiced, and, under the circumstances, the mere error in the matter of pleadings has not resulted in a miscarriage of justice, and a new trial is not necessary to determine the rights of the parties.

[7] Plaintiff points to the fact that the court found that plaintiff's wife did not agree to execute a lease to the premises. This finding is immaterial for the reason that section 172a of the Civil Code, requiring a wife to join with her husband in a lease of community property, applies only to community property acquired subsequent to the adoption of that Code section. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 116 Cal. 339, 48 Pac. 228, 36 L. R. A. 497, 58 Am. St. Rep. 170; Roberts v. Wehmeyer (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 22. The appeal being before the court upon the judgment roll alone, it must be assumed in support of the judgment that the evidence showed that the property was acquired before section 172a became part of the laws of this state.

We conclude, therefore, that the trial court was not authorized in this action of unlawful detainer to decree specific performance of the agreement to execute a written lease, but that the court had power to examine into the partial performance of the oral agreement to execute the lease as an equitable defense to the attempt at eviction, and that the court having found in favor of the defendant upon this issue, a new trial is unnecessary.

It is ordered, therefore, that that portion of the judgment decreeing specific performance of the agreement to execute the lease be vacated and set aside, and that the remainder of the judgment stand affirmed.

GREGG v. WESTERN PAC. R. CO. et al.

1. Appeal and error ⇨927(3)—Evidence viewed most favorably to plaintiff on appeal from judgment of nonsuit.

In determining whether a nonsuit was properly granted, every inference fairly deducible and every presumption fairly arising from the evidence favorable to plaintiff must be considered as facts proved in his favor, and, if one of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to plaintiff and discard contradictory evidence.

2. Negligence ⇨136(9)—Contributory negligence for jury, where reasonable men might disagree.

If the evidence and circumstances are such that the question of plaintiff's negligence is one on which reasonable men might disagree, a motion for nonsuit should not be granted.

3. Railroads ⇨350(28)—Contributory negligence of automobile driver held for jury.

An automobile driver, who had crossed a railroad track at a crossing daily for several months without having ever seen or known of a train passing such point at the hour he was struck by one, and who knew that a signal man was stationed at the crossing, held not negligent, as a matter of law in crossing the track while his view was obstructed by a street car filled with passengers, where the approaching train, which struck him, sounded no warning, and the watchman was absent, and he started to cross from the opposite side, after the conductor, pursuant to a rule of which plaintiff was aware, had looked down the track before the car started across.

4. Negligence ⇨68—Care commensurate with situation required.

It is the duty of every one to exercise such care as is commensurate with the situation.

5. Railroads ⇨330(2)—Adoption of safety devices reduces quantum of care required of traveler.

While a railroad crossing is a place of danger and an effectual warning of danger which must always be heeded, and the exercise of ordinary care in traveling over it is not excused by the railroad's negligent omission to exercise reasonable care, a railway company encouraging the public to relax its vigil by assurances that the danger has been removed or minimized by adoption of safety devices and measures cannot hold a person to the same quantum of care as if no such safety measures had been provided.

6. Railroads ⇨330(2)—Open gates held invitation to cross, which must be considered, with failure to sound warning, on issue of contributory negligence.

Though crossing gates are operated during certain hours only, open gates during the rest of the day give the same assurance of safety to persons without knowledge of such limitation as if there were none, in the absence of reasonable notice by appropriate signs or otherwise, and are an invitation to cross, which must be considered, with failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle, as required by Civ. Code, § 486, and other facts and circumstances, in determining the question of contributory negligence.

7. Railroads ⇨350(28)—Contributory negligence of traveler relying on assurance of safety from absence of flagman for jury.

The extent to which a traveler may rely on the assurance of safety arising from the absence of the flagman at a crossing, with which he is familiar, is generally a question of fact for the jury, from which it may be withdrawn only where the deduction from the circumstances is inevitably that of negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by C. J. Gregg against the Western Pacific Railroad Company and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ostrander & Carey, of Oakland, for appellant.

Stephen F. Otis, of San Francisco, and Snook & Brown, of Oakland (Thos. J. Ledwich, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. Appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in an action by appellant to recover damages from respondents for injuries sustained by the former while driving an automobile by reason of being struck by an engine drawing a train of cars, which, it is alleged, was operated by respondents in a careless and negligent manner.

A single track of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, a steam railroad, occupies a position on East Twelfth street, a few feet south of the center line of said street, in the city of Oakland. Its course through Oakland is in an easterly direction. Twenty-Third avenue, which extends northerly and southerly, intersects said East Twelfth street at a right angle. The San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways Company, with its terminal in Oakland and Alameda county, operates a double-track electric system over and along said avenue. The place where the accident occurred is within quite a busy suburban business section of said city of Oakland. At the time of the injury the Western Pacific train was moving in a westerly direction and the automobile was traveling southerly.

The east property line of Twenty-Third avenue northerly from East Twelfth street is entirely occupied with business buildings which shut off the easterly view of respondent company's railroad track, except as the line of vision is broadened by moving southerly upon the northerly property line of East Twelfth street. Business houses occupy the northeast corner formed by said intersecting streets and continue easterly along the property line of East Twelfth street for some distance. A station house for the accommodation of a flagman or watchman, whose duty it was to give warning signals to persons and to the traffic moving along East Twelfth street at the point where it is intersected by Twenty-Third avenue of approaching trains moving either easterly or westerly across said East Twelfth street, occupied a position about 6 feet south of the building line along East Twelfth street and 8 feet east of the property line of Twenty-Third avenue if projected southerly, leaving a passageway 6 feet in width between said buildings and station house. Said station house as thus placed served to further obstruct a full easterly view of the railroad track looking easterly from Twenty-Third avenue. This station house was 6 by 8 feet in dimensions and stood 8 feet in height. The steam railroad track runs on a straight line for some distance before reaching the crossing and continues until Twenty-Fourth avenue is reached, at which point it turns to the south. The distance from the north property line of East Twelfth street in a direct line to the north rail of respondent's track is approximately 44 feet. It was stipulated by the parties hereto that—

"From a point 10 feet north of the northerly rail of respondent's track on the west street car track looking east the Western Pacific track can be seen for a distance of 900 feet; from a point 33 feet north 1,000 feet; between 10 feet north and 32 feet north, at the following distances, between 900 feet and 1,000 feet; from a point 40 feet north the track can be observed for a distance of 200 feet; from a point 50 feet north it would be observed for a distance of 116 feet."

It was also stipulated that the flagman's house was 32 feet from the nearest rail of said track and was the nearest fixed obstruction. The overhang of the engine was from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 feet from the nearest rail. East Twelfth street is 38 feet in width from curb to curb, and Twenty-Third avenue is 52 feet.

For about six months prior to the collision,

East Twelfth street had been in a state of repair. The travel was along the northerly side. Trenches 18 inches in depth and 1 foot in width had been dug along the outside of the north rail, and ties were piled near by. These trenches led up to within 18 inches of the rails of the electric tracks, and vehicles in crossing East Twelfth street were compelled to keep within the limits of the street car tracks, thus requiring care and attention of drivers in directing automobiles through a narrow passageway. Very near the moment that the automobile was struck, an electric car operated by the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways Company, and moving northerly, had crossed the rails of the Western Pacific track. This car was 40 feet in length and was crowded with passengers so densely as to entirely obstruct the view of objects on the opposite side of said car. The train of respondent was evidently running at high speed; no whistle was blown or bell rung or alarm given in any manner to warn persons or the traffic of the approach of the train. The flagman or watchman who was accustomed to warn the public of approaching trains from a position near the center of the intersection of said streets was absent from his post. The main physical facts sufficient for an understanding of the situation have been substantially stated. Other facts and circumstances important to a consideration of the case will be developed as the discussion progresses.

[1] It is important to keep in mind from the outset the well-established rules of law which must control this court in determining whether or not the motion of nonsuit was properly granted. In so doing we must view with reasonable favor the evidence offered in support of appellant's case.

"Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence adduced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the plaintiffs. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if one of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the plaintiffs. If contradictory evidence has been given, it must be disregarded. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252. The plaintiff must also be given the benefit of every piece of evidence which tends to sustain his averments and such evidence must be weighed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs' claim. Anderson v. Wickliffe, 178 Cal. 120, 172 Pac. 381. Evidence, whether erroneously admitted or not, if relevant to the issues joined, must be given the credit and benefit of its full probative strength and any question arising from the fact of variation between the evidence of the witnesses cannot be raised or considered. The evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant, and, if the plaintiff has introduced proof sufficient to make out a prima facie case under the allegations of his complaint, the motion, if made upon the close of the case, should be denied. Bush v. Wood, 8 Cal. App. 647, 97 Pac. 709; In re Daly, 15 Cal. App. 329, 114 Pac. 787; Wassermann v. Sloss, 117 Cal. 425, 49 Pac. 566. 38 L. R. A. 176, 59 Am. St. Rep. 209; [Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 158 Cal. 597]; Lassen v. S. P. Co., 173 Cal. 71, 159 Pac. 143; Kleist v. Priem [51 Cal. App. 32], 196 Pac. 72." Berger v. Lane (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 45.

In the light of the foregoing rules the evidence must be examined. Learned counsel for respondent have rather assumed a contrary position. To illustrate: Appellant, upon insistent questioning, hazarded an estimate as to the width of an open space which was rapidly closing as the electric car and the automobile approached each other from opposite directions, and through which opening appellant momentarily looked easterly in observation of respondent's track, and through which opening he claimed to have had an unobstructed view of said track for a distance of about 150 feet. It is urged that the lines of vision limited by an open space of but 5½ inches in width, as estimated by appellant, rendered it impossible for him to have observed the track for so great a distance as 150 feet. For the purposes of this motion the extent of the view must be accepted and the space through which it was made must be widened to accommodate itself to the most favorable advantage of appellant, and, if necessary to that end, it must be entirely discarded.

This case falls within the rule controlling guarded crossings, and the evidence must be considered in its relation to those rules and not confined solely to the rules which govern unguarded crossings such as were applied in Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651, Green v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 138 Cal. 1, 70 Pac. 926, and in many subsequent cases dealing with facts analogous to the facts of those cases. That is to say, each must be considered and decided in reference to the facts peculiar to it.

Observing the rules of construction which apply to motions of nonsuit, the facts in the instant case may be thus stated. Appellant, who was employed as a steam fitter by the San Francisco Shipbuilding Corporation, was, on the morning of November 27, 1920, on his way to said shipyards pursuant to his employment, which yards are situate near the foot of said Twenty-Third avenue, in the city of Alameda. His course to and from his work was along said Twenty-Third avenue, which crosses East Twelfth street, the place of the accident. Twice a day, morning and afternoon, appellant had driven his Overland automobile, of the touring car type, over this course for a period of more than six months. He was therefore quite familiar with the location. On the day in question he left his home at the usual hour and arrived at the crossing, where the injury occurred, at about the hour of 7:43 a. m. Earlier on that morning he had overtaken a fellow workman who was on his way to the shipyards, and who, upon appellant's invitation to ride, took a seat at his right. As he approached the East Twelfth street crossing he reduced the speed of the automobile from a rate of 12 or 14 miles an hour to a rate of 5 or 6 miles an hour. As he continued to move southerly and crossed over the north property line of and into East Twelfth street, an electric car moving northerly was proceeding to cross the track of the Western Pacific Railroad Company. The electric car arrived at the street crossing prior to appellant's arrival but it was stopped within about 10 feet of the track of the Western Pacific, and the conductor, in obedience to the established rule and custom in such cases, went forward to make an observation as to approaching trains. Seeing none, he gave the motorman the signal to cross the track. The entrance into and the exit from the car was located midway from either end of said car. In making the crossing the electric car traveled at the rate of about 2 miles an hour. At a point about 6 feet from the northerly rail of the Western Pacific's track the conductor boarded his car. The rear end of the 40-foot car had not then cleared the steam railroad track. At a point approximately 25 feet north from the north rail of said steam railroad track said conductor again looked in an easterly direction and saw the light thrown forward by the reflector of the engine drawing the passenger train as it was about to make the curve and enter into East Twelfth street. The distance from Twenty-Fourth avenue to Twenty-Third avenue is 350 feet. He estimated the engine by the light he saw, to have been 200 feet beyond this distance, making a total distance of 550 feet. Neither the conductor, who had walked across the track to make observation for approaching trains, or the motorman, while his car was motionless, or appellant, who was traveling very slowly, or the two or three other persons who were on the sidewalk on Twenty-Third avenue near the scene of the accident, and in favorable positions to have heard an alarm, if given, heard a whistle blown or bell rung or any kind of a warning given of the oncoming train. It must be assumed for the purposes of this motion that no warning whatsoever was given. Had a whistle been sounded or a bell rung, the alarm would, according to the testimony, have been heard.

Appellant, upon nearing the track, had checked his speed to 5 or 6 miles an hour, and testified that he listened and also looked, so far as the conditions appeared to him to require it, for trains that might be approaching. His view to the west was full and complete. To the east it was limited by the station house of the watchman and obstructed by the passing street car, which was crowded with standing passengers. The electric car, as it cleared the tracks, missed being struck by the engine drawing said train of cars by but a few feet. Appellant, upon the next moment after the rear of said electric car had cleared the steam railroad track, was practically upon said track when he observed the engine so closely upon him a distance of 4 feet, as to make, so he claims, his escape impossible. His automobile was hit back of the left front wheel with great force by the engine. No person except the conductor of the electric car and the occupants of the automobile seem to have been aware at any time of an approaching train until the accident occurred. The automobile was carried forward quite a distance by the engine. The train was brought to a stop at a distance variously estimated from 150 to 250 feet from the place of impact. The rate of speed at which the train was traveling is not definitely fixed, but there is testimony to show that it was traveling at a somewhat fast rate of speed. One witness who heard the crash said:

"I could see that the emergency brakes were on—could see the smoke or dust. When I say that the brakes were smoking, it might have been smoke or dust; I don't know if it was either."

From what he then saw he was of the opinion that it had been traveling at a rate exceeding 20 miles an hour. Appellant also testified that it was traveling at a fast rate of speed. Some notion of its speed may be gained by an estimate of its position when first seen by the conductor and the time required to reach the crossing considered in relation to the position of the electric car at the time of the collision and also with reference to the distance required to stop the train. It was evidently an overdue train, as no train had been seen before to pass the point in question at the time this train was passing, by appellant or by any of the persons who were familiar with the situation and whose duty it was to inform themselves on train schedules. At the time appellant got a view of the steam railroad track between the watchman's station and the front end of the electric car, for a distance of 150 feet, the train had evidently not then moved into or passed through that area. If it had passed beyond it, judging by comparative rates of speed, it would have crossed the intersecting track ahead of appellant and passed safely on. Passengers in the car obstructed appellant's view through the car windows.

[2] The question presented is whether appellant, under all the facts and circumstances of the particular case, was, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence in proceeding to cross said railroad track without listening or looking more effectively or intently than is shown, or by stopping, if circumstances required it, before crossing said railroad track.

Conceding respondent railroad company to have been negligent in its omissions, was appellant also guilty of negligence under the exigencies of the situation by a failure to exercise ordinary care and prudence in attempting to cross said track? If the evidence in the record and also the circumstances of this case are such that the question of whether or not appellant was negligent in approaching the crossing is one upon which reasonable men might well disagree, then the motion for a nonsuit should not have been granted. Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Ry. Co., 158 Cal. 596, 112 Pac. 53.

[3] The appellant had crossed the steam railroad track at the point in question daily for several months preceding the injury. During all of that time he had never seen or known of a train passing along East Twelfth street at the hour he was struck. He knew that a signal man was stationed at said crossing whose duty it was to warn the traffic of approaching trains by giving signals from a position near the center of the intersecting tracks. He was not aware of the absence of the watchman or flagman from his post of duty and supposed that his absence from the signal point was an invitation, as it usually was, to cross and that it was safe to do so. No whistle was blown or bell rung by the engineer in charge of the train. Coupled with these circumstances, he observed the electric car passing across the track. It is clear from his testimony that he was aware of the rule of electric and street railways requiring motormen to stop their cars and send forward the conductor to make sure that no train is approaching before crossing a steam railroad track. He had worked as a fireman on locomotives. It was testified to by one witness that it was usual for respondent's employees to give warning of trains moving along East Twelfth street by blowing a whistle before arriving at the Twenty-Third avenue crossing notwithstanding the maintenance of a watchman.

We are not prepared to say as a matter of law under the circumstances of the situation that appellant in determining his action had no right to take into consideration or to be influenced in any degree by the movement of the traffic or by the investigation made by the conductor of the electric car as to its being reasonably safe to cross said track a second or two after the car had passed over it upon the invitation that was being extended by the absence of a warning.

true that that case involved as an element the question of an absent flagman. But the facts of that case are not the facts of this case. The elements which make up the case now before us and which have been stated were not present in Jones v. Southern Pacific Company, supra. There the view of the plaintiff was unobstructed, and for a distance of 30 feet from the nearest rail of the tract he had a plain view of defendant's train, and his conduct under the simple circumstances of the case was inexcusable. If he had looked at all, he would have seen the peril into which he was blindly driving. Other opportunities of protection were open to plaintiff in that case which are not shown in the present case. We do not here hold that one who blindly attempts to cross a steam railroad track, whether the crossing be guarded or unguarded, and by reason of such negligence is injured by being hit by a passing train, has a cause of action against the railroad company. The law casts upon every one the duty of exercising such care as is commensurate with the situation. The question is as to the quantum of care that was required to be exercised by appellant in the instant case.

[5] It is true, as has often been stated, that a railroad crossing is itself a place of danger and is an effectual warning of danger which must always be heeded, and the exercise of ordinary care in traveling over such place is not excused by the negligent omission of the railroad company itself to exercise reasonable care. But it is also true that a railway company will not be permitted to encourage the public to relax its vigil as to the dangers that lurk in railroad crossings by assurances that the danger has been removed or minimized by the adoption of safety devices and measures and at the same time hold a person to the same quantum of care as if no such safety measures had been provided. In Koch v. So. Cal. Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 680, 84 Pac. 176, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 521, 113 Am. St. Rep. 332, 7 Ann. Cas. 795, it is said that the adoption of safety gates or any other appliances by a railroad company for the protection of the public does not absolve the public from all duty of taking care of itself.

"A person is still required to exercise due and ordinary care, and while the quantum of care which will be reasonable may be less where the gates are provided and are relied upon by the traveler, still the gates themselves are not an assurance and a warranty such as to justify a traveler in going blindly ahead in total disregard of all ordinary precautions, as did the plaintiff in this instance." (Italics ours.)

Continuing, it quotes the following from Ellis v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., 169 Mass. 600, 48 N. E. 839:

"The raising of the gates was, no doubt, a circumstance which justified the plaintiff in starting to cross the railroad when he did, and he had a right to expect that if any engine or train was approaching the crossing on the inbound track, a whistle would be sounded or a bell be rung. But in attempting to cross the railroad he was bound, in the exercise of ordinary care, to himself exercise his own powers of observation, and to take thought for his own safety; and he was not entitled to have his case go to the jury unless there was evidence from which it could be inferred that he did this. * * * While the raising of the gates justified the plaintiff in attempting to cross when he did, and while that fact and the facts that no whistle was sounded and no bell was rung are to be taken into consideration on the question of how much he must himself look and observe as he makes his way across, these circumstances do not excuse him from looking and listening and taking thought for his own safety. He cannot rely wholly upon them, and cannot recover without showing more as to his own conduct than that he so relied."

[6] The general situation as presented by the instant case is different from the situation stated in the case of Koch v. Southern Pacific Company, supra. To the limited elements named in that case may be added the further facts that appellant was traveling at a very slow rate of speed and was listening and looking as herein described, and that he entered upon the track immediately after an electric car crowded with passengers had crossed it after investigation made by the conductor as to approaching trains. Other elements which must be considered are that the train appeared from around a curve and could not have been seen at any point near the crossing until it had approached within 900 or 1,000 feet of said crossing; said train was not running on schedule time, but was a belated or an extra train; that the passageway over which appellant was compelled to travel had been narrowed by repairs that were being made to respondent's track which required extra care to be given by the driver to the way over which he was passing. If a reasonably prudent person situated as appellant was situated, and seeing what he then saw and knew, would have been justified in acting upon appearances as appellant assumed to do, or, if reasonably prudent men would disagree as to whether appellant exercised ordinary care in the premises, then the case should have gone to the jury. The invitation to cross, the failure to ring the bell or sound the whistle, as required by the provisions of section 486, Civil Code, are elements which must be considered with all the other facts and circumstances of the entire case. The case of Koch v. Southern Pacific Company, supra, is not inconsistent with anything said in Wyseur v. Davis, 58 Cal. App. 598, 209 Pac. 213. The rule is there correctly stated to be:

"In discussing a similar question, the absence of a flagman from a crossing, in the case of Elias v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 226 N. Y. 154, 123 N. E. 73, it is said: 'The danger is obvious. It is like in kind to that caused by raised and untended gates. To some extent it is an assurance that the way is safe. That the railroads recognize the danger is seen by the familiar sign at country crossings giving notice that the flagman is absent after 6 p. m.' See, also Washington v. Birmingham Southern R. Co., 203 Ala. 295, 82 So. 545. Where operated during certain hours of the day only, open gates during the remainder of the day give the same assurance of safety to persons without knowledge of the limited operation thereof as if there were no such limitation, in the absence of reasonable notice by appropriate signs or otherwise. 'Whether required by statute or not, the fact that the gate is open is held to be an invitation to cross and an assurance that the track can be crossed in safety.' Elliott on Railroads (2d Ed.) § 1157; State v. Boston, etc., R. R. Co., 80 Me. 430, 15 Atl. 36; Pittsburg, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Tatman, 72 Ind. App. 519, 122 N. E. 357; Washington v. Birmingham Southern R. Co., supra; Montgomery v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 181 Mo. 477, 79 S. W. 930; Schwarz v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 211 Pa. 625, 61 Atl. 255. 'By these signals thousands of travelers are governed every day.' Hooper v. Boston & M. R. Co., 81 Me. 260, 17 Atl. 64. An open gate 'is in the nature of an invitation to cross, and a declaration that there are no approaching trains.' Penn. R. Co. v. Stegemeier, 118 Ind. 305, 20 N. E. 843, 10 Am. St. 136. [7] The extent to which a traveler may rely upon the assurance of safety arising from the absence of a flagman from his post of duty on the presumption that it is safe for him to cross a railroad track which he is familiar with is generally held to be a question of fact for the jury. 33 Cyc. 1027; Elliott on Railroads, § 1651.

"It has often been said by this court that it is very rare that a set of circumstances is presented which enables a court to say, as a matter of law, that negligence has been shown. As a general rule, it is a question of fact for the jury, an inference to be deduced from the circumstances of each particular case, and it is only where the deduction to be drawn is inevitably that of negligence that the court is authorized to withdraw the question from the jury." Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., supra, quoting from Seller v. Market St. Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 72 Pac. 1006.

We are of the opinion that the case should have been submitted to the jury under appropriate instructions by the court.

The judgment and order of nonsuit are reversed.

OLIVER v. SUPERIOR COURT, CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, et al. (S. F. 10974.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1924.)

Courts — 212—Transfer to Supreme Court not granted unless error appears upon face of opinion.

A transfer to the Supreme Court is not granted unless an error appears upon the face of the opinion, and the opinion must be in writing under Const. art. 6, § 24, and this applies to mandamus proceedings.

In Bank.

Application by A. J. Oliver for writ of mandate prayed to be directed to the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, E. P. Mogan, Judge, requiring respondent to correct judgment nunc pro tunc with reference to names of defendants. Matter transferred to this court and transferred to District Court of Appeal.

McKannay & Hunt, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

David K. Watkins and Leon A. Blum, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of mandamus directed to the respondents. An alternative writ was issued by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1, and a peremptory writ denied after hearing, without any written opinion.

Under the rule stated in Burke v. Maze, 10 Cal. App. 206, 101 Pac. 438, 440, we do not grant a transfer unless an error appears upon the face of the opinion. The Constitution provides (article 6, § 24) that—

"In the determination of causes all decisions of the Supreme Court and of the District Courts of Appeal shall be given in writing, and the grounds of the decisions shall be stated."

This provision applies to mandamus proceedings. People v. District Court of Appeal (Cal. Sup.) 222 Pac. 353.

The matter is hereby transferred to this court and, in view of the fact that the matter has been considered by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1, the matter is ordered transferred to the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1.

WILLIAMS v. GILL. (Civ. 4830.)

Municipal corporations § 159(1)—City clerk may not go behind face of recall petition containing sufficient number of signatures.

Under Const. art. 23, § 1, and Henning's Gen. Laws 1920, p. 2214, referring to recall petitions, "The clerk shall examine and from the records of registration ascertain whether * * * said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified voters," the city clerk may not go behind the face of the petition and refuse to certify because dates after the signatures were not written by the signers, but can merely determine whether the requisite number of qualified voters had signed, and, if fraud had been committed, a court of equity is the proper forum to determine it.

Application for writ of mandate by Edwin H. Williams against J. J. Gill, individually and as City Clerk of the City of San Leandro, to compel him to certify a recall petition. Writ granted.

Edwin H. Williams and Fred J. Russell, both of San Leandro, for petitioner.

J. Allison Bruner, City Atty., of San Leandro (Wm. J. Locke, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Petition for mandate to compel the performance of a public duty. The allegations of the petition show that petitioner is a resident of the city of San Leandro, county of Alameda, and that he is a registered qualified elector, freeholder, and taxpayer therein; that the defendant, Gill, is the qualified and acting city clerk of said city, and charged with the performance of all the duties and obligations pertaining to that office; that in the month of April, 1922, a general election for the office of city trustee was held in said city, and that at said election one Allen E. Pelton was duly elected to such office, and that he subsequently qualified and now is the acting city trustee of said city.

It is further alleged that on October 5, 1923, plaintiff and others circulated a petition to recall said Pelton from office, which petition was signed by the necessary qualified electors; that after every name signed to the petitions appeared the residence of the signer, by street and number, together with his occupation. It is then recited that all the signatures to the petition were secured between October 5, 1923, and October 19, 1923, and that plaintiff on said last-named date annexed thereto his affidavit, deposing to this fact, and that the affidavit was duly filed with defendant. It is then charged that defendant, after formal demand made upon him, refused to certify that the petition was in legal form and that it had annexed thereto the signatures of more than 253 qualified electors residing in said city, whose names appeared upon the great register of the county, and which number constitutes 25 per cent. of the total number of voters who voted at the last election for such office; that the defendant gave as his reason for refusing to make his certificate that the dates appearing opposite the names of 158 of the signers did not appear to be written in the handwriting of the signers; that such dates appearing after the names of 100 signers were indicated by ditto marks, and that the occupations appearing opposite the names of 24 of the signers did not appear to have been written in the handwriting of such signers, and also that a certain number of signatures were secured by a person who was not registered at the time he circulated the petition.

It is further charged that the only evidence defendant had for concluding that the dates on the petition for recall were not written by the respective signers was by a mere inspection of the petition itself and that said opinion was his arbitrary conclusion, not founded upon any other evidence. In his answer to the application for the writ defendant does not deny this fact, and plaintiff's allegation that the dates appearing opposite the signatures are the correct dates is denied by defendant merely upon lack of information and belief. Plaintiff contends that this showing does not entitle defendant to reject any of the names.

Upon the hearing it was conceded by defendant that the petition for recall was regular on its face and that it contained a sufficient number of genuine signatures. The sole question here presented is whether or not a signer is required to himself place upon the petition the true date of his signing.

To the general provisions of the law controlling recall petitions (Const. art. 23, § 1; Henning's General Laws 1920, p. 2214) the Legislature added a section to the Political Code. Such section reads as follows:

"1083a. Qualifications for Signing Initiative Petitions, etc. Wherever by the Constitution or laws of this state, any initiative, referendum, recall or nominating petition or paper, or any petition or paper, is required to be signed by qualified electors, only an elector who is a registered qualified elector at the time he signs such petition or paper shall be entitled to sign the same, and no elector shall be entitled to sign any such petition or paper on or after the first day of January of an even-numbered year unless he shall, on or since said first day of January, have made an affidavit of registration as required by law. Such signer shall at the time of so signing such petition or paper affix thereto the date of such signing. Wherever, by the Constitution or laws of this state, the county clerk or registrar of voters is required to determine from the records of registration what number of qualified electors have signed such petition or paper, he shall determine that fact with respect to the purported signature of any person from the affidavit of registration, and records relating thereto, current and in effect at the date of such signing of such petition or paper."

It is the contention of the defendant that this section is mandatory, and failure on the part of the signers to comply with its provisions justified his refusal to affix his certificate. Plaintiff, on the other hand, insists that the provisions requiring the signer to affix the date after his signature is directory merely, and failure to comply therewith does not justify the rejection of the signature. It is argued that the addition of the date after the name of the signer has not the least tendency to prevent fraud, and it is only those provisions of the statute controlling elections relating to the time and place of holding the same, the qualification of voters, and such others as are expressly made essential prerequisites to the validity of an election that are to be held mandatory, and that all others are directory. Russell v. McDowell, 83 Cal. 70, 23 Pac. 183.

We do not deem a discussion or decision upon this subject necessary, for whether the provision be mandatory or directory is a question with which the clerk is not concerned. His duty under the law is to do no more than verify the purported signatures appearing on the petition with the great register and certify the result of that examination. His authority is to be found in the general laws relating to the subject of elections, which is as follows:

"Within ten days from the date of filing such petition the Clerk shall examine and from the records of registration ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified voters, and he shall attach to said petition his certificate showing the result of his examination." Henning's Gen. Laws 1920, p. 2214. See, also, Const. art. 23, § 1.

The clerk is not clothed with authority to receive extraneous evidence of the contents of a petition. His certificate is only required to show the result of an examination whereby, "from the records of registration," he has ascertained whether or not the petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified voters. Beecham v. Burns, 34 Cal. App. 754, 168 Pac. 1058. His duty is to determine whether the names on the petition, which also appear on the records of registration, constitute enough persons to authorize the recall under the statute. Chester v. Hall, 55

Cal. App. 615, 204 Pac. 237. In the ascertainment of this fact he has no power to go behind the face of the petition. If fraud has been committed, a court of equity is the proper forum to determine such questions under appropriate proceedings. Watts v. Superior Court, 36 Cal. App. 692, 173 Pac. 183.

Let the writ issue as prayed.

6. Railroads ⚡5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Objection to suit for loss during federal control held waived.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by S. L. Jones & Co. against James C. Davis, as Agent, designated by the President of the United States under the Transportation Act of 1920, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Powell & Dow, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHORT, Justice pro tem. This is an action by a shipper against the carrier to recover for the total loss of a shipment of four bales of goatskins; the goods having disappeared after their delivery to the carrier for carriage from San Francisco to Wilmington, Del. Judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff for the admitted value of the goods. The appeal is by the defendants.

The undisputed facts of the case as shown by the evidence and stipulation of facts, signed by counsel for the respective parties, are as follows:

That on the 5th day of December, 1917, the plaintiff was the owner of four bales of goatskins, each bale consisting of 500 pieces, and that the plaintiff ever since has been and is now, the owner thereof; that on the last-mentioned date the plaintiff delivered the said bales to said defendant Southern Pacific Company at San Francisco, Cal., and the said company then and there accepted the same from the plaintiff for safe carriage by said railroad company for hire on its said railroad, and connecting mail carriers, from San Francisco to Wilmington, state of Delaware, and for delivery to plaintiff's order at the last-named place; that the said railroad company thereupon loaded the said bales in a car furnished by it for that purpose, and proceeded with the said carriage thereof; that upon the said delivery to it of said bales the defendant railroad company issued and delivered to the plaintiff its railroad straight bill of lading No. 13945, consisting of an acknowledgment of the receipt by it of said bales, and a contract to carry and deliver the same as aforesaid, which bill of lading contains the following provisions:

"Except where the loss, damage, or injury complained of is due to delay or damage while being loaded or unloaded or damaged in transit by carelessness or negligence as conditions precedent to recovery, claims must be made in writing to the originating or delivering carrier within six months after delivery of the property; or, in case of failure to make delivery, then within six months after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed.

"And suits for loss, damage, or delay shall be instituted only within two years and one day after delivery of the property, or, in case of failure to make delivery, then within two years and one day after a reasonable time for delivery has elapsed."

That the defendant railroad company did not safely carry or deliver the said bales, but wrongfully and negligently failed so to do, in this, that it failed and refused, and has ever since failed and refused, to deliver to plaintiff, or to plaintiff's order, the said bales, or any part thereof, and that neither the whole nor any part of said bales has ever been delivered to the plaintiff or to plaintiff's order, though frequently demanded by the plaintiff from the said defendants, their agents, and representatives; that owing to the congested condition of the freight traffic then existing between San Francisco and Wilmington on the railroad lines of the defendant railroad company and its connecting carriers, and owing to the fact that the said goods had gone astray during said carriage, ninety days from and after December 5, 1917, was a reasonable time for the delivery of said bales by said carrier to their said destination, and that the reasonable time for the said delivery thereof expired on March 5, 1918; that within six months after the said reasonable time had elapsed for the delivery of said bales by said carrier at destination, to wit, on August 7, 1918, the plaintiff notified said railroad company and said United States Railroad Administration, in writing, of the said failure on the part of said carrier to deliver the said goods at destination, which said notice was as follows:

"San Francisco, Cal., August 7, 1918.

"Southern Pacific Company, S. P. Building, Market Street, San Francisco, California—Gentlemen: Between the fifth and eighth of Dec. 1917, we shipped via Southern Pacific four (4) bales Goat Skins to F. Blumenthal & Company of Wilmington, Delaware. Notify Trans-ocean Products Company, 80 Maiden Lane, New York.

"Our attention has been called to the fact that up to this time the parcel in question has not arrived, and consequently, we ask that you kindly trace same and advise us the outcome of the four (4) bales of goat skins in question.

"Thanking you in advance for your attention in the matter, we are, dear sirs,

"Yours truly, S. L. Jones & Co.

"DRN:GMC

By D. R. Nunez."

That from time to time from the said 7th day of August, 1918, and until the 4th day of February, 1921, the said railroad company notified the plaintiff in writing that it was investigating the whereabouts of said goods, and from time to time during the period of said investigation, to wit, from on or about August 7, 1918, to on or about February 4, 1921, said railroad company requested indulgence and forbearance on plaintiff's part in the matter of pressing plaintiff's claim herein for the nondelivery of said goods, and in consideration of such forbearance said railroad company and said United States Railroad Administration promised the plaintiff to adjust and pay plaintiff's loss upon concluding such investigation, if said goods could not be found; that said investigation was not concluded until April 19, 1921; that on April 19, 1921, the defendants notified the plaintiff for the first time that they had concluded their said investigation, and then, for the first time, informed the plaintiff that said goods had been lost, and that plaintiff's claim of damage for such loss was by them rejected; that in the course of the said carriage of said goods the same were transferred without exception at Chicago, Ill., on January 7, 1918; that from the 26th day of December, 1917, to the 28th day of February, 1920, the railroad of the defendant Southern Pacific Company, and those of its connecting rail carriers were operated under the direction and control of the United States through the United States Railroad Administration, and that ever since the said 28th day of February, 1920, the United States, and the said United States Railroad Administration, have been, and are now, represented by an agent designated by the President of the United States under the Act of Congress known as the "Transportation Act of February 28th, 1920," and that said defendant James C. Davis, Esq., was at the time of the filing of the complaint herein, and ever since has been, and is now, such agent.

The court below found all of the foregoing facts to be true, and in addition thereto, found that said letter of August 7, 1918, was—

"in full compliance with the provisions of said bill of lading relative to the filing of a written claim in case of failure to make delivery, and at all times subsequent to its receipt it was treated and acted upon by the defendants, and each of them, as such a compliance, and at no time prior to the rejection of plaintiff's claim on the 19th day of April, 1921, was any objection made by the defendants, or either of them, to the sufficiency of said notice as a valid and effective claim under the provisions of said bill of lading; * * * that pursuant to said requests, (contained in facts herein set forth) and in reliance upon said promises, the plaintiff deferred the filing of a suit to recover its damage for the loss of said goods until the said investigation was concluded.

"Finding 9.

"That the plaintiff did, within 6 months after the failure of the defendants to make delivery of said skins, make in writing to the originating carrier a claim for the loss of said skins and for the failure to make delivery thereof, and that this action is not barred in consequence of any failure on plaintiff's part, or by any provision of the bill of lading or otherwise; that the defendants and each of them are estopped by their acquiescence and acts, and by their correspondence with and promises to the plaintiff, from asserting the insufficiency thereof as a claim under its said bill of lading.

"Finding 10.

"That this action was commenced in time, and is not barred by any provision of the bill of lading or otherwise; that the defendants, and each of them, are estopped by their acquiescence and acts, and by their correspondence with and promises to the plaintiff, from asserting that this action was not commenced in time, and are estopped from asserting that the cause is barred by any provision of the bill of lading, or otherwise."

These findings, the appellant contends, are not supported by the evidence, and that the decision is against law; that on the contrary the evidence clearly shows that the claim was not made within six months, and that suit was not instituted within two years and one day as provided in the bill of lading, and that "the parties could not waive" the provisions of such bill of lading, nor could "the carrier, by its conduct, give the shipper the right" to ignore them. Bronstein v. Payne, 138 Md. 116, 113 Atl. 648, cited by appellants, sustains their contention that the provisions of the bill of lading cannot be waived, nor disregarded because of the acts of the carrier, and cites Georgia, Florida & Alabama Rd. Co. v. Blish Milling Co., 241 U. S. 190, 36 Sup. Ct. 541, 60 L. Ed. 948, and Texas & Pacific R. Co. v. Leatherwood, 250 U. S. 478, 39 Sup. Ct. 517, 63 L. Ed. 1096, federal decisions, as authority upon said point. The first case of the two last-named sustains the rule as stated, but in the case of Texas & Pacific R. Co. v. Leatherwood, supra, a subsequent case, only four justices adhere to that rule, three dissenting, and two concurred in the judgment on grounds not discussed in the opinion, but specially declare that they are not prepared to assent to the broad proposition that the parties to a bill of lading cannot waive its terms, nor can the carrier by its conduct give the shipper the right to ignore them.

The letter in the case of Bronstein v. Payne, supra, which was held insufficient as a notice of claim, was in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Please find B/L and paid freight bill for nine compressed bales of rags, of which we only received eight. Kindly trace the bale that's short and acknowledge the receipt of this letter and enclosures."

R. P. Hazzard Co. v. Main Central Rd. Co., 121 Me. 199, 116 Atl. 258, was a similar case to Bronstein v. Payne, supra, and followed that decision, and held the letter set out in the decision as insufficient as a notice of claim, and in each of said cases there was only a partial loss of shipment.

Replying to the first point that the notice of claim of loss was not given to the carrier within the time specified in the bill of lading, respondent makes the following points:

First. That the letter of August 7, 1918, was a claim, and was both timely and sufficient.

That "the purpose of the stipulation [in the bill of lading for a notice or claim of loss] is not to escape liability but to facilitate prompt investigation." George, Florida & Alabama Rd. Co. v. Blish Milling Co., supra.

"Such notice puts in permanent form the evidence of an intention to claim damages and will serve to call the attention of the carrier to the condition of the freight, and enable it to make such investigation as the facts of the case require while there is opportunity so to do." St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern R. R. v. Starbird, 243 U. S. 605, 37 Sup. Ct. 468, 61 L. Ed. 925.

The letter of August 7th gives the name of the shipper; a reasonably approximate date of shipment; the name of the carrier; the kind of merchandise; the quantity; the name of the party to whom shipped; the destination of the shipment; the name of the party to notify; the address of the party to be notified; the information that there had been a failure to deliver; and that the entire shipment was lost.

In Georgia, Florida & Alabama Rd. Co. v. Blish Milling Co., supra, it was held that the following statement of facts constituted a claim:

Railroad telegram to shipper:

"Flour order notify Draper Garrett Grocery Co. refused account damage. Hold at your risk and expense. Advise disposition."

Milling Company replied:

"Sending our representative there. What is nature of damage?"

Reply:

"Flour transferred en route. Slight damage by water. Apparently rough handling. When will your representative reach Bainbridge?"

The milling company replied that its man would be there the next day. At the conference the milling company sent this telegram:

"We will make claim against railroad for entire contents of car at invoice price. Must refuse shipment as we cannot handle."

And that said telegrams complied with bill of lading that it must be in writing.

Respondent further contends that the evidence shows that said letter of August 7, 1918, was treated by the carriers as a claim, as shown by stipulation of facts and the letter of Mr. Fitch of April 19, 1921, and that no objection was raised to it until the final rejection of the claim. In said letter Mr. Fitch wrote:

"It had seemed to me that even if section 3 of the bill of lading requires filing of claim within six months after a reasonable time for delivery of the property, nevertheless the circumstances of this case warranted recognition of the claim. Upon receipt of your letter of August 7, 1918, carriers instituted investigation and developed that the shipment was transferred without exceptions at Chicago on January 7, 1918. I assumed that a reasonable time for delivery, therefore, would be say thirty days after January 7, 1918, and that inasmuch as your letter was mailed to the carriers on August 7, 1918, you had complied with the statute."

And in the stipulation of facts, we have the following: "On August 7, 1918, the plaintiff notified said railroad company and said United States Railroad Administration, in writing, of the said failure on the part of said carrier to deliver the said goods at destination; * * * that from time to time thereafter, and until the 4th day of February, 1921, the said railroad company notified the plaintiff in writing that it was investigating the whereabouts of said goods, and from time to time during the period of said investigation, to wit, from on or about August 7, 1918, to on or about February 4, 1921, said railroad company requested indulgence and forbearance on plaintiff's part in the matter of pressing plaintiff's claim herein for the nondelivery of said goods, and in consideration of such forbearance said railroad company and said United States Railroad Administration promised the plaintiff to adjust and pay plaintiff's loss upon concluding such investigation, if said goods could not be found;" and that these facts fully sustain all the findings of the court below.

Second. Respondent further claims that no notice of claim of loss was necessary because no evidence of what became of the shipment was given, and in the stipulation of facts it was expressly stipulated that said railroad company did not safely carry or deliver said bales, but wrongfully and negligently failed so to do, in this: That it failed and refused, and has ever since failed and refused, to deliver to plaintiff or to plaintiff's order the said bales or any part thereof, and that their loss may have occurred because of damage in transit. See section 7976 Barnes' Federal Code (U. S. Comp. St. § 8604a); also the terms of the bill of lading.

And finally, that from on or about August 7, 1918, to on or about February 4, 1921, said railroad company requested indulgence and forbearance on plaintiff's part in the matter of plaintiff's claim herein for nondelivery of said goods, and in consideration of said forbearance, said railroad company and said United States Railroad Administration promised the plaintiff to adjust and pay plaintiff's loss upon concluding such investigation, if said goods could not be found, and that appellant should be bound thereby.

[1] From the foregoing facts heretofore set out it appears that said letter of August 7th was at all times treated and acted upon by the defendants as a sufficient notice of claim, and a full compliance with the bill of lading in that respect, and that the defendants and each of them should be and are estopped by their acquiescence and acts from asserting the insufficiency thereof as a claim, and that the finding of the court on that point is fully sustained by the evidence.

[2-5] Respondent claims that the second defense that the action was not filed or commenced in time was expressly abandoned at the trial, and that the defendants are therefore precluded from raising it in this court.

At said trial the following occurred:

"Mr. Dow: Your honor will note that in the correspondence they ask us for our indulgence. We will cite authorities that where a carrier asks the indulgence of a shipper, and such indulgence is granted, the shipper cannot afterwards come into court and say, 'Well, you relied upon our promises to pay, and you gave us indulgence, but you did not file your suit in time and you are out.'

"Mr. Ford: I am satisfied that you are right. I am satisfied we are not in a position to plead the statute of limitations, so we need not waste any time on that.

"The Court: Very well.

"Mr. Ford: The second defense, the one with reference to the action not being brought in time, is expressly waived. I am satisfied that, whether the letters in evidence did in fact cause the plaintiff to defer action beyond the period, I am satisfied they would be sufficient to do that. Anyway, we stipulate that that defense is waived."

The statute of limitations may be waived. Wells Fargo & Co. v. Enright, 127 Cal. 669, 60 Pac. 439, 49 L. R. A. 647.

When the creditor forbears to sue upon the written request of the debtor, the debtor will be estopped to plead the statute, and agreement to waive it is not against public policy. State Loan and, Co. v. Cochran, 130 Cal. 245, 62 Pac. 466, 600; Quanchi v. Ben Lomond Wine Co., 17 Cal. App. 565-569, 120 Pac. 427.

The above constituted an abandonment of the point that the suit was not filed in time, and disposes of that point against the appellant, and together with all the other evidence herein set out sustains the finding of the court on that point.

[6] Appellant raises the further point that the Southern Pacific Company is not liable in any event if the cause of action arose during federal control.

The objection that the carrier company is not a proper party defendant is waived by failure to raise it in time. Wyman v. Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co., 115 S. C. 138, 104 S. E. 542.

The railroad company never raised the point at any time by demurrer or answer, or by motion to dismiss, and therefore waived said point.

"When any of the matters enumerated in section four hundred thirty [grounds of demurrer] do not appear upon the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer." Section 433, Code Civ. Proc.

"If no objection was taken, either by demurrer or answer, the defendant must be deemed to have waived the same. * * *" Section 434, Code Civ. Proc.

The record in the case at bar shows that the railroad company never raised the point at any time, either by demurrer or answer, or by motion to dismiss on the ground that it was not a proper party.

[7] Furthermore, the appellants have expressly stipulated that, in consideration of the indulgence and forbearance that was given them by respondent, they had promised to pay plaintiff's loss upon concluding such investigation if said goods could not be found, and this promise in itself should be sufficient under the evidence in the case to sustain the judgment.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

HOCHHEIMER & CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR KERN COUNTY
et al. (Civ. 4610.)

1. Justices of the peace §166(2)—Statute held not to take from superior court power to dismiss appeals for failure to prosecute.

Code Civ. Proc. § 981a, as added by St. 1923, p. 755, providing that no appeal from the justice court shall be further prosecuted unless brought to trial within a year from the filing of such appeal, but that any appeal pending when the statute takes effect shall not be dismissed "under the direction hereof" before January 1, 1924, does not take from the superior court the general powers vested under Code Civ. Proc. § 980, authorizing dismissals for failure to prosecute appeals for unnecessary delay in bringing them to hearing; the further language of the statute that "by existing rule or by rule hereafter to be enacted" the superior court may "provide for dismissal of such appeal within a time less than one year" manifesting a legislative intention to leave undisturbed, the existing law.

2. Statutes §158, 159—Repeals by implication not favored, and exist only when statutes are irreconcilably inconsistent.

The law does not favor repeals by implication; such repeal existing only where two statutes are irreconcilably inconsistent with one another.

3. Justices of the peace §141(2)—Superior court on appeal may determine whether justice's judgment is void for want of jurisdiction.

The superior court has power to determine as a question of law arising on appeal from the justice's court whether the judgment of that court was void for want of jurisdiction.

4. Appeal and error §20—Appeal from superior court not dismissed where that court has rendered affirmative judgment.

The Supreme Court will not dismiss an appeal from a judgment of the superior court upon the ground that that court had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding when it has assumed such jurisdiction and rendered an affirmative judgment therein.

5. Certiorari §5(1)—Will not lie where remedy by appeal exists.

Certiorari will not lie where a remedy by appeal exists.

6. Certiorari §6—Will not lie where right of appeal lost by laches.

Certiorari will not lie where the right of appeal has been lost by laches.

Application for writ of certiorari by Hochheimer & Co., directed to the Superior Court in and for the County of Kern, J. W. Mahon, Judge, the Justices' Court of the Sixth Judicial Township, County of Kern, and Edward V. Jones, Justice of the Peace of said Township, to determine jurisdiction of the Superior Court in dismissing an appeal from Justices' Court. Writ discharged.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for petitioner.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Certiorari. The purpose of this proceeding is to determine whether or not the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction in dismissing an appeal from the justice's court; also whether or not the justice's court exceeded its jurisdiction in the action pending before it in rendering a judgment on a counterclaim.

It appears that judgment was rendered against the plaintiff on a counterclaim in the justice's court in the month of April, 1919; that shortly thereafter an appeal therefrom to the superior court was perfected by the plaintiff and the cause set for trial in the superior court on November 5, 1919, at which time, neither of the parties appearing in court, the cause went "off calendar." Nothing further was done in the matter by any one connected therewith until on or about October 1, 1923, at which time plaintiff's attorneys served on defendants a notice of motion to set the cause for trial, and on the same day defendants' attorneys served on plaintiff a notice of motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that it had not been diligently prosecuted, which latter motion was granted by the court.

Section 980 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which deals with the powers of the superior court on appeal, and which section since its amendment in 1880 has remained unaltered, provides in part that "for a failure to prosecute an appeal, or unnecessary delay in bringing it to a hearing, the superior court * * * may order the appeal to be dismissed."

The Legislature at its session in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 755) passed an act known as section 981a of the Code of Civil Procedure, which also affects appeals from the justice's court. Its provisions, so far as are deemed here applicable in the consideration of that part of the particular matter now before the court, are as follows:

"No action heretofore * * * appealed from the justice court * * * shall be further prosecuted, * * * where the appealing party fails to bring such appeal to trial within one year from the date of filing such appeal * * *; provided, however, that in any appeal pending when this section takes effect, judgment or [of] dismissal shall not be entered under the direction hereof sooner than January first, 1924."

Petitioner's contention is that, without reference to the length of time any appeal from the justice's court to the superior court may have been pending, the language of the section of the Code just quoted precludes the superior court from dismissing any such appeal until January 1, 1924—in other words, that, notwithstanding the general powers of the superior court under section 980 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which permits dismissals for failure to prosecute appeals, or for unnecessary delay in bringing an appeal to a hearing, the provisions of section 981a are a limitation upon such powers. Aside from the inherent power of the superior court to order a dismissal of an action which has not been diligently prosecuted, and which dismissal might be ordered, even in the absence of statutory authority as contained in section 980, Code of Civil Procedure, it will be noted that the statute under which petitioner claims immunity for its lack of diligence expressly provides that as to any pending appeal no judgment of dismissal shall be entered "under the direction" of such statute until January 1, 1924; that is to say, that the preceding provisions of such statute shall be no authority for the dismissal of any pending appeal until January 1, 1924.

[1] The statute does not purport to take from the court the general powers therein vested under the provisions of section 980 of the Code of Civil Procedure which authorizes dismissals for failure to prosecute appeals, as well as for unnecessary delays in bringing them to a hearing, much less does the statute under consideration appear to in any manner trench upon the concededly inherent power of the court to deal with such matters. The greater part of the force of the statute is expended in directing that no dismissal shall be had "under the direction" thereof until a certain fixed time has arrived; that is to say, that no appeal should be dismissed solely by virtue of this section (and having nothing to do with any similar right conferred by any other section, or through the inherent power of the court) before the time fixed by the statute. So far as the provisions of section 980, Code of Civil Procedure, are concerned, or as regards the inherent power of the court, the law relating to the dismissal of justice's court appeals is unaffected by any provision contained in section 981a.

The additional language of the statute under consideration, to the effect that "by existing rule or by rule hereafter to be enacted" the superior court may "provide for dismissal of such appeal within a time less than one year," constitutes further ground for assuming that the intention of the Legislature was to leave undisturbed the existing law with reference to the power of the court to dismiss such appeal. The apparent intention of the Legislature was to shorten the time within which an appellant must procure action to be taken on his appeal, and to give effect to the construction of the statute for which petitioner contends would be to thwart the evident purpose of the Legislature in enacting the statute. If the power given to the superior court by the provisions of section 980, Code of Civil Procedure, were taken away, an appeal which at the time the statute became effective had been pending for 10 years could not be dismissed for an additional period of several months, irrespective of manifestly deliberate failures to prosecute such appeals or unnecessary and intentional delays in bringing them to a hearing. Under section 980, Code of Civil Procedure, what constitutes "a failure to prosecute an appeal," or what length of time amounted to an "unnecessary delay in bringing it to a hearing," was somewhat elastic and indefinite, permitting much diversity of construction of such language; and while in the exercise of a sound discretion the circumstances of each case should be taken into consideration by the court in its determination of such questions, the necessity for greater uniformity with reference to such matters is recognized by the Legislature in its declaration that hereafter one year shall be considered as the outside limit within which (barring stipulations of counsel extending the time) final action on appeals must be taken.

[2] It is also apparent that the inevitable result of sustaining petitioner's contention with reference to the claimed limitation of section 981a, Code of Civil Procedure, upon the powers of the court as set forth in section 980, Code of Civil Procedure, would be the virtual repeal of that part of said section which may be in conflict with the provisions of section 981a, but the rule of law is that repeals by implication are not favored. It is only where the two statutes are irreconcilably inconsistent one with the other that such a repeal may be said to exist. Matter of Petition of Johnson, 167 Cal. 142, 138 Pac. 740; Fox v. Townsend, 2 Cal. App. 193, 83 Pac. 272; Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 Pac. 9, 18; People v. Pacific Improvement Co., 130 Cal. 442, 62 Pac. 739; People v. Sands, 102 Cal. 12, 36 Pac. 404; Thompson v. Board of Supervisors, 111 Cal. 553, 44 Pac. 230; Banks v. Yolo County, 104 Cal. 258, 37 Pac. 900.

[3] The second point raised by petitioner is that the judgment in the justice's court was void for the reason that such court had no jurisdiction to enter the judgment, but, without directly considering the point itself, it is clear that the superior court to which the appeal was taken had power to determine the matter as a question of law arising on such appeal.

[4] It is said in Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 380, 26 Pac. 206:

"This court will not, however, dismiss an appeal from a judgment of the superior court upon the ground that that court had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding when it has assumed such jurisdiction, and rendered an affirmative judgment therein. Our appellate jurisdiction over the judgments of the superior court includes those in which that court improperly assumed jurisdiction, as well as those in which it was properly entertained. It is revisory of the action of that court, and it is to be exercised by affirming, correcting, modifying, or setting aside its judgments; whereas, if the appeal therefrom is dismissed, the judgment would remain as originally pronounced."

See, also, Barnhart v. Fulkerth, 92 Cal. 155, 28 Pac. 221; Ritzman v. Burnham, 114 Cal. 524, 46 Pac. 379.

[5] Certiorari will not lie where a remedy by appeal exists. Section 1068, Code Civ. Proc.; Bennett v. Wallace, 43 Cal. 26; Wittman v. Police Court, 145 Cal. 474, 78 Pac. 1052; Anglo-Californian Bank v. Superior Court, 153 Cal. 753, 96 Pac. 803; Hildebrand v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 89, 159 Pac. 147; Baird v. Justice's Court, 11 Cal. App. 442, 105 Pac. 259; La Due v. Forbes, 19 Cal. App. 126, 124 Pac. 867.

[6] It is also well settled that certiorari will not lie where the right of appeal has been lost by laches. Bennett v. Wallace, 43 Cal. 25; Faut v. Mason, 47 Cal. 7; Valentine v. Police Court, 141 Cal. 615, 75 Pac. 336; Green v. Rogers, 18 Cal. App. 576, 123 Pac. 974.

It therefore follows that petitioner should be denied any relief. The writ is discharged.

COSTELLO v. SHARP. (Civ. 2622.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 5, 1924.)

1. Pleading ⚡93(2)—In action against adjoining owner to quiet title to right of way, defendant could interpose inconsistent defenses.

In action against adjoining owner to quiet title to a right of way, the defendant could defend on the ground that the plaintiff's use of the way was purely permissive, and could also defend on the ground that the right of way claimed by plaintiff was a public highway, under Pol. Code, § 2619, though defenses were inconsistent, since the defendant was at liberty to interpose, as in impeachment of the claim of the plaintiff to title to the way by prescription, as many defenses as he saw fit, however inconsistent they might be.

2. Appeal and error ⚡842(1)—Whether land used by adjoining owner as right of way was public road or private way question of fact.

In action against adjoining owner to quiet title to right of way, in which the defendant interposed the defense that the plaintiff's use of the way was purely permissive, and also the defense that the way was a public highway under Pol. Code, § 2619, the question of whether the road was a county road or a private way or neither was a question of fact for the trial court to resolve.

3. Appeal and error ⚡1012(1)—Rule stated as to effect of trial court's conclusion on question of fact.

Trial court's finding on question of fact will not be disturbed, unless the testimony from which its conclusion has been derived is palpably unbelievable, or the testimony is intrinsically lacking in the requisite strength to support it.

4. Easements ⚡5—Existence of elements of adverse possession necessary to establishment of easement by prescription.

To establish an easement in the lands of another by prescription, all the elements necessary to acquire title by adverse possession must be shown to exist, and it must therefore be made clearly to appear that the party claiming the easement has been, for the statutory period of 5 years under Code Civ. Proc. § 318, in actual occupation or possession and use of the easement, and has held such possession openly, continuously, and notoriously, not clandestinely; and that it has been held hostile to the title of the owner of the land in which the easement is asserted, and under a claim of title exclusive of any other right as one's own.

5. Easements ⚡36(1)—Rule as to burden of proof in action to establish easement by prescriptive title stated.

The party who claims an easement by prescriptive title has the burden of clearly proving by competent evidence all the elements essential to the establishment of such title, but, when the plaintiff has made a prima facie showing of a prescriptive title, it is incumbent on the defendant to show by sufficient affirmative proof that the use has been by virtue of a license or permission, or any other defense which would destroy the prima facie showing.

6. Easements ⚡36(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding of acquisition of right of way by prescription.

In action against adjoining owner to quiet title to right of way, in which plaintiff claimed an easement by prescriptive title, evidence held to sustain finding that plaintiff had acquired the right to use such right of way by prescription.

7. Easements ⚡36(3)—Prescriptive title may be established by or implied from circumstances.

A prescriptive title to an easement may be established by or implied from circumstances under which the use of such easement was enjoyed.

8. Estoppel ⚡63—Plaintiff's declarations that road was county road held not to preclude him from asserting easement therein by prescription.

In an action to quiet title to right of way over adjoining owner's land, wherein plaintiff claimed to have acquired an easement by prescription, his declarations that the locus in quo was a county road did not preclude him from obtaining the relief sought in such action, since such declarations constituted merely the statements of a legal conclusion, and the question of whether the road was or was not a county road was one for the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; C. J. Luttrell, Judge.

Action by J. W. Costello against W. W. Sharp. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. K. Collier and J. P. McNamara, both of Yreka, for appellant.

Chas. E. Johnson, of Yreka, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action to quiet title to a right of way. The plaintiff and the defendant are the owners of adjoining ranches. The plaintiff's ranch is known and referred to in the testimony as the "Marion ranch," one Joe Marion being the plaintiff's grantor or immediate predecessor in interest. The defendant's ranch is known and likewise referred to as the "Benton ranch," one Col. Benton having, a trifle over 4 years prior to the trial of this action, conveyed the same to the defendant.

The plaintiff claims an easement in a certain portion of the land of the defendant in the nature of a right of way, extending from his ranch to a point on the north side of a public or county road leading from the town of Fort Jones to the town of Gazelle, in Siskiyou county, and which is known and designated in the pleadings, the testimony, and the findings as the "Moffit Creek-Gazelle wagon road." The right of way in question is alleged in the complaint to be 20 feet wide, the same being 10 feet on each side of a center line specifically described in the complaint. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff "is now and for the past 20 years immediately preceding the filing of this complaint he has been, the owner, and the predecessors in interest of plaintiff were, for the period of 13 years or more immediately preceding the ownership of this plaintiff, the owners in possession, and entitled to the possession of" a private right of way over the lands of the defendant from his (defendant's) ranch to the above-named county road, describing the same. It is alleged that "defendant claims to be the exclusive owner of said way, and has obstructed the said right of way so that plaintiff cannot use the same, which claim, as against plaintiff, is without right."

The prayer is that defendant be required to set forth the nature of his claim, that the same be determined by the court, and that it be decreed that the plaintiff is the owner of the right of way described in the complaint, and for an injunction enjoining the defendant and all others from obstructing or otherwise interfering with said way.

The defendant in his answer, denies the allegations of plaintiff's ownership of a right of way over his (defendant's) lands, and admits that he claims to be owner of "all of his own land and of said purported way," and that he has obstructed the same; denies that "plaintiff cannot use the same, and, in this connection, states the fact to be that he has given plaintiff permission to use said purported way and to pass over his said lands as long as plaintiff will close the gates thereon."

The court's findings are in accord with the averments of the complaint, except in so far as is concerned the width of the right of way, as to which it was found:

"That plaintiff is owner and entitled to a private way over the lands of the defendant, 16 feet wide, being 8 feet on each side of the center line described in paragraph 1 of these findings, the said width of said private right of way being sufficient for the convenience or use by said plaintiff to pass and repass on foot, with teams, wagons, and automobiles."

The conclusions of law and the judgment consist with the findings. The injunctive element of the decree is both mandatory and prohibitory.

The defendant appeals from the said decree or judgment upon a record made up according to the alternative method.

The general contention is that the findings are not supported by the evidence. The specific contentions are that the testimony shows that plaintiff's acts and conduct are incompatible with the claim of the acquisition of a private right of way by prescription; that plaintiff's use of the road or way in controversy was by the permission of the defendant and his predecessors in interest; that the said road became a public highway by virtue of the terms of section 2619 of the Political Code, and that therefore the plaintiff could not acquire a private right of way over said road by prescription. The section of the Political Code referred to provides:

"Whenever the franchise for any tollbridge, trail, turnpike, plank or common wagon-road has expired by limitation or non-user, such bridge, trail, turnpike, plank or common wagon-road becomes a free public highway; and no claim shall be valid against the public for right of way, or for the land, or material comprising such bridge, trail, turnpike, plank or common wagon-road. All public highways, once established, shall continue to be public highways until abandoned by order of the board of supervisors of the county in which they are situated, or by operation of law, or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction."

[1] The contention that the plaintiff's use of the way in question was purely permissive and as a neighborly accommodation is inconsistent with the contention that the road in dispute became a highway upon the presumption of its dedication as such from immemorial or the statutory prescriptive use thereof by the general public, or became such in the manner indicated by the above section of the Political Code, since if it is a highway or county road, by whatsoever means it became such, the plaintiff's use thereof was, in common with the public, as a matter of right and not of grace or by the permission of the owner of the lands over and through which it runs. The defendant, though, was at liberty to interpose, as in impeachment of the claim of plaintiff to title to the way by prescription, as many defenses as he saw fit, howsoever inconsistent they might be.

[2, 3] Obviously, whether the road in dispute was or is a county road or a private way, or neither, is a question of fact which it was for the trial court to resolve, and its decision of the question must remain undisturbed, unless the testimony from which its conclusion has been derived is palpably unbelievable, or we are forced to say from the face of the testimony that it is intrinsically lacking in the requisite strength to support it.

[4, 5] It is well understood that it is essential, to establish an easement in the lands of another by prescription, all the elements necessary to acquire title by adverse possession must be shown to exist. It must therefore be made clearly to appear that the party claiming the easement has been, for the statutory period of 5 years (section 318, Code Civ. Proc.), in actual occupation or possession and use of the easement, and held such possession openly, continuously, and notoriously, not clandestinely; that it has been held hostile to the title of the owner of the land in which the easement is asserted, and under a claim of title, exclusive of any other right, as one's own. Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 456, 12 Pac. 491; Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 Pac. 10; Pyramid Land, etc., Co. v. Scott, 51 Cal. App. 634, 646, 197 Pac. 398; Ricioli v. Lynch et al. (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 88. And upon the party claiming the easement by prescriptive title rests the burden to clearly prove by competent evidence all the elements essential to the establishment of such title. Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 Pac. 10, supra; Pyramid Land, etc., Co. v. Scott, 51 Cal. App. 634, 646, 197 Pac. 398, supra; Ricioli v. Lynch et al. supra. On the other hand, when the plaintiff, claiming the easement by adverse user, has made a prima facie showing of a prescriptive title to the easement, then it is incumbent upon the defendant, by sufficient affirmative proof, to show that the use has been by virtue of a license or permission, or any other defense which would destroy the prima facie showing of title made by the plaintiff. Fleming v. Howard, 150 Cal. 28, 30, 87 Pac. 908; Washburn on Easements (4th Ed.) p. 156; 14 Cyc. of L. & P. 1147; Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 66, 11 Pac. 879; Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 209, 63 Pac. 361; Guernsey v. Antelope Creek, etc., W. Co., 6 Cal. App. 387, 92 Pac. 326; Yuba Cons. Goldfields v. Hilton, 16 Cal. App. 229, 116 Pac. 712, 715; Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 457, 12 Pac. 491, supra; Ricioli v. Lynch (Cal. App.) 223 Pac. 88, supra. And, upon a prima facie showing of title by the plaintiff, it is solely the province of the trial court to determine whether the same has or has not been overcome or dispelled by evidence presented by the defendant.

[6] By the foregoing principles the testimony received in the case must be considered. At the outset it is just as well to say that a careful review of the evidence has convinced us that there is no justification for holding that, as a matter of law, the findings do not derive sufficient support from the evidence.

The plaintiff acquired the land to which the road in dispute leads from the county road mentioned in the month of May, 1901, from one Joe Marion, and from that time down to the trial of this action, in the month of May, 1923, owned and, with the exception of a brief period during which he was engaged in erecting a new home for residential purposes, resided with his family thereon. This covered a period of 20 years. Other than plaintiff and members of his family, there were eight witnesses, residents of the neighborhood of the Costello and Sharp ranches practically all their lives, who testified that the road in question was and had been for upwards of 40 years a well-defined road; that they had themselves traveled over it in going to the Costello ranch, and had often seen the plaintiff passing back and forth over it, sometimes hauling wood and hay on said road. Marion, the predecessor in interest of the plaintiff, testified that, during the greater part of the 13 years he owned the Costello place, a man named Benton owned the defendant's ranch; that during all those years he (Marion) exclusively used the road in dispute for the purpose of going from and to his (now the Costello) ranch; that Benton, then owner of the Sharp ranch, knew that he (Marion) was using said road; that, while he never had any conversation with Benton on the subject, the latter never at any time made any objection to his (Marion's) use of the road, or denied his right to use it, nor did he ever erect a fence or put any other obstruction on or in the road; that he was still using the road when he transferred his land to the plaintiff, and never knew of any obstruction being put in the road until within a couple of years before the trial of the present action, when, on one or two occasions, he observed that a fence and some gates had been erected thereon. He testified that within a few weeks prior to the trial he saw the road in question, and that it was the same road he had always used when he owned the Costello ranch.

Frank Sharp, a brother of the defendant, testified that he had known the road for upwards of 20 years; that it was a well-defined wagon road; that he never knew of any obstruction being placed in the road until in very recent years, when a controversy arose between plaintiff and defendant upon the question whether the road constituted a private or any way.

The plaintiff testified that the road in dispute was in existence and a well-defined wagon road when he acquired and took possession of the Marion ranch; that he had used said road exclusively, under a claim of right, from the time he acquired his ranch from said Marion until the time of the trial; that for a number of years after he became the owner of said ranch Col. Benton was the owner of and resided on the ranch now owned by the defendant; that Benton knew that he (plaintiff) was using said road and no other in going from and to his ranch; that Benton never made any objection to such use of the road by plaintiff, and, in fact, never discussed the matter of the use of the road with him; that the road was in existence and being used by him (plaintiff) when defendant bought and took possession of the Benton ranch; that his use of the road was for 20 years continuous, and his right to its use was never in all that time questioned until a couple of years after the defendant became the owner of the Benton ranch; that defendant about 4 years prior to the trial, erected a fence across the road, but left an opening therein of sufficient size to admit of the passage through it of a wagon or an automobile; that later and within a year or two of the date of the trial the defendant closed the opening by placing a gate therein; that plaintiff thereupon cut an opening in the fence so that he could pass through; that he (plaintiff) often did repair work on the road, and kept it in a condition for his usual use of it; that defendant at all times knew that he used the road in going from and to his farm, himself assisted the plaintiff in moving to his ranch immediately after he acquired it, and in so doing passed over said road; that on one occasion the defendant offered to build him (plaintiff) another road connecting with the Moffit Creek-Gazelle county road and leading to his ranch, but that he (defendant) made no reply to the proposition. The plaintiff further testified that, after the defendant erected a fence across the road, he made a complaint to the district attorney about the obstruction of the road, and that he was advised by that official to bring the matter to the attention of the board of supervisors; that the district attorney in an informal way brought the matter before the board, and the defendant was thereupon notified by said board to appear before it and present reasons for his action in closing the road; that a hearing was subsequently had, and the said board thereupon notified the defendant in writing that the road was a public or county highway, and at the same time ordered him to remove the fence from across the road and not to obstruct it so as to prevent its use by the public.

The plaintiff's wife, and also two sons, one of the latter being 19 and the other 20 years of age, corroborated the plaintiff's testimony as to the continuous and uninterrupted use of the road by plaintiff for 20 years (by the wife) and (by the sons) for about 15 years.

The defendant, testifying in his own behalf, admitted that the road was in existence and was being used by plaintiff when, some 4 years previously to the trial, he (defendant) acquired ownership and took possession of the Benton ranch; that there was no fence maintained across said road at the time he located on the Benton ranch, but that he built a fence across it a short time thereafter; that the fence remained across the road for a short time only, when the plaintiff "cut" an opening in it; that plaintiff never complained to him about the fence until the matter was brought before the supervisors by plaintiff. Defendant denied proposing to plaintiff that he (defendant) would build another road for him (plaintiff) to be used in the place of the road in controversy. He testified that, at the hearing before the supervisors, the plaintiff repeatedly stated that the road was a county road. He further testified that some "10 or 12 years ago" the general public traveled over the road in going to and returning from certain copper mines then being worked some distance beyond the Costello place.

The witness Taber, testifying for defendant, stated that at some time prior to the hearing before the board of supervisors and at the house of the witness the plaintiff declared to the witness that the road was a public or county highway. A number of other persons testified that at the hearing before the board of supervisors they heard the plaintiff declare that the road in question was a county road.

M. F. Barnum, a member of the board of supervisors of Siskiyou county, testified that the board ordered defendant to remove the fence he erected across the road, but later gave him permission to maintain the fence, with gates at the ends of the road. On cross-examination Barnum testified, in effect, that all that the supervisors knew about the road being a county road was what the parties had said relative to the matter when the hearing referred to was had. He testified that the board made no other investigation for the purpose of determining whether the road was a county road than such inquiry as was had at said hearing, which, as the evidence shows, was of an informal character or consisted of the unsworn statements, pro and con, of the parties to this controversy.

In rebuttal the plaintiff testified that he asked the district attorney to take such legal steps as would result in keeping the road open; that he did not testify before the board of supervisors at the hearing referred to; that he always knew that the road was a private and not a county road, and (in effect) that, if any confusion in that regard occurred at the hearing, it was wholly due to a misunderstanding of his position by the district attorney, who presented the matter for him before the board.

The foregoing statement of the evidence embodies a recital in substance of all the salient facts brought out at the trial.

[7] It will not be doubted that a prescriptive title to an easement may be established by or implied from circumstances under which the use of such easement was enjoyed. Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 460, 12 Pac. 493; Humphreys v. Blasingame, 104 Cal. 40, 42, 37 Pac. 804, 805. "The question is one for the jury, or for the court sitting as such, to determine as a fact, in the light of the relations between the parties and all the surrounding circumstances." Id. That the plaintiff, by the circumstances developed by the testimony presented by him, made out at least a prima facie title in himself to the easement asserted and claimed by him in this action seems to us to be so clear as to leave no ground for legitimate controversy. To confirm this conclusion it is necessary only to refer, by way of recapitulation, to the following facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence he produced: That the road was in existence and had been continuously used for 13 years by his immediate predecessor in interest, with the knowledge of the predecessor in interest of the defendant, when he (plaintiff) became the owner and took possession of the Marion ranch; that plaintiff from the time he became the own er of the Marion ranch continued to use the road, as it had been used by his predecessor, with the knowledge of Benton, the defendant's grantor or predecessor in interest, for many years before the defendant acquired the Benton property (the servient estate), and continued to use it as he always had after Sharp bought the Benton property, with the knowledge of Sharp, and without ever asking the latter's permission to use it; that plaintiff kept the road in repair; that Sharp once proposed to him that he would build another road for plaintiff, to be used by the latter for the same purposes as he was required to use the road in dispute; that plaintiff, under a claim of right to the way, cut an opening in the fence erected by the defendant across the road so as to enable him to use the road for the usual purposes to which he had for over 15 years continuously put it. These facts and circumstances, viewed alone according to their face value, seem clearly to reveal or imply all the essential elements of a prescriptive title in the plaintiff in the defendant's land for the purpose claimed by the former. In fact, the circumstances and facts specifically adverted to, in the absence of countervailing proof of such force as to overcome their probative effect, are sufficient to justify the conclusion that plaintiff acquired a prescriptive title to a private way over defendant's land long before the defendant acquired ownership of the Benton ranch.

The case of Humphreys v. Blasingame, 104 Cal. 40, 43, 37 Pac. 804, 805, supra, is, as to the facts, strikingly similar to the instant case, and the following discussion of the facts in that case is peculiarly pertinent to the facts of this:

"We think the evidence sufficient to support the finding that the way was used by plaintiff for more than the statutory period under a claim of right, and that the use was not merely permissive. He had used it 5 years or more before defendant acquired the property, and was so using it when defendant acquired it. The use could not, therefore, have originated in defendant's permission, either express or implied, and the fact that defendant made no objection, nor any inquiry as to plaintiff's right, is quite as significant of an admission of such right as it is of a mere permissive use, whilst the fact that plaintiff never asked permission to use the way is at least suggestive of a claim of right to use it."

Thus far the testimony presented by the plaintiff has alone been considered. As to the support which the defendant attempted to give to his several defenses, it is only necessary to repeat that it was wholly the function of the trial court to determine whether he had succeeded in breaking down the prima facie case made by the plaintiff.

Its decision upon that question, as evidenced by its findings, is conclusive upon this court.

As to the claim of the defendant that the evidence shows that the road is a county road, it is to be said that there is no testimony in this record which shows or tends to show that the public authorities of Siskiyou county ever regarded or, until the hearing above referred to, attempted to recognize, the road as a county road. There is no testimony that the supervisors or the supervisor and ex officio road superintendent of the district in which the road is located ever did any repair or other work of improvement on, or attempted to exercise any authority over, the road until the hearing before the board following the controversy between Costello and Sharp as to the legal character or status of the road, and the only supervisor testifying at the trial said that the board did not know that it was a county road. There is no evidence that a considerable number of people had ever had occasion to use the road except for a year or two some 12 years before the commencement of this action, during which the development of some copper mines had been attempted and that those engaged in such development passed back and forth over the road. There is absolutely no evidence in this record showing or tending to show that there had ever existed a franchise for the maintenance of the road as a toll road.

[8] Plaintiff's alleged declarations that the road was a county road amounted to no more than a legal conclusion. While testimony that he had made such statements was perhaps admissible as tending to impeach his testimony that he had always claimed title to a private way over the road, the testimony of such declarations could not perform the office of substantive proof of the legal character of the road. As was said in the case of Humphreys v. Blasingame, supra, referring to the testimony of the plaintiff therein that he supposed that the difficulties of reaching his land by any other route were such as gave him a right of way of necessity across defendant's land rather than a right of prescription:

"That he [plaintiff] was mistaken upon a question of law does not affect the fact that he claimed a right to cross defendant's land by a road which he found in existence when he purchased the 160-acre tract."

In other words, the question whether the road was or was not a county road was one for decision by the court and not by the witnesses.

The judgment is affirmed.

BEVANS v. HUNTINGTON et al. (Civ. 2738.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 14, 1924.)

Contracts ⇨236—New contract for construction of canal held not invalid as an oral modification of former written contract.

Where a written contract for the construction of a canal was not for the construction of any definite section, but only to do excavation work indefinitely at a given price per yard, either party had the right to terminate the contract at any time and, having done so by mutual consent, a new oral agreement for the construction of the remainder of the canal was not invalid as being an oral modification of the written contract without consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by James Bevans against V. E. Gunter and J. A. Huntington, in which both defendants filed cross-complaints. From a judgment for plaintiff against said Huntington, and for defendant Gunter against said Huntington, the latter appeals. Affirmed.

Raymond A. Leonard, of Oroville, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Andrew J. Lloyd, of Oroville, for appellant.

W. E. Davies and R. R. Raish, both of Marysville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendant Huntington. The parties entered into a written contract containing the following terms:

"Whereas, said J. A. Huntington, party of the first part, has entered into a contract with Cordua Irrigation District to build and construct a main irrigation canal according to plans and specifications attached to said contract; and

"Whereas, the said V. E. Gunter and James Bevans, parties of the second part, are desirous of taking and entering into a subcontract with said J. A. Huntington for the construction of a part of said main canal, according to said plans and specifications:

"Therefore it is hereby agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said V. E. Gunter and James Bevans, the parties of the second part, may and will commence the construction of that part of the main canal, beginning at the west end thereof and working eastward, for the consideration of the sum of 30 cents per cubic yard of excavation and borrowed embankment."

After a certain quantity of work had been done under the subcontract, hardpan was encountered, and Gunter informed Huntington that "it would be impossible * * * to continue with the contract on account of this hard ground," and Huntington replied: "I don't expect you to. * * * I do want you to help me finish this main canal, and I will pay you wages for it." Gunter agreed to the proposition, and so informed Bevans. The remainder of the work was performed under the oral contract thus entered into, and the suit is based thereon.

Appellant contends that the new contract was invalid as an attempted oral modification of a written contract without consideration. The written contract was not for the construction of any definite section of the canal or for any given quantity of work or for work to be continued for any given time, but only to do excavation work indefinitely at a given price per yard. Either party had the right to terminate the contract at any time. When Gunter informed Huntington that the former would no longer continue the work under the terms of the contract, the agreement came to an end. The rights of the parties to terminate the contract were no different than if the employment had been merely at a given price per day. After the parties had abandoned the written contract by mutual consent, there was nothing to prevent them from entering into a valid oral contract, as the court found that they did. There is no other point raised by the appeal which merits attention.

The judgment is affirmed.

BRADLEY v. THOMPSON. (Civ. 4325.)

1. Negligence ⇨113(7)—Complaint based on theory of attractive nuisance must negative trespass.

Since the doctrine of the turntable and attractive nuisance cases is an exception to the general rule that a property owner owes no duty to trespassers except not to willfully or intentionally inflict injury upon them, where action is brought for injuries to a child sustained while trespassing on defendant's premises, plaintiff seeking to invoke such doctrine must allege all facts necessary to remove the effect of the trespass as an objection to recovery.

2. Explosives ⇨8—Allegations necessary in complaint based on theory of attractive nuisance where child guilty of more than technical trespass.

Where a complaint alleged that a newsboy 11 years old while delivering newspaper at defendant's farm removed a dynamite cap from a colored tin box placed in shed near the public road, and was later injured by its explosion, his moral turpitude in surreptitiously taking property of another precluded application of the doctrine of the turntable and attractive nuisance cases, in the absence of an allegation showing that he was ignorant of the moral quality of his act, such as that he was deficient in understanding and did not realize the culpability of his conduct; the presumption that a boy under 14 years of age is incapable of committing crime being a rule of evidence, not of pleading.

3. Explosives — Complaint for injuries to child based on attractive nuisance theory held insufficient.

A complaint alleging that defendant placed dynamite caps used on his farm $1\frac{1}{4}$ miles from town in a colored tin box in his shed located near the public road, and that plaintiff, a newsboy 11 years old, removed one while delivering defendant's paper, and was later injured by its explosion, but not alleging that defendant knew or had reason to believe that the caps would prove attractive to boys of plaintiff's age and mental capacity, nor that defendant knew or had reason to believe that children of the class to which plaintiff belonged would be so lacking in moral discernment as to be tempted to purloin such caps, did not allege facts sufficient to charge defendant with negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Elden Bradley, a minor, by Mabel Bradley, his guardian ad litem, against J. C. Thompson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Raymond W. Stewart and Lyle W. Ruckert, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Drapeau, Orr & Gardner, of Ventura, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff, a boy 11 years of age, brought this action to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. He claims that his asserted right of recovery is justified by the doctrine of the turntable and attractive nuisance cases. Defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, judgment for defendant was entered accordingly, and plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges, in substance, the following: Plaintiff was injured as the result of the explosion of a dynamite cap which he had taken from a tin box found by him on defendant's premises—a parcel of land about one-quarter of a mile north of the town of Moorpark, Ventura county, and upon which defendant intended planting apricot trees. A quantity of dynamite caps had been purchased by defendant for the purpose of blasting holes in his land in which to plant the trees. A number of the caps having been thus used by defendant, the unused ones were deposited in a brass-colored tin box which defendant caused to be placed on one of the crossbeams, about three feet from the ground, which supported a shed on his premises. The shed, which rested on posts reinforced by the crossbeams, was located a few feet from a public road along which plaintiff and other children and persons, with defendant's knowledge and consent, had been accustomed to travel for some time prior to the day on which the accident occurred. The tin box, so placed on the crossbeam with its dangerous contents, was about one foot in depth, was uncovered, unprotected, and unguarded. "Defendant, well knowing said dynamite caps to be dangerous and attractive to children, negligently placed [them] upon the said crossbeam * * * and within easy reach of pedestrians traveling upon said road." Plaintiff, while traveling along the public road for the purpose of delivering a newspaper at defendant's house, "was attracted by said tin box containing said dynamite caps, because of its color, condition, appearance, and surroundings." It is not alleged that plaintiff was upon defendant's premises with the latter's knowledge and consent. The allegation is that plaintiff and other children and persons "traveled along said road" with defendant's knowledge and consent. It is alleged that plaintiff, a lad of 11 years, "was then and there too young and inexperienced to foresee the danger which might result from said dynamite caps contained in said tin box," and that he was "wholly ignorant of the dangerous character and composition" thereof. He took some of the caps from the box while it rested on the crossbeam, and in the course of his play one of the caps exploded, causing the injuries for which he seeks damages.

Appellant, as we have stated, claims that the case presented by his complaint is within the principle of the turntable and attractive nuisance cases—a principle which has been applied in such cases as Barrett v. Southern Pacific Co., 91 Cal. 296, 27 Pac. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186; Cahill v. Stone, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 571, 96 Pac. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094; Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 Pac. 700; and Faylor v. Great Eastern, etc., M. Co., 45 Cal. App. 194, 187 Pac. 101. The doctrine has been stated in the following terms:

"One who places an attractive but dangerous contrivance in a place frequented by children, and knowing, or having reason to believe, that children will be attracted to it and subjected to injury thereby, owes the duty of exercising ordinary care to prevent such injury to them, and this because he is charged with knowledge of the fact that children are likely to be attracted thereto and are usually unable to foresee, comprehend, and avoid the danger into which he thus knowingly allures them." Cahill v. Stone, supra.

[1] The doctrine of the turntable and attractive nuisance cases is an exception to the general rule that a property owner owes no duty to trespassers except not willfully or intentionally to inflict an injury upon them. Inasmuch as the injury caused by the offending instrumentality in this class of cases is the result of a trespass committed by the child, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to obviate what otherwise would be the legal consequences of the trespass by alleging and proving all the facts which are necessary to remove the effect of the trespass as an objection to a recovery. From the complaint in this case it appears that plaintiff was a trespasser upon defendant's premises and that he purloined the dynamite caps; also that but for such trespass and misappropriation of the caps he would not have been injured. It behooves plaintiff, therefore, to allege all the facts necessary to remove that objection to a recovery and thus bring his case within the principle of the attractive nuisance cases. If his complaint does not allege every fact necessary to obviate the consequences of his own tortious conduct, it fails to remove the objection that his own fault or negligence was a proximate, contributory cause of his injuries. The question, therefore, is: Does plaintiff's complaint allege all the facts necessary to remove the effect of his own culpable conduct as a bar to a recovery?

In many, if not most, of the attractive nuisance cases the injury is the result of but a mere technical trespass upon the defendant's property, and the only wrong which the child commits is in the use of the dangerous instrumentality or appliance. That is to say, usually the injury occurs while the child is playing with or upon the turntable or other dangerous or attractive contrivance. It may well be expected that the sportive and playful instincts of children will cause them to be attracted to some object upon or about which they can play, even though they have to trespass upon private property in order to accomplish the object of their venturesome daring. For not only is it true that young children, as a rule, are unable to appreciate the perils embodied in dangerous contrivances to which they are attracted, but it is equally true that, generally speaking, such children, in their thoughtless eagerness for play, do not possess a lively sense of the moral tortiousness of their conduct if it does not exceed the limits of a mere technical trespass upon private property, i. e., if their conduct, though involving the unauthorized use of another person's property as a plaything, stops short of actual theft or of the unlawful misappropriation of the property of another.

[2] In the instant case there was in plaintiff's conduct something more than a mere technical trespass. Here the child, though 11 years old, and presumably possessing the average understanding of a boy of that age, committed an act of grave moral turpitude by appropriating defendant's property. It may be conceded that, had this element of wrongdoing been absent from the case, and had there been naught but a mere technical trespass upon defendant's premises, all question as to plaintiff's immaturity of intelligence and foresight—such immaturity as would have sufficed to excuse his conduct and to avoid the consequences of his own thoughtless trespassing upon the property of another—would have been foreclosed by those averments in the complaint which allege, in substance, that plaintiff was attracted to the tin box because of its color, condition, appearance, and surroundings, and that he was "too young and inexperienced to foresee the danger" which might result from playing with the dynamite caps. Cahill v. Stone, etc., Co., supra, p. 577 (96 Pac. 84). But since the injury was the direct result of plaintiff's speculation as well as of his trespass upon defendant's land, the complaint should have contained some averment which would have sufficed to show that this 11 year old boy was ignorant of the moral turpitude involved in his conduct—such an averment, for example, as that he was deficient in understanding and that therefore he did not realize the culpability of his conduct in making free with another's property. True, a boy under 14 years of age is prima facie presumed to be incapable of committing crime (Pen. Code, § 26); but this is a rule of evidence, not a rule of pleading, and it does not dispense with some allegation sufficient to show that the child did not appreciate the moral iniquity of his conduct where, as here, the complaint discloses that the injury was the result of his surreptitious taking of property which did not belong to him.

As we view the case it is ruled by the decision in Nicolosi v. Clark, 169 Cal. 746, 147 Pac. 971, L. R. A. 1915F, 638. There the plaintiff, a boy 10 years of age, purloined dynamite caps from a tool box which the defendant had left in a street where he had been lawfully engaged in excavating a sewer trench. There, as here, the complaint alleged that the child being of tender years, was attracted by the open box and was prompted by childish curiosity; that he was "wholly ignorant of the dangerous character and composition of said dynamite caps"; and that, "without fault or negligence on his part" he took from the box "one of said dynamite caps, and while handling the same the said dynamite cap exploded" and injured him. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state a cause of action. The trial court sustained the demurrer, and our Supreme Court, holding that the demurrer was properly sustained, expressed itself as follows:

"The mere fact that plaintiff in such an action as this is of tender years does not require that the alleged cause of action be submitted to the jury to determine whether or not the plaintiff, through negligence or other cause, was himself so in fault as to destroy his right of action. Where the facts, as here, are set forth in the complaint, the question is one of law. If the complaint clearly establishes plaintiff's negligence in point of law, the demurrer was properly sustained. * * * In the case at bar the plaintiff was clearly guilty of trespass, if not of pecculation. If a boy of ten years of age is not chargeable with knowledge that he has no right to make free with the contents of a box placed such as this, manifestly a box belonging to other people and containing their goods, it can only be because that particular boy is of deficient intellect and understanding. But this is not alleged. Not being alleged, we hold it plain as a proposition of law, that he was guilty of an unwarranted trespass, barring his right of recovery."

[3] Moreover, the complaint in this case does not allege facts sufficient to charge defendant with negligence. To make out a case of negligence on the part of the defendant in this class of cases facts must be alleged showing that the defendant knew, or ought to have known, that children of the class to which the plaintiff belongs would be likely to use the dangerous instrumentality in the manner which caused the injury. The question in every case is whether the injury might have been anticipated or foreseen had the defendant exercised the care and forethought of a reasonably prudent person. 20 R. C. L. pp. 83, 84, title "Negligence," par. 73. In Gates v. Northern Pacific Ry. Co., 37 Mont. 103, 94 Pac. 751, Mr. Justice Holloway, in a carefully considered concurring opinion, says:

"I think such landowner should be held liable to the injured child only in a case presenting all of the following facts: (1) That the injured child was too young and inexperienced to appreciate the danger, and was therefore incapable of contributory negligence. (2) That the injury was caused by an unguarded, dangerous machine, or other dangerous thing peculiarly attractive to children of the class to which the injured one belongs. (3) That the landowner impliedly invited children of that class to come upon his premises." (Italics ours.)

In the instant case there is nothing in the complaint to justify the inference that defendant knew, or had reason to believe, that a boy of 11 years, of average intelligence and possessing the moral sense usual in a lad of that age, would enter defendant's close and purloin these dynamite caps. The only allegation respecting defendant's knowledge is that "defendant, well knowing said dynamite caps to be dangerous and attractive to children," negligently placed them upon the crossbeam. It is not even alleged that defendant knew, or had reason to believe, that the caps would be attractive to children of plaintiff's class. They might be attractive to "children," as the complaint alleges; they might be attractive to children of 7 years or less, or even to some older children or to children of deficient mentality; and yet they might not be attractive to a normal boy of 11 years of age. It is not enough that defendant's conduct might have constituted negligence with respect to some children. To justify a recovery against this defendant facts must be alleged and proved which show that his conduct constituted negligence with respect to this particular boy and not with respect to some other child or children. But not only is this complaint deficient in failing to allege that defendant knew or had reasons to believe that the caps would prove attractive to boys of plaintiff's age and mental capacity, it is deficient in failing to allege facts showing that defendant knew, or had reason to believe, that children of the class to which plaintiff belongs would be so lacking in moral discernment as to be tempted to purloin these dynamite caps. While the caps and the tin box in which they were contained were left in such a way that a thief might not find it difficult to reach them, it cannot be said, from the facts alleged, that defendant was bound to anticipate that a normal boy of the age of this plaintiff might surreptitiously appropriate what was so evidently the property of another.

The judgment is affirmed.

SAKURAI v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4562.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 15, 1924.)

1. Guardian and ward ⚡17—Order appointing guardian when made and entered becomes decree.

An order appointing a guardian when duly made and entered becomes a decree of the court.

2. Guardian and ward ⚡15—Court's duty to approve bond when order appointing guardian valid.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1393, 1808, it is the duty of the court when a valid order of appointment of a guardian has been made to approve a duly executed bond with sufficient sureties when such bond is made in compliance with the terms of the order of appointment.

3. Guardian and ward ⚡10—Act disqualifying person ineligible to guardianship held not to interfere with guardian properly appointed.

Since Code Civ. Proc. § 1751a as added by St. 1923, p. 584, providing that no person ineligible to citizenship may be appointed guardian of any estate in real property, cannot be construed as interfering with the qualification of any guardian under a valid order of appointment, it does not authorize the court's refusal to approve a surety bond of a guardian made in compliance with the terms of the order appointing him.

4. Mandamus ☞28—Lies to compel inferior tribunal to exercise discretion exercisable in but one way.

If vested discretion can be legally exercised in but one way, mandamus will lie to compel the inferior tribunal so to exercise it.

5. Guardian and ward ☞18—Vacating order appointing guardian unauthorized.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1801, providing procedure on notice for the removal of a guardian where cause for such removal exists, where order for appointment of guardian of a minor had been duly entered and became a decree, an order vacating and setting aside the original order after the expiration of time within which an appeal might have been taken was unauthorized.

Application for writ of mandate by Mary Sakurai, by T. Sakurai, her guardian ad litem, and another, against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for Los Angeles County, and Victor R. McLucas, Judge. Writ granted.

Louis B. Stanton, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, and Louis P. Boardman, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. On petition for writ of mandate. It is conceded by respondents that prior to the 16th day of August, 1923, it was lawful for the superior court in a proper case to appoint as guardian of an estate any suitable person, notwithstanding that such person was ineligible to citizenship in the United States. Section 1751a of the Code of Civil Procedure was added to that Code by an amendment which became effective August 16, 1923. Stats. 1923, p. 584. That section provides that—

"No person ineligible to citizenship in the United States * * * may be appointed guardian of any estate which consists in whole or in part of real property."

On the 8th day of August, 1923, pursuant to proceedings leading thereto in due form, the superior court of Los Angeles county made and entered in its minutes an order that T. Sakurai be appointed guardian of the estate of Mary Sakurai, and that letters of guardianship be issued accordingly upon his taking the oath as required by law and giving bond to said minor in the sum of $1,000. The said Mary Sakurai is a minor child born of Japanese parents in the state of California, and is the owner of real property situate in the county of Los Angeles. The said T. Sakurai is a native and subject of the empire of Japan and is not eligible to citizenship in the United States. He is the father of the petitioner herein, the said Mary Sakurai.

On the 18th day of August, 1923, the said T. Sakurai presented for approval of the judge of the superior court in the department where said order of appointment of guardian had been made a bond as required by said order, which bond, with sufficient sureties, was executed in due form as the guardian's bond in accordance with the terms of section 1754 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The judge has refused to approve said bond, basing such refusal solely upon the fact of the status of said T. Sakurai as an alien ineligible to citizenship in the United States, and upon the ground that by reason of the provisions of section 1751a, Code of Civil Procedure, he was precluded from approving such bond. Thereupon said Mary Sakurai presented to this court her petition for a writ of mandate to compel respondent court to approve said bond.

[1, 2] An order appointing a guardian, when duly made and entered, becomes a decree of the court. The provisions of the Code relative to the estates of decedents in so far as they relate to practice in the superior court apply to proceedings under the chapter relating to guardian and ward. Code Civ. Proc. § 1808. Section 1393 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to bonds of executors and administrators, provides that all such bonds must be approved by a judge of the superior court before being filed. Reading together the above-mentioned sections, it clearly is the duty of the court, when a valid order of appointment of a guardian has been made, to approve a duly executed bond with sufficient sureties when such bond is made in compliance with the terms of the order appointing the guardian. The order here in question was a complete decree of the court prior to the 16th day of August, 1923. Nothing remained to give it all the force and effect of any decree of court. So far as the appointment of the guardian was concerned, the judicial action was finished. The qualification of the guardian by presenting and filing a sufficient bond and by taking the oath of office were not a part of the order of appointment, but were only proceedings required to be taken for the purpose of carrying into effect the decree as made and entered. There is nothing contained in section 1751a, Code of Civil Procedure, which purports to interfere or can properly be construed as interfering with the qualification of any guardian under a valid order of appointment.

[3, 4] We therefore are of the opinion that the provisions of section 1751a furnish no valid excuse for the refusal of the judge to approve the bond. No other excuse is offered, since it is not denied that the bond was in due form and with sufficient sureties.

It is well settled that mandamus will issue to correct an abuse of discretion in such a case. If the vested discretion under the facts can be legally exercised in but one way, mandate will lie to compel the inferior tribunal so to exercise it. Newlands v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 741, 744, 154 Pac. 829.

[5] In the return to the alternative writ of mandate herein respondents state that at a session of said superior court duly held on November 26, 1923, the court entered an order vacating and setting aside the order of August 8, 1923, and placed upon its calendar for further hearing the matter of the appointment of a guardian of said minor's estate. This order appears to have been made ex parte, not only after the order of August 8th had been duly entered and thus had become a decree of court, but also after the expiration of the time within which an appeal from the order of appointment might have been taken. The Code provides a procedure upon notice for the removal of a guardian where cause for such removal exists. Code Civ. Proc. § 1801. We find no authority in law for the arbitrary vacation by the superior court of a valid decree once entered by its order.

Let the preemptory writ issue.

VAIL v. NICHIBEI BUSSAN CO. et al.
(Civ. 4687.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Dec. 26, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Feb. 21, 1924.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances — Burden upon creditor to bring himself within Civ. Code, § 3440.

The burden is upon him seeking the benefits thereof to bring himself within the purview of Civ. Code, § 3440, relating to fraudulent transfers of personal property, and prescribing the effect as evidence of fraud of a want of immediate delivery and continued change of possession.

2. Fraudulent conveyances — Burden on plaintiff of showing lack of change of possession and control held not sustained.

In an action under Civ. Code, § 3440, to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance of merchandise, where defendant testified that, while owner of the merchandise in question he "took in some new partners who are the same men that are with me today," the fact that he did not state that these men took actual possession of the property or exercised any dominion over same, held, not sufficient to sustain the burden resting on plaintiff to prove his contention that defendant had remained individually in possession and control of the property until the time of the alleged fraudulent transfer by the partnership to a corporation of which defendant became manager.

3. Evidence — In absence of evidence, finding should be against party having burden of proof.

Where no evidence is introduced upon an issue, a finding thereon should be against the party having the burden of proof.

4. Fraudulent conveyances — What constitutes delivery and continued change of possession under statute questions of fact.

Under Civ. Code, § 3440, relating to fraudulent transfers of personalty and making want of immediate delivery and continued change of possession conclusive evidence of fraud but introducing no new rule touching what shall constitute a delivery and change of possession, such matters are questions of fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Henry R. Vail against the Nichibei Bussan Company, a corporation, and S. Tatsuno and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. Clarence Ogden, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Gillogley, Crofton & Payne, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action in which he sought to have certain transfers of personal property declared void and the property subjected to execution in satisfaction of a judgment obtained upon August 20, 1921, against the defendant S. Tatsuno for over $2,000 upon a promissory note dated September 29, 1920.

The complaint alleged that on September 28, 1917, S. Tatsuno was the owner and in possession of certain personal property consisting of a stock of merchandise in a dry goods store in San Francisco, Cal.; that about October 15, 1920, S. Tatsuno transferred this personal property to Tsuyo Tatsuno, intending thereby to delay, hinder, and defraud the creditors of S. Tatsuno, and subsequent to November 1, 1920, Tsuyo Tatsuno transferred the property to S. Tatsuno, T. Tsuchiya, M. Uchiyama, N. Yokiyawa, and Tsuyo Tatsuno, intending thereby to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of S. Tatsuno, and that on December 1, 1920, the five persons last named, as co-owners, transferred the property to Nichibei Bussan Company, a corporation, intending to delay, hinder, and defraud the creditors of S. Tatsuno; that the Nichibei Bussan Company had notice of the intended fraud upon the plaintiff as a creditor of S. Tatsuno.

For a second cause of action, the plaintiff added to the allegations contained in the first count, the following: That on September 28, 1920, and prior thereto, S. Tatsuno was the owner of and in possession of the merchandise in dispute, and has ever since remained and now is in possession and control of said property, and in addition thereto the bank account carried in the name of Nichibei Bussan Company; that S. Tatsuno is manager of and in control of the Nichibei Bussan Company.

The trial court found specifically that all the allegations of the complaint were untrue and found the facts to be: That on or about December 1, 1920, the defendants S. Tatsuno, T. Tsuchiya, M. Uchiyama, and M. Yokozaawa, as copartners transferred the property to S. Tatsuno, T. Tsuchiya, M. Uchiyama, N. Yokozaawa, as copartners and co-owners, were in possession of the store and merchandise mentioned in plaintiff's complaint; that at said date the said copartners transferred said property to the defendant Nichibei Bussan Company, a corporation; that said transfer was made in good faith and without any intent to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor of S. Tatsuno and that said transfer was accompanied by an immediate and continued change of possession of the property transferred.

The appellant complains of the findings against him, asserting they are unwarranted by the evidence. The record is very brief; the plaintiff's case resting upon the following testimony by the defendant S. Tatsuno:

"I am one of the defendants in this action. My business is the dry goods business, at 1701 Post street. The name of the store is the Nichibei Bussan Company. I have been connected with it from 1902, I think. I have been employed in the dry goods business under the name Nichibei Bussan Company from 1902 right down to date. Originally, when I first start in business I had two partners, Mr. Kano and Mr. Koto. Mr. Koto stayed in the business, I think about two years until he died. When he died we paid to his doctors a fee and expenses and that used up his interest, when we paid the expenses of his funeral and sickness. I think that is it; I don't know if it was exactly. Later Mr. Kano went to Los Angeles, and we separated. I then bought his interest. Then I was all by myself for a little while. Mr. Kano sold out to me one day before the fire in 1906. Then I took in some new partners who are the same men who are with me today. We continued to conduct the store as the Nichibei Bussan Company. When we first opened the store sometimes I signed, and sometimes Mr. Kano signed, and sometimes Mr. Koto signed checks for the payment of goods. After Mr. Kano and Mr. Koto went out I signed the checks. I was manager of the store during the course of the partnership formed after Kano and Koto were out. The corporation was formed in 1920. The same men who were my partners after Mr. Kano and Mr. Koto left formed this corporation. There were no new persons interested in the corporation. The business has continued down to the present time as a corporation. I am manager of the corporation. Mr. Tsuchiya is president of the corporation. I sign the checks. The name is just the same except we add 'a corporation,' and we have continued on in the same place of business. After Kano and Koto went out of our original partnership no articles of partnership were ever signed between myself and the new partners. No papers were ever made. We never published any notice of the formation of this partnership or that I was selling to them. I am still the manager of the Nichibei Bussan Company, now a corporation, and I still sign all the checks and I signed all the checks before the formation of the corporation."

Upon cross-examination, Mr. Tatsuno testified:

"At the time the Nichibei Bussan Company, a corporation, took over the store we changed the name over the door and issued cards announcing that it was a corporation and changed the bank account from the name of the partnership to the name of the corporation. Before the formation of the corporation the name was Nichibei Bussan Company, after Nichibei Bussan Company, a corporation, incorporated."

[1-3] Appellant argues that since S. Tatsuno merely testified that he "took in some new partners who are the same men that are with me to-day" and failed to state that these men took actual possession of the property or exercised any dominion over the same, the finding should have been that Tatsuno alone remained in possession up to the time of the transfer to the corporation and not that the copartners were in possession of the same at the time of said transfer. This argument overlooks the fact that the burden of bringing himself within the purview of section 3440 of the Civil Code rested upon the plaintiff. He did not sustain the burden of proving the fact that S. Tatsuno, individually, was in "possession and control of the property" at the time of the transfer to the corporation. Appellant contends that the assumption should be in his favor, in the absence of any proof upon the subject. On the contrary, when no evidence is introduced upon an issue, the finding should be against the party having the burden of proof. Dieterle v. Bekin, 143 Cal. 683, 688, 77 Pac. 664.

[4] It appears from findings, properly made, that the transfer to the corporation sought to be set aside as fraudulent against the creditors of S. Tatsuno was made by a copartnership and not by S. Tatsuno individually, and that the partnership was in possession of the property at the time of the transfer and delivered the possession of the same to the corporation. The fact strongly relied upon by appellant that S. Tatsuno was retained in the employ of the corporation as manager of the store, despite the fact that he had been actively engaged in the management of the business under the partnership arrangement, is only a circumstance which would have aided a finding in favor of appellant upon the question of change of possession, had such a finding been made, but there is nothing conclusive about it. The ultimate fact was the immediate delivery and actual and continued change of possession of the goods from the vendor to the vendee, and when it is apparent to all the world that the vendor has ceased to be the owner and another has acquired and openly occupies that position, the statute is satisfied. Godchaux v. Mulford, 26 Cal. 316, 85 Am. Dec. 178. In the present case there was evidence that notice of the sale of the property by the partnership to the corporation had been recorded in the recorder's office of the city and county of San Francisco on November 23, 1920; that the name had been changed over the place of business; that new cards and stationery had been used bearing the new name indicating the corporate entity; that the bank account had been changed; that one of the former partners had become president of the corporation. Section 3440 of the Civil Code makes the want of an immediate delivery and continued change of possession conclusive evidence of fraud, but it introduces no new rule touching what shall constitute such delivery and change of possession. That was a question of fact for the trial court, which has been determined against the plaintiff, and therefore the circumstances upon which he relies becomes of no significance upon the present appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FEIGELMAN. (Cr. 1012.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 17, 1924.)

1. Criminal law §620(1)—Consolidation of prosecutions for grand larceny committed more than year apart not an abuse of discretion.

Under Pen. Code, § 954, authorizing consolidation of two or more prosecutions of the same class, the court did not abuse its discretion in consolidating and trying at the same time two prosecutions for grand larceny, though committed more than one year apart.

2. Depositions §89—Proof held to show due diligence to obtain presence of witness at trial to admit his deposition.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 1335-1346, providing for examination of witnesses upon application made upon affidavit stating * * * "(4) that the witness is about to leave the state," proof introductory to production of a deposition, that a process server armed with subpoena, went to witness' hotel, found him gone, and made return accordingly, that witness returned later, but checked out the same day, that a deputy sheriff connected with the district attorney's office telegraphed witness' sister, who replied that witness had left for Europe, showed due diligence to obtain his presence, and that he was not within the state.

3. Depositions §35—Proof held to show substantial compliance with statute requiring notice of taking depositions.

Where clerk in the office of defendant's attorney received and acknowledged service of notice of application to take testimony, defendant's attorney appeared on the examination, making only a general objection that section 1338 had not been complied with, no error was committed in holding that Pen. Code, § 1338, requiring three days' published notice of application for conditional examination of a witness about to leave the state, had been substantially complied with, since, under section 1341, defendant's counsel could have prevented the examination by proof that witness was not going to leave the state.

4. Depositions §36—Prima facie showing for taking deposition of witness made by presentation of affidavit.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 1335-1346, providing for examination of witnesses upon application on affidavit that witness "is about to leave the state," the prosecution by its affidavit presented on application for the order to take the deposition made a prima facie showing that witness had left the state.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Joe Feigelman was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank E. Dominguez, Clare W. Woolwine, and H. L. Giesler, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. By indictment in case superior court No. 16949 defendant was charged with grand larceny from the person of one Bernard Odell, committed on the 3d day of August, 1921. By information in case superior court No. 18925 he was charged with grand larceny from the person of Willett Woolsey, committed on the 9th day of September, 1922. By order of court the two cases were consolidated, and thereafter were tried at the same time. The defendant was convicted on both counts, and thereafter was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. He appeals from each judgment and in each case from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Section 954 of the Penal Code authorizes the court to order the consolidation of two or more criminal actions where the indictments or informations charge the commission of two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses. The fact that the two crimes charged against the defendant were committed, the one more than a year after the other, does not in our opinion furnish any ground for the claim that the court abused its discretion in consolidating said actions and causing them to be tried at the same time.

[2] On the 30th day of August, 1921, pursuant to an order of the superior court, the testimony of Bernard Odell was taken upon conditional examination, the order therefor being based upon an affidavit stating, among other things, that the witness was then about to leave the state. By an order of that same date the case was set down to be tried on the 24th day of October, 1921. The trial was postponed from time to time, and did not actually occur until the 31st day of May, 1923. Sections 1335 to 1346, inclusive, of the Penal Code provide for the examination of witnesses conditionally as therein set forth. The application must be made upon affidavit stating "(4) that the witness is about to leave the state. * * *" The application may be made to the court or a judge thereof and must be made upon three days' notice to the opposite party.

When the Odell deposition was offered in evidence testimony was introduced for the purpose of showing that due diligence had been exercised to procure the attendance of the witness Odell at the trial, but that such attendance could not be secured, and that in fact the witness was out of the state. The process server, a deputy sheriff, armed with a subpoena, on the 7th day of May, 1923, went to the Northern Hotel, in the city of Los Angeles, where Odell had been living, and was there informed that Odell had gone away and had left a forwarding address at Pittsburg, Pa. Return upon the subpoena was made accordingly. It appears that in fact Odell at that time had gone to Bakersfield and returned to the Northern Hotel on or about the 15th day of May. On the same day he "checked out" from the hotel and again left his forwarding address, a street number at Pittsburg, Pa. It does not appear that the process server or the district attorney knew that Odell had thus returned to the city of Los Angeles. Thereafter a deputy sheriff, whose duties were in connection with the office of the district attorney, on the 29th day of May, telegraphed to Odell at Pittsburg, in the name of the district attorney, stating therein that this case was set for May 31st, and asking advice as to whether Odell could be here. By reply of the same date one Mrs. Goldstein, a sister of Odell, replied that Odell had left for Europe. We think that these facts were sufficient to warrant the court in determining that due diligence had been exercised to obtain the presence of the witness, and that the witness was not within the state of California.

[3,4] The defendant objected to the admission in evidence of the Odell deposition not only upon the ground that due diligence had not been exercised to obtain the presence of that witness at the trial, but also upon the ground that the provisions of section 1338 of the Penal Code were not complied with by the prosecution, in that the defendant or his attorney were not served with the notice required under said section, which is a 3 days' notice of the application to the superior court for an order to take such testimony. Mr. Burke, of the district attorney's office, testified that prior to making the application he had a telephone conversation with the attorney of the defendant wherein said attorney stated that he would waive notice of such application. Defendant's attorney testified that this conversation did not occur. The court, in deciding upon the admission of the deposition in evidence, stated that it was not necessary to pass upon the effect of this testimony, for the reason that, in view of other facts, the matter was immaterial. These facts were that notice of the time and place of taking the deposition before the magistrate had been delivered to a clerk in the office of defendant's attorney, who acknowledged service thereof; that defendant's attorney in fact appeared at the taking of the deposition, where he cross-examined the witness and made no objection that the 3 days' notice required under section 1338 had not been served upon him, although he did make a general objection that the provisions of the Code had not been complied with. We are of the opinion that, in view of these facts, the court committed no error in holding that the deposition was a conditional deposition taken in substantial compliance with the provisions of the statute. As is pointed out by the Attorney General in his brief, notwithstanding said order of the superior court for the taking of the deposition, the defendant at the time when he appeared before the magistrate had an opportunity to prevent the taking of the deposition, if in fact the witness was not about to leave the state. For the Penal Code, at section 1341, provides that, if at the time and place so designated it is shown to the satisfaction of the magistrate that the witness is not about to leave the state, the examination cannot take place. The prosecution by its affidavit presented on application for the order to take the deposition had made a prima facie showing that the witness was about to leave the state. By appearing at the taking of the deposition without challenging or attempting to disprove this fact, the defendant in effect waived the objection, and he should not later be heard to complain that the proceedings are defective merely because he was not served with three days' notice of the application for the order to take the deposition.

It is not denied that the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict. No miscarriage of justice appears to have occurred in the conviction of the defendant.

The said judgments are and each of them is affirmed, and the orders denying the several motions for a new trial are and each of them is affirmed.

BRIGGS et al. v. SHERMAN et al.

Landlord and tenant §152(11)—Provision of lease against "alterations" held not violated by construction of gate.

Lessees of one portion of a storeroom, divided by a partition a few feet high running from the rear to a point not far from a common door at the front, by constructing a gate at the end of such partition between it and the frame of the common door in such a way as to keep persons out of their store when they were not there held not to have made an "alteration" in violation of a covenant of their lease that they would not make or suffer any alterations to be made without the consent of lessor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Alter—Alteration.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Clayton W. Briggs and another against Nellie M. Sherman and husband. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hyman Schwartz, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Nichols, Cooper & Hickson, of Pomona, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action of unlawful detainer. The complaint alleges that defendants held over after breach by them of certain covenants of a lease under which they occupied the premises in question in the cause, and after due notice to quit. Judgment went for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

The lease involved in the action was made to respondents by a predecessor in interest of the appellants. The latter, and their predecessor before them, occupied one-half of a certain storeroom, and the lease to respondents demised the remaining half. The instrument contained a provision that the lessor "agrees to pay the water rate during the continuance of this lease, also to furnish free heat, electricity to be furnished by the lessee." One of the allegations of the complaint is that respondents breached the covenant of the lease requiring them to furnish electricity for the premises. The trial court in effect found this averment to be untrue, for it found specifically that the predecessor of appellants, after the execution of the lease, entered into an agreement with respondents waiving the furnishing of electricity by them in consideration of the agreement of respondents to allow him the use of a certain space in the rear part of the half of the storeroom covered by the lease; that these mutual understandings were executed by appellants' predecessor taking possession of and occupying thereafter the space mentioned and by his thereafter paying the bills for electricity; that the predecessor of appellants notified the latter of this modification of the lease prior to the transfer to them of his interest in the property; and that appellants thereupon entered into possession of the space mentioned and thereafter always continued to occupy it and thereafter paid and continued to pay all bills for electricity for the entire premises without objection and without demand upon or notice to respondents until shortly before the commencement of the action. Appellants contend that these findings are without support in the evidence, but the contention is baseless. There was ample testimony from several witnesses, including the predecessor of appellants, to support each of the findings mentioned. This evidence was so plain and direct that we do not find it necessary to recite it.

The lease provided that the lessees should not "make or suffer any alterations to be made" on the premises without the written consent of the lessor. The complaint alleges that this covenant had been broken, but the trial court found that the allegation was untrue. Appellants insist that this finding is unsupported by any evidence. The portion of the premises covered by the lease was separated from the remaining half of the store by a partition a few feet high running from the back of the room to a point not far from the door at the front which gave ingress to the entire place. What appellants complain of as an "alteration" was a gate placed by respondents on their side of the room and swinging between the forward end of the partition and the frame of the common door at the front of the store. A witness said of this gate that it was "about ten feet long, and about five feet high, made with slats, oh, about three or four inches apart; they are pine wood made with slats to be folded back against the post in four sections, and was plain lumber, unplanned, hardly finished." One of appellants testified that the gate could be fastened at the end near the front door by means of a latch which "corresponded to a screen door latch or something of that sort," and "was attached by light hinges and screws to the center part at the end of this center partition." He also testified that "the whole structure constituted a gate simply and effectively, simply for the purpose of keeping people out of the Shermans' store when they were not there, when their business was closed." This evidence amply supports the finding. The gate was not an "alteration" under the terms of the lease (2 C. J. 1166). It did not substantially change the character of the building or of any part of it. It is apparent from the evidence that it could have been removed at any time without material change in or damage to the building.

Other points are made by appellants, but they are in effect but statements in another form of the points of which we have already made disposition.

Judgment affirmed.

GREEN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4626.)

Injunction ¶145—Court held without jurisdiction to enter temporary injunction because of failure to serve affidavits until day of hearing.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 527, providing that a party who has obtained a temporary restraining order must at least two days before hearing serve a copy of the complaint and all affidavits to be used at such hearing, on the adverse party, where affidavits presented and used at such hearing were not served on defendant until the day of the hearing, held, that the court had no jurisdiction except to dissolve the restraining order, no discretion in the matter being vested in the court by the statute.

Application by Max Green for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Harry R. Archbald, Judge thereof. Writ granted.

J. W. Satterwhite, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

J. Edward Keating and Craig & Bromley, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles and to Harry R. Archbald, as judge thereof, requiring the said respondents to desist from any action or proceeding based upon a temporary injunction following a restraining order issued out of said court under the order of the said judge.

The facts appear to be that Rosa Green had brought a suit in accounting against Max Green and had obtained from the court an order restraining the defendant from dealing generally with the subject-matter of the action, and directing defendant to show cause on the 18th day of October, 1923, why a temporary injunction pending the trial of the cause should not be issued to the same effect. In accordance with the said order, the defendant personally appeared, his attorney being excusably absent. Although the order to show cause did not appear on the court's calendar, the matter was nevertheless called; and, according to the return, as appears by the affidavit of the judge filed herein, the defendant personally requested a continuance, to which request the attorneys representing plaintiff consented, and an order was thereupon made by the court continuing the hearing of said order to show cause until October 26, 1923. On said date defendant served on plaintiff and filed in the action a counter affidavit setting up certain matters not relevant here, and plaintiff also filed therein two affidavits neither of which was in reply to anything contained in defendant's counter affidavit and which affidavits of plaintiff had been prepared preceding the date of service of defendant's counter affidavit, and preceding said date of hearing of the order to show cause. Over defendant's objection, the court proceeded to hear the matter, received in evidence plaintiff's said two affidavits, and ordered a temporary injunction to issue.

Defendant assigns several reasons why the court had no jurisdiction to order a temporary injunction in the premises; but for the purpose of deciding the question of whether or not a writ of prohibition should issue, but one of such reasons need receive consideration by this court. Section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which indicates the necessary steps to be taken in obtaining a temporary injunction, contains, among other provisions, the following:

"When the matter first comes up for hearing the party who obtained the temporary restraining order must be ready to proceed and must have served upon the opposite party at least two days prior to such hearing, a copy of the complaint and of all affidavits to be used in such application and a copy of his points and authorities in support of such application; if he be not ready, or if he shall fail to serve a copy of his complaint, affidavits and points and authorities, as herein required, the court shall dissolve the temporary restraining order."

In the case of Kelsey v. Superior Court, 40 Cal. App. 229, 180 Pac. 662, it was held that a failure by the plaintiff to serve on the defendant a copy of his points and authorities at least two days before the hearing was sufficient to divest the court of jurisdiction, excepting for the sole purpose of dissolving the restraining order theretofore issued; that consequently the order of temporary injunction issued by the court was a nullity; and that a writ of prohibition should issue as against further proceedings under such order. The language of the statute covering the situation here is plainly to the effect that, unless all affidavits to be used on the hearing be served upon the opposite party at least two days prior thereto, the court shall dissolve the restraining order. The facts of the instant case are that certain affidavits used by the plaintiff were not served on the defendant until the day of the hearing. The evident purpose of the statute is to prevent surprise—to the end that no unfair advantage may be taken of the defendant in the way of evidence which has not been anticipated. An examination of the record herein discloses that entirely new matter was injected into the case by the allegations contained within the affidavits presented by the plaintiff on the day of the hearing, and it might well be that the defendant was entirely unprepared to meet such new issues. That fact, however, is beside the point for the reason that the statute leaves no room for the exercise of discretion by the court. As bearing upon the duty of the court where all the affidavits used on the hearing were not served as directed by the statute, what the affidavits contained is entirely immaterial. The court is neither required nor permitted to determine either the substance or the effect of the affidavits; the allegations thereof may be germane or they may be wholly irrelevant so far as affecting the propriety of the action by the court as indicated by the statute is concerned. Where it appears that affidavits which were used on the hearing were not served on the opposite party at least two days before such hearing was had, one duty only is prescribed, and that is an order dissolving the restraining order. The measure of the power to be exercised by the trial court in the matter of provisional injunctions is contained within the provisions of the section of the Code to which reference has been made (United Railroads v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 758, 151 Pac. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 199) and the language of that section is so plain and unambiguous that no room exists for interpretation (Kelsey v. Superior Court, 40 Cal. App. 236, 180 Pac. 662; German Sav., etc., Society v. Aldrich, 5 Cal. App. 216, 89 Pac. 1063). We see no escape from the conclusion that because of the fact that plaintiff did not serve upon defendant at least two days prior to the hearing of the order to show cause "a copy of * * * all affidavits to be used in such application," the superior court had no jurisdiction therein other than to dissolve the temporary restraining order.

It follows that the respondents should proceed no further in the premises other than to order the dissolution of the restraining order and the order of temporary injunction. It is so ordered.

BRIGGS & TURIVAS v. PACIFIC TRADING CO. (S. F. 10470.)(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 18, 1924.
Rehearing Denied March 17, 1924.)1. Sales 81(5)—Contract to buy wire held to require buyer to give instructions as to where to send it.

A contract evidenced by a letter from a California buyer to seller in Illinois, agreeing "to buy" wire "outright and place same in warehouse, payment to be made against warehouse receipt or domestic or export bills of lading, as such may be the case," imposed on the buyer the duty of giving instructions as to where to make delivery, and the seller was not required to make tender or delivery of the wire until buyer forwarded instructions as to its destination.

2. Sales 181(11)—Evidence held to support implied court finding that seller performed within reasonable time.

In an action for damages for breach of contract "to buy" wire "outright and place same in warehouse," in the absence of instructions as to where and how to send the wire, evidence that seller, three months later, warehoused the wire before buyer attempted to cancel, supported an implied court finding that seller had performed its part within a reasonable time.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Briggs & Turivas against the Pacific Trading Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. E. Bien, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Brownstone & Goodman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Justice Kerrigan prior to his retirement, is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages for breach of a contract to buy a carload of wire. Plaintiff recovered a judgment of $2,848.10, being the difference between the contract price and the market value of the goods, and defendant appeals.

The facts of the case as they appear from the various letters and telegrams exchanged between the parties to this contract and from the deposition of one Frank A. McMonagle, the manager of the plaintiff corporation, are as follows:

During the year 1918 the plaintiff was an Illinois corporation, having its place of business in Chicago. At the same time the defendant was a California corporation, having its principal place of business in San Francisco. W. S. Hanford acted as agent for the plaintiff in dealing with the defendant in San Francisco. At a place in Chicago, known as Blue Island, the plaintiff had a quantity of wire of various sizes and some of which was rusted to a certain extent. After some negotiations the defendant wrote to the plaintiff a letter which, and the acceptance of its terms by plaintiff, constituted the contract on which this suit is based. The letter is as follows (on the letterhead of the Pacific Trading Company, Inc.):

"San Francisco, Cal., U. S. A. W. S. H. 427.

"September 17, 1918.

"(Received Sep. 21, 1918.

"W. S. Hanford.)

"Briggs & Turivas Co. Chicago, Ill.—Gentlemen: Attention Mr. W. S. Hanford. You may take our firm order for one (1) car—approximately 80,000 lbs. black soft steel wire, gauges 2-6. Price 3c. flat f. o. b. cars Chicago. We agree to buy this outright and place same in warehouse providing said material is as stated—slightly rusty, and not rusted into the goods. Payment to be made against invoice and warehouse receipts, or domestic or export bills of lading, as such may be the case. Yours very truly, Pacific Trading Co., Inc. G. K. Fujioka, Asst. Mgr. Export Dept. RK:MD."

At the time the letter was written the World War was in progress, and an altogether abnormal condition existed in the iron and steel market. The letter was received by the plaintiff on September 21, 1918, and thereupon Frank A. McMonagle, the manager of the plaintiff corporation, testified that he telephoned to the plaintiff's yard to prepare the wire for shipment. Shortly afterwards, as he testified, he prepared tags for the purpose of marking the coils, and which were placed thereon. The record does not show any communication thereafter between the parties until December 13, 1918. On that date the defendant wired the plaintiff that its purchaser had canceled its order and therefore that the defendant considered its order to the plaintiff canceled. This telegram read:

"Our order black rusty wire one car account delayed receipt of draft and warehouse receipt our purchasers have canceled therefore we consider our order canceled."

To this the plaintiff replied as follows:

"Your wire thirteenth sale contract nine six two wire now in warehouse being unloaded. Absolutely insist on your acceptance of same in view of fact no cancellation received prior to shipment."

A warehouse receipt, introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, showed that the wire had been deposited in a Chicago warehouse on December 12th, the day before defendant telegraphed its cancellation. Some correspondence followed between the parties, and on January 22, 1919, the plaintiff drew a sight draft on the defendant, attached thereto the warehouse receipt and forwarded the same through its bank to the Seaboard National Bank of San Francisco. The defendant refused to pay the draft, and this action was commenced.

[1] The defendant urges in support of its appeal that the plaintiff was in default under the terms of the contract, with the consequent right on its part to cancel, thus terminating its liability. This contention is based upon the argument that no time being specified in the contract for the delivery of the goods, the seller was by law given a reasonable time therefor, which the testimony showed to be 10 days, and that it did not make delivery within said time nor at any time before defendant's cancellation, nearly three months after the giving and acceptance of the order.

This contention, we think, is based upon a misconception of the meaning of the contract, under which, it is clear, the seller was not required to make tender or delivery of the wire until the buyer forwarded instructions as to its destination. The buyer in its order used the expression:

"We agree to buy this outright and place same in warehouse. * * * Payment to be made against warehouse receipt or domestic or export bills of lading, as such may be the case," —plainly implying that the buyer had not yet determined how or when it desired delivery to be made, that it might order the goods to be placed in a warehouse, or that it might order them to be shipped to a domestic or foreign destination. In this situation the seller was entitled to await further instructions, which the buyer neglected to furnish; and when the latter finally attempted to cancel the order, it gave as its reason:

"Account delayed receipt of draft and warehouse receipt our purchasers have canceled, therefore we consider our order canceled."

It would appear from this language that the defendant had resold upon certain conditions as to dispatch of draft and warehouse receipt the wire purchased from the plaintiff, which conditions not having been complied with by the defendant, its customer upon that ground canceled its order. The defendant then plainly says: "Therefore we consider our order canceled." But its right to cancel its order did not depend upon its customer's action with reference to a contract with which the plaintiff had no concern. Unless the plaintiff was in default, the defendant is bound by its contract. Upon the trial of the case the defendant offered no evidence whatever, but the plaintiff's evidence showed that after the making of the contract the defendant gave no instructions to the plaintiff as to delivery or shipment. And if it be said that the delay referred to in defendant's telegram of cancellation was the plaintiff's delay in warehousing or shipping, the absence of these instructions furnishes the complete answer. Apparently at the time defendant placed its order with the plaintiff it did not know where its customer, assuming that it had one, would want the material delivered. Receiving no instructions upon this point, plaintiff was not required to make a delivery. Indeed, it would not know where to deliver the wire had it so desired. Under the circumstances of the case the plaintiff adopted a proper course of action, that is, to keep the goods until defendant should send instructions. Not having heard from the defendant, the plaintiff deposited the wire in a warehouse. At the time it did so, the contract was still in existence, but the defendant not having given instructions as to the delivery of the wire within a reasonable time could have been put in default by plaintiff. Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 313, 81 Pac. 964; Williston on Sales, §§ 450, 451, et seq.; Mecham on Sales, vol. 2, p. 972. But while plaintiff could have put defendant in default for its delay in proceeding with the execution of the contract, no such right existed in the defendant. It was the defendant's and not the plaintiff's duty to take the first affirmative action under the contract, which was to notify plaintiff where to make delivery. The defendant's attempted cancellation was therefore ineffective for any purpose, and the plaintiff was justified in refusing to abide by this attempted cancellation and in insisting that defendant live up to its agreement.

Some stress is laid by the appellant upon certain language to be found in one of plaintiff's letters in which it attributes whatever delay there was in warehousing the goods to certain labor trouble. This refers to the fact that the plaintiff kept the goods on hand a considerable time before sending them to a warehouse. As we have seen, there was no obligation upon plaintiff's part, in the absence of specific instructions from the defendant, to deposit them in a warehouse, and it had no need to offer any excuse for delay in doing so. The fact that it offered an excuse affords no ground for implying an obligation at variance with the plain terms of the contract.

The respondent in its brief has devoted some space to an attempt to show that title to the goods passed to the defendant. As to this, it is sufficient to say, first, that the question is not involved in the case, and, second, that this action was brought upon the proper and correct theory that title had not passed.

[2] The evidence in the case supports the implied finding of the trial court that the plaintiff had done and performed on its part all things to be done and performed by it within a reasonable time.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARDESTY v. HARDESTY. (L. A. 7931.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1924.)

I. Marriage ¶58(4)—Fact of pregnancy at time of marriage and concealment thereof from innocent spouse is fraud.

A husband suing to annul a marriage for fraud based on defendant's concealed pregnancy at the time of marriage by one other than plaintiff, it is not necessary that defendant at time of marriage made representations as to her condition, since the fraud consists in the fact of pregnancy, together with the concealment of that fact, and defendant's ignorance that she was pregnant is no defense.

2. Marriage ¶64—Award giving child alternately to guilty and innocent spouse held erroneous.

Under Civ. Code, § 85, the court in annulling a marriage for fraud must award custody of children of such marriage only to the innocent parent, and is forbidden to provide for division of custody and for the education and maintenance of such children out of the property of the innocent party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ralph H. Clock, Judge.

Action by Thomas M. Hardesty against Aileen Hardesty. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Donald P. Lane, of Long Beach, and H. Clyde Harms, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

S. H. Underwood, of Long Beach, for respondent.

MYERS, J. The parties hereto intermarried in this state on August 19, 1918. The defendant gave birth to a child seven months and ten days after the marriage took place, having been pregnant before and at the time of the marriage by a person other than the plaintiff. Such pregnancy was not disclosed to the plaintiff and he had no knowledge of the same and believed that the child was his child and a child of their marriage, and continued in such belief up to September 11, 1922, at which time he learned the facts above stated. This action for the annulment of the marriage was commenced in March, 1923. In the meantime a second child had been born—a child of this marriage and of the parties hereto, whose name is Helen Hardesty, and who was about eleven months of age at the time of the commencement of this action. The question of the custody of this child is the principal point involved upon this appeal.

The trial court found all of the facts in favor of the plaintiff and rendered judgment annulling the marriage. The plaintiff appeals from the portion of the judgment which makes provision for the custody of the child of the parties, which is as follows:

"It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the custody of the child of the parties hereto, Helen Hardesty, be awarded to the father, plaintiff herein, until said child reaches the age of six years. The mother, defendant herein, be allowed to take the child to her home at any point within the state of California during the months of September, October, November, December, January, and February of each year. When said child reaches the age of six years further order of court to be made. During such time the child is with the mother, the father is to pay $30 a month for her support."

Section 85 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

"The court must award the custody of the children of a marriage annulled on the ground of fraud or force to the innocent parent, and may also provide for their education and maintenance out of the property of the guilty party." (Italics added.)

[1] It is appellant's contention that the portion of the judgment appealed from, which is above quoted, is in clear violation of the Code section referred to. There seems no room for doubt that this section is applicable to the instant case. The action was one for annulment of a marriage on the ground of fraud. The fact of pregnancy existing at the time of the marriage, together with the concealment of that fact from the innocent spouse, amounts in law to the perpetration of a fraud. Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 87, 103; Barnes v. Barnes, 110 Cal. 418, 422, 42 Pac. 904. There is no suggestion that the findings of fact herein were not amply supported by the evidence. Indeed, the defendant by her verified answer did not deny the essential allegations of the complaint. She denied the making of any express representations to the plaintiff concerning her character or condition, but no such representations are necessary to the maintenance of the action (Donovan v. Donovan, 91 Mass. [9 Allen] 140), and these denials were therefore immaterial. The fraud consists in the fact of pregnancy which disables the party from fulfilling the marriage contract, together with the concealment of that fact from the other party to the contract. She does not deny that she was pregnant by another at the time of her marriage to plaintiff, but contents herself with denying that she then knew that she was so pregnant. This denial is equally immaterial for the reason last stated.

[2] A consideration of the language of the Code section above quoted, with particular reference to the words there italicized, leads to the conclusion that the Legislature intended to make it the duty of the court in annulling a marriage upon the ground here involved to award the custody of the children of such marriage only to the innocent parent, and to forbid the court from making provision for the education and maintenance of such children out of the property of the innocent party. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court erred in that portion of the judgment appealed from. While in terms it awarded the custody of the child to the plaintiff, in effect it divided the custody equally between the two parties, awarding it to each in alternate periods of six months. We find no warrant in the law for the provision limiting the award of custody to a term of six years or to any period short of the minority of the child. We do not mean to intimate hereby that the trial court is without authority, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to specify, within reasonable limits, when the mother may visit or take the child, and the conditions thereof. But any such provision which would have the effect of awarding the custody of the child to the guilty party for substantial portions of the time would, in our opinion, be in contravention of the statute. It is but fair to state that respondent has filed no brief herein, and we are therefore left in the dark as to the theory upon which the learned court proceeded or the considerations which moved it to the action taken.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the case remanded to the trial court, with directions to enter judgment upon the findings in accordance with the conclusions above indicated.

1. Appeal and error  948—Assignment failing to show abuse of discretion by trial judge in allowing amendment not considered on appeal.

It being within the discretion of the trial court to allow or refuse an amendment at will, an assignment of error that the court erred in allowing plaintiffs to amend their complaint, with no showing of abuse of discretion by the trial judge, will not be considered on appeal.

2. Contracts  332(2) — Amended complaint held to state cause of action by architects for services.

In an action to recover for services rendered as architects, an amended complaint held to state a cause of action, where the contract was set out in hæc verba, stating the agreed price for the services and defendant's promise to pay therefor, and the only modification pleaded being a change in the character of the buildings for which the plans and specifications were to be prepared.

Action by W. J. Dodd and William Richards against F. B. Dunn. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Daly, Daly & Todd, of Long Beach, for appellant.

Lloyd W. Moultrie, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MYERS, J. The plaintiffs recovered judgment in the court below in an action upon contract to recover the agreed price for services rendered by them as architects employed by the defendant. The defendant has appealed therefrom upon the judgment roll alone. But two points are made by him upon this appeal.

[1] The first is that the court erred in allowing plaintiffs to amend their complaint. The original complaint herein declared upon an express written contract, whereby the defendant employed the plaintiffs to prepare the plans and specifications for certain proposed buildings therein described, and agreed to pay them the sum of $6,000 for their services in so doing. It alleged the performance thereof by plaintiffs, and the failure to pay on the part of the defendant. The parties went to trial upon the issues as framed by this complaint and the defendant's answer thereto, and at the trial plaintiffs were permitted to file an amended complaint. The amended complaint declared upon the same written contract, and alleged an executed parol modification thereof. The modification consisted only in this: That the written contract described the buildings for which plans and specifications were to be prepared as "a class 'A' theater and apartment house with necessary space below for the ultimate construction of a public bathhouse." The parol modification provided for "a theater and apartment house building arranged so that the entrance to the mezzanine floor of the theater would be from the street level above the ground floor of the theater, eliminating any space below the theater for the ultimate construction of bathrooms." Appellant concedes that it was within the discretion of the trial court to allow or refuse amendments to pleadings, and that the policy of our law is that such discretion should be liberally exercised in the furtherance of justice. He makes no showing whatever which would indicate the slightest abuse of discretion by the trial judge in the instant case. This point, therefore, does not call for any further consideration upon our part.

[2] The second point made by appellant is that the amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the judgment is not supported by the findings. This point is based upon the contention that—

"There is no allegation that the parol modification provided for the payment by defendant of the sum of six thousand ($6,000.00) dollars or any other sum."

There is no merit whatever in this point. The amended complaint pleads in hæc verba the written contract stating the agreed price for the services to be $6,000, and containing the defendant's promise to pay the same, and the only modification pleaded is the change above mentioned in the character of the buildings for which plans and specifications were to be prepared. The findings follow the allegations of the amended complaint, and all of the facts are found in favor of the plaintiffs.

The judgment is affirmed.

193 Cal. 311

ENSIGN v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.
(S. F. 10254.)

1. Death $\S$ 76—Finding of causal connection between injury and death sustained.

Evidence that decedent, while loading pipes in a box car, sustained an injury to his back due to the bumping of the car by a switch engine, and that thereafter his health began to fail, and he was unable to do any heavy work, and that he consulted several doctors and a professional masseur to obtain relief, and that due to his weakened power of resistance he became a prey of tuberculosis, which resulted in a rectal abscess, tubercular in origin, which necessitated an operation, which resulted in his death, held to justify the jury in finding a causal connection between the happening of the injury and decedent's death.

2. Death $\S$ 17—Injury proximate cause of death from disease resulting from weakened condition.

If, on account of the weakened condition of a person caused by an injury, he is rendered more susceptible to germs than if he had not been injured, or because of his debilitated condition he is unable to resist the attack of germs present in his system, then the disease resulting from the germs is a natural sequence to his condition resulting from the injury, and the injury is the proximate cause of his death, and the disease is but one of the links in the chain of causation.

3. Pleading $\S$ 236(5)—Amendment to conform to proof as to date of accident held properly allowed.

In an action for the death of plaintiff's decedent alleged to have resulted from injuries received while loading pipes in a box car, the court did not err in exercising its discretion under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 473, in granting an amendment to plaintiff's complaint to conform to the proof of the real date of the accident, where the trial took place some five years thereafter, and the injury at the time appeared trivial, and there being no question but that the car was loaded by decedent and his helper, as alleged in the complaint.

4. Evidence $\S$ 317(18)—Hearsay testimony to show that one received proper care after injury held improperly admitted.

In an action for the death of plaintiff's decedent, the court erred in permitting plaintiff to testify as to what decedent told her about his condition after the injury alleged to have resulted in his death and the treatment and doctors that had been recommended to him by others, and what other people and doctors had told her was the proper treatment for his injuries, to show that deceased had received ordinary care after his injury; such testimony being purely hearsay.

5. Evidence ⚡127(3)—Declarations of injured person five hours after accident held not part of res gestæ.

In an action based on accidental injury resulting in death of plaintiff's decedent, declarations of decedent made several hours after the accident at the home of his father-in-law as to his back being wrenched were not admissible as constituting any part of the res gestæ.

6. Evidence ⚡355(7)—Private memorandum containing entries of decedent, offered on behalf of plaintiff suing for his death, held inadmissible.

In an action based on injuries resulting in death of plaintiff's decedent, the court erred in admitting a private memorandum of decedent to show that medicine received by him before the injury had been for his father, and that decedent was in good health prior to his injury; such memorandum not being admissible under Code Civ. Proc. § 1946, governing the admission of entries of a deceased person.

7. Appeal and error ⚡1053(3)—Error in admitting evidence as to pecuniary circumstances of decedent held not cured by instruction.

In an action based on injuries resulting in death of plaintiff's decedent, the court erred in permitting plaintiff to testify that decedent was unable to take certain treatments because he had no money, and everything he owned was mortgaged, where no issue as to the reasonable care of decedent was made, and the error was not cured by an instruction that the pecuniary circumstances of the plaintiff or heirs of the deceased could not increase or diminish the amount of damages plaintiff was entitled to recover, especially where a motion of defendant to strike out such testimony was refused.

8. Trial ⚡235(1)—Instruction as to how to weigh the evidence held not erroneous.

An instruction which merely states the general rule as to how the jury shall weigh the evidence is not erroneous.

9. Trial ⚡253(7)—Hypothetical instruction directing verdict should require jury to base it on all the evidence.

In an action based on injuries resulting in death, an instruction directing a verdict for defendant if its evidence showed that there was no negligence on its part or that there was no causal connection between the injury and the death was properly modified by requiring the jury to base their verdict upon all the evidence.

10. Trial ⚡250—Instruction as to duty of injured person to secure medical treatment held unnecessary.

In an action based on injuries resulting in death, a requested instruction that an injured person was required only to secure such medical treatment as an ordinarily prudent person would have had was unnecessary and confusing, where defendant had not alleged or attempted to prove that the absence of medical treatment or inefficient service was the cause of plaintiff's decedent's death.

11. Trial ⚡251(1)—Instruction should be applicable to issues.

Instructions extraneous to any issue in the case held improperly given.

12. Trial ⚡296(9)—Instruction held not erroneous as leaving determination of material allegations of complaint to jury.

An instruction that plaintiff could recover if all the material allegations of any one of the causes of action were proved by a preponderance of evidence was not erroneous as leaving the determination of the material allegations to the jury where the court had already pointed out in another instruction the material averments of the complaint in each cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

Action by Heman B. Ensign, as administrator of the estate of Peter Carmine, deceased, against the Southern Pacific Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank McGowan and Blaine McGowan, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Southern Pacific Company from a judgment rendered against it in the sum of $15,000 and in favor of the plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Peter Carmine, deceased, as damages for the death of said deceased resulting from an injury alleged to have been suffered by the deceased as the result of the negligence of the defendant. The main contention urged in support of a reversal is that it was not shown that the injury to the deceased was the proximate cause of his death. It is argued in this behalf that the verdict of the jury, with its implied finding that the death of the deceased proximately resulted from the injury caused by defendant, rested, not upon the firm foundation of satisfactory evidence, but rather upon conjecture, surmise and speculation.

It is plaintiff's claim that, while the deceased's death did not immediately follow the infliction of the injury, nevertheless the injury was the initial step in a chain of causation which resulted finally and as a natural consequence in the death of the deceased. And, while there are several distinct steps in the claimed chain of causation, and while the death occurred some little time after the infliction of the injury, both of which factors render more difficult, of course, the task of the plaintiff of proving a direct causal connection between the death and the injury, nevertheless we cannot say the plaintiff has not sufficiently shown by competent evidence a causal connection existing between each link in the chain and the step immediately preceding it.

Peter Carmine, so the evidence shows, in 1914, at the time of the alleged injury, was living with his family on a ranch near Klau, in San Luis Obispo county, about 15 miles from Paso Robles. The ranch was a stock and dairy ranch. During the latter part of May, 1914, Carmine entered into an arrangement with the superintendent of a quicksilver mine near Klau to haul some of the mining machinery from the mine to Paso Robles, and to there load it into the cars of the defendant Southern Pacific Company. The machinery consisted of heavy quicksilver pipes, which were about 6 or 8 feet long, about 12 inches in diameter, and each weighing between 600 and 700 pounds. The pipes were too heavy for Carmine to handle alone, and Carmine hired a helper, Charles Pemberton, to assist him in loading the pipes into the box car. The pipes were first loaded upon a hand truck, known in railroad parlance as a "dolly." The "dolly" was rolled into the car over an iron apron which overlapped the station platform and the threshold of the car. When placing the pipes in position, in the north end of the car, Carmine used a crowbar, and Pemberton, his helper, used a car stake as a pry. Carmine and his helper were in the act of placing one of these pipes in position when the car was jarred by the impact of two empty box cars which were "bumped" against it by a locomotive operating in the vicinity. This "bumping," it is alleged, caused the injury to Carmine's back. Pemberton described the bumping and its results in this manner:

"We had one end up there and we had our wooden pry, a kind of a car stake about 3x3, and a crowbar. Carmine was upon the right of me, and we were moving that to the north end of the car inside, and he [Carmine] was lifting that up kind of leaning ahead of this way when this bump came. When the bump came against the car, with the jar I dropped my bar, and that threw the weight on him, and it kind of broke him down like, and he turned around a couple of times and put his hand on his back."

In coupling onto the "empties" the locomotive, it appears, struck the car onto which it was being coupled with such force that it drove the two cars against the car in which Carmine and his helper were working, driving that car back several feet. Pemberton testified that after the accident he and Carmine replaced the iron apron, which had slewed around, and finished loading the remaining two pipes into the car. The testimony of Pemberton is sufficient to sustain the implied finding of the jury that the accident which is alleged to have caused the injury actually occurred. The story of the manner in which the accident occurred is not so inherently improbable as to warrant this court in saying that the jury was not justified in finding that it did happen.

Carmine's wife testified that upon Carmine's return home the next day he did not jump down from his wagon, as was his habit, but climbed down, first stepping on the hub of the wheel and then stepping to the ground. She helped him unharness and put away the team. When he got off of the wagon he put his hand to his back. That night he awakened her with the request that she rub his back. At the time she noticed that it "was a little swollen, and felt hot" to her hand, and "there was some projection of one of the vertebra." She had had occasion to notice a few days before that his back was not in that condition.

There is testimony in the record tending to show that the deceased previous to the injury to his back was an active, hard-working, healthy man. After the accident Carmine was unable to do any lifting, his father or his wife lifting the buckets of milk for him after he had milked the cows on his ranch. He walked stooping over to the left, with his hand on his back. His left leg gradually became shortened and drawn up. Although previously he had been a sound sleeper, he became restless, and there were nights when he could not sleep at all. In June, 1915, he was in bed for over three months, and during that time had no use of his lower limbs. Both arms were affected, and his wife had to feed him. He gradually got better, and was able after a time to walk with two canes.

Dr. Sobey, the doctor who attended Carmine prior to and at the time of his death, testified that, although he had made no examination of Carmine's spine because it was an old injury, and he was interested mainly in the tubercular phase of the case, still his spine was out of alignment; "he was not straight up and down"; "he walked with a cane and a decided limp," and he was "inclined to the side." This is clearly sufficient to prove the injury to the spine even if the entire testimony of Professor De Brock, a professional masseur, who was perhaps not qualified to testify as to any facts calling for a detailed knowledge of anatomy, be disregarded. The fact, however, that a professional masseur was consulted corroborates to some extent the fact that Carmine had sustained an injury to his back. There is also other testimony that he sought the aid of several physicians in an effort to obtain relief. His weight steadily declined. In 1915 he weighed about 145 pounds; in 1916, 130 pounds; in 1917, about 115 pounds; and in 1918, at the time of his death, he weighed but 85 pounds. During this time he had developed a tubercular cough.

Dr. Chain, who had practiced as a physician and surgeon for 15 years, and who was at the time of the trial city physician and health officer of Eureka, testified that the accepted theory at the present time in reference to the presence of tuberculosis germs in the human body is that practically 100 per cent. of the people have a tubercular lesion in their body somewhere, and in some stage of the disease, either healed, quiescent, or in an active state. He testified that anything that would lower the general resistance of a person would cause a quiescent tubercular process to "light up."

In 1918 Carmine developed a rectal abscess which the physician who attended him testified was probably tubercular in origin. An operation was performed in July, 1918. Carmine's vitality was very low, and he failed to rally from the anæsthetic administered preparatory to the operation. The evidence is clear that it was reasonable and probable that the rectal abscess was due to the tuberculosis from which Carmine was suffering. Dr. Sobey testified that the operation he performed was for fistula ano, "probably tubercular in origin"; that he found Carmine tubercular at the base of the spine; that his body was "practically riddled with tuberculosis." He testified very positively that, although the abscess might possibly be due to some other cause, because of the tubercular condition of the patient he considered the abscess tubercular in origin.

This testimony completes the chain of causation contended for by plaintiff.

[1] The jury were justified under the evidence hereinabove set out in arriving at the conclusion, as they evidently did, that the back of the deceased was wrenched; that as a consequence he suffered pain, with attendant loss of sleep, which resulted in a lowering of his vitality; that by reason of his weakened power of resistance he became the prey of tuberculosis; that as a result a rectal abscess, tubercular in origin, developed, which necessitated an operation which resulted fatally. In other words, the jury found, and were justified in finding, that the ultimate result could be traced through successive stages to the original injury and that the responsibility rested upon the one who put in operation the chain of events which resulted in the death of the deceased.

[2] It was not necessary for the plaintiff, in order to recover, to show that the tuberculosis was traumatic in origin. If, on account of the depleted and weakened condition of a person caused by an injury, he is rendered more susceptible to germs than if he had not been injured, or if, because of his debilitated condition, he is unable to resist the attack of germs present in his system, then the disease resulting from the germs is a natural sequence to his condition resulting from the injury, and the injury is the proximate cause of his death, and the disease is but one of the links in the chain of causation. *Robinson v. [3] One of the contentions of the defendant is that the trial court erred in permitting an amendment of the plaintiff's complaint changing the date of the alleged accident from May 20, 1914, as testified to by Mrs. Carmine and by the plaintiff, to May 27, 1914. This amendment was occasioned by the fact that the defendant introduced in evidence a letter from Carmine himself written to the owner of the machinery which he had been loading, which fixed the date of the loading as May 27, 1914. The trial of the case took place some five years after the accident, and, considering the nature of the accident, which at the time appeared to be trivial, it is quite natural that the exact date of the injury should not have been retained in the minds of the witnesses. Furthermore, there is no question but that the car in question was loaded by the deceased and his helper, as alleged in the complaint. The permission to make the amendment was therefore properly within the discretion of the trial court. Section 473, Code Civ. Proc.

[4] Testimony admittedly hearsay was introduced on the part of the plaintiff to show, it was claimed, that the deceased had received ordinary care after the injury, and that his injuries and death were not due to lack of such care. This testimony, to which objection is made, was the testimony of Mrs. Carmine as to the opinions and advice of others as to the proper treatment of her husband. Mrs. Carmine was permitted to testify that Dr. Glass recommended exercise of the arms and lower limbs; that Professor De Brock, the professional masseur, was highly recommended to her by one of his patients; that she had called Dr. Dresser on the phone and explained to him the symptoms of the deceased, and that Dr. Dresser told her to go ahead with the treatment she was using, and also indicated other treatments to be employed; that a lady nurse instructed her how to rub her husband's back, and that a man nurse told her that where he had worked in a hospital in Los Angeles they were always using hot applications for an injury of the same kind as her husband's. Mrs. Carmine was permitted to testify, over the objection of the defendant, that Dr. Dresser recommended that deceased see a bone specialist by the name of Dr. Baldwin; that Dr. Dresser told him to go see a man whom Dr. Baldwin had operated on in order to satisfy himself of the doctor's ability; that her husband had gone to see the man; that the man had been operated on by Dr. Baldwin because one of his vertebra was diseased; that the man had to wear a brace for a long time thereafter, and could not lift 50 pounds. In other words, Mrs. Carmine was permitted to testify as to what her husband had said this man had told him. This was hearsay twice removed. Mrs. Carmine admitted on the stand that her knowledge was derived from her husband, and that she based her description regarding this man's condition not only upon what her husband had told her, but also on what a good many other people had said. The defendant had no opportunity to contradict this hearsay testimony, and, while perhaps no single instance narrated in the testimony complained of could be said to be seriously prejudicial, nevertheless the frequency and persistency with which this testimony was iterated and reiterated could not, we think, fail to make a substantial impression upon the minds of the jury adverse to the defendant's case.

[5] The declarations made by the deceased, as testified to by the father-in-law of the deceased, concerning the condition of his back, which were made several hours after the accident, were plainly hearsay. The father-in-law of the deceased testified, among other things, that the deceased spent the night at his home after the accident, and then complained of his back, saying it "was wrenched." Clearly that did not constitute any part of the res geste, and therefore did not fall within the exception to the hearsay rule. Estate of James, 124 Cal. 653, 57 Pac. 578, 1008; 10 Cal. Juris. 1076.

[6] The admission in evidence of a book marked "Day," purporting to be a memorandum kept by Peter Carmine, the deceased, showing an account between himself and his father, was improper. In order to show that two years before the alleged injury the deceased was a sick man, requiring medical attention, and in contradiction of the testimony of Mrs. Carmine that the deceased was in good health before the time of the alleged injury, Sonne, a stage driver, testified on behalf of the defense that he had delivered to the deceased some arnica and smartweed to be used on his back. In rebuttal of the testimony of Sonne, and in support of the testimony of Mrs. Carmine to the effect that the medicine was used by the father of the deceased, and not by the deceased, the plaintiff introduced in evidence several pages from the book marked "Day," claimed to contain an account in the handwriting of the deceased of transactions between the deceased and his father, which pages showed items of medicine similar to that delivered by the stage driver bought by the deceased and charged to his father. The entries in question were in the nature of a private memorandum of the deceased, and the admissibility of the various items are governed and controlled by the provisions of section 1946 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

"The entries * * * of a decedent, made at or near the time of the transaction, and in a position to know the facts stated therein, may be read as prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein, in the following cases: 1. When the entry was made against the interest of the person making it. 2. When it was made in a professional capacity and in the ordinary course of professional conduct. 3. When it was made in the performance of a duty specially enjoined by law."

The point decided in this case is analogous to that decided in the case of Thompson v. Orena, 134 Cal. 26, 30, 66 Pac. 24, 25, wherein it was said:

"A private memorandum book in the handwriting of decedent, and kept by her in her lifetime, showing items of money collected for rent, and other collections, as well as expenditures, and including items of money paid to plaintiff, was placed in evidence by appellant, and afterwards stricken out on motion of plaintiff. In this there was no error. Section 1946 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as to what entries or writings of a decedent may be used as evidence, and these entries, offered as they are on behalf of the estate of the decedent, are not admissible under that section. The book, containing only private memoranda, cannot be held admissible under the rule admitting a tradesman's books, or other entries made in the regular course of business."

[7] Perhaps the most serious error was the introduction in evidence of the testimony of Mrs. Carmine to the effect that Peter Carmine was unable to take certain treatments because of the fact that he had no money and that everything he owned was mortgaged. The introduction of the testimony was permitted upon the issue of reasonable care after the injury, but, as has been pointed out, no such issue was made. Although an instruction was given to the effect that the pecuniary circumstances of the plaintiff or the heirs of the deceased could not increase or diminish the amount of damages which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, if entitled to recover at all, it cannot be said to have cured the error. The court's instruction was general. The jury were not told to disregard this particular evidence. On the contrary, a motion made by the defendant to strike out was refused. This refusal, sanctioning, as it did, the evidence, accentuated the error of its introduction. It cannot be said that by reason of the general instruction the minds of the jury recurred to this particular evidence and eliminated it from consideration. Where the element of sympathy enters into a case, the difficulty is that it is as likely to result in the giving of a verdict against the evidence of nonliability as it is to increase the verdict where a liability exists. Sympathy permeates the whole case and introduces an irrelevant factor which may result not only in the giving of an excessive verdict but a verdict where none would otherwise be given. It cannot be said, we think, that evidence of poverty, particularly where that poverty has apparently resulted from the efforts to meet obligations arising from an illness resulting from the injury in suit, is not prejudicial. The cases in this state are unanimous in holding the admission of such testimony prejudicial error sufficient to call for a reversal of the case. Mahoney v. S. F., etc., Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 471, 42 Pac. 968, 43 Pac. 518; Green v. Southern Pacific, 122 Cal. 563, 55 Pac. 577; Story v. Green, 164 Cal. 768, 130 Pac. 870, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 961; Steinberger v. Cal. Electric, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 386, 168 Pac. 570; Johnston v. Beadle, 6 Cal. App. 251, 91 Pac. 1011; Wilbur v. Emergency Hospital Ass'n, 27 Cal. App. 751, 151 Pac. 155; Lawrence v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 434, 208 Pac. 966; Malone v. Hawley, 46 Cal. 409.

As previously indicated, the errors narrated undoubtedly contributed materially to the verdict, and must therefore be held to have been prejudicial to the defendant's case. As a consequence the case must be remanded for a new trial.

[8, 9] In view of the necessity for a new trial some discussion is proper of the contentions made by the appellant that certain instructions given to the jury were erroneous. Instruction No. 2 requested by plaintiff is a mere general stereotyped instruction which is given in nearly every case. It merely stated the settled rule as to how the jury should weigh the evidence, and cannot, we think, be said to be prejudicial to the defendant in the instant case. Instruction 12 of plaintiff's requested instructions, however, is not very clear, and might well have been omitted. In view of the fact that there were no particular or peculiar presumptions arising out of the evidence it seems unnecessary to charge the jury that "by the term preponderance of evidence is meant simply when all the evidence, including the presumption of law, if there be any applicable to the case, on one side, taken together, is stronger than all the evidence on the other side, taken together, including the presumption of law." Defendant objects to a modification of its requested instruction No. 2, which before modification stated that, if the testimony offered by the defendant, Southern Pacific Company, showed that there was no negligence at said time and place, then the verdict must be for the defendant. As so stated it was clearly incorrect. The jury are to determine from all of the evidence in the case whether or not there was negligence shown on the part of Southern Pacific Company. By striking out the phrase "offered by the defendant, Southern Company" the court made the instruction speak the law correctly. The same is true of the criticism of the modification made of defendant's requested instruction No. 5.

The defendant claims that the jury should have been instructed that, omitting the evidence of the plaintiff as to the cause of the death, the defendant was entitled to a verdict if its evidence showed that the deceased did not die from the alleged injury. The jury was to arrive at a determination of the cause of the death of the deceased from all of the evidence in the case and an instruction which would have instructed the jury to take into consideration only the evidence offered by the defendant would have been clearly erroneous. Of these two instructions as given the defendant has no grounds for complaint.

[10, 11] Instructions No. 9 and No. 14, requested by plaintiff, which instructed the jury in effect that an injured person was required only to secure such medical treatment and to have the injury treated in the same way as an ordinarily reasonable and prudent person would have had it treated, was wholly unnecessary, since it had no application to any issue in the case. The defendant had not alleged or attempted to prove that the absence of medical treatment or inefficient service was the cause of Peter Carmine's death. Such instructions could have had no tendency but to confuse the jury, and should therefore have been omitted. So, likewise, the instructions No. 10 and No. 11, given at plaintiff's request, dealing with the employment by the deceased by the Joshua Hendy Iron Works, to whom the quicksilver pipes were being shipped, were wholly extraneous, and had no place in this case. There was no dispute that the deceased was not in the employment of said company.

[12] Defendant claims that instruction No. 13, which instructed the jury that "it is sufficient to entitle him [plaintiff] to recover if the plaintiff shall have proven by a preponderance of the evidence all of the material allegations of any one of the causes of action," left the determination of the material allegations to the determination of the jury. Inasmuch as the court, in instruction No. 3, had already pointed out the material averments of the complaint in each cause of action, this contention is without merit. We have critically examined the remaining instructions challenged by counsel for the appellant, and we are satisfied that the instructions are not susceptible to the criticism made against them.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

MYERS, J. I concur in the judgment and with what is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice LENNON herein, except that I am inclined to the opinion that the evidence herein is insufficient to support the implied finding of the jury that the death of the decedent proximately resulted from the original injury complained of.

BOGART v. GEORGE K. PORTER CO. et al.
(Porter et al. Interveners). (S. F. 10154.)(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 15, 1924.
Rehearing Denied March 14, 1924.)1. Limitation of actions ⚡5(3)—Statute making contract for benefit of third person enforceable by him held not to render statutes of limitation inapplicable.

Civ. Code, § 1559, providing that a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it, does not exempt third person's right of action from the operation of the statutes of limitation, in view of section 309, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 343, 348.

2. Limitation of actions ⚡46(12)—Right of action on note against one which assumed payment accrued at maturity when subsequent to the assumption.

Right of action on note against trustees of dissolved corporation, which assumed payment thereof on maker's transfer of his assets to corporation before maturity of the note accrued upon maturity of the note, and was barred four years thereafter under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 312, 337, subd. 1, regardless of whether the right of action found its source in the agreement of the immediate parties to the promise to pay the debt, or was based on the theory that the corporation became the principal debtor and the maker its surety, and that plaintiff was entitled in equity to enforce the obligation under Civ. Code, § 2854.

3. Limitation of actions ⚡124—Commencement of action against maker's estate held not to stop running of statute against corporation which had assumed payment.

Where a corporation assumed payment of note on maker's transfer of assets to corporation, the corporation became in effect a joint and several obligor upon the note, the same as if it had been a signer thereof, and the commencement of an action upon the note against the maker's estate did not stop the running of limitations as to the corporation.

4. Limitation of actions ⚡13—Mortgages ⚡275—Grantee assuming payment of debt estopped to deny validity thereof at the time, but may set up limitations subsequently running.

A grantee who assumes payment of a debt cannot contest the validity thereof as a valid and subsisting obligation at the time he assumed it, and will not be heard to claim that it was not at that time a valid and subsisting obligation, but is not thereby estopped to plead limitations subsequently running against his own obligation.

5. Contracts ⚡20—If assumption of payment of note was mere offer, acceptance within reasonable time was necessary.

Where maker of note for a valuable consideration transferred his assets to a corporation which assumed the maker's liabilities, the payee's assignee could not recover against the trustees of corporation after dissolution thereof, and 11 years after the corporation assumed the indebtedness on the theory that assumption of the debt was merely an offer, and that the cause of action did not accrue until acceptance, since, if acceptance was necessary, such acceptance should have been made within a reasonable time, and on plaintiff's failure to accept within a reasonable time the proposal was revoked by operation of law under Civ. Code, § 1587, subd. 2.

6. Limitation of actions ⚡43—Period of limitations runs from accrual of cause of action.

Generally the period of limitations runs from the time when the cause of action accrues; that is, when the creditor is entitled to commence and maintain an action thereon, under Code Civ. Proc. § 312.

7. Limitation of actions ⚡65(1), 66(15)—Demand or acceptance necessary to perfect right of action must be made within reasonable time.

Where a demand or acceptance is necessary before suit to perfect a right of action, a party cannot indefinitely and unnecessarily extend the bar of the statute by deferring such demand or acceptance, but must make it within a reasonable time.

8. Attorney and client ⚡104—Attorney's knowledge held imputable to client.

Knowledge of attorney for payee's assignee that a corporation to which maker had transferred his assets had assumed the payment of a note held chargeable to assignee, precluding her from bringing action against the corporation's trustees after dissolution, and 11 years after corporation's assumption of the debt, though the attorney had in the meantime been an officer of the corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Mary M. Bogart against the George K. Porter Company, Fred L. Boruff, Kate C. Boruff, Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, and others, in which Benjamin F. Porter and others intervened. From judgment for plaintiff, the last three named defendants appeal. Reversed.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Philip C. Boardman, of San Francisco, for defendants.

Hutchinson, Van Fleet & Christin, of San Francisco (Alan C. Van Fleet, of San Francisco, of counsel), for interveners.

Frank J. Solinsky and Edward R. Solinsky, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

MYERS, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a promissory note. The sole contention urged by them upon this appeal is that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations.

After the former decision of this case, a rehearing was applied for by the respondent upon the ground that we had failed to consider one of the points made by her upon the oral argument, and that we had, in effect, overruled the case of More v. Hutchinson, 187 Cal. 623, 203 Pac. 97. The rehearing was granted in order that we might give further consideration to the point stressed upon the application therefor and re-examine our former conclusions in the light of their claimed conflict with the More Case. After such re-examination we adhere to those conclusions upon the points then under consideration, and are satisfied that they present no real conflict with the rules announced in the More Case.

On August 5, 1905, George K. Porter executed and delivered to O. H. Bogart, plaintiff's assignor, the note here sued on, which is for the sum of $2,575.20. The instrument is made payable 18 months from the date thereof, to wit, March 5, 1907. After the execution of the note, and about September 10, 1906, Porter caused the incorporation of the George K. Porter Company. This company was formed principally to take over, hold, own, manage, and control the properties of Porter. In pursuance of this plan Porter a few days thereafter granted and conveyed to the company all of his real and personal property wheresoever situated. The company, as part of the consideration for this conveyance and transfer, agreed to and did assume the payment of all the outstanding indebtedness of Porter existing at the time of said conveyance. This agreement was never rescinded. Shortly thereafter, on November 16, 1906, Porter died. The claim of Bogart upon the note was duly presented within the statutory period to the executors of the estate of Porter. It was rejected, and a suit was duly commenced upon the note, which action is still pending and undetermined. On January 27, 1909, Bogart assigned, transferred, and set over to his wife, the plaintiff herein, all of his right, title, and interest in and to the said note and in and to the action based thereon for its collection, then pending against the executors of Porter's estate. About this time the affairs of the George K. Porter Company became involved and litigation resulted. A settlement was effected, under which a division of the assets of the corporation was made among its stockholders. In pursuance of this settlement the company conveyed all the real property located in the county of Los Angeles, valued at the sum of $750,000, in equal parts to its three principal stockholders, Kate C. Boruff, one of the defendants, and Estelle C. Christin and Benjamin F. Porter, interveners herein. At this time there still remained in the company undistributed certain lands situated in different counties of the state, which, together with certain personal property, amounted in value to about $65,000. On September 30, 1911, this property was transferred and conveyed to the Merchants' Bank & Trust Company, a corporation, now the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, defendant herein, for the purposes of sale, and for the payment out of the proceeds thereof of the taxes thereon and other incidental expenses connected therewith, and also for the payment of all the indebtedness of the Porter Company. Thereafter this last-named company failed to pay its license tax and forfeited its charter, and its directors, Kate C. Boruff, Fred L. Boruff, Louis P. Boardman, and J. E. Pearce, became its trustees by operation of law. Under all of these circumstances, and upon the promise of the Porter Company to pay all of the outstanding indebtedness of George K. Porter, this action was commenced January 20, 1917, against the George K. Porter Company, its trustees, above named, and against the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, as the holder of certain assets of the Porter Company charged with the payment of its indebtedness under the conveyance, as above indicated. The facts, as above stated, are interpreted in the light most favorable to respondent's contentions and in support of the judgment.

[1] Appellants contend that whether the gist of plaintiff's action be considered to be upon the original note which matured in 1907, or upon the assumption thereof by the George K. Porter Company in 1906, or upon the implied assumption thereof by the bank in 1911, in either event it is barred by the statute of limitations; this action having been commenced more than 4 years subsequent to all of those dates. Respondent contends that her cause of action rests upon the agreement of the George K. Porter Company in 1906, whereby it assumed and agreed to pay all of the outstanding indebtedness of the said George K. Porter; that under the well-recognized rule of equity, which has been enacted as a rule of law in section 1559 of the Civil Code, providing that "a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it," her right of action is exempted from the operation of any of the statutes of limitation. Her position is that the phrase "at any time before the parties thereto rescind it" expresses the only limitation upon her right to maintain her action, and that all statutes of limitation are excluded thereby. We cannot accept this view. The rule of law there expressed is a rule of substantive law, and is not adjective or procedural. It means that the cause of action arises in favor of the third person upon the making of such a contract, and that such a cause of action subsists until the parties thereto rescind their contract. It does not mean that the right to commence and maintain an action upon such cause of action is exempted from the statutes of limitation. This conclusion is fortified by a consideration of the various provisions of title 2, part 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the time of commencing civil actions. The Legislature has there specified the limitations applicable to a wide variety of actions, and then, to rebut the possible inference that actions not therein specifically described are to be regarded as exempt from limitations, it has specified a 4-year limitation upon "an action for relief not hereinbefore provided for" (section 343); and where it has intended that an action shall be exempt from limitations it has said so in clear and unmistakable language. Code Civ. Proc. § 348; Civ. Code, § 309.

It is the theory of some of the decisions that the right of action thus recognized finds its source in the agreement of the immediate parties thereto (George K. Porter and the George K. Porter Company) from which the law operating upon the acts of the parties creates the duty, establishes a privity, and implies the promise and obligation on which the action is founded. Washer v. Independent M. & D. Co., 142 Cal. 703, 76 Pac. 654. Other cases proceed upon the theory that—"When a grantee contracts with his grantor to pay the latter's debt or obligation in payment, or in part payment, for the conveyance, the creditor or obligee may accept and appropriate that contract to himself and maintain a suit in equity to enforce it. In that event the grantee becomes the principal debtor and the grantor the surety, and the creditor's suit stands on the equitable doctrines that the creditor may have the benefit of any security or obligation given by the principal debtor to the surety, * * *." Silver King Coalition Mines Co. v. Silver King Cons. Min. Co., 204 Fed. 169, 122 C. O. A. 405, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 571; 3 Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (4th Ed.) p. 2891; Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 438, 440, 37 Pac. 411; Daniels v. Johnson, 129 Cal. 415, 418, 61 Pac. 1107, 79 Am. St. Rep. 123.

"In fact, the relief granted is merely the application towards the payment of the debt by a court of equity of the mortgagor's property, consisting of the promise running to him from the grantee of the mortgaged premises." 1 Williston on Contracts, p. 724.

[2] Under the rule of the cases which hold that the right of action "finds its source in the agreement of the immediate parties thereto," it is apparent that the obligation from the promisor (grantee) to the third person (creditor) arises at once upon the making of the agreement. The law instantly "creates the duty, establishes a privity, and implies the promise and obligation on which the action is founded." The cause of action therefore arises at once, and the right of action thereon accrues when the obligation is breached. If the original indebtedness does not mature until after the assumption thereof by the promisor (grantee), the breach would occur and the right of action accrue when, upon the maturity of the original indebtedness, the promisor failed to pay the same. Roberts v. Fitzallen, 120 Cal. 482, 52 Pac. 818. If the original indebtedness had matured prior to the assumption thereof, the obligation would be breached immediately upon its creation, and the right of action would accrue at that time. Davis v. Davis, 19 Cal. App. 797, 127 Pac. 1051; Daniels v. Johnson, supra.

Under the rule of the cases which proceed upon the theory that the grantee (promisor) becomes the principal debtor and the grantor (promisee) his surety, and that the creditor (third person) is entitled in equity to enforce that obligation and apply it to the satisfaction of his claim, it is clear that the basis of his action is the obligation from the grantee to his grantor. That obligation is fully created when the contract to assume the debt is entered into, and the right of action thereon would accrue at the time and under the conditions as above stated. This conclusion is supported by a consideration of the provisions of section 2854 of the Civil Code, that—

"A creditor is entitled to the benefit of everything which a surety has received from the debtor by way of security for the performance of the obligation, and may, upon the maturity of the obligation, compel the application of such security to its satisfaction." (Italics added.)

It follows that under either of the foregoing theories as to the nature of plaintiff's cause of action herein her right of action thereon as against the George K. Porter Company accrued upon the maturity of the obligation which the latter had assumed, which matured March 5, 1907. Assuming it to be founded upon an instrument in writing, it outlived at the expiration of 4 years after it accrued. Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 1; section 312.

[3] The obligation herein was kept alive by the commencement of the action upon the note against the estate of George K. Porter, deceased, which suit is still pending and undetermined. This undoubtedly has the effect of keeping the right of action alive as against that estate, but not as against any other parties liable upon the note. Conceding that the indebtedness evidenced by this note was a part of the indebtedness assumed and agreed to be paid in 1906 by the George K. Porter Company, the latter became, in effect, a joint and several obligor upon that note, the same as if it had been a signer thereof, and the rule would apply that the pendency of an action against one of several joint obligors stops the running of the statute of limitations only as to him who was the party defendant at the time it was filed. Jeffers v. Cook, 58 Cal. 147, 150; Spaulding v. Howard, 121 Cal. 194, 198, 53 Pac. 563; Harrison v. McCormick, 122 Cal. 651, 55 Pac. 592; Sherman v. S. K. D. Oil Co., 185 Cal. 534, 548, 197 Pac. 799.

[4] Respondent relies upon the rule stated in 3 Pomeroy Eq. Jur. (4th Ed.) p. 2888, as follows:

"That a grantee who thus assumes payment, in whole or in part, of a mortgage as a portion of the purchase price of the land conveyed to him, cannot contest the validity of the mortgage on any ground and thus evade the liability which he has assumed."

Respondent construes this rule to mean that such a grantee cannot defend against the enforcement of such a mortgage even upon the ground that the action thereon is barred as to him by the statute of limitations. But the rule does not go thus far either in its language or in its meaning. It means only this: That a grantee who thus assumes payment of a mortgage cannot contest the validity thereof as a valid and subsisting obligation at the time he assumed it; or, in other words, that he will not be heard to claim that it was not at that time a valid and subsisting obligation. That this is the extent and the limitation of the rule is made manifest by an examination of the numerous cases which are cited by the author to this portion of his text. All of those cases, with the exceptions hereafter noted, were cases wherein the grantee sought to contest the validity of the mortgage upon a ground which, if successful, would have established its invalidity at the time he assumed it, such as failure or want of consideration therefor, fraud, undue influence, nonexecution, usury, etc. The rule is but a particular application of the general rule of estoppel by deed. A grantee who by a covenant in his deed expressly recognizes the existence and validity of a particular debt or other obligation, and assumes and agrees to pay the same, is estopped thereby to claim that such debt or obligation was not valid or subsisting at the time he so recognized and assumed it, but the estoppel thus arising goes no further than the admissions of the covenant out of which it arises. This is apparent from the cases cited by the author. For example, in Sherman v. Goodwin, 12 Ariz. 42, 95 Pac. 121, Robinson Bank v. Miller, 153 Ill. 244, 38 N. E. 1078, 27 L. R. A. 449, 46 Am. St. Rep. 883, and Drury v. Holden, 121 Ill. 130, 13 N. E. 547, it was held that where the deed does not specifically describe the particular debt, but contains a general clause whereby the grantee assumes "all mortgage and other liens standing against the property," or "all the outstanding indebtedness of the grantor," such grantee is not estopped thereby from contesting the validity of any such claimed mortgage, lien or indebtedness.

"If the promisor's agreement is to be construed as a promise to discharge whatever liability the promisee is under, the promisor must certainly be allowed to show that the promise [e] was under no liability. Thus one who in return for an assignment of property assumed all the grantor's debts would certainly be allowed to dispute the validity of any debt. On the other hand, if the promise means that the promisor agrees to pay a sum of money to A, to whom the promisee says he is indebted, it is immaterial whether the promisee is actually indebted to that amount or at all. The promisee has decided that question himself. Where the promise is to pay a specific debt, for example, to assume a specific mortgage, especially if the amount of it is deducted from the consideration paid by the promisor for the mortgaged property, this construction will generally be the true one. Most of the cases accordingly refuse to allow one who has assumed a specific debt to set up usury or other defenses, of which the debtor might have availed himself." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 399.

This limitation of the rule was recognized and impliedly approved by this court in Alvord v. Spring Valley G. Co., 106 Cal. 547, 553, 40 Pac. 27. So, also, it was held in Davis v. Davis, 19 Cal. App. 797, that such a grantee cannot set up that the mortgaged debt when he assumed it was barred by the statute of limitations, because to do so would be to contradict the covenants of his deed, which recognized the debt as a then valid and subsisting obligation. That the rule here in question rests upon the doctrine of estoppel by deed is also expressly recognized in the cases of Hurwitz v. Gross, 5 Cal. App. 614, 618, 91 Pac. 109, and San Ramon Valley Bank v. Walden Co., 53 Cal. App. 534, 536, 200 Pac. 662, as well as in the case of Alvord v. Spring Valley G. Co., supra.

"The nature of a creditor's right against one who has promised the debtor to pay the debt is also involved in determining when the statute of limitations bars the creditor's action. On principle the creditor must have a claim that has not been barred against the original debtor [see, also, Daniels v. Johnson, 129 Cal. at page 418, 61 Pac. 1107, 79 Am. St. Rep. 123], and the latter must also have such a claim against the promisor. But courts which allow a direct right to the creditor against the promisor hold that, though the creditor's original claim is barred, he may nevertheless enforce a claim against the promisor, if the statutory period has not run since the debt was assumed." 1 Williston on Contracts, § 398. (Italics added.)

No case has been cited herein, nor have we found any, which decides that the statute of limitations will not run in favor of a grantee, upon his contract to assume a debt, or that a grantee who is sued upon a debt, the payment of which he has assumed by a covenant in his deed, is estopped to defend upon the ground that the statute has run upon his obligation since the maturity thereof. There are cases in which language is used which seems to support this conclusion, but upon analysis it is found that such language goes beyond the points decided and is irrelevant to the facts there under consideration. For example, in Davis v. Davis, supra, the court cites a Michigan case and holding "that where a vendee assumes the payment of a mortgage indebtedness, he waives all defenses thereto except payment." That question was not involved in the Davis Case. The sole question there was whether such a vendee could defend on the ground that the indebtedness was not a valid obligation at the time he assumed it, and the court correctly held that he could not. The Michigan case there cited (Terry v. Durand Land Co., 112 Mich. 665, 71 N. W. 525) did use the language above quoted, but all that it decided in this connection was that such a grantee could not set up want of consideration between the assignee and the assignor of the mortgage as a defense to a suit by the assignee. The case there cited as authority for the quoted dictum (Crawford v. Edwards, 33 Mich. 354) went no further. The same is true of the case of Key West, etc., Co. v. Porter, 63 Fla. 448, 58 South. 599, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 173. Allen v. Freear, 50 Cal. App. 645, 195 Pac. 748, was a suit in equity brought by a creditor of one Bateman to impose a trust upon certain property. Bateman, who had become financially involved in the conduct of a grocery business, conveyed the same to Freear in trust to conduct the business, pay Bateman's debts from the proceeds thereof, and then to reconvey to Bateman a one-half interest therein, and upon no other consideration. Freear sold the business in violation of the trust, receiving therefor a note and mortgage, upon the proceeds of which it was sought to impose the trust. Freear pleaded the statute of limitations, and the District Court of Appeal held that the trust being a positive one, though resting in parol, the statute could not run until a repudiation and knowledge thereof. It then added:

"Moreover, Freear having received the property under the express agreement to pay the debts of Bateman, and there being no repudiation thereof, it does not lie in his mouth to plead the statute as against Bateman's creditors. He cannot be heard to say that while the debt is due from the person with whom he contracted, that the statute has intervened"—citing Washer v. Independent, etc., Co., Williams v. Naftzger, and Davis v. Davis, supra.

If this language is to be given the broad effect contended for by respondent herein, it is not supported by the cited cases or by any others which have been called to our attention. Under the facts in that case the statute of limitations had not run under any tenable theory of the nature of the cause of action. The language above quoted was not necessary to the decision, and is not to be regarded as authority herein.

It is to be noted that there is no element of trust in the instant case, so far as the question of the liability of the George K. Porter Company is concerned, and the respondent so concedes. There is neither allegation nor evidence nor finding which would support the inference that a trust relationship existed on the part of that defendant. It clearly appears that the conveyance of property from Porter to the Porter Company was not upon any trust, but, on the contrary, passed to the grantee upon a valuable consideration, not merely the legal title, but the entire beneficial interest in the property conveyed, and the trial court found that "the said corporation thereupon became the owner of all the said property."

[5] In the case of More v. Hutchinson, supra, it was held that the rule that suit may be brought by the third person upon a contract entered into for his benefit immediately upon the execution of the contract arises from the fact that the suit itself is deemed an acceptance of the contract, and until such acceptance there is no liability on the part of the person making the contract, but such contract, as far as the third person is concerned, amounts to a mere offer or proposal. On the authority of that case it is now argued that the assumption by the George K. Porter Company of the debts of Porter was a mere offer or proposal which did not give rise to any obligation in favor of plaintiff until the acceptance thereof by plaintiff; that plaintiff never accepted it until the commencement of this action, and, therefore, the statute of limitations could not have run. This point was not made nor was that case cited in any of the briefs on file herein, although the case had been briefed three different times by both parties upon this appeal; first, upon the original appeal, then upon application for rehearing in the District Court of Appeal, and again upon application for hearing by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal. The point was mentioned and the More Case cited for the first time in the oral argument at the hearing by this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, but nothing was said to indicate that the point was not discussed or that case cited in the briefs on file. The former opinion was written in response to the arguments presented in the briefs, and therefore did not dispose of the point now urged.

[6, 7] The case of More v. Hutchinson was dealing with the peculiar statute of limitations applicable to stockholders' liability which forms an express exception to the general rule with respect to the time when the statute begins to run. Code Civ. Proc. § 359. The general rule is that the statute runs from the time when the cause of action accrues (Code Civ. Proc. § 312), or, in other words, when the creditor is entitled to commence and maintain an action thereon. But the statute under consideration in the More Case runs from the time when the liability was created, which may be, and frequently is, an entirely different point of time. This distinction was pointed out in the case of Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87, which was cited in the opinion in the More Case. The statute of limitations there under consideration looks to the time when the defendant's liability arose, but the general rule is that a statute of limitation looks to the time when the plaintiff's right to commence the action accrued.

"The theory of our statute of limitations is that a creditor has four years (or other time, as the case may be) on any day of which he may, of his own volition, commence an action." Union Collection Co. v. Soule, 141 Cal. 99, 74 Pac. 549.

Plaintiff herein had nearly 7 years, on any day of which she might, of her own volition, have commenced this action. The bringing of the suit constitutes the acceptance which creates the obligation and perfects the right of action. Morgan v. Overman S. M. Co., 37 Cal. 534, 537; More v. Hutchinson, supra. So, with reference to a promissory note payable on demand, the bringing of the suit is a sufficient demand, and the statute runs not from the time of the demand, but from the execution of the note. Brummagim v. Talant, 29 Cal. 503, 89 Am. Dec. 61. Where a demand or acceptance is necessary before suit to perfect a right of action, a party cannot indefinitely and unnecessarily extend the bar of the statute by referring such demand or acceptance, but must make it within a reasonable time. Thomas v. Pac. Beach Co., 115 Cal. 136, 142, 46 Pac. 899; Meherin v. S. F. Produce Exchg., 117 Cal. 215, 217, 48 Pac. 1074; Dennis v. Bint, 122 Cal. 39, 44, 54 Pac. 378, 68 Am. St. Rep. 17; Harrigan v. Home Life Ins. Co., 128 Cal. 531, 548, 58 Pac. 180, 61 Pac. 99; People v. Cal. Safe Dep., etc., Co., 41 Cal. App. 727, 731, 183 Pac. 289, and cases there cited.

[8] It is argued that the instant case is not governed by the rule last mentioned, because it is not a case wherein the acceptance is required merely to perfect a right of action upon a cause of action already existing but presents a situation, as in the More Case, wherein the acceptance is necessary to create the obligation itself which constitutes the cause of action. So, also, was the case of Thomas v. Pac. Beach Co., supra, but, granting this contention, and giving full application herein to the rule of the More Case, and conceding that the contract of the George K. Porter Company, whereby it assumed and agreed to pay Porter's debts, was, as to the plaintiff, nothing more than a mere offer or proposal, which could not give rise to an obligation unless and until accepted by plaintiff, it follows that the duty rested upon the plaintiff to accept such proposal within a reasonable time, and upon her failure to do so the proposal was revoked by operation of law. Civ. Code, § 1587, subd. 2; 1 Williston on Contracts, § 54. The "proposal" herein was made in 1906, and not accepted by plaintiff until 1917. It is suggested that plaintiff did not know of its existence until "a year or two" before this action was commenced. But it conclusively appears from the record that her attorney, who was especially charged with the collection of this particular indebtedness, was fully cognizant of all of the facts as early as 1910, and she is chargeable with that knowledge. 1 Cal. Jur. pp. 846-854, and cases cited. Counsel for respondents urge that the knowledge acquired by Mrs. Bogart's attorney, Mr. Louis P. Boardman, of the existence of the resolution of assumption of indebtedness which is the foundation of the present action was acquired by him, not while he was acting as her attorney but while he was acting as director and vice president of the corporation, and they urge that she is not chargeable with this knowledge under the rule that "a client, as principal, is not bound by knowledge obtained by his attorney as agent in the course of other employment," citing Wittenbrock v. Parker, 102 Cal. at page 101, 36 Pac. 374, 24 L. R. A. 197, 41 Am. St. Rep. 172. That rule is not applicable to the facts of this case. It appears by the uncontradicted testimony of Mr. Boardman himself that he was acting as Mrs. Bogart's attorney during all of the time from the date of the assignment of the note to her by her husband in 1909 until shortly before the commencement of the present action; that as such attorney he was in charge, by express arrangement with her, of all proceedings that were had or taken in the action relative to the disposition of the note or otherwise, and also relative to all considerations of settlement and compromise; that he acquired full knowledge of the existence of the resolution in 1910; and that he did not become director or vice president of the defendant corporation until July, 1911; that prior to his employment by or in behalf of the defendant corporation he held many consultations with representatives of the George K. Porter Company, at which "the outstanding indebtedness of the company was considered, including this obligation represented by this note." The rule invoked by counsel is subject to the qualification that "knowledge possessed by an agent while he occupies that relation and is executing the authority conferred upon him, as to matters within the scope of his authority, is notice to his principal, although such knowledge may have been acquired before the agency was created, if it appears that such knowledge was present in his mind at the time he acted for the principal." Cooke v. Mesmer, 164 Cal. 332, 338, 128 Pac. 917, 920; Christie v. Sherwood, 113 Cal. 526, 530, 45 Pac. 820. It further appears from Mr. Boardman's testimony that he was actively engaged during the years 1909 and 1910 in taking depositions to be used in the trial of the action of Mrs. Bogart against the Porter estate upon this note, and that during the years 1910 and 1911 he was negotiating as attorney for Mrs.

Bogart with the officers of the defendant corporation for a settlement by compromise of her claim upon this note. The circumstance that Mr. Boardman, before accepting employment in behalf of the Porter Company, deemed it necessary to have an express understanding with the representatives of that company that such employment should be without prejudice to his position as attorney for Mrs. Bogart, and without prejudice to his right to proceed upon her claim, shows that he had in mind at that time the knowledge that her claim was against the corporation, and therefore adverse to it. Under these circumstances his knowledge of the existence of the resolution which is the foundation of the present action must be deemed to have been her knowledge from the time he first acquired it in 1910.

It cannot be said that an acceptance after an unexplained delay of more than six years was within a reasonable time. 6 Cal. Jur. pp. 56, 57, and cases cited. It follows that plaintiff is not entitled to recover herein in either view of the case. If it be deemed that the contract of assumption by the George K. Porter Company, ipso facto, created the cause of action here sued upon, the action is barred by the statute of limitations. If it be deemed that such assumption constituted a mere offer or proposal, the same was revoked by operation of law before its acceptance by plaintiff, and therefore never gave rise to the obligation here sought to be enforced.

With respect to the question of the liability of the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, it is to be noted that this defendant did not assume, or agree, or promise, or offer to pay any indebtedness whatsoever. The George K. Porter Company conveyed to it certain property in trust for certain specified purposes, among which was the payment of the debts of the grantor, and it still holds said property under said trust. It follows that, if the respondent were entitled to recover herein as against the Porter Company, she would also be entitled to have her claim satisfied out of the assets held by the bank in trust for that company. But, having no enforceable claim as against the Porter Company, she has none against the bank.

The judgment is reversed.

In prospective tenant's action against apartment house operators for injuries caused by defective condition of automatic elevator, evidence as to the orders and rules promulgated by the Industrial Accident Commission respecting the maintenance and operation of similar elevators and as to inspections made by the Commission under St. 1917, p. 84, held admissible.

3. Carriers ⚡320(14)—Negligence in operation of defective automatic elevator held for jury.

In prospective tenant's action against operators of apartment house for injuries caused by defective automatic elevator, the question of negligence held for the jury.

4. Carriers ⚡315(1)—Plaintiff in suit for elevator injury, having specified certain negligence, could not prove other negligence.

In prospective tenant's action against operators of apartment house for injuries caused by defective automatic elevator, in which the only specification of negligence in the complaint was the failure to keep the elevator in repair, the plaintiff could not recover on proof of negligent failure to keep the hallway leading to elevator lighted.

5. Carriers ⚡347(4) — Contributory negligence of prospective tenant in walking into elevator shaft held for jury.

In prospective tenant's action against operators of apartment building for injuries caused by defective condition of automatic elevator when she walked into elevator shaft, thinking elevator in place, in which there was evidence that the door would not have been open if the elevator had been in good condition, the question of the prospective tenant's contributory negligence was one for the jury.

6. Trial ⚡191(7), 240—Instruction as to liability as to operator of automatic elevator held argumentative and invasive of province of jury as assuming fact.

In prospective tenant's action against operators of apartment building for injuries caused by defective automatic elevator, involving an issue as to whether the defendants knew that the elevator was in a defective condition, an instruction that, "You are instructed that the defendants in operating the automatic elevator therein for the carriage of tenants and their guests and persons who visited the place on business were not excused from liability for injuries due to an inherent structural defect in the appliance, or from some lack of repair, on the theory that the elevator installed was as perfect an elevator as could be constructed under the then condition of electrical knowledge and science, as the law does not contemplate that such appliance may be used to the peril of the life or limb of those who may be invited to employ them, at least without adequate warning and protection against the perils attending such employment," held erroneous, being argumentative and invasive of the province of the jury, in that it assumes an inherent structural defect or some lack of repair.

7. Carriers — 293—Operators of apartment house not liable for injuries to prospective tenant from defective elevator, unless negligent.

Operators of apartment house were not liable for injuries to prospective tenant caused by an inherent structural defect in an automatic elevator or lack of repair thereof, unless negligent with respect thereto.

8. Trial — 251(8) — Instruction authorizing finding not within issues held erroneous.

In prospective tenant's action against operators of apartment building for injuries caused by defective automatic elevator, in which the only negligence alleged in the complaint was the negligent failure to keep elevator in repair, instruction held erroneous as inviting the jury to predicate a finding of negligence as to a matter entirely outside of the issues.

9. Trial — 191(7)—Instruction held erroneous in that it assumed negligence.

In prospective tenant's action against operators of apartment building for injuries caused by defective automatic elevator, in which the complaint alleged the negligent operation of the elevator in defective condition, instruction held erroneous, in that it assumed the negligence of the defendants.

10. Carriers — 293—Operators of apartment building liable for injuries caused by negligence in maintenance of elevator, though they employed inspector.

If operators of apartment building were negligent in the maintenance of an automatic elevator, the mere fact that they employed an inspector and that he made inspections did not relieve them from liability for injuries to prospective tenant caused by such negligence.

11. Carriers — 316(7)—Proof of defect in elevator not proof of ultimate fact of negligence.

In prospective tenant's action against operators of apartment building for injuries caused by defective automatic elevator, the mere proof of a defect in the elevator, whether latent or patent, was not proof of the ultimate fact of negligence, but was a probative fact, which merely tended to prove negligence.

12. Carriers — 316(7)—Res ipsa loquitur doctrine held inapplicable.

In prospective tenant's action against operators of apartment building for injuries caused by defective automatic elevator, in which the only negligence specified in the complaint was the failure to keep the elevator in order and repair, the res ipsa loquitur doctrine held inapplicable.

13. Appeal and error — 760(1)—Court will not search entire record to ascertain whether substance of refused instruction was embodied in given instructions.

Appellant's contention that court erred in refusal to give 12 instructions requested by them, with the mere general assertion that "these instructions we submit expressed the law correctly, and were relevant and pertinent, nor did the court give equivalent instructions," will not be considered, since the court will not search the entire record to ascertain whether or not the substance thereof has been embodied in the instructions given.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Alice T. McKeon against A. L. Lissner and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Rehearing denied; Richards, J., not participating.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MYERS, J. [1] Defendants appeal herein from a judgment on verdict in favor of the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in falling to the bottom of an elevator shaft in an apartment house operated by the defendants. We adopt the following portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal herein, which was prepared by Mr. Justice St. Sure:

"Plaintiff, looking for an apartment, visited a certain apartment house of which defendants were lessees. Being admitted to the building, she approached an automatic elevator maintained in the premises for the use of tenants and others. The door of the elevator cage was open, and plaintiff, believing that she saw the cage in its proper place, stepped through the doorway, and fell to the bottom of the shaft, a distance of about 14 feet. She received injuries for which a jury awarded her damages in the sum of $4,000. Defendants appeal from the judgment.

"The automatic elevator was of a type now generally in use in apartment houses. There was a grill door in the elevator itself, and on each landing there was another door of wired glass opposite the elevator entrance. So-called 'safety' locks were installed on each floor, which permitted any one of said last-mentioned doors to be opened when the elevator was at that floor. The elevator could be brought to any floor by pressing a button located at such floor. Buttons were installed in the elevator cage with numerals on them corresponding to the floors in the building, and a passenger in the elevator would be carried to any particular floor by pressing the corresponding button in the elevator. It was necessary that both the door on the shaft and the elevator door be closed before the cage could be moved, and it was impossible to open the shaft door at any floor except the one at which the elevator was standing if the mechanism was in order. If parts of the mechanism were out of order the shaft door might be opened without the elevator being at the same level, sometimes at once, and easily, and again with difficulty, and after trials lasting from half an hour to an hour. In addition to the inspection of the elevator by the Industrial Accident Commission (provided for by an act of the Legislature approved April 6, 1917; Stats. of that year, page 84), defendants had a weekly inspection made by a private company, part of which inspection consisted in testing the doors. The testing of the shaft door, according to an inspector of the company, consisted in dropping the cage about three feet below each floor and trying the shaft door three or four times to see if it would open. Such an inspection had been made two days before the accident, and no defects noted. Immediately after the accident the lock was removed from the door, and it was found that a spring inside had broken, probably through crystallization of the tempered steel of which it was made. This was a gradual process and not discoverable by the tests made by the inspector, nor except by removing the lock itself.

"The evidence shows that plaintiff had made two visits to the apartment house on the day she was injured. The first visit was at about 2 o'clock, and the second at about 5 o'clock in the afternoon. She readily used the elevator on the occasion of her first visit. On her second visit she approached the elevator, and thought she saw the cage door open. 'When I got back to the place where the elevator was located I turned,' she testified. 'I found the door open, and then, of course, I am accustomed to automatic elevators, having lived in places nearly two years where I operated one several times a day; so, of course, an open door said to me that the cage of the elevator was there, but I stood there just a moment; I was only there a moment looking, and I thought I saw this cage, and I looked straight ahead of me, and I thought I saw the elevator, and I looked down, and I thought I saw the elevator floor, so, of course, I stepped in and fell down. The elevator wasn't there. There was no light in the hallway at the time that I went in there the second time. It was as dark as could be, and that is the reason I stopped and looked for the floor of the elevator. It appeared to me at 5 o'clock that it was a little bit darker than when I was there at 2 o'clock. My recollection is that it was a bright day. I was thoroughly acquainted at that time with automatic elevators. In my experience with automatic elevators I have seen an automatic elevator with the door ajar and the cage there. I have seen this on more than one occasion. I lived in an apartment house before that for a long time. I have lived on the top floor in an apartment house, and very often I had to walk downstairs when I was in a hurry, simply because when I pressed the button the elevator did not come up to me because the door down on the third floor had been partially open. I know positively that you cannot move the elevator if the door is the least bit open. You can't open the door unless the cage is at the floor. I found the door ajar and the cage appeared to be at the floor. I looked, and thought I could discern this black cage. You can see the floor, and it is rather black, and I saw what I thought to be the black floor of the cage, and of course I thought the elevator was there. I stepped in, and I remember myself falling. I knew I was falling. The next I remember was being down at the bottom of the pit.'

"After viewing the premises during the trial, plaintiff testified that she was impressed 'that something had been done to brighten the light up greatly; it seemed very much brighter. The sun was shining right through the transom above the two doors. The light yesterday appeared much better than on the day I was there. There was plenty of light there. * * * A police officer, who appeared at the scene of the accident, and assisted in removing plaintiff from the pit of the elevator shaft, testified, 'When I went back to the elevator that hall around the elevator was to me rather dark.' The defendants testified that a light was always maintained in the elevator cage, and their manager and one of the tenants testified that the light was lit at 2 o'clock on the day of the accident, and also at the time the accident occurred. An elevator inspector testified that upon the occasion of his visit the light in the elevator cage was always burning; that 'if the light was out you never could see the punch buttons.'

"Defendants' points on appeal are, first, that there was no evidence of negligence whatever; second, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; third, errors in the instructions of the court; and, fourth, errors of the court in refusing to give instructions requested by defendants.

"In their argument, given in support of the first point, counsel for defendants call our attention to the fact that the Legislature in 1917 (Stats. of that year, page 84) passed an act forbidding the operation of elevators without a license to be issued by the Industrial Accident Commission, after inspection and approval of elevators by inspectors appointed by it, the inspection fees to be paid by the elevator owner or operator, and by the terms of the act the owner or operator is obliged to comply with orders issued by the commission respecting repairs, alterations, etc., of the elevator. Counsel earnestly contend that 'since the passage of this act owners and operators of elevators have ceased to be free agents'; that 'the statute of 1917 revolutionized the law relating to the responsibility of owners and operators of elevators'; that 'a new system was put in operation by that act, and the old system of freedom of action, coupled with responsibility, was abolished'; that 'the theory underlying the act in question is that these matters cannot safely be trusted to the control of private enterprise, but should be taken in hand by public authority.'

"With this contention we are unable to agree. An examination of the statute discloses, as expressed in the first clause of its title, that it is 'an act for the periodical inspection of elevators operated in places of employment in this state,' etc. Sections 1 and 2 of the act seem designed to protect employees in the place where the elevator is maintained, and it may be, as suggested by counsel for plaintiff, that the act has no application to the maintenance of the elevator involved herein. However, we are not called upon to decide such a question in this case.

"We cannot conceive that it was the intention and purpose of the Legislature, in the passage of said act, to 'revolutionize' the law relating to the responsibility of owners and operators of elevators. We think that the act was intended merely for the purpose of providing additional safeguards in the type of elevators used and in the mechanism employed in their operation; and that the periodical inspection of the same was provided for to the end that the public generally, as well as employees in the building where elevators are used, might have additional protection against injury or loss of life. The legislation was probably inspired through an enlightened appreciation of the value of human life, rather than for the purpose of relieving the owners and operators of all responsibility. In our opinion the measure of the owner's care prescribed by the law and owing to persons lawfully using an elevator has not been diminished in the slightest degree by said act of 1917."

[2, 3] To the foregoing it should be added that the facts as to the requirements of the orders and rules promulgated by the Industrial Accident Commission respecting the maintenance and operation of elevators similar to the one here in question, and as to the inspections made by that Commission, were proper to be placed in evidence and to be considered by the jury in its determination of the question whether or not the defendants were negligent in the maintenance of the elevator under all the circumstances in evidence, which was, in the first instance at least, a question of fact for the jury.

[4] In answer to appellants' contention that the evidence was insufficient to support the implied finding of negligence of defendants, respondent replies that negligence was proven in at least two particulars: (1) "The maintaining of the dark and confusing hallway leading to the elevator," and (2) "in operating the elevator with a broken spring, when no inspection had been made adequate to disclose the defective appliance." It is to be noted that the first specification of negligence above is entirely outside the issues made by the allegations of the complaint and answer herein. The complaint contains no allegation of negligence other than that which had to do with and was expressly limited to the failure of defendants "to keep said elevator and said apparatus for operating the same in order and repair." In such case the plaintiff can recover only upon proof of one or more of the acts or omissions alleged in the complaint. Marovich v. Central California Traction Co. (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 595, and cases cited. Inasmuch as this case must be reversed because of errors in the instructions, to be hereinafter noted, and as the evidence may not be the same upon a second trial thereof, we do not deem it necessary to here pass upon the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the allegations contained in the complaint.

[5] In response to appellants' contention that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence, it is sufficient to say that such negligence cannot be said to appear conclusively as a matter of law from the evidence herein. Jacobi v. Builders' Realty Co., 174 Cal. 708, 711, 164 Pac. 394, L. R. A. 1917E, 696; Muller v. Hale, 138 Cal. 163, 167, 71 Pac. 81.

The court, at the request of plaintiff, gave the following instruction to the jury:

"You are instructed that the defendants in operating the automatic elevator therein for the carriage of tenants and their guests and persons who visited the place on business were not excused from liability for injuries due to an inherent structural defect in the appliance, or from some lack of repair, on the theory that the elevator installed was as perfect an elevator as could be constructed under the then condition of electrical knowledge and science, as the law does not contemplate that such appliances may be used to the peril of the life or limb of those who may be invited to employ them, at least without adequate warning and protection against the perils attending such employment."

[6-8] This presents an excellent illustration of the danger inhering in the practice of copying language used in an opinion of a reviewing court and embodying the same in an instruction to be given to the jury. The above instruction consists in part of a garbled quotation from the opinion of this court in the Jacobi Case, supra, at page 710 (161 Pac. 395.) The passage from which the quotation was taken reads as follows:

"If the apparatus, though it be the last achievement of mechanical and scientific skill, is not a suitable appliance to be used in the transportation of passengers, to employ it for that purpose is negligence. The law does not contemplate that such appliances, in the experimental stage of their development, may be used to the peril of the life and limb of those who may be invited to employ them, at least without adequate warning and protection against the perils attending such employment." (Italics added.)

By lifting the second sentence thereof out of the context by which it was limited and qualified it was given an apparent meaning entirely different from that which it was used to convey. The language quoted, as used in the opinion, was expressly applied to apparatus which was in the experimental stage of development, and which, "though it be the last achievement of mechanical and scientific skill, is not a suitable appliance to be used in the transportation of passengers." The quoted language was used arguendo in the discussion of a case wherein it had been proved, without conflict, that the apparatus in question was not only seriously defective, but was actually known by the defendant to be so defective prior to the time of the injury. Embodied in an instruction to the jury, under the issues and evidence as presented in the instant case, it is open to the criticism that it is argumentative, invades the province of the jury to determine the facts, and misstates the law applicable thereto. It is not only argumentative, but is arguing against a contention made in the Jacobi Case which has not been made at any time in the case at bar, so far as the record discloses. It invades the province of the jury, in that it assumes that there was in the case at bar either an inherent structural defect or some lack of repair, whereas both of these were questions of fact for the jury's determination. It misstates the law, in that it tells the jury, in effect, that defendants would be liable for injuries due to an inherent structural defect or to lack of repair, regardless of whether defendants were or were not negligent with respect thereto. It is further erroneous in its application to the instant case, in that it invites the jury to predicate a finding of negligence upon the failure of the defendants to give "adequate warning and protection against the perils attending such employment," which finding, if made, would be entirely outside of the issues herein.

[9] The court also instructed the jury as follows:

"You are instructed that even though you may find from the evidence that prior to the accident defendants had employed an inspector to inspect its elevator, as well as the doors and other appliances in use in connection therewith, and that an inspection failed to disclose any defect in the elevator or the doors or the other appliances used in connection therewith, and that they were apparently in a reasonably safe condition; but, if you find that the accident occurred by reason of a defect or a failure to keep the appliances in repair, the mere fact of the employment of an inspector will not relieve defendants from the consequences of their negligence."

This instruction was erroneous in that it virtually assumed that the existence of a defect in the elevator or its appliances would be conclusive proof of negligence. It said to the jury in effect:

"If you find that such defect existed, you must find that the defendants were negligent, and the fact that they employed an inspector will not relieve them from the consequences of their negligence."

[10, 11] Thus the instruction assumed the existence of the very fact which was in issue in the case, and upon which the plaintiff's right to recover depended; namely, the negligence of the defendants. It is, of course, true that, if the defendants were negligent in the matter of the maintenance of the elevator, the mere fact that they employed an inspector and that he made inspections would not relieve them from the consequences of such negligence. But the defendants were not insurers and were not liable herein, unless they were negligent, and the question whether they were or were not negligent was an ultimate question of fact which was to be determined by the jury upon a consideration of all of the probative facts in evidence. The mere proof of a defect in the elevator, whether latent or patent, was not proof of the ultimate fact of negligence, because it was not necessarily inconsistent with the exercise of due care by the defendants. It was a probative fact which merely tended to prove the ultimate fact of negligence. Likewise, the mere proof that defendants employed an inspector who made periodic inspections was not proof of the ultimate fact that defendants exercised due care, because it was not necessarily inconsistent with negligence on their part. It was a probative fact which merely tended to prove the ultimate fact of the exercise of due care. It would therefore have been entirely proper for the court to instruct the jury:

"If you find that the accident occurred by reason of a defect or a failure to keep the appliances in repair, and if you find that the defendants were negligent in failing to discover or in failing to remedy such defect or disrepair, the mere fact of the employment of an inspector will not relieve defendants from the consequences of their negligence."

This was doubtless the rule of law which the learned trial judge had in mind, and, in substance, the instruction which he intended to give. But the omission therefrom of the qualifying phrase above italicized gave to it the effect of withdrawing from the consideration of the jury a material question of fact which it was the sole province of the jury to determine. The questions whether the existence of the defect was due to defendant's negligence and whether their failure to repair it was a negligent failure were questions for the jury, which the court had no right to determine.

[12] The trial court also gave to the jury six different instructions, each of which embodied a statement of the rule of res ipsa loquitur, and instructed the jury to apply the same in its consideration of the issues. Appellants do not contend that any of these instructions embodied an incorrect statement of the rule itself, but do contend that the rule itself is wholly inapplicable to the situation here under consideration, because of the circumstances that the elevator in question was not being operated by the defendants or their servant at the time of the injury, and that the plaintiff was not injured as the result of any movement or operation of the elevator, but rather as the result of her own act in stepping into the open elevator shaft. In this connection it is sufficient to advert to the fact already mentioned that the complaint herein contains no allegation of negligence other than that which had to do with and was limited to the failure of defendants "to keep said elevator and said apparatus for operating the same in order and repair." There was not the slightest hint or suggestion in the complaint of a claim that the defendants were negligent in omitting to have the hallway leading to the elevator properly lighted. Evidence to the effect that the hallway was dark was admitted in behalf of the plaintiff at the trial. It was properly admitted because it was one of the circumstances immediately surrounding the happening of the accident—the res gestæ—and also because it was relevant to the issue of contributory negligence. Under these circumstances instructions embodying the res ipsa loquitur doctrine should not have been given, because they authorized the jury to base a verdict upon a theory of negligence which was entirely foreign to the issues in the case. We so held, in effect, in Marovich v. Central Cal. Traction Co., supra. The point there decided was not precisely identical with the one here presented, but the rationale of the rule there applied applies with equal force to the present situation. The defendants were brought into court upon notice that they were charged with negligence in respect of the repair of the elevator, and in no other respect whatever. They were never notified that any other or different claim would be made against them. Under these circumstances, to tell the jurors, after the close of the trial, that if they should find that the defendants were negligent in the matter of lighting the hallway they should return a verdict for plaintiff, would be to authorize a verdict against the defendants upon a claim against which they had never been called upon to defend themselves. This, in effect, is what was done by the giving of the res ipsa loquitur instructions. If plaintiff desired to rely upon this additional claim of negligence, she should have notified the defendants thereof by pleading it in her complaint. Cary v. L. A. Railway Co., 157 Cal. 599, 603, 108 Pac. 682, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 764, 21 Ann. Cas. 1329.

The allegations of the complaint herein were as follows:

"At all of the times herein mentioned defendants carelessly and negligently failed and neglected to keep said elevator and said apparatus for operating the same in repair, and said elevator and said apparatus for operating the same were at all of said times, because of said carelessness and negligence of said defendants, out of repair and failed to operate in this: That the apparatus for operating said elevator provided by defendants to be used by passengers in bringing said elevator from one floor to another and to open the doors in the shaft, as aforesaid, caused said doors to open when the elevator car was not at the place in said shaft opposite the floor where the elevator was sought to be used."

The allegations in the first portion of the foregoing quotation were obviously particularized and limited by the specifications in the latter portion thereof, but if we assume that they were not so limited, and for the moment wholly ignore the particular specifications, we have left a general allegation of negligence in failing and neglecting to keep said elevator and the apparatus for operating the same in repair.

"It is well settled that it is sufficient to charge negligence in general terms, and that, when that which is done is stated, it is sufficient to say that it was negligently done without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent." Sharpless v. Pantages, 178 Cal. 122, 172 Pac. 384.

That is precisely what the plaintiff did in this case, if we ignore the specification of particulars above quoted. It obviously follows that in order to recover she was required to prove some negligent act or omission on the part of the defendants in doing that which was alleged to have been negligently done by them, to wit, in keeping the elevator and its apparatus in repair. Under these circumstances she could not recover upon proof of some negligence which was wholly disconnected with the keeping in repair of the elevator and its apparatus, such as, for example, the insufficient lighting of the hallway leading to the elevator. Cary v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 157 Cal. 599, 603, 108 Pac. 682, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 764, 21 Ann. Cas. 1329; Marovich v. Central California Traction Co., supra (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 595. But this is precisely what the plaintiff has sought to do, and what the given instructions upon the res ipsa loquitur doctrine have enabled her to do. The jury was told that "plaintiff is not required to show particularly what the specific act of negligence was which produced the accident, but is only required to show that the accident is one which would not ordinarily occur had due care been employed," and "that the happening of the accident, if any, affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants that the accident, if any, was the result of a want of proper care on the part of the defendants." The jurors were thus invited to predicate a verdict against the defendants upon any theory of negligence which might find support in the evidence, regardless of whether or not it was within the issues. Plaintiff is now contending that the verdict is sufficiently supported by evidence that the hallway leading to the elevator was insufficiently lighted, and this may well have been the theory of the jurors upon which their verdict was based. But this is entirely unconnected with the claimed failure to keep the elevator in repair, and is therefore wholly outside of the issues herein.

[13] Appellants complain of the refusal of the trial court to give to the jury 12 different instructions which were requested by them. In this connection they content themselves with the general assertion that "these instructions we submit expressed the law correctly, and were relevant and pertinent, nor did the court give equivalent instructions." From some examination of the record we find the equivalent of several of the refused instructions in the instructions given. We cannot be expected to search the entire record with respect to each of the 12 refused instructions for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the substance thereof has been embodied in the instructions given.

No question is made upon this appeal as to the degree of care incumbent upon the appellants in the maintenance of the elevator. Respondent asserts and appellants concede that they were held "to the utmost care and diligence of very cautious persons and responsible for the slightest neglect."

We are satisfied that the error in giving the instructions which are above quoted was of so serious a character as to produce a miscarriage of justice, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

In the matter of the application of H. B. Smith for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

R. Clarence Ogden, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. M. Friedlander, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner, who, on the 19th day of August, 1923, was engaged in the business of conducting an employment agency in the city of Los Angeles, is restrained of his liberty by the chief of police of said city of Los Angeles by virtue of a warrant of arrest issued upon a criminal complaint charging him with the violation of that portion of section 11½ of an amendatory act of the Legislature approved June 18, 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 938), which provides as follows:

"* * * In all other employment, which classification shall include also semi-manual employments such as those of clerks, bookkeepers, typists, stenographers, domestics, and mercantile, office, professional and semi-professional employments, the fee charged shall in no case exceed ten per centum of the wages or salary earned for the first month, the twenty-six working days, or shorter period, to be determined in the same manner as in the case of manual employments. In determining any such per centum proper allowance may be made for items of board, lodging, or other consideration or privilege, or for differences arising by reason of rating the compensation otherwise than according to the time of work or service.

"This section shall not apply to an association of teachers conducting an employment agency exclusively for the purpose of securing employment for its own members, nor to bona fide schools, having been established for at least three years, securing employment for its own pupils without compensation."

The offense consists in charging and collecting fees in excess of the amounts provided by said act. No violation of the act so far as it relates to applicants for employment classified as "manual" is claimed, and therefore it is not necessary to reprint the portion of the act dealing with that classification. It is admitted by respondent that the business of conducting an employment agency is lawful, useful and beneficial to society. It is claimed, however, that the business furnishes an exceptionally fertile field for the growth of industrial abuses, which it was the purpose of the Legislature to prevent by the adoption of said amendatory act. It is the claim of respondent that the act is regulatory merely and operates upon a subject which properly falls within the police power of the state.

All of the main facts of the case have been stipulated to, excepting the question as to whether or not the maximum fees fixed by the act before us are so low as to be prohibitory of the business rather than regulatory of said occupation or business. The disputed question of fact, in view of our conclusion becomes an immaterial issue, and the only question left for determination is the constitutionality of the act. The act is assailed by petitioner on the ground that it is in contravention of the Constitution of the United States, and particularly the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment thereto; also that it contravenes the provisions of sections 1 and 13 of article 1 of the Constitution of this state.

These objections find support in our decisions and also in the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. The constitutional question raised is not a new one. The Legislature of 1903 adopted a statute which placed a limitation on the amount of fees that an employment agency may charge which, in legal effect, was identical with the limitation fixed by the act before us, and this court, in disposing of the question, said:

"The petitioner is engaged in a harmless and beneficial business. As part of his 'property' in that business are the services that he renders in obtaining employment for those seeking it. It is not compulsory upon any one to employ him, and whose seeks to avail himself of his services is at liberty to reject them if the terms of the contract for compensation are not satisfactory to him. This right of contract common to the followers of all legitimate vocations is an asset of the petitioner in his chosen occupation, and, as has been said, is a part of the property in the enjoyment of which he is guaranteed protection by the Constitution. By the act in question he is arbitrarily stripped of this right of contract, and deprived of his property, and left, in following his vocation and in pursuit of his livelihood, circumscribed and hampered by a law not applicable to his fellow men in other occupations. Such legislation is of the class discussed by Judge Cooley in the paragraph above quoted, 'entirely arbitrary in its character, and restricting the rights, privileges, or legal capacities' of one class of citizens 'in a manner before unknown to the law.' For such legislation, as he very justly adds, those who claim its validity should be able to show a specific authority therefor, 'instead of calling upon others to show how and where the authority is negatived.'" Ex parte Dickey, 144 Cal. 238, 77 Pac. 925, 66 L. R. A. 928, 103 Am. St. Rep. 82, 1 Ann. Cas. 428.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Adkins v. Children's Hospital, 261 U. S. 525, 43 Sup. Ct. 394, 67 L. Ed. 785, 24 A. L. R. 1238, made an exhaustive review of the authorities touching the right to contract about one's affairs, including the right to make contracts of employment, and held that such a right was a part of the liberty of the individual which is protected by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The question under consideration was whether Congress had the constitutional power to fix standards and minimum wages for women and children engaged in any occupation within the District of Columbia. Its conclusion was that the act in question passed the limits prescribed by the Constitution and was therefore, invalid. Surely the reasons which may be advanced for establishing standards of minimum wages for women and children are not less potential than those which may be urged in favor of the validity of the act before us.

[1] The same arguments made for and against the validity of the act in the instant case were made in the Adkins Case, and the conclusion there reached was the result of a very full and deliberate consideration of the many authorities which have been cited in the case at bar. The question being a federal one, the decision of the highest court of the country on the subject is conclusive upon us, even if we found ourselves without a precedent within our own jurisdiction.

[2] Upon the authority of the cases cited, and a long list of others referred to therein, we are of the opinion that the statute in question is invalid and that the prisoner is entitled to his discharge.

Ordered that the prisoner be discharged.

Ex parte BOYNTON. (Cr. 2608.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 26, 1924.)

Constitutional law —298(1)—Master and servant —14½—Statute fixing maximum fee of employment agencies held invalid.

St. 1923, p. 938, § 11½, fixing maximum fee of employment agencies, held violative of the due process clause of Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

In the matter of the application of E. C. Boynton for a writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

R. Clarence Ogden, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. M. Friedlander, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The principle of law which rules Ex parte Smith (Cr. No. 2609) 223 Pac. 971, this day decided, is decisive of the instant case. The facts of the two cases are so similar in material respects as to bring both within the same rule of law.

Upon the authority of Ex parte Smith, the writ is granted, and the petitioner is released from custody.

SAN DIEGO & A. RY. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (L. A. No. 7834.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 26, 1924.)

Master and servant —405(4)—Finding of injury in altercation arising out of and in course of employment within Compensation Act sustained.

Evidence held to justify finding that shooting of employee in an altercation by another employee arose in the course of, and while he was in the proper discharge of, his employment, within Workmen's Compensation Act.

In Bank.

Proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission under the Workmen's Compensation Act, by Mary Rote, claimant, for the death of her husband, opposed by the San Diego & Arizona Railway Company, a corporation, employer. The Industrial Accident Commission granted an award, and the employer brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Read G. Dilworth, of Coronado, and V. F. Bennett, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, and F. W. Fellows, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Del Rote, while employed by the petitioner here, was shot by a fellow employee. The respondent Commission found that the injury, which resulted in Rote's death, occurred in the course of, and arose out of his employment. It also found that the employee left surviving him, and wholly dependent, his wife, Mary Rote, to whom it awarded a death benefit in the sum of $4,900, together with the usual allowance of $100 for funeral expenses. This is a proceeding to annul the award.

It is the contention of the petitioner that Rote was not acting in the course of his employment at the time he was shot, and further that, even should it be found that the decedent may have been so acting at the time, the shooting which caused his death did not arise out of his employment in any capacity.

The record is very voluminous, but the salient facts are as follows:

On April 23, 1922, Rote was employed by the San Diego & Arizona Railway Company as trainmaster and also as road foreman of engines. In such capacity he was in charge of the operation of all trains as soon as they were made up, and seems to have been charged somewhat with oversight of the equipment furnished. C. B. Trott was, at the same time, employed by the petitioner as night foreman at its roundhouse. Trott was not officially under Rote's jurisdiction, but in the course of the latter's employment it was frequently necessary for him to be informed about matters at the roundhouse. The railway is not a large one, and the lines of authority over different departments do not appear to have been always recognized. For some time Trott had been in the habit of blowing the roundhouse whistle to call his men when he wanted them. Complaint was made by nearby residents about the noise thus made, and on the night before the shooting Rote went to the roundhouse and inquired for Trott, who was absent. His purpose was to inquire why the whistle was blown to call the men. He left directions with another employee at the roundhouse to tell Trott to discontinue the practice of blowing the whistle during the night, and reported what he had done to Mr. Lowe, superintendent and chief engineer of the petitioner. Trott, the roundhouse foreman, was angered by the message he received from his fellow employee.

The following night it was necessary to make up a train which should leave the depot at 10 o'clock. This train was usually a mixed freight and passenger train, in which case it was impossible to heat the train from the locomotive. On the night in question there were no freight cars, and it was desirable to have an engine employed which had a steam-heating device. The making up of this train was part of Rote's duties. Just what actually occurred that night rests largely in the credence to be given to the testimony of various witnesses, and on the justifiable inferences and conclusions to be drawn from their testimony. It appears that the engine furnished by Trott, the roundhouse foreman, did not have the required heating device. Rote undertook to ascertain why the engine he wanted was not furnished. There were telephone conversations between Rote and Superintendent Lowe, and between Rote and the roundhouse foreman, Trott. Shortly after the train left the station, Rote accompanied by his wife, went in an automobile to the roundhouse. It is the contention of petitioner that as soon as Rote got there he began using abusive language to Trott, at the same time advancing in a threatening manner. The fact is that immediately after Rote entered the office of the roundhouse foreman a shot was fired, and Rote ran from the office pursued by Trott. Two more shots were fired, one striking Rote in the back. He was picked up by an automobile and taken to the police station, then to a hospital, where he died two days later. Trott was arrested and charged with murder. At the trial he testified that he did not intend to shoot Rote, but that his pistol became jammed while he was running, and that in striking his pistol to relieve the jam it was discharged twice, and that unfortunately Rote happened to be in the line of fire.

We have given but a mere synopsis of the testimony, and feel that it is unnecessary to go further into a narration of the events leading up to and immediately preceding the shooting. From all the facts and circumstances surrounding the fatal shooting affray, we are convinced that the Industrial Accident Commission was justified in concluding that the assault upon Rote occurred in the course of and actually arose out of his employment. The shooting took place while Rote was actually performing a duty in the course of his employer's business at the roundhouse. It arose out of the employment and was incident thereto, in that the assault grew out of circumstances occurring in the course of his work and not out of any prior or personal quarrel. Giving full weight to the contention of petitioner that Trott, the roundhouse foreman, was angered by the visit and message of Rote that Trott cease blowing the roundhouse whistle at night, and that bad feeling resulted between Trott and the decedent therefrom, we are unable to accept petitioner's point of view that the injury can be considered only as one arising out of a prior and personal quarrel. From the beginning of the incidents which led up to the killing, the relations between the two men actually arose out of the work of the two employees in the service of the petitioner. Although the giving of any such directions was denied by the superintendent, there is evidence, which no doubt had compelling weight with the Commission, tending to establish the fact that Rote went to the round-house on the evening he was killed on the direct order of Lowe, for the purpose of ascertaining why the desired equipment had not been furnished for the night train.

The petitioner attempts to bring the injuries received by Rote within the line of authorities known as the "horse play" cases, such as, for instance, Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 682, 158 Pac. 212, L. R. A. 1916F, 1164. But this is not such a case. The injury here was one arising out of and in the course of Rote's employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, St. 1917, p. 831 (Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 706, 151 Pac. 398), and can fairly be traced as an incident of such employment (Warren Construction Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm. [Cal. App.] 221 Pac. 381).

The evidence in this case justifies the finding and conclusion of the respondent that Rote was injured in an altercation which grew out of the proper discharge of his employment. It will serve no useful purpose to critically analyze the authorities cited from other jurisdictions or to elaborate the discussion on this point. As was said, in Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra:

"In its last analysis the petitioner's argument rests upon a supposed state of facts which was not established to the satisfaction of the Commission, and which was not shown by evidence free from conflict."

The award is affirmed.

NORTH CONFIDENCE MINING & DEVELOPMENT CO. v. FITCH et al.
(Sac. 3561.)

Appeal and error ⇐345(1)—Appeal not dismissed on ground that notice was filed too late, where filed within due time after disposition of motion for new trial.

Where affidavits have been filed showing that a notice of intention to move for a new trial was properly served by mail, and the notice of appeal from the judgment was filed within due time after the disposition of the motion for a new trial, the appeal will not be dismissed on the ground that the notice of appeal was filed too late, notwithstanding the contention that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not properly served and filed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by the North Confidence Mining & Development Company against C. S. Fitch and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss. Motion denied.

See, also, 58 Cal. App. 329, 208 Pac. 328; 58 Cal. App. 335, 208 Pac. 330.

Richard Chute and William Grant, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Frank W. Street, and Horace M. Street, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The respondents moved to dismiss the appeal from the judgment taken by the appellants upon the ground that the notice of appeal was filed too late. This question turns upon whether or not there was a motion pending for a new trial. Appellants claim that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was not properly served and filed. Since the hearing of the motion, affidavits have been filed showing that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was properly served by mail. The notice of appeal from the judgment was filed within due time after the disposition of the motion for a new trial, and the motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment is therefore denied.

In re BAIRD'S ESTATE.

BAIRD v. BAIRD et al.

(S. F. 10226.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 16, 1924.
Rehearing Denied March 17, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1097(2), ⇐1195(1)—Law of the case defined.

The rule of the law of the case is that trial and appellate courts must follow the rules laid down on a former appeal, whether the rules are right or wrong.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1099(7)—Insufficiency of evidence at previous trial to establish adoption held established as matter of law by decision on former appeal.

Decision on former appeal held to have established as matter of law that all the evidence adduced at the previous trial was insufficient as matter of law to establish an adoption, under Civ. Code, § 230, of an illegitimate child, by his father.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1096(1)—Matters looked to for determining whether the law of the case applies.

For the purpose of determining whether the law of the case should control, the court, on second appeal, will look not only to the opinion on the former appeal, but also to the record.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1099(7), 1195(3)—Insufficiency of the evidence established on former appeal law of case on subsequent trial, and appeal on evidence not materially different.

The law of the case controls the decision on a subsequent trial and appeal, the evidence not being substantially different in a material respect from that on a former appeal, where the decision established as matter of law that the evidence was insufficient, though the evidence was not quoted or cited in the opinion on former appeal.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1097(1), 1195(1)—Attempt to decide question of fact on appeal not law of case.

An appellate court having no jurisdiction to pass on questions of fact, any inadvertent attempt to do so would not be binding as the law of the case.

6. Appeal and error ⇨1097(1), 1195(1)—Department decision on former appeal held not to establish sufficiency of evidence of adoption.

Department decision reversing judgment against one seeking partial distribution of an estate, as having been adopted by deceased, held not to establish as the law of the case the sufficiency of the evidence of adoption; concurrence of three justices being, under Const. art. 6, § 2, necessary for a department decision, and the concurrence of one of the three participating justices having been limited to the single ground of error in refusing a jury trial, and the opinion of the others having expressly refrained from passing on the sufficiency of the evidence of adoption.

7. Evidence ⇨276—Declaration of decedent not competent proof that he had told his mother of his bastard child; "declaration against interest."

Declaration of decedent to witness that he had told his mother of the existence of his bastard child is not competent to prove that he had told his mother; not being a declaration against interest within Code Civ. Proc. § 1853.

8. Appeal and error ⇨1099(7)—Essentials of new evidence which will avoid the rule of the law of the case.

New evidence on a subsequent appeal, which will avoid the rule of the law of the case that the evidence is insufficient, and make it an open question, must be materially, essentially, or substantially different from that on the former appeal, and must not be merely cumulative to evidence of the same class, but must bring in a new and substantive fact.

9. Appeal and error ⇨1099(7)—New evidence in case involving question of adoption of bastard by father held not to take it out of rule of law of case.

The new evidence in case involving question of adoption, under Civ. Code, § 230, of a bastard by the father, held not essentially different from that on former appeal, to present no new substantive fact, to involve no new principle, and at most to be cumulative, and so not to avoid the law of the case, as to insufficiency of the evidence to establish such adoption.

10. Appeal and error ⇨1170(9)—Instructions conflicting with law of case and other correct instructions, prejudicial.

Giving instructions in conflict with the law of the case, and with other correct instructions given, is prejudicial within Const. art. 6, § 4½; it being impossible to say which was followed by the jury.

11. Bastards ⇨13—Each element of adoption by father must be established by preponderance of evidence.

Each of the elements for adoption of an illegitimate child by its father, under Civ. Code, § 230, must be established by a preponderance of the evidence, and, the proof failing as to one, adoption is not made out.

12. Bastards ⇨105—In proceeding in nature of contest of will to establish adoption by father, special verdict must cover elements of adoption.

The proceeding by an illegitimate child to establish an adoption by the father under Civ. Code, § 230, being in the nature of a contest of the deceased father's will, it being in favor of others, the jury's conclusions of fact must, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 624, 1314, be in the form of special verdict covering all the elements of such an adoption.

13. Bastards ⇨13—"Public acknowledgment" of paternity as element of adoption by father defined.

"Public acknowledgment" of paternity, one of the elements of adoption of an illegitimate child by his father, under Civ. Code, § 230, is the opposite of private acknowledgment, and means the same kind of acknowledgment a father would make of his legitimate child.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public Acknowledgment.]

14. Bastards ⇨13—Willful concealment of paternity from relatives opposed to public acknowledgment relative to adoption.

While to constitute public acknowledgment of paternity, as an element of adoption, under Civ. Code, § 230, of an illegitimate child by its father, he need not declare his paternity under all circumstances, his willful concealment of it from his business associates, his relatives with whom he is in frequent intercourse and on terms of affection, and their friends, is opposed to such acknowledgment, though he acknowledged his paternity to persons where he kept and supported the child and its mother, who were not likely to meet his relatives or business associates.

15. Bastards ⇨13—"Family" into which, as element of adoption, father must receive his illegitimate child, defined.

"Family," within Civ. Code, § 230, providing, as an element of adoption of an illegitimate child by its father, that he receive it, as his own, into his family, means no more than that he must have a home, a settled place of habitation of which he is the head, into which he shall receive the child.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Family.]

16. Bastards ⇨ 13—Abodes of illegitimate child and mother held not "family" or "home" of father, relative to adoption.

The abodes where a father clandestinely kept and supported his illegitimate child and its mother, and where he and they were known under an assumed name, he all the time having a room at a hotel, given in the directory as his residence, held not his "family" or "home," within Civ. Code, § 230, as to adoption by receiving the child as his own into his family.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Home.]

17. Bastards ⇨ 105—Child held not otherwise treated by father as legitimate.

The father of an illegitimate child held not to have otherwise treated it as if it were a legitimate child, an element for adoption under Civ. Code, § 230; he, in addition to keeping it and its existence away from his family, making no provision for its future, though his attention was called to his will, giving the property to others.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of David Jennings Baird, deceased. Petition by David Jennings Baird for a partial distribution of the estate. From a decree for petitioner, Veronica C. Baird and others appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Mastick & Partridge, Karl C. Partridge, and Jos. T. O'Connor, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

C. M. Fickert and E. A. Cunha, both of San Francisco (R. P. Henshall and Robert R. Moody, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. The petitioner, David Jennings Baird, a minor, by Lydia M. Valencia, guardian of his person and estate, filed an amended petition praying for partial distribution to him of the above-entitled estate as the adopted child and heir of decedent. The petition alleges that petitioner is the illegitimate son of Miss Valencia and decedent; that decedent died after the birth of petitioner and that before his death, and within the meaning of section 230 of the Civil Code, he adopted petitioner as his own child; that petitioner is the sole surviving issue and only child of decedent; that decedent left an estate consisting of real and personal property; and that he left a last will in which no provision was made for petitioner. Petitioner prayed an order of court distributing to him the whole of decedent's estate, or such part thereof as the court shall direct, on the delivery of a bond to the executor and executrix of the said will. An answer, denying, among other things, that petitioner is the child of, that he was adopted by, or was in any way related to, decedent, was filed by I. I. Brown, executor of said will, and by Veronica C. Baird, as executrix of and legatee and devisee under the said will.

The issues of adoption were tried by jury, and the special verdicts were in favor of petitioner. The court adopted the special verdicts of the jury, made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered its decree of partial distribution awarding to petitioner twenty $1,000 Liberty bonds, 221 shares of the capital stock of the Sausalito Land & Ferry Company, and an undivided fourth interest—decedent's whole interest—in certain lands situate in Contra Costa county. An appeal from the verdict, from the entry thereof, and from the order and judgment was taken by Veronica C. Baird, individually, and as legatee and devisee under the said will of decedent, and as assignee of the interest of her sons, Miles T., Benjamin H., and Thomas R. Baird, as legatees and devisees under the said will. A second appeal from the decree of distribution was taken by Veronica C., Benjamin H., and Thomas R. Baird. A third appeal was taken from the verdict, from the entry thereof, from the order and judgment, and from the whole thereof, by C. H. Williams and R. C. Farley, individually; Adelaide McColgan, administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of D. A. McColgan, deceased, and F. W. Morrison and R. C. Farley, as trustees.

This is the third trial of the issues of adoption. The first was had before the court sitting without a jury. Judgment was given against respondent, and it was reversed on appeal upon the ground that the court erred in refusing his demand for a trial by jury. Estate of Baird, 173 Cal. 617, 160 Pac. 1078. The second trial was by jury and the verdicts and judgment were in favor of respondent. The judgment in that case was reversed upon the ground that a case of adoption had not been established. Estate of Baird, 182 Cal. 338, 188 Pac. 43.

The claim of respondent is that beginning a year before the birth of the child decedent and Miss Valencia, although not married, accomplished all the relations of man and wife and that she had no sexual intercourse with any other man; that from the date of respondent's birth until his own death decedent publicly acknowledged his paternity; that with Miss Valencia he had a family in the St. Helen and Octavia Apartments and at 230 I street, in the city and county of San Francisco, into which he received respondent; and that he otherwise treated him as a legitimate child.

Respondent was born in the St. Helen Apartments at 5 a. m., December 7, 1906, and following a debauch decedent died in the house at 230 I street at 10 or 11 o'clock on the morning of November 25, 1908, a few months after he passed into his twenty-ninth year.

According to the evidence, Miss Valencia and decedent first met in 1898, and beginning in 1902 they entered upon an illicit relationship which continued until his death. Miss Valencia claims that they lived together as man and wife and that the relationship would have ripened into marriage but for the opposition of his relatives. Appellants claim that decedent associated with Miss Valencia for purposes of dissipation and illicit sexual intercourse and that the relationship had no other significance. Decedent never married. Prior to the San Francisco disaster on April 18, 1906, the couple occupied the relation of mistress and lover in several abodes in San Francisco. At the time of the fire their relationship was being carried on in the Alexandria Apartments at 570 O'Farrell street. A week or ten days later they took up quarters at 1310 Divisadero street in a cottage owned by Miss Valencia's mother. The next abode was at the St. Helen Apartments at 2070 O'Farrell street. They occupied this apartment for six or seven months, then moved to a room at the Octavia Apartments, and from there to a house at 230 I street, which was purchased by decedent for Miss Valencia. Following his death the place was sold and Miss Valencia received what was left.

Throughout the relationship between decedent and Miss Valencia he had relatives with whom he associated when they were in San Francisco. His mother, Mrs. Veronica C. Baird, a widow, visited Europe annually. He had a sister, a brother, Miles T. Baird, and two half-brothers, Benjamin H. and Thomas R. Baird. His eldest brother, John R. Baird, died in an accident in San Francisco in December, 1905. The sister married about this time and with her husband located in New York. She made occasional visits to San Francisco. During the entire period of his relationship with Miss Valencia decedent maintained quarters in hotels and other places in San Francisco, where at times he lived with his relatives.

1. Appellants' first contention is that the second decision (Estate of Baird, 182 Cal. 338, 188 Pac. 43) established the law of the case and that there is no change in the record herein in the essential facts upon which the above decision was based as to the asserted receipt of respondent into the family of the decedent and otherwise treating him as a legitimate child. Respondent's position is that the principle of the law of the case has no application whatever to the trial of an issue of fact. It is claimed that the decision on the former appeal was a decision on a question of fact and not of law, and that therefore the doctrine of the law of the case could not apply. We quote what was said by respondent after asserting that important evidence must have been overlooked in the department decision:

"In the present instance it is not necessary to consider the question whether important evidence in favor of petitioner was overlooked on the former appeal for the reason that many new witnesses and much additional evidence was introduced on the last trial to which the previous decision of this court, not having had it before it, could have no application whatever."

Since appellants claim the evidence on this trial is substantially the same as on the last, and respondent contends it is different, and is sufficient to justify an affirmance of the judgment, we will discuss the former decision. Estate of Baird, 182 Cal. 338, 188 Pac. 43. And as respondent seeks to avoid the effects of the former decision and claims it is not only erroneous but that it does not establish the law of the case, it will be proper to consider the contention, although the nature and effect and the scope of the doctrine have been so frequently considered in this state that further discussion of the subject would seem to be a work of supererogation.

The reasons for the rule known as the law of the case are not always stated in the same way; in fact, various reasons have been assigned for this well-established principle. At the outset of the discussion and before commenting upon the cases cited by the respondent, we may say that an excellent discussion of the subject of the law of the case as established in this state will be found in 2 California Jurisprudence, 944, beginning with section 555, to and including section 569. The reason for the rule is stated in section 556. We will not undertake an elaborate discussion of the multitude of authorities in this state upon the subject of the law of the case. In a discussion of the principle excerpts from opinions may be misleading or entirely inaccurate. For instance, one of the cases relied upon by the respondent is Allen v. Bryant, 155 Cal. 256, 100 Pac. 704, where it is said:

"The sole reason for the existence of the doctrine is that the court, having announced a rule * * * applicable to a retrial of facts, both parties upon that retrial are assumed to have conformed to the rule and to have offered their evidence under it. Under these circumstances it would be a manifest injustice to either party to change the rule upon the second appeal."

If this were the sole reason for the existence of the principle, it might be true that in this case we would be justified in disregarding the law of the case for the reason that upon the last trial the respondent, at least, in his proposed instructions to the jury, hereinafter discussed, did not attempt to conform to the rule laid down upon the former appeal. There are, however, other reasons for the rule sufficiently set forth in the section cited in 2 California Jurisprudence, to which we shall refer without further discussion.

[1, 2] The rule of the law of the case may be succinctly stated as the rule requiring both trial and appellate courts to follow the rules laid down upon a former appeal whether such rules are right or wrong. It is sufficiently obvious as scarcely to require a statement of the proposition upon this appeal that the decision of this court upon the second appeal established as the law of the case that all the evidence adduced at the previous trial was insufficient as a matter of law to establish a legal adoption of the child. If any authority is needed for so obvious a proposition it will be found in a decision by this court in bank in Brett v. S. H. Frank & Co., 162 Cal. 735, 738, 124 Pac. 437. It was there held that a decision on appeal that the evidence in the case was insufficient to go to the jury, and that the court should have granted a nonsuit was the law in the case, and that where the evidence upon the next appeal was not materially different the law of the case should control in the decision, both in the superior and appellate courts. The rule is also well stated by Mr. Justice Hart in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, Third District, in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Carmichael, 50 Cal. App. 749, 196 Pac. 76, with a collation of the authorities, as follows:

"If then, it be true that, as counsel for respondent contend is the fact, that the evidence received at the two trials of the action is substantially the same in all vital particulars, it of necessity follows that the doctrine of the law of the case applies, and per consequence the instrument sued on must be held to involve a stated account; and this would be so even if it were necessary to concede that the Supreme Court was in error in holding that said instrument involved an account stated. See 2 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, p. 1658; Dewey v. Gray, 2 Cal. 374; Clary v. Hoagland, 6 Cal. 685; Gunter v. Laffan, 7 Cal. 588; Cordier v. Schloss, 18 Cal. 576; Phelan v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 39; Haynes v. Meek, 20 Cal. 288; Davidson v. Dallas, 15 Cal. 75; Ritter v. Stevenson, 11 Cal. 27; Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11; *Burton v. [3-5] Upon the second appeal the court will not only look to the opinion of the court on the previous appeal, but also to the record for the purpose of determining whether or not the law of the case should control in the determination of the second appeal. McKin- lay v. Tuttle, 42 Cal. 576; Otten v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 252, 254, 191 Pac. 11. The respondent, after stating the rule of the law of the case, claims that this principle has no application whatever to the trial of an issue of fact. To avoid misunderstanding, we quote in part from the brief as follows:

"The decision of an Appellate Court upon a law point is, of course, controlling even if erroneous through all subsequent proceedings in the case, both in the trial court and in the Appellate Court again. There can be no question that this is the law in California as it is in every other jurisdiction. This principle has no application whatever to the trial of an issue of fact, otherwise it would be quite unnecessary for the Supreme Court ever to grant a new trial. Granting a new trial is for the purpose of setting the case at large so that the successful party, against whom a decision has been reversed, may make out a better case and that the other side, if errors have been committed against him, may conduct himself in such a manner as to obtain a decision in his favor. It is not a decision that the testimony of the witness is not to be believed nor does it preclude the trial court from receiving the former evidence and drawing from that evidence any proper conclusions. 'It is settled beyond controversy that a decision of the Court of Appeal, as to question of fact, does not become the law of the case.' Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87. It is only where the exact case is again presented to the trial court upon the same evidence that the doctrine of the law of the case has any application and even, in that instance, its application is very much modified by certain principles to which we now direct attention. * * *

In support of this contention the case of Allen v. Bryant, supra, is cited. It is claimed that this decision establishes two principles which we will state in the language of the respondent:

"First, that the application of the doctrine of the law of the case does not apply where the evidence is different and, secondly, that it does not apply where it appears that the previous decision overlooked important evidence. * * *

As we have already pointed out, neither of these propositions is supported by the authorities. The evidence may be different, and yet unless it is substantially different in a material respect, the doctrine of the law of the case applies, and it applies notwithstanding the fact that in the previous decision evidence contained in the record is not quoted or cited in the opinion. These principles are established by the case of Brett v. S. H. Frank & Co., supra, and the case of McKinlay v. Tuttle, supra.

The appellate courts in this state have no jurisdiction to pass upon questions of fact as distinguished from questions of law. If the court should inadvertently attempt to decide a question of fact as distinguished from a question of law, that decision would, of course, not be binding. As we have already said, however, to determine that the evidence adduced at the trial, with all the inferences properly deducible therefrom, does not support the claim of adoption, is a determination of a question of law.

We have declared that under the doctrine of the law of the case the decision rendered upon the former appeal is binding both upon the trial court and upon this court. There are statements in some opinions by this court which justify some further discussion of that matter in view of the fact that the respondent insists that the former opinion is not binding because it passed upon a question of fact. In the case of Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 619, 628, this court, in denying a petition for rehearing, declared:

"Facts are stated, in the opinion of the court, solely that the course of reasoning adopted by the court, and the principles enunciated, may be the better understood. The court does not assume to find the facts in a case, for it has no authority to do so, except in case where an ultimate fact results, as a conclusion of law, from the proof of certain prior facts. If this court states the evidence in a cause, whether correctly or incorrectly, the statement in no manner controls the court below, and cannot prejudice the parties, where a new trial is had. It is upon questions of law, that the decision of the appellate court becomes the law of the case, and not upon questions of fact."

This observation of the court in denying a rehearing was directed to a situation where the court for the purpose of deciding the questions of law involved in the case states sufficient of the facts involved to disclose the pertinence of the law points decided. It had no reference to a case where the whole decision turned upon the sufficiency of the facts established by the record to support the judgment of the trial court.

In the case of Robinson v. Thornton, 114 Cal. 275, 46 Pac. 79, it was said, with reference to a prior decision in the case:

"But it was further decided * * * that the evidence taken at the former trial was sufficient to warrant the finding that Thornton did have such possession for said statutory period, and the judgment was reversed on account of said adverse possession of Thornton. But the question of such adverse possession is one of fact, and upon a subsequent trial the jury were not estopped by the decision of this court from finding the issue of such adverse possession differently from the finding at the former trial. They might have found that issue differently, even though the testimony was the same as at the former trial, but, as a matter of fact, there was at the latter trial additional testimony on that point. It was for the jury, therefore, to determine whether or not there was such adverse possession; and the court erred in taking that question away from the jury."

As we understand this case, it merely holds that when the question of adverse possession is involved in a case upon conflicting evidence, the jury may decide either way, and if upon one appeal it is held that there was sufficient evidence of adverse possession to support a finding and judgment based upon such adverse possession, upon a retrial the court or jury may determine the conflict in exactly the opposite way and would not be precluded from doing so because of the fact that on a former appeal the court has held there was sufficient evidence to justify a finding to the contrary. This case is not authority for holding that where upon an appeal the court has held that the evidence is insufficient as a matter of law to establish a fact, that the same question can again be submitted to a jury and decided adversely to the conclusion of the appellate court upon the matter of law.

The decision of this court in Sneed v. Osborn, supra, and the decision in Wallace v. Sisson, 114 Cal. 42, 45 Pac. 1000, are cited in the opinion in Allen v. Bryant, supra, in support of the doctrine there enunciated. The decision in Wallace v. Sisson, supra, was concurred in by only three justices in bank upon the point to which that case is cited, and was concurred in by the fourth justice (Garoutte) upon the ground that the evidence in the record under review was not the same as that presented to the court upon the former appeal. The point concurred in by three justices in bank was not a decision by the court. If the opinion in Allen v. Bryant, supra, justifies the contention of the respondent, it is not supported by the authorities cited and is in conflict with and in effect overruled by the subsequent decisions of this court hereinabove quoted. This must be true because a decision by this court that the evidence is insufficient to justify a finding or a judgment is necessarily a decision upon a question of law, for upon no other theory could the court pass upon the question. It should be further said with reference to the decision in Allen v. Bryant, supra, that upon the second appeal the court was of the opinion that upon the former appeal the District Court of Appeal had invaded the province of the jury in passing upon the credibility of witnesses.

It is clear from the foregoing discussion that the last decision was a decision upon a question of law and not of fact and that without regard to the correctness of the statement of the evidence or the legal principles declared therein said decision established the law of the case and was binding on the court below as it is binding here.

[6] 2. We will next consider respondent's contention that the first department decision (Estate of Baird, 173 Cal. 617, 160 Pac. 1078) established the law of the case. Respondent's contention is that there is a conflict between the first and the second department decision and that—

"It is not at all clear that this conflict in these decisions does not take away the application of the rule of the law of the case and set everything at large under the decision of this court in the case of Gage v. Downey, 94 Cal. 241, 29 Pac. 635. This much, however, is clear, the petitioner has as much a right to invoke the application of the law of the case based on the first decision rendered by Mr. Justice Shaw as the appellants in this case have a right to apply the rule of the law of the case based on the second decision."

In view of the fact that the concurrence of one of the justices was limited to the single ground that the trial court erred in refusing respondent's demand for a jury trial, the decision on that question would alone constitute the law of the case, since the concurrence of three justices is necessary for a department decision. Section 2, art. 6, Const.; see, also, section 4, art. 6, Const., as to the District Courts of Appeal before the amendment of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1956); Turner v. Fidelity Loan Concern, 2 Cal. App. 122, 83 Pac. 62, 70; Matter of Coburn, 165 Cal. 202, 131 Pac. 352. In addition to this, the first department decision expressly refrained from passing on the sufficiency of the evidence to constitute an adoption in these words:

"Nothing we have said is to be taken as an expression of opinion on our part regarding the sufficiency of the evidence to prove that the decedent received the child into his family and treated it as if it were a legitimate child."

[7] 3. We will now take up respondent's contention that the additional evidence received on the last trial put the case at large so that the doctrine of the law of the case would not apply.

The briefs of appellants have undertaken to segregate the additional from the former evidence, but respondent's brief, after contending that the doctrine of the law of the case does not apply, presents both classes of evidence together. The testimony relied on in this connection is, first, that of Miss Valencia's masseuse, who did not testify on the second trial, to the effect that in a conversation with decedent in the St. Helen Apartment while Miss Valencia was present the witness asked him why they did not get married. His reply was they would "some day but it cannot be done now. My mother is too prejudiced, she is too bitter * * * against him presumably being married to Miss Valencia," that she asked him if he had not shown his mother the baby and offered to take it to his mother, but he said:

"She is too bitter. * * * It would not do any good. She is made of stone. * * * Q. Did Mr. Baird indicate to you at that time in his conversation whether or not his mother knew about the baby being in existence? A. He said his mother knew of the beautiful baby, that he himself had told her, but that she did not—she turned a deaf ear to it all. Q. He said, though, that she had never seen the baby? A. He said she had never seen the baby, that she did not want to see the baby."

In Miss Valencia's testimony as to the incident she did not state that decedent said his mother knew about respondent.

We will at this point consider the purpose for which this testimony is competent. The position of appellants with reference to it is that it cannot aid respondent because—

"It is not evidence that Mrs. Baird did know of the existence of the child, or that deceased ever did tell her of it. * * * If offered as proof of the fact that decedent did tell his mother of the child, this evidence would have been clearly hearsay and inadmissible. It was, however, admissible as bearing upon decedent's attitude toward the child."

Section 1853 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares:

"The declaration, act, or omission of a decedent, having sufficient knowledge of the subject, against his pecuniary interest, is also admissible * * * to that extent against his successor in interest."

Section 1870, subd. 2, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

"In conformity with the preceding provisions, evidence may be given upon a trial of the following facts: * * * (2) The act, declaration, or omission of a party, as evidence against such party."

The testimony of this witness cannot be regarded as a declaration against interest, for to be competent as such the declaration must be against a pecuniary or proprietary interest at the time when made, in the absence of a statute. Smith v. Hanson, 34 Utah, 171, 96 Pac. 1087, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 520. Here any interest of decedent which might have been involved at the time he made the asserted statement was entirely too remote to give it probative value within the requirements of a declaration against interest. As distinguished from a declaration against interest, the statement was an admission to the witness of paternity and of his attitude toward the child. We conclude that the statement of decedent in the conversation with the masseuse was an admission of his paternity and of his attitude toward the child, propositions as to which a great deal of evidence was introduced in the former trials; it was, however, not competent evidence that decedent told his mother of the existence of the child. It follows that the part of this testimony which is competent is addressed to the elements of paternity and public acknowledgment—which were assumed in the last department opinion to have been established. We do not understand that respondent's brief claims the evidence was admissible other than as tending to prove public acknowledgment of paternity.

The portion of the testimony of this witness held to be admissible, whether it be regarded as tending to prove public acknowledgment or as showing the attitude of decedent toward the child, presents no new principle; but, as we have stated, it was not competent to prove decedent told his mother of respondent.

The next additional evidence was furnished by Miss Valencia. She testified to the effect that in 1905, when decedent, his mother, and a Miss Klein, a friend of the Baird family, were returning from a European trip, she took the same train from Chicago to New York and occupied a berth adjoining the one occupied by Mrs. Baird; that Mrs. Baird upset an ink bottle, asked Miss Valencia's permission to sit in the same seat with her while the damage was being repaired, which request was granted, and that she recognized Mrs. Baird and thinks "she must have known me"; that Mrs. Baird suddenly left the seat and called to her son; that at dinner time he said to her, "You must leave this train"; that she heard his mother say "she would not travel an inch with that Valencia woman. You put her off this train." That he left for San Francisco that evening with his mother, but she remained over in Chicago two days, and he met her at the ferry when she arrived in San Francisco. Mrs. Baird, in her deposition, disclaimed any knowledge of Miss Valencia being on the same train with her and her party.

Miss Valencia also supplied this additional evidence: She testified for the first time that she met Mrs. Baird at the physician's office when decedent was confined in the sanitarium, but that she would not recognize her; that the Baird family had her arrested for vagrancy in 1903 on a complaint sworn to by the attorney for the Baird family. The occasion of decedent being in the hospital will be later referred to. She also testified that Mrs. Baird tried to have her excluded from the hospital but that decedent told the physician he wished her to come. Two police officers, one in rebuttal, neither of whom appeared in the earlier trials, also testified that Miss Valencia was arrested on the charge of vagrancy in 1903, and that it was dismissed in the police court. They also testified that decedent protested the arrest and Miss Valencia quoted him as saying he would tell the attorney "to lay off this business and let you live in San Francisco, and I will have him tell the family, my sister and my mother, to leave us alone." It may be assumed from this and other evidence on the point that the jury inferred that in 1903, about the time it is claimed decedent tried to borrow $5,000 from his sister to get rid of Miss Valencia, the attorney for the Baird family swore to the complaint in question and that he and decedent's sister were active in an attempt to break up the relationship.

Miss Valencia also testified that before leaving 1310 Divisadero street to go to the St. Helen Apartments, two police officers came there and said to her, "Well, we have orders to come here and back up a wagon for you"; that decedent reported he had been to the police station about the matter and told her: "You will not have any more trouble, I told them you were my wife and this was my baby, and I was supporting this place." The child was not born at the time, and when this was called to her attention she offered an explanation. Miss Valencia was the only witness who gave testimony as to this incident. Under the rule applied to the testimony of the masseuse, the statement imputed to decedent that he would tell the attorney to deliver his message to his relatives is not evidence that it was delivered, nor is the statement of the police officers proof that his relatives knew the couple lived together at 1310 Divisadero street or that they were responsible for the statement of the police officers. Miss Valencia also testified that Mrs. Baird saw her and the child at a dry goods store "more than once" in January, 1908, that she only stared at them and walked out of the store because they were there; and that when Mrs. Baird's deposition was being taken she refused to remain in the same room with Miss Valencia. The latter enlarged on her former testimony that the ring "Dave to Dodie" was a wedding ring given to her before the birth of respondent; that decedent always wanted to marry her, and of her refusal to marry him when one of the unmarried couples, later referred to, were married in Redwood City a few weeks before he died.

The physician gave additional testimony to the effect that when decedent was in the sanitarium Mrs. Baird asked him if he would prohibit Miss Valencia from calling on the patient; that she referred to Miss Valencia as a very bad woman, and that she asked him if he knew they were not married, to which he answered, "Yes." Mrs. Baird denied that she had seen Miss Valencia at the sanitarium, and the physician said he did not believe she did. On the last trial the physician made this additional statement:

"Dave had asked me to keep this quiet as long as I could. He did not want me to file the certificate at all; neither did Miss Valencia. But it was the law, so I had to do it. I went to the health office. At that time Dr. * * * was in the office. * * * I asked him to keep that certificate from getting into the papers, so Mrs. Baird would not find it out. * * * David Baird asked me not to file the birth certificate so his mother would not find it out. I asked the man in charge of the health office to hold it up and keep it out of the newspapers, that David wanted it."

The deposition of the milliner was not offered on the second trial, but was read into the record on the third. Her testimony is to the effect that she saw decedent at the abodes playing with respondent; that they went by the name of "Tyler," but that she did business with decedent under his true name and knew Miss Valencia as "Mrs. David J. Baird." This new evidence is clearly cumulative, as it is addressed to subjects concerning which a great deal of testimony had been received on the former trials.

Two real estate partners testified that about two months prior to decedent's demise he commissioned them to sell the place at 230 I street, and to secure a house north of the park in the Richmond district; but that decedent's death intervened to prevent the transaction from going through. In connection with the proposed property deal Miss Valencia testified that decedent was at that time planning "to take her and the baby away from San Francisco for good." This apparent inconsistency was sought to be explained on cross-examination. A shoe clerk testified that decedent told him he would marry Miss Valencia when they were settled at 230 I street.

Miss Valencia's additional evidence presents no new facts within the contemplation of the rule. The portion covering the asserted train incident, the meetings with Mrs. Baird in the physician's office, the episode at the taking of the deposition, the occasions at the dry-goods store, the arrest for vagrancy, and the action of the officers at 1310 Divisadero street, all tend to prove Mrs. Baird's hostility toward her, as did the statements made by Mrs. Baird to the physician, but, as will presently be shown, the hostility of Mrs. Baird and her daughter toward Miss Valencia was to be inferred from the evidence on the previous trials. The additional testimony of the physician covering his efforts to keep the contents of the birth certificate out of the newspapers is along the line of his previous statements that decedent did not want his mother to know about respondent and that he thought it was the fault of the board of health the certificate was not seasonably filed.

[8] At this point we will state the legal test by which it is to be determined whether the change in the evidence is sufficient to avoid the rule of the law of the case.

The authorities use such expressions as that the new evidence must be "materially," "essentially," or "substantially" different before it can be held the doctrine does not apply. (2 Cal. Jur. 557 et seq.; Brett v. S. H. Frank Co., 162 Cal. 735, 124 Pac. 437; McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 187 Cal. 144, 201 Pac. 577, cited in Burns v. Jackson, 53 Cal. App. 345, 347, 200 Pac. 80; Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 189 Cal. 746, 210 Pac. 259; In re Cook, 83 Cal. 415, 23 Pac. 392; Heidt v. Minor, 113 Cal. 385, 45 Pac. 700; Daniel v. Smith, 75 Cal. 548, 17 Pac. 683; Muller v. Swanton, 17 Cal. App. 232, 119 Pac. 200; Morrell v. San Tomas Drying, etc., Co., 30 Cal. App. 194, 157 Pac. 818. The rule is binding as to questions which involve and are controlled by the same principles. Tally v. Ganahl, 151 Cal. 418, 90 Pac. 1049.)

"Additional evidence merely cumulative to evidence of the same class given on the first appeal, will not carry a question outside the operation of the rule as to 'the law of the case,' but to successfully escape the rule a new and substantive fact must be brought into the case on the subsequent appeal." Alerding v. Allison, 170 Ind. 252, 83 N. E. 1006, 27 Am. St. Rep. 363.

[9] None of the additional evidence is essentially different from that received on the second trial. It does not present any new substantive fact, it involves no new principle, and where it supplements the former evidence it comes under the cumulative rule.

4. We will pause at this point to consider respondent's contention that the additional evidence answers paragraphs H and I of the law of the case, infra. Concisely stated, the claim is that because of the hostility of the Baird family toward the mother and child decedent did not acknowledge his paternity nor introduce respondent to his relatives.

After quoting from paragraph I of the law of the case, infra, the brief continues:

"In the former appeal it was ruled as one of the grounds of reversal that the illegitimate child was not introduced to and known by the decedent's mother and his blood relatives. In the present case evidence was introduced to show why the child was never taken to decedent's mother. This evidence related to the hostility of the mother and of decedent's family toward the child's mother and to the child itself, and to the necessity which the decedent was under of keeping the child and its mother away from his family."

First, with respect to the animus of the Baird family toward Miss Valencia: Notwithstanding the evidence is not new on this trial, we will describe in this connection certain episodes asserted to have occurred in 1903-4, which may be conceded to be the basis of such hostility as Mrs. Baird and her daughter entertained for Miss Valencia.

Early in the litigation the depositions of Mrs. Baird and her daughter were taken. They were read in evidence on each of the three trials. It appears from these depositions that the sister of decedent testified that in the fore part of 1903 she was notified over the telephone to come to 318 O'Farrell street—"the Kingston"—to get decedent or he would be turned over to the authorities. The witness testified she found him suffering from delirium tremens in a room in which she afterward learned Miss Valencia lived and that when decedent saw her he exclaimed, "Oh, my God, have they brought you here?" He was taken to the residence at 2513 Pacific avenue, where he was then residing with his sister, and on the following morning he appeared to her as being in a more rational state of mind. However, she observed, as he lay in bed, a pistol on his mattress, as he declared, "Those thieves have taken my watch and I am going after them." She became alarmed and reported the matter to the police commissioner, a friend of the Baird family. It was this and other circumstances that led us to the conclusion that the jury would have been justified in inferring that the charge of vagrancy emanated from the police commissioner and decedent's sister. The witness also testified that not long after the above incident she was informed over the telephone by a Mrs. Rogers, residing at 1776 Pacific avenue, that a plot had been hatched to marry decedent to Miss Valencia. She quotes Mrs. Rogers to the effect that the ceremony was to be performed at a beach resort, and that a colored minister was to officiate. The witness enlisted the aid of her brother, who, with a friend of the family, called at 1776 Pacific avenue; but it appears Mrs. Rogers was not in. Nothing further appears in the record concerning the incident.

According to the witness it was about this time decedent tried to borrow the $5,000 from her to buy Miss Valencia off. Concerning this proposal a meeting was held in the office of the family attorney, and evidently the money was refused; the witness declaring she did not believe Miss Valencia would go away. The sister testified this was the first time she ever heard of Miss Valencia. As we understood the record, the next event which was brought to the attention of decedent's relatives was when an account of the asserted stabbing of decedent by Miss Valencia appeared in the newspapers. Miss Valencia's version of decedent's injury was that he was cut by a piece of glass; the physician described it as a lacerated wound. Decedent's sister discussed Miss Valencia with her brother and said that he "ought to quit, * * * that he had given us enough notoriety."

It would appear from the evidence that Mrs. Baird was in Europe at the time of decedent's attack of delirium tremens, the marriage plot and the money matter. She testified to a conversation with her daughter on her return, however, and stated:

"She told me that David was going with some woman by the name of Valencia; that she didn't think she was a very nice woman."

The witness asserted this was the first time she ever heard of Miss Valencia. Mrs. Baird was in San Francisco, however, when decedent was taken to the hospital, and upon reading about it in the newspapers she visited him at the sanitarium. He told her he had been "cut by this woman"; begged her pardon and said he was "very sorry such a thing had happened to him, that he was quit of this woman, and he promised he would never have anything more to do with her." We will presently discuss the testimony of Miss Valencia and the physician, from which it appeared decedent did not intend to keep the promise to his mother.

Mrs. Baird testified that when she was in Europe in 1905, Mrs. Hopkins, a friend of the family, quoted the sister to the effect that the Baird estate advanced money to decedent to get rid of Miss Valencia. The Baird estate collected a claim against decedent's estate for $7,700, represented by his promissory note dated November 1, 1905. There is no other testimony connecting Miss Valencia with this money and it does not appear she was questioned about it. The note must have been executed after decedent returned with his mother from the European trip of 1905, when it is claimed the train incident occurred.

Decedent's sister also testified that in 1904 a warrant of arrest was caused to be issued to take decedent into custody on a charge of insanity, and that after the San Francisco disaster, and up to the time of decedent's demise, she was not aware the couple kept up their relations.

Whatever the merits of the evidence touching these episodes may be, we do not attempt to decide. Our purpose in referring to this evidence is to show that Mrs. Baird and her daughter had learned of Miss Valencia as early as 1903; that they must have condemned her association with decedent, and that their attitude toward her has been a part of the evidence on all the trials.

Now, with regard to the claim that the members of the Baird family were hostile to respondent: There is no evidence tending to dispute the testimony of Mrs. Baird and her daughter that the first time they heard of the child was after decedent's death. Of course, if they did not know of the baby before that event respondent's present contention must fail.

Upon this point we will review the evidence as to each member of the Baird family. The testimony of Miss Valencia is that when Miles T. Baird called at the St. Helen Apartment in April, 1907, before leaving for Australia, the child was asleep in another room, and that decedent remarked to him, referring to respondent: "Miles, he is a dandy. He beats your boy all hollow." The connection of this brother with the case is singular, to say the least, and upon the surface of things unaccountable. He never testified for either side, and respondent offered evidence that he was in King City at the time of the last trial. In one part of the record there is a mention of his deposition, but if one was taken it has not appeared in evidence. Some time following his departure for Australia, in 1908 it appears, his mother joined him at Hull, England, and together they journeyed to San Francisco, arriving after decedent's death.

It appears that this brother had transactions with Miss Valencia following decedent's demise. It was suggested that Miss Valencia knew Miles T. Baird before the relationship with his brother was formed. A question was put to her and she answered: "That has always been the opinion, but I did not." By way of supporting the claim that decedent had his residence with the mother and child, it was testified he kept his clothes in those places. The wardrobe was not produced by respondent at the trial, and there is evidence that an extensive wardrobe was found in decedent's room at the Fairmont Hotel after his death. Accounting for her failure to produce the wardrobe at the trial, Miss Valencia explained that when Miles T. Baird was prosecuted on a criminal charge after his return to San Francisco and was released, he had no money and appealed to her for decedent's clothes, which she gave to him. The other side submitted evidence that about this time he gave Miss Valencia a check for $150, which check was not honored. It also appears from her testimony that there were other money transactions between them. At all events, it is not claimed that Miles T. Baird was hostile to respondent.

Benjamin H. Baird related a conversation he had with decedent at the Hotel Robins in September, 1908, at which time the witness stated decedent had been drinking and seemed greatly worried. We quote: "I am ashamed to walk the streets"—owing to Miss Valencia's claim that he was the father of respondent. When asked why he drank so much, he answered:

"That is the only peace I have, is when I am drinking. * * * This woman, Dodie Valencia, has gotten it all around that a child she has is his.' I said, 'Why don't you put a stop to it?' and he said, 'I am cut up enough now.' * * *"

It is not claimed that Thomas R. Baird ever heard of the relationship or of respondent before decedent's death.

Notwithstanding the evidence to the contrary, it is claimed that Miles T. Baird and Benjamin H. Baird must have informed Mrs. Baird and her daughter of the child after they learned of its existence. As already indicated, Miles T. Baird talked with decedent about respondent in April, 1907, and joined his mother in England in 1908; but there is absolutely no evidence that he mentioned the child to her, to his sister, or to his half-brothers. In the state of the record, to hold to the contrary would be to draw one inference from another. So, too, as to Benjamin H. Baird. He testified he did not repeat to his relatives the conversation he had with decedent at the Hotel Robins about the mother and child. Moreover, his mother was in Europe and his sister in New York from the date of the conversation until after decedent died. It is also claimed that the colored family coachman or his wife must have mentioned respondent to Mrs. Baird. The records show the coachman testified on the first and second trials but not on the last trial. His wife did not testify at all. His testimony was to the effect that a member of a well-known San Francisco family told him it was being claimed decedent was the father of a child; also, that a downtown merchant said to him: "Well, Miss Dodie Valencia claims that she has a baby by David." The witness describes himself as backing away and refusing to listen. He testified that about a month after the incident with the merchant he repeated the charge to decedent who denounced it as a lie and concluded with an aggressive remark about the merchant. The witness denied mentioning the matter to Mrs. Baird. He served the family for 35 or 40 years and it is stated in respondent's brief that because Mrs. Baird presented him with a home he was no doubt influenced in his testimony. Here, again, there is no foundation for an inference that the witness repeated to the other members of the Baird family what had been said to him about the baby. The same rule applies to other testimony. It was shown there were photographs of respondent in decedent's room at the Fairmont Hotel at the time of his death and it is claimed an inference is justified that Mrs. Baird saw the photographs, that she inquired about them and thus learned of respondent's existence. But here, too, to draw an inference from this circumstance alone would be to enter the realm of speculation and conjecture.

The testimony of the masseuse that the couple used the name of "Tyler" because of the hostility of Mrs. Baird to the mother and child is open to the objection that it was hearsay. At most, it was a conclusion of the witness. It does not appear that she ever saw or came in contact with Mrs. Baird or had any knowledge of her bearing toward the mother or the child. The testimony of the milliner as to Mrs. Baird's attitude and the reason for the use of the name "Tyler" is objectionable upon similar grounds. Miss Valencia's testimony touching the asserted visits of Mrs. Baird to the dry goods store is essentially a conclusion of the witness and is not evidence that Mrs. Baird knew or recognized them or either of them.

Another point is made in this connection. Answering the statement in the last department decision that decedent was not estranged from his relatives, the claim is made that from the time the association of Miss Valencia and decedent began he separated himself from his blood relatives, was estranged from them, and that their intercourse thereafter was confined to business matters connected with the Baird estate. The claim of separation and estrangement is entirely without foundation. No evidence has been offered to controvert the statement in the opinion that the relations between decedent and his mother were of the most intimate and affectionate character. When John R.

Baird, his eldest brother, died in December, 1905, decedent was most solicitous for his mother in her bereavement. For a time he slept in the same room with her and constantly showed her every attention. We have stated he was with her in Europe in 1905. He joined her and Benjamin H. Baird in the home of his sister in New York in the winter of 1907-08 on their return from Europe. The relations between decedent and his sister and brothers were such as usually obtain between relatives of that degree. His half-brothers, when they were in San Francisco, were frequently in his company and were entertained by him. In support of the claim of estrangement the point is made that decedent's sister had urged the mother not to give money to the boys, but there is no intimation that she sought any advantage for herself in making this suggestion. The mother was, nevertheless, generous with her sons. It is shown that there was a difference of opinion between decedent and his sister as to two business matters. When she was keeping house for her brothers at 2513 Pacific avenue, the decedent refused to pay what she regarded as his proportion of the cost of some concrete and other work about the premises. He took the position that the regular monthly sum he paid was in full for everything. They failed to agree on this point and decedent gave up his room and went to live at the Grand Hotel, which was his home at the time of the asserted stabbing. The second incident occurred on January 4, 1908, while visiting his sister in New York after the European trip of his mother and Benjamin H. Baird. He tried to sell his sister a portion of his stock in the Baird estate. She declined the offer and said she would advise her mother not to buy it, but that they each would give him $1,000 to help him along. He became angry at this, and, according to her testimony, his relations with her were somewhat strained during the remainder of the visit. His mother decided to purchase the shares. The party remained in New York until January 9, when they started for San Francisco, arriving on January 13. It is these three incidents upon which respondent must base the claim that decedent was estranged from his relatives. There is evidence that decedent corresponded with his sister and that when he was abroad in 1905 he sent her a gift. The briefs of appellants do not question that following the episodes referred to both the daughter and her mother were opposed to decedent's relations with Miss Valencia, but it nowhere appears that the disclosures ever disturbed the affectionate regard the members of the family had for each other; and there is no trace of proof to the contrary. When the relatives were in San Francisco decedent was frequently in their company and their relations with him appeared to be harmonious. On Christmas Day, 1906, less than three weeks after the birth of the child, Mrs. Baird had her sons at dinner, and until she left for Europe in April, 1907, the decedent was often in her company. He provided for his mother and half-brothers in his will and expressed himself as satisfied with it in 1907, nearly a year after the birth of respondent and at the very time it is claimed he was estranged from his relatives.

Finally, it may be assumed in the light of the evidence that apart from the child decedent's relatives would be opposed to any kind of relations between him and Miss Valencia. But this has appeared to be the fact ever since the litigation was entered upon. It would, however, require something more than the bare assertions in respondent's brief to justify us in holding that if decedent evinced a desire to adopt the innocent child his relatives would have been hostile to the idea, or, if they were, it would prevent him from making him his heir. There is no phase of the evidence in this case which would justify us either in concluding that in addition to Miles T. Baird decedent's other relatives knew of the child, or that their attitude in respect to it was responsible for decedent's failure to treat respondent as the father of a legitimate child would treat his offspring.

[10] 5. It is claimed by appellants that certain instructions proposed by respondent and given to the jury ignore the principles of law laid down in the last department decision on the issues of receipt into family and otherwise treating the child as legitimate. In this connection it is argued that when these instructions are compared with other instructions that were given in accordance with the principles laid down in the decision "it is impossible to tell which was adopted by the jury in reaching their verdict (Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 248, 253, 107 Pac. 309)." We are satisfied appellants' contention must be sustained.

Upon the last appeal it was necessary to lay down certain principles of law and to determine whether or not the evidence in the case satisfied those principles, failing in which it was declared that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the judgment. These principles were not only announced in the last department decision in plain and unmistakable terms, but were embodied in the instructions given to the jury upon the trial now under review.

The court on the last trial gave to the jury paragraphs F, G, and I of the law of the case, infra, substantially in the language of the decision.

That the last department decision established these principles as a matter of law was clearly recognized by the respondent in the petition for hearing in bank filed upon the second appeal. We will quote from that petition some of the statements therein set forth in black-faced type, not for the purpose of binding the respondent by the more or less hastily prepared petition, but for the purpose of showing that the respondent then recognized that the decision did establish certain principles of law which, of course, would be controlling upon a new trial. It was asserted in the petition for hearing in bank after the last department decision:

"The record establishes that the decedent received the petitioner into his family as his child and a member of his family. * * * Any objection that the existence of decedent's family with petitioner was concealed from decedent's mother and other blood kindred goes to the point of public acknowledgment, and it has no force in respect to the condition of reception into family and treatment as a legitimate child where paternity and public acknowledgment of paternity are admitted. * * * The department opinion erroneously rules that decedent's reception into his family of petitioner as his child, was invalidated for the purposes of section 230, Civil Code, by reason of concealment of the existence of the family from decedent's mother and other blood relations. * * * The decedent's attitude and conduct toward petitioner establish his receipt of petitioner into his family as his child and member of his family. * * * The department opinion erroneously declares a rule that in cases arising under section 230 where the father is a bachelor, proof of his treatment of his child as if it were a legitimate child is not complete unless it includes evidence that the father informed his blood kindred of the child's existence and his family with the child. * * * The department overlooked, or failed to consider as material, a condition of the evidence showing that during a period of nine months while decedent was living with petitioner and petitioner's mother, in a household and home in San Francisco, and decedent performing daily acts evidencing that he had received petitioner into his family, and was in every way treating petitioner as if he were a legitimate child, the decedent's mother, sister, and brothers were without the State of California, and that during such period the adoption of petitioner was complete, and under circumstances where objection on account of any charges of concealment would be untenable, if such an objection could be tenable in any case. * * * The opinion concedes that decedent did not attempt to conceal his relations with petitioner and petitioner's mother, and that there was evidence that he freely, frequently and publicly proclaimed their relations. * * * The weight of the testimony concerning decedent using the assumed name of Tyler and his alleged concealment of the existence of petitioner and of decedent's family with petitioner, was a question specially considered in the trial court. * * * The opinion assumes a different state of facts concerning alleged cordiality between decedent and his kindred than is shown by the record, and gives such assumption false weight in overturning the verdict and judgment of the trial court. * * * The department opinion overlooks the force of evidence of public acknowledgment in eliminating all idea of concealment, and in its bearing on receipt into the family and otherwise treating the child as a legitimate child."

With this statement by the respondent before it, as to the nature and effect of the last department decision, the court in bank denied the petition for hearing therein. Having thus unsuccessfully petitioned this court in bank for a rectification of the asserted errors in the decision in department, the respondent was apparently more successful in the trial court, for that court instructed the jury in accordance with some of the contentions advanced in his petition for hearing in bank and in his briefs upon the previous appeal, which instructions he now seeks to justify and uphold upon the ground that the last department decision was erroneous, and that it was therefore unnecessary for the trial court to follow it. The instructions we are about to quote are inconsistent with those we have heretofore referred to in this opinion, also given by the trial court, and are, in part, as follows:

"If you find from the evidence that the deceased is petitioner's father and that deceased had no home but that of Lydia Valencia, and that the deceased and petitioner and petitioner's mother constituted the family of deceased, and that they resided in one house as a household and family, and that the deceased did receive the petitioner into his family and otherwise treat said petitioner as if he was a legitimate child, and if you find further that the deceased did at any time publicly acknowledge the petitioner as his own child, then your verdict should be for the petitioner."

This instruction entirely ignored the main point in the case, namely, the clandestine character of the family and the concealment and dissimulation practiced by the decedent in his relations with the child and its mother.

Another erroneous instruction was given upon the same subject, as follows:

"The court instructs you that a father, and his illegitimate child living with and supported by him, constitutes a family such as contemplated under section 230 of the Civil Code. Therefore, if you find from the evidence that David J. Baird, the deceased, and David Jennings Baird, Jr., the petitioner herein, resided together under such circumstances would be sufficient receiving into the family under the provisions of said section, notwithstanding the fact that the deceased and the mother of the petitioner were not married."

This instruction also wholly ignores what was declared in the last department decision as to the clandestine character of such "family" and the concealment and dissimulation practiced by decedent as the rule upon that subject was established by the said decision.

Another erroneous instruction was given which covered not only the subject of whether or not decedent received the child into his family, but also the question of public acknowledgment and the subject of otherwise treating the child. We will, for convenience, italicize portions of the instruction to be subsequently quoted and referred to. The instruction is as follows:

"The law of this state establishes that an association between an adult unmarried father and his illegitimate child and the child's mother may constitute a family. This family is established by the living together as a household in like manner as legitimate families abide together, and are established and maintained. Therefore, if such father and child and mistress establish a household and home maintained by the father, where they abide together apart from the father's blood relatives, and this association and manner of living together is proved by competent testimony, the status of family is impressed upon such association. And if such association is made publicly by the conduct of the father in his manner of living with his child and mistress, and he publicly acknowledges the child to be his own child, and receives and harbours the child as his own in such family association, and otherwise treats the child in the manner that fathers of legitimate families treat their children, and this public acknowledgment of paternity and association, between the father and child, is proved by the testimony of strangers, neighbors, tradesmen, and friends and acquaintances of the father, the law determines from such evidence that the father has effectually adopted his child under the provisions of section 230 of the Civil Code. In such a case, the failure of the father to advise his blood relatives of his relations with the child, or his denial and concealment of such relations from his blood relatives, would not prevent a complete adoption under section 230 of the Civil Code."

This instruction in its effect under the evidence may be epitomized as follows: Where an unmarried man, his illegitimate child, and the child's mother live together as a household in like manner as legitimate families abide together and are established and maintained; where they abide together apart from the father's blood relatives, they constitute his family, even if the family is a clandestine one living under an assumed name, and if he receives and harbors the child as his own in such family association he receives the child into his family within the meaning of that phrase as used in section 230 of the Civil Code. In such a case the denial and concealment of such relations from his blood relatives would not prevent a complete adoption under section 230 of the Civil Code if he publicly acknowledges the child as his own, and by his conduct such association is made public.

It will be observed that this instruction is complete in itself, for, after stating the various considerations which may result in adoption, it is said under such circumstances "the father has effectually adopted his child under the provisions of section 230 of the Civil Code."

This instruction is directly in the teeth of the decision of this court upon the previous appeal. It not only completely ignores the clandestine character of the family in determining whether or not the relationship under consideration is sufficient to constitute a family within the rule announced in the previous decision, but it is also for that reason inconsistent with the other instructions to which we have referred.

The instruction not only permits the jury to determine that the relationship between the decedent, the child, and its mother constituted a family, although that relationship was clandestine, as above stated, but it also deals with the question of the public acknowledgment of the child and the question of whether or not it was otherwise treated as his own.

The instruction now under consideration upon the latter subject is as follows:

"And if * * * the father * * * otherwise treats the child in the manner that fathers of legitimate families treat their children, * * * the law determines from such evidence that the father has effectually adopted his child under the provisions of section 230 of the Civil Code. In such a case, the failure of the father to advise his blood relatives of his relations with the child, or his denial and concealment of such relations from his blood relatives, would not prevent a complete adoption under section 230 of the Civil Code."

The instruction as a whole is in accordance with the view of the law unsuccessfully contended for by respondent in his petition for hearing in bank above quoted as follows:

"Any objection that the existence of decedent's family with petitioner was concealed from decedent's mother and other blood kindred goes to the point of public acknowledgment, and it has no force in respect to the condition of reception into family and treatment where paternity and public acknowledgment of paternity are admitted."

Respondent does not seek to justify these erroneous instructions otherwise than by attacking the last department decision, which criticisms we will consider under the next head.

We have held that the law laid down in the last department opinion became the law of the case. The principles thus declared are in accord with the evidence and the law. But even if this were not so, those declarations were binding on the trial court as they are binding here. The trial court had no alternative in ruling on the evidence and in instructing the jury but to follow the law declared in the last department decision. It was no part of the trial court's function to determine whether the former appeal had been correctly decided; its sole duty was to follow without question the principles established by that decision. This the trial court failed to do, and the instructions we have condemned are therefore prejudicially erroneous within the meaning of the Constitution (section 4½, art. 6).

6. We will, before bringing to a close the consideration of the general subject of the law of the case, and as in a sense entering into it, take up respondent's attack on the last department decision as indicated by the following quotations from his brief:

"A perusal of the transcript will, however, demonstrate that one of two things is certainly true: (1) Either the evidence is essentially different on this appeal, or (2) this court upon the former appeal made a grave mistake in its decision by overlooking evidence establishing the fact that decedent did receive petitioner into his family and did treat him as if he were a legitimate child. Without any intended reflection upon this court, we will hereafter point out that the author of the decision in the Estate of Baird, 182 Cal. 338, 188 Pac. 43, not only overlooked much testimony favoring the contention of petitioner and which the trial court and jury found to be true, but the decision gave a false coloring to the testimony in spite of the fact that the opinion says: 'We shall resolve every question of fact in favor of petitioner.' We respectfully take issue with any claim that the opinion correctly or fairly sets forth the conditions of the evidence, and we submit that a fair consideration of the record in that case will convince that the opinion has resolved all questions of fact adversely to the petitioner even against the accumulated testimony of numbers of witnesses upon single points, and against the finding of the trial court and jury, that such testimony is true. * * *

We have purposely refrained from quoting the entire brief upon the subject, because if the attack does not pass beyond the bounds of just criticism, it is in any event entitled to a place in the opinion of this court. There is nothing new in this contention now advanced by the respondent, for exactly the same contention was presented by the petition for hearing in bank upon the former appeal and determined against respondent by a denial of that petition, all of the justices concurring except Kerrigan, J. pro tempore, who did not act. It is, for instance, stated:

"It thus appears that the department ignores the rule that in appeals the decision of the trial court is final on the question of credibility of witnesses and the weight of testimony. That the decedent gave the utmost publicity to the fact of his paternity of petitioner; and that his family consisted of himself, petitioner and petitioner's mother, and that he abided and had his home with his family at the St. Helen's Apartments and afterwards at the Octavia Apartments, and then at 230 I street from October, 1907, until his death on November 25, 1908, is established by such a large mass of testimony, determined by the trial court and jury to be true, that it is compelling on this court, under the law and practice governing the decision of appeals, to give full credit to such testimony to support the judgment appealed from."

This objection thus stated in the petition for hearing in bank and now repeated in the briefs upon this appeal was not considered by the court of sufficient importance to require another hearing or a modification of the opinion. Inasmuch, however, as the respondent has persisted in his views, and as the trial court apparently accepted that view on the trial, we will further consider the contention.

The statements and discussion of the evidence in the petition for hearing in bank involve the following paragraphs from the opinion, which we will designate herein as paragraphs A, B, and C, respectively:

A. "A mass of evidence was introduced in support of and against the claim of adoption, but in the consideration of the question here we shall assume that upon the evidence, the verdict of the jury and the findings of the court, it was established that the decedent was the natural father of petitioner, and that he publicly acknowledged him as his own child. We will therefore discuss the evidence with special reference to the remaining propositions—whether petitioner was received into the family of the decedent, and by him otherwise treated as a legitimate child, and view it in the light most favorable to petitioner."

B. "In this summary of the evidence we have not attempted to cover every phase thereof, nor the numerous inquiries on cross-examination, nor the many apparent contradictions and inconsistencies as shown by the voluminous record before us, for the reason, as already indicated, that we shall resolve every question of fact in favor of petitioner. It may, however, contribute to a more complete understanding of the evidence to mention that the decedent in his relations with the mother of the child led a life of reckless dissipation, being habitually under the influence of intoxicants, and otherwise showing great demoralization; that for the most part the persons who figured prominently in their illicit relationship (excluding neighbors and those with whom they had business dealings), and upon whose testimony the case of petitioner very greatly depends, came into the life of the decedent through such relationship, some of them of loose morals and just the kind of characters it might be expected would be their mutual companions, associates, and friends. There are frequent references to lively automobile parties, the bill in one month for automobile hire amounting to over six hundred dollars, and, according to the evidence, only one man ever sharing with the decedent the expense of such entertainment; and to trips to the beach, to roadhouses, to cafés and the like, on occasions the entire night being given over to that kind of diversion."

C. "In this case the couple masqueraded as man and wife under a fictitious name assumed by the father and mother and given to the child in order to keep the decedent's family in ignorance of the meretricious relationship and of the child. As we have seen, the decedent was on cordial and intimate terms with the members of the Baird family. He constantly canvassed the affairs of the Baird estate with them, had other interests in common with them, corresponded with his mother and sister, arranged for the schooling of his half-brothers, and one year made a trip to New York to meet his mother on her return from Europe so that he might journey to San Francisco with her and other members of the family. In short, the relations between the decedent and his relatives clearly appear to be such, considering their respective modes of living, as usually obtain between a bachelor son and his relatives with whom he is on terms of cordial and affectionate intimacy, and plainly suggest that the motive for his course of conduct towards petitioner was to spare the Baird family humiliation. We think this is true in spite of the testimony of several of respondent's witnesses, from which it might be inferred that the decedent seized every opportunity to proclaim his shame, going so far, according to the testimony of the attending physician, as to name the child 'David Jennings Baird.' This witness, who had known Miss Valencia and the decedent for several years before petitioner was born, stated that he obtained the data for the birth certificate from the decedent, who was reluctant to give the information because 'he wanted to keep it from his mother.' It is worthy of mention that the birth certificate was not filed until February 14, 1907—more than two months after the birth of petitioner. This physician also stated that when he sent bills for his services to the decedent to the apartment or to the house he used the name 'Tyler,' and when to the Palace Hotel or the Fairmont Hotel, the name of 'Baird.'"

We quote the following paragraphs from the law of the case and refer to them herein as paragraphs D, E, F, G, H, and I, respectively:

D. "If this was a family, it was a clandestine family, using the word 'clandestine' to describe the character of the family rather than the relationship that existed between the father and the mother of the child."

E. "It is the attitude of the father toward and his conduct in respect to the child, and not the character of his relationship with the mother, which is the true test in determining whether the child was received into the family of the father."

F. "It would be a violation of the letter and spirit of the statute to hold that 'the father of an illegitimate child' has received it 'into his family,' where the existence of the 'family' rests upon concealment and dissimulation well calculated to keep from his own relatives, who are living in the same community and with whom he is on terms of intimacy, all knowledge either of the child or of 'his family.'"

G. "The evidence leads us to the conclusion that where the unmarried father of an illegitimate child lives in the same community and maintains constant relations with his own legitimate family, and at the same time, under an assumed name, maintains the illegitimate child clandestinely in another home with its mother, with whom he lives in illicit relations a great part of his time, he is not receiving the child as his own 'into his family,' within the meaning of section 230 of the Civil Code."

H. "But, even if it be true from the testimony on behalf of respondent, that the decedent maintained an establishment at the places where the mother and the child lived which had something of the character of a family in the sense in which that term is used in some of the decisions, although clandestine with respect to his legitimate family, it cannot be denied, on the other hand, that he did not treat the child as if it were a legitimate child. A father of a legitimate child, under such circumstances, does not cause or allow it to be known by an assumed name. If he wanted the child to be deemed legitimate, he would have it known by his own name, he would naturally refer to it when associating with his own mother, sister, and brothers, and he would either take the child to see them or have them see the child. If he had been estranged from his own family he might not have done so, but that was not the case. When his relatives were in San Francisco he was associating with them as a member of the family during all of the time, yet he never in any sense treated the child as he would a legitimate child so far as they were concerned. It is a circumstance proper to be considered in determining this question that when the decedent discussed his will with I. I. Brown, whom he named as his executor, some time after the birth of petitioner, he made no change therein."

I. "Where the father of an illegitimate child has members of his own family living in the same community with whom he is in almost constant association and maintains cordial relations, he does not treat the child as if it was a legitimate child, if he conceals its existence from such members of his real family, never has them visit the child or has the child visit them, or in any other manner acts toward the child with regard to his own legitimate relatives as any father reasonably would do if he intended to adopt the child as his own and treat it as his legitimate child. Such treatment is contrary to the sense in which section 230 of the Civil Code uses the phrase 'otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child.' The treating it as if it were legitimate is as essential to a legal adoption under that section as any of the other elements therein mentioned. Because of the want of such treatment we are of the opinion that there was no adoption."

The evidence on the issues of paternity and public acknowledgment thereof was assumed for the purposes of the last department decision to be sufficient. This dispensed with the necessity of describing the evidence particularly addressed to those issues, or even of making a close summary of it. Touching the other issues of adoption—receipt into family and otherwise treating the child as legitimate—it was not so much a question of what facts must be held under the rule of decision on appeal to have been established by the evidence for respondent as it was a lack of facts to satisfy the requirements of section 230 of the Civil Code on those issues. And yet, in the face of this legal situation, plainly appearing in the decision, the brief for respondent is largely made up of repetitive statements and discussion of the evidence under all the issues, except paternity, of criticisms of the opinion and of the testimony of the witnesses for the other side. It has been shown in division 1 of this opinion that the law laid down in the decision became the law of the case on those two issues—that is to say, the evidence was not sufficient as matter of law to establish receipt of respondent into the "family" of decedent or that he otherwise treated the child as legitimate. The law thus stated remained the law of the case on the third trial until or unless new facts were presented sufficient to put the case at large. Yet it is argued in respondent's brief that the judgment was reversed on a question of fact, and not one of law, and that the first decision (Estate of Baird, 173 Cal. 617, 160 Pac. 1078), notwithstanding its own clear statement that it did not pass on the above issues, established the law of the case. As we have stated, no attempt was made by appellants to segregate the additional from the other evidence. The brief, in dealing with the question of the additional evidence, did not show as a distinct proposition whether or not the principles of law declared under the evidence on those issues governed the third trial. Of the 247 pages of the brief, the discussion of the doctrine of the law of the case occupies 16, and the assignments of error in the rulings and in the instructions 14 pages, the remaining pages being devoted principally to a review of what is claimed is all of the evidence on the said three issues of adoption, and to criticisms of the opinion and of the witnesses for appellants. But notwithstanding we have held the law of the case did apply to the last trial, we will consider generally the criticisms of the decision.

As to the first criticism it is sufficient to say that we have shown in division 3 of this opinion that the evidence on the third trial is not essentially different. With reference to the second contention that the decision overlooked much testimony favoring respondent and gave a false coloring to that bearing on the issues of receipt into family and otherwise treating the child as legitimate, it will be noted that paragraph B of the facts, supra, states that the opinion did not attempt to cover every phase of the proof. It is also to be noted that the evidence concerning the "family" and decedent's attitude toward and his conduct in respect to respondent, including the use of the name "Tyler," and the conditions that marked the places where the child was kept came almost entirely from the witnesses for that side. The difficulty was not the failure to take the evidence into account and present it in its true color, but the failure of counsel for respondent to present the evidence as it is and to give legal effect to its import. For instance, it is claimed the child was always known by decedent's true name, and yet the witnesses for respondent contradict such claim. This contention is on par with the statement "that decedent gave the utmost publicity to the fact of his paternity" when the record shows that with the exception of Miles T. Baird he never acknowledged the child to his relatives or to his friends.

A comparison of the testimony summarized in the opinion with that presented by the record of the second trial makes it clear that no phase of the evidence important to the issues upon which the decision turned was ignored, but that it was stated, considered, and applied subject to the rule of decision on appeal. It appears from the decision that the evidence as to decedent's attitude toward the child and his conduct with respect to it in the environments where it was kept was accepted as true, but that even accepting the evidence as true it was not sufficient, in the face of the clandestine "family" and the isolation of the child from decedent's relatives, to establish the issues to which the evidence was addressed. The evidence as to decedent's life among his relatives, the places he held out to the community as his residence before and after the birth of the child, and as to whether his relatives knew of its existence was supplied by the witnesses for appellants, some of it taking the form of documentary evidence, hotel books of account, checks, bills, vouchers, and the like. To put it in another way, generally speaking, respondent's witnesses depicted decedent's relations with the mother and his attitude toward and his conduct touching the child, and appellants, his relations with his relatives and friends and the friends of the Baird family. It is clear from the decision that the rule applied in Fowden v. Pacific Coast Steamship Co., 149 Cal. 151, 86 Pac. 178, cited by respondent, was followed; that—

"It is the duty of the appellate court to sustain the verdict when there is a substantial conflict of the evidence, no matter how much it may preponderate upon the other side."

This rule was observed upon every question of fact. Every fact which, under that rule, would be deemed to exist in favor of respondent was so applied. And where the evidence of either side was not contradicted, either directly or indirectly, it was accepted under the familiar rule that, where uncontradicted evidence is not inherently improbable, it will be held sufficient to decide a question of fact. And no fact was deemed established by appellants, even when not directly involved by counter evidence, if under the rule of decision on appeal it stood opposed to the facts established by respondent, or to the inferences arising therefrom.

It is plain the opinion did not question the testimony of respondent's witnesses, but that it was accepted as true and given proper legal effect. The theory of the opinion was that conceding to have been established every fact claimed by respondent from the testimony of his witnesses, as matter of law decedent neither received the child into his family nor otherwise treated him as legitimate. This will be made plain by what will be said in division 7 of this opinion on those issues.

To illustrate the manner of considering the evidence in the opinion: The decision assumed as true the testimony of the physician that decedent gave him the legal data for the birth certificate, including the name for the baby, and as to the circumstances attending the filing of the birth certificate. It also accepted as true Miss Valencia's testimony, variant as it was in many particulars, including the statement that decedent always intended to marry her, and this notwithstanding the uncontradicted testimony of Benjamin H. Baird as to decedent's declarations concerning her character. And the many statements imputed by Miss Valencia and other witnesses of respondent to one whose lips were sealed in death (Estate of Emerson, 175 Cal. 724, 167 Pac. 149) were not questioned under the rule.

It is apparent from what we have said in answer to the criticisms of the decision there is no warrant for respondent's contention that the decision resolved all questions of fact adversely to respondent, even against the accumulated testimony of his witnesses. The opinion itself demonstrates that it did not resolve all questions of fact adversely to respondent or ignore the rule that the decision of the trial court is final as to the credibility of witnesses and the weight of testimony.

Now, with regard to the statements in paragraphs B and C of the facts, supra. It is not to be questioned that decedent in his relations with Miss Valencia was reckless and dissipated, that he was frequently under the influence of intoxicants when he was with the mother and child and that he otherwise became greatly demoralized. Nor can there be any dissent from the statement that some of their associates were persons of loose morals and the kind of characters it might be expected would, under the circumstances of the relationship, be their companions and friends. There are many references in the evidence to drinking places where women keep appointments with men; visits to and drinking at the race track. There are allusions to meetings in saloons, cafés on the beach and elsewhere, when there was much drinking; to well-known characters, bartenders, saloon-keepers, café proprietors and habitués of a certain section of the city before the great fire. For a considerable time the mother and child took their meals in a well-known café. The proprietor of one of these places frequented by the couple figures in the testimony in connection with the effort of decedent to borrow $5,000 from his sister with which to buy Miss Valencia off in 1903, and he is numbered with other men as being on intimate terms with her. We will not pause to review the testimony as to the automobile parties in and out of San Francisco when, as one of the chauffeurs testified, they did not "miss many places where there was a good deal of liquor." Respondent's witnesses gave accounts of trips to the beach, to points in the interior, when the couple registered by the name of "Tyler," and when there was much drinking and dissipation, decedent practically paying all the bills. It is not too much to say that when the couple were together, much of their time and that of their mutual friends was spent in that way. It appears from the record that several of their associates and friends were not called as witnesses for respondent, although it is in evidence they were closely identified with the relationship and evidently in touch with every phase of it. We have in mind, for instance, the two women, each of whom lived with a man out of wedlock. These women were close associates of Miss Valencia, and one of them, as already indicated, became the bride of her lover in Redwood City a short time before decedent died, in connection with which it was proposed that Miss Valencia and decedent do likewise. The record leaves the impression that the woman who engaged the St. Helen Apartment before the birth of respondent was a guiding spirit in all that affected the relationship and the child as will later more fully appear. Instead of overstating the facts as to the "family," an examination of the record will make it clear that the opinion kept well within the bounds of moderation in describing the manner of life decedent and Miss Valencia led together from the beginning to the end, and some of the people who figured in their relationship. No mention was made of the testimony as to Miss Valencia's reputation in the community nor to other phases of the proof dealing with the character of their relations.

In the light of the evidence later set forth we fail to understand upon what theory respondent questions the testimony of his own witnesses which justified the statement that the couple masqueraded as man and wife under an assumed name, which was given to the child. Miss Valencia insists they always lived together as man and wife, but she admits they used the fictitious name at times. The evidence shows that she was known in the community as "Lydia M. Valencia" and "Dodie Valencia," and in and around the abodes as "Mrs. Tyler," "Mrs. D. V. Tyler," sometimes called "Mrs. Baird." Yet it is contended the child, less than two years of age when decedent died, was only known as "David Jennings Baird," although in the abodes decedent was also known by the name of "Tyler." It is not, we have said, claimed the name "Tyler" was never used, but it is insisted it was resorted to because of the pursuit of the couple by decedent's relatives, when there is positive evidence tending to show that neither Mrs. Baird nor her daughter ever heard of Miss Valencia prior to the episode of 1903, and the evidence is that the name "Tyler" was used by the couple from the beginning of the relationship. It also appears that among their companions and friends it was known by some they were not married, while the uninitiated assumed they were; occasionally decedent declared that they were married; on other occasions that they were going to marry. To the neighbors and to some of the visitors to the abodes they passed as man and wife. Deceit was systematically practiced both as to the character of the relationship and of the "family," and this from the birth of the baby to the death of decedent. It cannot be disputed that decedent adopted the fictitious name and used it as a part of the deception, and it is idle to argue that the relationship, the "family," and the child were not kept secret as far as decedent could accomplish it.

There is no merit in the criticism that the decision assumed to weigh the evidence in the statement that decedent's motive for his course of conduct toward respondent was to spare the Baird family humiliation, which was followed by the conclusion:

"We think this is true in spite of the testimony of several of respondent's witnesses from which it might be inferred that the decedent seized every opportunity to proclaim his shame."

The statement was based on two general propositions: First, that if the relationship constituted a "family" it was a clandestine family; and, second, that the relations between decedent and his relatives "appear to be such, considering their respective modes of living, as usually obtain between a bachelor son and his relatives with whom he is on terms of cordial and affectionate intimacy." First, did it trespass on the function of the jury and trial court? It is apparent the opinion was not in that connection reviewing the evidence. The evidence had been summarized in the preceding pages, and the excerpt complained of was made in connection with paragraphs D, E, F, and G of the law of the case, supra, on the subject of the "family," and precedes H and I of the law of the case, supra, on the issue of otherwise treating the child as legitimate. The statement does not suggest that "the testimony of several of respondent's witnesses" was not to be accepted as true; what it does declare is that the propositions of fact are true in spite of such testimony. We shall presently show that this conclusion is not to be questioned. In view of the context it would be giving a forced interpretation to language to contend that the words "it might be inferred" meant it could be inferred that decedent proclaimed his paternity and the "family" to his relatives and friends, as well as to those whom he met where he kept the child. The plain purport of the language is that because he proclaimed his paternity to several of respondent's witnesses it might be inferred he was no less reticent among his relatives and friends, when the fact, as we have shown, is otherwise. In other words, it might be inferred from the fact he spoke of the situation of the "family" and the child in one environment he must have done so in the other, for the expression "the testimony of several of respondent's witnesses" plainly had reference to declarations made to them by decedent in the environments of the mother and child.

The justification for the statement complained of is based on the recited facts. What were the propositions of fact stated to be true in spite of the testimony of respondent's witnesses? (1) That the couple masqueraded as man and wife; (2) that they assumed a fictitious name; (3) that they gave such name to respondent; (4) that the purpose was to keep the Baird family in ignorance of the relationship and of the child; (5) that the relations between decedent and his relatives were such as usually obtain where a bachelor son and his relatives are on terms of cordial and affectionate intimacy; and (6) that the motive for his course of conduct toward respondent was to spare the Baird family humiliation.

We will not repeat what we have said as to the first three propositions of fact. The statement in the opinion as to the attitude of decedent and his relatives toward each other was correct. Respondent denies the "family" was clandestine and affirms decedent was estranged from the Baird family. Neither proposition can be maintained. A point is made on the evidence that decedent kept up the association after he promised his mother he would have no more to do with Miss Valencia, following the episode in which it was claimed he was stabbed by her. The testimony of Miss Valencia and the physician on the point would seem to indicate that decedent did not intend to keep his promise to his mother, but that would only be further evidence that out of regard for her sensibilities he sought to delude her. When the uncontradicted evidence of his attitude toward his mother is considered, no doubt will remain that it was his definite purpose to prevent his reckless and immoral conduct from causing her humiliation and pain. Apparently the relatives endeavored to keep from her the truth as to the life he was leading, for she states in referring to a certain point of time she did not believe the relationship was "then" being carried on. In considering the motive for decedent's attitude toward his relatives with respect to the child, it is to be kept in view that he was financially independent of his relatives and that in a material sense he could follow the bent of his will.

There is therefore no merit in respondent's contention that the statement in the opinion following the above propositions of fact involved an assumption of the functions of the jury. The point is made that the statement in the opinion that the father of a legitimate child would not allow it to be known by an assumed name is contradictory of the other statement that according to the physician decendent gave respondent his own name. The answer to this is: First, that the evidence of respondent's witnesses shows he was known by an assumed name; and, second, that the testimony of the physician makes it clear that in no real evidential sense did decendent intend to give his own name to respondent, at least so far as Mrs. Baird was concerned, and it would seem that in keeping knowledge of the child from her it would be kept from his sister and his half-brothers. It is plain from the physician's testimony that through his action the data contained in the birth certificate "never came to light," and it would appear it was never intended to thereby proclaim the birth of respondent. It must be concluded from his testimony that in giving any data for the birth certificate decendent acted under what he was led to regard as legal compulsion, for the reason that there is no dispute that he wanted the existence of the child kept a secret from his mother. There is not a trace of evidence in the record that the fact of the child's birth ever became known through the filing of the certificate. Hence all that can be claimed from the filing is that it was a constructive proclamation of the birth of the child. What is concerned here is not the legal effect of filing the certificate, but the question of fact whether decendent ever intended to give respondent the name of Baird. In short, the question is one of intention, and it must be regarded as settled against the claim of respondent by his own witness, whose testimony on the point is self-effacing.

Respondent questions the statement in the last opinion that the facts of the cases of Estate of Gird, 157 Cal. 534, 108 Pac. 499, 137 Am. St. Rep. 131, and Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 108, 135 Pac. 288, and Estate of McNamara, 181 Cal. 82, 183 Pac. 552, 7 A. L. R. 313, "differ so widely from those in the case at bar that we do not think it is necessary to discuss them, for in no case has it been held that a family constituted as this 'family' was, as shown by the uncontroverted evidence in the case, would come within the meaning of the statute." It is sufficient to distinguish those cases from this to point out that in the former the place where the child was received was the home and the only home of the father, that he was the head thereof, and that he always went by his own name. Gird never married and he lived on the Gird ranch; that was his only home. He always lived under his own name, but the children were known by the mother's married name. Jones had no other name; he was unmarried and lived alone for long periods on his cattle ranch in the mountains, which was his fixed abode; he had no other home and there is no suggestion of any other "family." The father in the McNamara Case did not attempt to keep knowledge of his paternity from his relatives, friends, or the community at large either in connection with the birth certificate or otherwise, and what we are about to quote from the opinion will plainly distinguish the case on the facts:

"A more public acknowledgment than the act of McNamara in signing the child's birth certificate describing himself as the father, it would be difficult to imagine. In addition, the child was with him and its mother most of the time after its birth and the evidence shows that the relation openly assumed by him was that of father. His statements and his actions were both a public acknowledgment of the child as his and a consistent treatment of it as if it were legitimate. It was also received into his family within the meaning of the Code. It has already been decided by this court that the word 'family' as used by the Code in this connection does not necessarily mean relations, but may mean the family in which or as part of which the father abides. (Estate of Gird, 157 Cal. 542 [137 Am. St. Rep. 131, 108 Pac. 499]; Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 108 [135 Pac. 288].) In this sense the only family McNamara had after the birth of the child was the child and its mother with whom he abided with occasional absences until his death with full assumption of the relation of father, mother, and child. It is worthy of note in this connection that while McNamara was so living with Mrs. Bettencorte and her child, his sister, one of the appellants, visited and stayed with them for some days. * * * It is attempted to distinguish this case from Estate of Jones, supra, where the facts establishing an adoption were much weaker, on the ground that McNamara had no fixed habitation. The parties did change their abode several times, but it was a change of abode. They were not mere wanderers or travelers. Where they were, they made their home. When they finally moved to the place where McNamara died, they did not rent the place but actually arranged to purchase it."

Respondent relies on Estate of Garr, 31 Utah, 57, 86 Pac. 757, to support his claim of receipt into family. The adoption in that case was under a statute identical with section 230. One witness testified he heard John T. Garr, the father, declare, and several others, that they heard his brothers charge that the father of the boy was a man named Jones. The court said:

"If that evidence is all true, it cannot overbalance the weight of his deliberate admissions to those not of kin, and of his acts and conduct toward the boy and his family. The conclusion upon all the evidence in the case is irresistible that he was in fact the father of the child."

The controlling question in that case was whether Garr was the father of the child. It was held he was and that upon all the evidence there was a public acknowledgment. It was not disputed that the child was openly received into the home of Garr, who called it "Johnnie Garr," and that he took care of and raised him "as was natural for a father to do." Here, too, the facts distinguish the authority.

It is also argued that In re McGrew, 183 Cal. 177, 190 Pac. 804, is authority for the proposition that the name of the child is immaterial, referring to what was said in the last department decision concerning the use of an assumed name. The parties lived in Sonoma county and the father's name was Zimmerman—he used no other—and the mother continued to use her family name, McGrew, which was given to the child. Zimmerman tried to marry the mother, but her mother protested. Under her own name the mother of the child engaged the lodgings in San Francisco where the child was born. In holding the father adopted the child the opinion declared that ever since its birth the father at all times publicly acknowledged his paternity; that he received the child with the consent of its mother into his family, where he and its mother resided and kept house together; and that at all times he supported and otherwise treated the child as if it were legitimate. As indicating that the "family" was not clandestine and that the truth was not concealed from the relatives is the fact that the child was adopted in the city and county of San Francisco under section 226 by the sister of the mother while the father was away from the mother and the child working in Lassen county. The court held the father had previously adopted the child under section 230, and the order of adoption under section 226 was vacated on his motion upon the ground that the sister was not a resident of San Francisco when the order under the latter section was made. In that case there was one "family," and, except when the parents stopped temporarily in the lodgings during the mother's confinement, no attempt was made to disguise the situation. There is nothing in that case opposed in principle to the law laid down in the case at bar.

[11, 12] 7. This brings us to consider respondent's contention that the evidence received on the last trial establishes a case of adoption apart from any question of the law of the case.

Appellants do not argue on this appeal that the evidence is not legally sufficient to sustain the special verdict on the issue of paternity. We will therefore confine our discussion under this head to the remaining elements and adopt as far as they will serve the statements of the evidence contained in the last department decision and in the preceding pages of this opinion.

Section 230 of the Civil Code provides:

"The father of an illegitimate child, by publicly acknowledging it as his own, receiving it as such, with the consent of his wife, if he is married, into his family, and otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child, thereby adopts it as such; and such child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from the time of its birth. The foregoing provisions of this chapter do not apply to such an adoption."

Within the meaning of this section, each of the foregoing elements must be established by a preponderance of the evidence, and if the proof fails as to any one of them a case of adoption is not made out. The proceeding to establish an adoption under section 230 partakes of the nature of the contest of a will. If the issues are tried by jury, they must make conclusions of fact in the form of special verdicts. "The special verdicts must pass on all the issues by presenting the conclusions of fact bearing on all," and the issues "must be such that the determination of them will leave to the court no office except to enter a judgment" for or against adoption. Sections 624 and 1314, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Sanderson, 74 Cal. 199, 15 Pac. 753; Estate of Benton, 131 Cal. 472, 63 Pac. 775; Estate of Baird, 173 Cal. 617, 160 Pac. 1078. The issues submitted to and found by the jury herein purport to cover the four elements of adoption according to the terms of section 230, with the exception of special verdict No. 3, which, in finding that respondent was received into the family of decedent, does not state he was so received as his own child.

[13] (a) First as to the issue of public acknowledgment: The term "public acknowledgment" of paternity is the opposite of "private acknowledgment." It means the same kind of acknowledgment a father would make of his legitimate child. It was said in Estate of Gird, 157 Cal. 534, 542, 108 Pac. 499, 503 (137 Am. St. Rep. 131):

"The language of section 230 of the Civil Code is simply 'by publicly acknowledging it as his own.' There is no provision as to what shall constitute a 'public acknowledgment,' and the words of the statute must be taken in their ordinary sense. * * * In the face of circumstances which might well be accepted as calling for explanation as to the true situation if he was not the father of these children, he never expressly denied that he was such. * * * Nor is the fact that he did not say anything about the matter to his brother when he visited his home shortly before his death of such importance, under the circumstances, as to forbid the conclusion of public acknowledgment." Gird's brother never resided in California. The rule is thus stated in the syllabus of Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 108, 112: 'It was also shown that the decedent acknowledged Lester to be his own child many times, willingly and on all occasions, as the father of a legitimate child would naturally do.'" (Italics added.)

The following statement in Estate of Jessup, 81 Cal. 408, in holding there was no public acknowledgment, applies to the conversation between decedent and Benjamin H. Baird at the Hotel Robins (page 429):

"The fact of the boy's existence, and that Jessup was supporting him, was communicated to his brother while yet the child remained in San Francisco, by the nurse in whose charge he was. A few days afterward the brother asked Jessup about it, and asked him if it was his boy, to which Jessup replied: 'No, it ain't my boy.'

Concerning the witnesses to whom it was claimed Jessup acknowledged his paternity, the opinion further says (page 430):

"None of these witnesses were members of Jessup's family, and with a single exception they were not persons likely to come in contact with his family. None of them were his business associates, and such of them as could in any sense be called his companions were only so during such portions of his time as he was in hiding from society. They were not persons likely to make public what he had said to them on such a subject, but rather to accept it as a matter of confidence, to be kept secret."

Concerning this authority it was said in Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 579:

"It was held in the Jessup Case that the father had a family, in the sense of brothers and sisters, with whom he was brought into frequent contact, and from whom he concealed and denied the paternity of the child, and for these reasons, and others, the court held there was no adoption."

The following from Estate of De Laveaga, 142 Cal. 158, 168, just as aptly applies to the case at bar:

"In fact, it seems to have been his studied purpose not to refer to or introduce the subject of his illegitimate child in his intercourse or correspondence with his parents."

In Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 577, 31 Pac. 915, it was said in the main opinion signed by three of the justices that this acknowledgment was also public, "for as we have seen, the thought of concealment of the paternity of the child never entered his mind."

[14] While it is not required in order to constitute public acknowledgment that the father declare his paternity under all circumstances, it would be opposed to the idea of public acknowledgment if he deliberately refrained from declaring his paternity when the occasion would naturally demand it; or misrepresented the fact, or remained silent when he would reasonably be expected to announce he was the father of the child, as, for instance, in the case of immediate relatives. A distinction will be recognized between a mere failure to disclose or publicly acknowledge paternity and a willful misrepresentation in regard to it; in such circumstances there must be no purposeful concealment of the fact of paternity. In this case we have shown that with the exception of Miles T. Baird decedent never acknowledged his paternity to his relatives, his friends, or business associates, or to the friends of the Baird family.

According to the evidence, decedent acknowledged his paternity to numerous persons in the places where he kept and supported the mother and child, in cafés, in stores, on automobile rides, to chauffeurs, to neighbors, to visitors in the abodes, and to others, nearly all of whom it may safely be said were persons who knew the couple and learned of the child through the illicit relationship, and who would not be likely to meet or mention respondent to decedent's relatives, friends, or business associates. With the exception noted, the evidence shows that decedent limited his acknowledgments of paternity principally to such persons as were not acquainted with the Baird family and who were removed from the surroundings where his relatives and friends would be likely to hear of the child.

Each case depends upon its own circumstances (Estate of Gird, supra, 157 Cal. page 543, 108 Pac. 499, 137 Am. St. Rep. 131) and the circumstances in this case were such as to call upon decedent to acknowledge or otherwise disclose his paternity to the members of his own family, especially to his mother. He constantly associated with his half-brothers, and when his mother and sister were in San Francisco he spent much of his time in their company; yet he never spoke of respondent. It is in evidence that neither at the Christmas dinner in 1906, when respondent was less than three weeks old, nor in New York in January, 1908, after the baby had turned its first year, did he mention the child. Estate of De Laveaga, 142 Cal. 158, 75 Pac. 790, comments on the circumstance that the father in that case did not take the child among his kindred, and the italicized expression in the Jones Case indicates that in order to establish an adoption the father of an illegitimate child must willingly acknowledge his paternity on all occasions.

We have seen that to Benjamin H. Baird and to the family coachman decedent denied his paternity. To the former he expressed his opinion that another man, whose name he gave, was the father, and to the latter he spoke with vehemence in denying his paternity. The testimony of Thomas R. Baird that he never heard of the baby until decedent passed away is not denied. Mrs. Baird denied any knowledge of respondent prior to decedent's death and the sister stated she never learned of the child until after decedent died, when word came to her in New York in the form of letters and telegrams. There is no contradiction of the testimony of a number of persons that while decedent discussed matters relating to the Baird family he never mentioned the baby to any of them, and that they never heard of the child before decedent's death. These persons consisted of friends, business associates, acquaintances, including a couple residing in New York, Mrs. Amelia Hutchins, at whose house at 1611 Vallejo street decedent and Benjamin H. Baird lived for a time, and where Thomas R. Baird was sometimes a visitor; the persons with whom decedent had business dealings for the Baird estate at the very time the child was born, real estate agents, and a number of others; the employees of the hotels where he stopped, the servants of the Baird family, and other individuals whom he frequently met and with whom he was on business or friendly terms. The contractor who did work for the Baird estate and lived near decedent at 1611 Vallejo street testified he often drove decedent home and visited him in the evenings, especially during 1906-1908, but that he never mentioned the child to him. A betting commissioner, whose deposition was taken on behalf of respondent early in the litigation and though never offered by that side, was introduced in evidence by appellants for the first time on this appeal, said, referring to the couple:

"I never heard them speak of the child with reference to the Baird family, the Baird estate or the Bairds."

The reticence of decedent as to respondent with respect to the friends of the Baird family, the business men whom he frequently met, his own personal friends, is opposed to every conception of public acknowledgment under the statute. The concealment of the fact that he was a father in the case of such persons is presumptive evidence that away from the environments of the mother and the child he purposely failed to acknowledge his paternity. Such conduct, under the circumstances, was the equivalent of a deliberate denial and a willful concealment of paternity.

The evidence of public acknowledgment relied upon by respondent is that relating to the birth certificate and to the testimony of the witnesses who knew the couple through the relationship and the child. Respondent's brief inquires: "Under the circumstances, how could he [decedent] have done anything more than he did do?" The answer is that he should not have refrained from making acknowledgment of his paternity to his relatives, friends, and business associates—the classes of persons to whom the father of a legitimate child would naturally speak of it. Effect could not be given to the statute if the father of an illegitimate child were thus permitted to discriminate between the classes and groups of persons with whom he is acquainted and who enter into the routine of his life, or who are related to him. Under the terms of section 230 and such cases as Estate of Jessup, supra, and Blythe v. Ayres, supra, it must be held that willful concealment of the fact of paternity by the father from relatives with whom he is in frequent intercourse and is on terms of affection is opposed to public acknowledgment of paternity.

[15] (b) In respect to the issue of receipt into family we will adopt the definition of "family" given in Estate of Gird, supra, as stated at page 545 (108 Pac. 504):

"As used in this section, the word 'family,' in our opinion, means no more at most than that the father must have a 'home,' a settled place of habitation of which he is the head, into which he must receive the child."

It is said in Estate of Jones, supra, at page 114 (135 Pac. 290):

"In Estate of De Laveaga, 142 Cal. 169 (75 Pac. 794), the court held squarely that a man cannot adopt a child under this section unless he has a 'family, or at least a home, into which he can receive it.' In that case the father had parents, brothers, and sisters living, with whom he was on friendly terms, but he did not live with them. He also had a place of abode, but he never received the child therein or took it among his kindred * * * Jones had a residence and dwelling-house which was his fixed place of abode." (Italics ours.)

It was said in the case of In re Jessup, 81 Cal. 434, 22 Pac. 749, 6 L. R. A. 594:

"If he has a wife, he can only receive it into the family with her consent; but if he has no wife, he must still receive it into his family—that is to say, in such family as he has, the child must be acknowledged and treated as his—at least, he must not deny to the members of such family that it is his."

[16] It is plain from the authorities in this state that so far as the element of receipt into the family is concerned, the father, in order to comply with section 230, must have a home or habitation into which he shall receive his illegitimate child as his own, and that the place where he lives must be his settled or fixed habitation of which he is the head. It has been held that where the father of an illegitimate child lives in a home alone, such home may constitute a "family" into which he may receive the child, or where the father and mother of an illegitimate child live in a home or habitation of which the former is the head, although they are not married, the father has a "family" within the meaning of section 230, into which the illegitimate child may be received. Garner v. Judd, 136 Cal. 394, 68 Pac. 1026; In re McGrew, 183 Cal. 177, 190 Pac. 804; Estate of Gird, supra; Estate of De Laveaga, supra; Estate of Jones, supra.

Although the question whether the child was received into decedent's family involves the period between its birth and the death of decedent, it is proper to consider also the evidence dealing with the events and conditions that marked the relationship between decedent and the mother up to the time the baby was born. In other words, the entire history of the relationship should be considered if it will aid in determining whether, under the provisions of section 230, decedent had a family consisting of himself and Miss Valencia, of which he was the head and into which he received respondent.

As bearing on the question of the character of the "family" where the child was kept, it has been urged by appellants in all of the trials that Miss Valencia had lived the life of a prostitute and evidence was sought on the point. The question was put to several witnesses on this trial whether she had not been "one of the most notorious prostitutes in San Francisco," but in a number of instances objections to the questions were sustained. We shall not pause to discuss the exceptions to such rulings, or to go further than to declare that, within the rules of evidence, the fullest latitude should be allowed to prove the sort of life the couple led together, the incidents thereof, the character of Miss Valencia and her friends and associates, whether during the relationship she occupied relations with other men, the kind of places in which she and decedent lived together before the San Francisco disaster, and whether she was from the beginning to the end anything other than the mistress of decedent. Evidence of this general import would probably determine one way or the other the question of adoption more persuasively than any other form of proof. Therefore, under the record in this case when evidence of that character was competently offered it should not have been excluded. Of course, if the charge of prostitution were true, such a fact might have had a controlling effect on the special verdict of the jury on the issue we are discussing. Miss Valencia was asked on cross-examination whether she did not follow prostitution for a livelihood after the death of decedent. In the absence of any objection she declined to answer the question, but at a later session of the court her counsel brought up the inquiry again and then she said: "Absolutely not. No." On another occasion she declared she did not know what the word "prostitute" meant.

The physician was questioned as to the general reputation of Miss Valencia and of the houses in the neighborhood where decedent was claimed to have been stabbed by her. He answered that her reputation was "not very good," and the houses were "not good—loose houses." The betting commissioner referred to the characters who visited the abodes after the fire, told of the people he met at the different places, such persons as "Messenger No. 9," "The Count," bartenders, café and saloon proprietors, men and women who live that sort of life being included. Speaking of the St. Helen Apartment, he mentioned a saloonkeeper, a prize fighter, "and I remember some girls." On cross-examination, referring to Miss Valencia, this testimony was given:

"Q. Did you ever know of her being an inmate of a house of ill fame? A. I did, but I don't know if it was a house of ill fame. Q. Where was that? A. The Palmerlee."

He also stated that the woman who rented the St. Helen Apartment lived with her at this place. Referring to "The Palmerlee," he said:

"I don't suppose it had as good a reputation as the Palace Hotel. Q. During those times that you knew Miss Valencia, what was her reputation? A. Her reputation wasn't very good."

The woman just referred to played a prominent part in the affairs of the couple, and she and Miss Valencia were on terms of the closest intimacy. The woman is referred to in the testimony by three different appellations and was the proprietress of the Kingston at 318 O'Farrell street, where it is claimed decedent was stabbed by Miss Valencia. The court, saying, "We are not trying other people here," sustained objections of respondent to questions as to whether this woman had not kept houses of prostitution in which Miss Valencia was an inmate. When she engaged the St. Helen Apartment she represented it was for "her sister" who was about to be confined, referred to the couple as "Mr. and Mrs. Tyler," and in giving her own name joined "Mrs." to the surname of her lover. This couple were guests at 1310 Divisadero street for two months, went on automobile trips with decedent, Miss Valencia, and the baby, and were frequent visitors at the other abodes. There is some dispute in the record as to the size of the St. Helen Apartment—whether there were more than two rooms. There is some evidence that it included a servant's room. At all events, according to the evidence, it was occupied by the two unmarried couples, the baby, and for a time the nurse. It was testified that decedent and the other man paid the rent. Thus it was claimed the "family" was constituted at the St. Helen Apartment where the child was born and where it remained with the mother until they moved to the Octavia Apartments.

The keeper of a beach resort, who testified in the case for the first time on this trial and whose place was visited by decedent when he was on the debauch which culminated in his death a few hours later, testified that Miss Valencia visited other cafés he owned before the fire, and that she and decedent visited his place at the beach and would sometimes bring the baby. The witness stated that in October, 1908, about a month before decedent's death, a party of them drove down to the Fourteen Mile House and from there to Redwood City, where the marriage previously mentioned took place. The bridal couple had been very intimate with Miss Valencia, and, as we have suggested, they too played a prominent part in the relationship, going with them on automobile trips, drinking parties, and spending much of their time in the abodes. As was to be expected, the bridal occasion continued in a spirit of romance, for the witness stated decedent then proposed that he and Miss Valencia make it "a four-handed party," but that she refused. We quote:

"A. Yes, she said to him, 'You know your folks are very much opposed to me.' She said, 'I do not think they will accept me in any way, shape, or form on account of your mother. I know your mother is very much opposed to it.' Q. She said that? A. Yes. Q. What did Dave say when she made that statement? A. He said, 'Oh, yes, I know the folks object to you and object to this marriage.'"

The wedding plans had not matured when decedent died.

A married couple lived as guests for five months at 1310 Divisadero street. The wife was introduced to Miss Valencia in 1904 in a café kept by the proprietor mentioned in division 6 of this opinion. The couple testified for respondent, the wife stating he was known as "David Jennings Baird, Jr."; she made many extended visits to the abodes. In fortifying her testimony as to her knowledge of the actual relations that existed between decedent and Miss Valencia, she stated that on occasions at the Alexandria and the St. Regis Apartments she saw them undress and go to bed. The testimony concerning decedent's conduct toward Miss Valencia and the child in the various abodes, on the automobile trips to the country when the party would remain away over night, and to the road houses along the beach, comes in part from the six chauffeurs who were hired at the rate of $5 or $6 per hour, and who appeared as witnesses for respondent. The bill of one of them for a single month was $600, and another collected several hundred dollars from the estate of decedent for automobile hire.

Referring again to the assumed name, the nurse for the baby said the couple used the name "Tyler" and that she continued to call Miss Valencia "Mrs. Tyler" after she learned decedent's true name. The woman who engaged the St. Helen Apartment for "her sister who is to be confined," spoke of her as "Mrs. Tyler," and this was believed to be the correct name by those in charge until a package came addressed in the name of "Baird." A neighbor and his wife did not know that "Baird" was the true name of decedent until after decedent's death. The physician testified the couple went by the name of "Tyler" at the St. Helen Apartment and 230 I street. Miss Valencia's milliner, and her seamstress, said they went by the name of "Tyler," the former stating the baby was called "David, Little David," and the latter asserting he was not called by any name at 230 I street. A house servant said they were known as "Tyler." The nurse who attended the confinement was told the mother was "Mrs. Tyler"; the grocery account was kept in the name of "Tyler," and the proprietress referred to the baby as the "little Tyler boy"; the betting commissioner said they were "known as Tyler by almost everybody," and that at 1310 Divisadero street he saw a suit box addressed to "David J. Tyler." A neighbor who knew them as Tyler testified:

"They seemed to stay by themselves and no one seemed to know them. They were not acquainted with the neighbors. * * *"

One of the chauffeurs said Miss Valencia was known as "Mrs. Tyler" by the trades people and as "Mrs. Baird" by those who knew decedent's real name. The physician testified that when he sent his bills to decedent at the abodes he used the name "Tyler," and to the hotels "Baird." It is sought to overcome the effect of such testimony by references to evidence that the couple were known by some persons as man and wife, being called "Mr. and Mrs. Baird"; that decedent on occasions introduced Miss Valencia as his wife, referring to her as "Mrs. Baird"; that certain visitors to the abodes said the child was known as "David Jennings Baird, Jr."; that certain accounts, including the chauffeur's charges, were kept in decedent's true name; but in every one of these instances his real identity was known and credit may have been extended to him upon his known financial responsibility. It is true that in the case of some of these witnesses they undertook to give the reasons that led the couple to use the fictitious name; but, as we have said, such declarations would be hearsay and merely represent the conclusions of the witnesses. It is clear then that by design and by systematic practice the knowledge of the association and the existence of the baby were to be kept from decedent's own relatives, his friends, and the friends of the Baird family. In addition to what we have stated concerning the birth certificate, it appeared the filing was not made until February 14, 1907, more than two months after the birth of the child, and that in answer to what the last department decision said about the delay the physician stated that he appealed to a doctor in the board of health "to keep the certificate from getting into the papers so that Mrs. Baird would not find it out. Probably that is the reason it did not come to light. That is the only explanation I can make."

In the St. Helen and Octavia Apartments the things were insured by and in the name of the woman who engaged the former and owned and conducted the latter. The house at 230 I street was purchased by decedent on the installment plan and stood in the name of "Lydia M. Valencia." Decedent made two payments on the house of $1,000 and $500, respectively, and at the time of his death $1,125 more had been paid at the rate of $75 per month. The house was insured in Miss Valencia's name; the service of gas, electricity, and water was supplied in the name of Lydia M. Valencia; and the furniture stood in the name of Miss Valencia. In the years 1907, 1908, and up to February, 1909, the telephone was listed in the name of "Mrs. D. V. Tyler."

It is clear that whether or not the attitude of decedent's relatives was responsible for the use of the name "Tyler," that was the name decedent planned to be known by in the relationship, and that was the name by which they were generally known among the uninformed in the several abodes where the child was kept. Under the evidence it is idle to contend that decedent did not seek to hide his identity under an assumed name in the surroundings of the mother and the child in order to keep his relatives and friends in ignorance of the relationship and of the child; but in such a situation it was inevitable that their identity should become known to some of those who came in contact with them, including the persons who served them in one capacity or another, such as the chauffeurs, the tailors, her milliner, her seamstress, her masseuse, the servants, and the storekeepers, who, as we have said, may have been concerned with the problem of getting their money. In addition to this, there is the testimony of Benjamin H. Baird that—

On the day decedent died "some woman's voice at the 'phone told me my brother was very sick and that I had better come out quickly. I said, 'Where?' She said, 'Well, out there on I street near Thirtieth avenue.' She said 'Ask at the grocery store for the name of Tyler and they will show you the house,' which I did."

Later he saw Miss Valencia at 230 I street. This testimony is not contradicted. Miss Valencia admitted she requested the attorney for the Baird estate over the telephone to come out to the house, and after being questioned on the point she finally denied she gave him similar instructions about locating the place. If decedent intended the abodes where he kept the mother and the child to be the residence or the home of his "family," he would give such places as his residence or home and would naturally live in them under his own name. The record is destitute of any evidence that decedent ever gave to his relatives, to his friends, or to the public, any of these abodes as his home or place of residence.

"Residence" has been defined as "the act, or state of being seated or settled in a place, * * * a place where a man's habitation is fixed without any present purpose of removing therefrom, * * * a place where anything permanently rests, * * * the abode or place where one actually lives," 34 Cyc. 1647 et seq. "Home" is defined as "the place of constant residence; the seat." Am. Univ. Dic. Before the birth of the baby and until the death of decedent, the latter had stopped alternately at the St. Francis, the little St. Francis, the Palace, the Little Palace, the Fairmont, and the Majestic Hotels, and he had a room at the Fairmont at the time of his death. All of this was shown in part by the accounts of those hotels and by their employees. With respect to this evidence it is claimed by respondent that decedent kept a room as an office where the business of the Baird estate was conducted. The testimony of a number of witnesses is to the effect that when they addressed a letter to him it was to the hotels or to 1611 Vallejo street and that his letters to them were sent from those addresses. There is no evidence that any communication was ever sent to him at the abodes. A part of the time he stopped at those hotels his mother was living there with him, also his sister, and at times his half-brothers. Miss Valencia testified he sometimes told her he was going to dine with his mother at the hotel. His tailor testified he sent his clothes, after the fire, to the Hotel Majestic, where he lived for a while with his mother; his address was changed thereafter to 2513 Pacific avenue; then to 1611 Vallejo street; and later to the St. Francis Hotel. Three deliveries were made to the Fairmont in 1908; the last on August 11.

The city directories for the years 1907 and 1908 were introduced in evidence and contained these entries—1907, "Baird, David J. Residence. 1611 Vallejo street." And 1908 "Baird, David. Residence. Fairmont Hotel." The record of the post office from October, 1906, to July 30, 1907, gave his true name and showed his address was changed from 2513 Pacific avenue to 827 Eddy street (the office of the family attorney after the disaster), and from 1611 Vallejo street to the St. Francis Hotel. The addresses he left in the office of the attorney for 1907 and 1908 were the St. Francis and Fairmont Hotels. Changes of address were also given to the bank at which he kept his account, and where for a time Benjamin H. Baird was employed, from 2513 Pacific avenue to 827 Eddy street, and after the fire, from the St. Francis Hotel to the Fairmont Hotel. Executor Brown testified that when he met decedent in 1907 and asked him where he was living, he answered, "The Fairmont Hotel." He was living with Benjamin H. Baird in Mrs. Hutchins' house at 1611 Vallejo street when the baby was born, and at that very time and for several months thereafter his mother was in San Francisco. Mrs. Hutchins was a friend of the Baird family. She testified that while decedent was stopping there he would sometimes be away for several days at a time, and on such occasions would explain he had been in the country. Similar testimony was given by the night watchman at the Fairmont Hotel. This witness testified that decedent would on occasions come in late at night in such a condition of inebriation that he would have to watch him. It was also testified that up to January, 1903, which was about a year after the relationship was formed, decedent kept seasonable hours at 2513 Pacific avenue, where he lived with his sister; but his habit thereafter was to remain out late, and on this account he was requested to leave.

Respondent's witnesses are divided on the question as to when decedent first appeared at the St. Helen Apartments. The betting commissioner testified that because of decedent's intoxicated condition he did not know for several days after Miss Valencia left 1310 Divisadero street that she had gone to the St. Helen Apartments. Her version is that decedent went with her to look at the place before it was engaged—which is opposed to other testimony for respondent—and that he appeared on the night of the second day following the event. The attending nurse testified she did not see decedent for two or three days after the child was born.

It would appear from the evidence that the life of reckless dissipation which decedent led contributed to his tragic and untimely end. He had several spells of sickness and was very ill from hemorrhages of the stomach during the months of August and September, 1907. Evidence of his dissipation abounds in the record. It shows such instances as his rushing excitedly into a shoe store and telling a clerk, who was a stranger to him, but a friend of Miss Valencia, that he was the father of a son and inviting him out to the house; making similar declarations to persons he met on the street, to a policeman in the neighborhood, to chauffeurs, to bartenders, to servants, and to strangers in the abodes, and to some of the characters already described. According to such persons he proposed to send the child to Paris to be educated, was going to make him president of the Baird estate; that he was on his way home to his wife and baby; that he was in a café the night after the child was born, "let everybody know he was the father of a baby," and made other declarations of similar import. It is only upon the theory of the immoral relationship and incidental habits of intoxication that he kept knowledge of the double life he led from his relatives and friends. A striking circumstance in connection with his dual existence is that his relative elected him president of the Baird corporation. In business matters he was bright and attentive.

[17] (c) What has been said on the issues of public acknowledgment and receipt into family applies largely to the remaining issue—whether decedent otherwise treated respondent as a legitimate child. "The criterion referred to in the statute is the treatment usually accorded to legitimate children." Estate of Heaton, 139 Cal. 237, 73 Pac. 186. What was said in the Estate of De Laveaga, 142 Cal. 158, 167, 75 Pac. 790, 794, applies here:

"But it seems, however, that the relations of affection between Jose Maria and his parents did not cease, as the numerous letters produced at the trial written by him would show, and they also show that in none of them was any reference ever made to the respondent in this case. In fact, it seems to have been his studied purpose not to refer to or introduce the subject of his illegitimate child in his intercourse or correspondence with his parents."

It is established in the case that respondent was never taken to visit the Baird family, nor, except to Miles T. Baird, was he ever referred to by decedent as his child in his intercourse with the members of his family, that there was no form of communication or association between the child and decedent's relatives, and that decedent never brought the child to any of the places he held out to the community as his residence. While decedent is shown in pictures with Miss Valencia, he never appeared in one with the child. He sent a number of communications to Miss Valencia while he was in Europe in 1905, but no communication was produced as having been sent to her by him after the birth of respondent. Decedent had nearly two years to consider whether he would make financial provision for the child, but that natural duty of a father who contemplated adopting his illegitimate offspring was, we have seen, with apparent deliberation, left undischarged. The record is singularly free from any evidence to sustain the reiterated contentions of counsel that decedent intended to adopt the unfortunate child. On the contrary, it seems to have been his clear purpose not to assume any legal responsibility for him. The declarations of decedent contain nothing more tangible than such expressions as that he was going to make the child president of the Baird estate, or that he would send him abroad to be educated. Is this the attitude of the father of a legitimate child, or of the father of an illegitimate child intending to adopt it? We have shown there was no estrangement between decedent and his kin and that no reason appears other than decedent's concern for the Baird family why he should keep the child away from them. Such treatment is contrary to the sense in which section 230 of the Civil Code uses the phrase "otherwise treating it as if it were a legitimate child." The treating it as if it were legitimate is as essential to a legal adoption under that section as any of the other elements therein mentioned.

It may finally be declared that the evidence as to public acknowledgment of paternity, receipt into family, and otherwise treating the child as legitimate, does not, in any true sense, conform to the conception of adoption under section 230. The father of a legitimate child would not allow it to live in a clandestine family or to be known by an assumed name, or be the object of concealment and dissimulation. The father of a legitimate child would not hold himself out to the world as having a residence into which he did not receive it. He would especially provide for the future of the child. Decedent's will, already referred to, was dated July 30, 1903. He gave half of his property to his mother and the other half to his half brothers. In 1907 Executor Brown called his attention to the will but he made no change therein. This item of proof is relevant to the question whether decedent was estranged from his mother and his half-brothers.

Decedent allowed the child to remain in the custody of his mother, where the law placed him. Section 200, Civ. Code. He could have legitimated the child by marrying the mother (section 215, Civ. Code), or he could have made him his heir by a writing under section 1387 of the Civil Code; but he did none of these things, nor anything else to indicate he was concerned with the future of the child. His entire course of conduct toward respondent precludes the idea that he intended to do more than support him, and his attitude is consistent with his denial of paternity, and inconsistent with the claim that he intended to treat respondent as the father of a legitimate child would do. With the exception of Miles T. Baird, no one connected with his life away from the abodes visited him or the child, or acted in the way relatives and friends usually act in such circumstances. Giving the evidence its fullest import in favor of respondent, there can be no dissent from the conclusion that the failure to publicly acknowledge his paternity, the clandestine nature of the "family," and the isolation of respondent from decedent's relatives and friends, represented a deliberate purpose on the part of decedent to keep them in ignorance of the child, and under the circumstances shown this alone is sufficient to defeat an adoption.

This court declined, in Re Jessup, 81 Cal. 459, 21 Pac. 976, 22 Pac. 742, 1028, 6 L. R. A. 594, to adopt the view of the dissenting justices that in cases of adoption under section 230 the only strictness required should be proof of paternity; and that the paternity being satisfactorily established by plenary proof courts should lean strongly in favor of a finding that the father had performed his duty and adopted the illegitimate child. It has been the rule ever since that the elements of paternity, public acknowledgment thereof, receipt of the child into the family of the father as his own, and otherwise treating him as legitimate, must each be established by a preponderance of the evidence, and that if the proof fails in respect to any one of them there is no adoption.

"There can be no compliance with section 230 in the absence of the conditions contemplated by that section, and absolutely necessary to give it effect." Garner v. Judd, 6 Cal. Unrep. 675, 64 Pac. 1076.

We hold that apart from the doctrine of the law of the case the evidence received on the last trial in insufficient to sustain the special verdicts or to support the findings, and that a case of adoption has not been established. We further hold that the court erred in denying the motion for nonsuit, in denying the motion for an instructed verdict, and in failing to enter judgment for appellants. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the assignments of error in the rulings and the assignments of misconduct by the court.

The decree of partial distribution is reversed, and the trial court is ordered and directed to set aside the special verdicts and findings and to enter judgment for appellants, denying the petition for partial distribution upon the ground that respondent is not the adopted son or heir of the deceased.

PEOPLE v. KING. (Cr. 1110.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 17, 1924.)

1. Infants ⇐20—Conviction of committing lewd act on female child sustained.

Evidence held sufficient to support a conviction of committing a lewd and lascivious act on a girl under 14 in violation of Pen. Code, § 288.

2. Criminal law ⇐1160—Verdict not set aside for insufficiency of evidence unless there is no substantial evidence supporting it on any hypothesis.

It is the function of the jury in the first instance, and of the trial court after verdict, to determine what facts are established by the evidence, and a verdict approved by the court cannot be set aside on appeal for insufficiency of the evidence to support it, unless it clearly appears that there is no substantial evidence sufficient to support it on any hypothesis.

3. Infants ⇐20—Crime charged held sufficiently differentiated from similar crimes by instruction.

In a prosecution for committing lewd and lascivious acts on a girl under 14, in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, an instruction referring to the particular act charged held to have sufficiently differentiated between it and acts constituting other crimes against children.

4. Criminal law ⇐824(1)—Party asking no instructions cannot complain of error in not giving them.

A party failing to ask for instructions on a particular point cannot complain of error in not giving them.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Benjamin King was convicted of violating Pen. Code, § 288, and appeals. Affirmed.

M. H. Hernan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ST. SURE, J. Defendant was charged and convicted of the crime defined in section 288 of the Penal Code. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. He contends that the evidence is insufficient to warrant the verdict and also that the trial court committed error in failing to make more specific an instruction given on a certain point of law.

The victim of defendant's alleged assault was a girl six years of age. The story of the offense was told by Thomas Murphy, a police officer, who was on duty in the old fair grounds, San Francisco. While walking through the high weeds he saw the little girl lying on the ground, and the defendant apparently lying over her. He grabbed the defendant and pulled him over. Defendant's pants were down, his privates were exposed, and the child was lying on her back, her coveralls were down over her feet, and her flesh exposed. "I asked him why he should be guilty of such a crime," testified the officer. "He said his only excuse was he had been drinking moonshine."

[1] It is argued on behalf of defendant, that the evidence does not support the allegations of the information in that it cannot be inferred from the evidence that "the defendant placed his hands and private parts upon and against the body and legs and private parts of the child." The facts in the instant case are somewhat similar to those in People v. Dong Pok Yip, 164 Cal. 143, 127 Pac. 1031. There, as here, the testimony revealed the fact that the defendant had first secured the confidence of the child, whom he led to a secluded place such as would be selected for the commission of the crime charged; that he had induced or placed the child in a position and he himself had assumed an attitude which clearly indicated his indecent purpose; that he exposed his own person; and that the child's clothing had been disarranged in a manner which comported with the theory of the prosecution regarding the defendant's guilt. All of this, coupled with the lack of consent on the part of the little child, was sufficient to support a verdict of guilty. See, also, the case of People v. Smith, 33 Cal. App. 195, 164 Pac. 609.

[2] It is the function of the jury in the first instance, and of the trial court after verdict, to determine what facts are established by the evidence, and before the verdict of the jury, which has been approved by the trial court, can be set aside on appeal upon the ground we are discussing, it must be made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached in the court below. People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 326, 184 Pac. 389.

[3] Defendant's objection to the instructions of the trial court was that—"They were not sufficient to cover the offense charged in the information. In other words, they were not specific enough to establish the rule of evidence in prosecutions under section 288 of the Penal Code. There was no instruction upon the distinction between the acts constituting an offense in section 288 of the Penal Code and the acts constituting other crimes which are excepted in said section."

This objection is not leveled at any particular instruction, nor is our attention called to any authority supporting any such objection. The record shows that defendant requested no instructions; it further shows that the trial court instructed the jury concerning the offense charged in the information as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, that in the city and county of San Francisco, at or about the time mentioned in the information, the defendant did feloniously, willfully, and lewdly commit a lewd and lascivious act upon or with the body, or upon or with the members or private parts of the body of Anita Jones, by then and there touching, rubbing or fondling the body, or members, or private parts thereof, of the said Anita Jones, as charged in the information, with intent then and there of arousing, appealing to, or gratifying the lust, passions, or sexual desires of the defendant, and the said Anita Jones, or either of them, as charged in the information, and that the said Anita Jones was then under the age of 14 years, then you should find the defendant guilty."

This instruction, by its reference to the particular act charged in the information to have been committed by the defendant, does, we think, sufficiently differentiate between this offense and the acts constituting other crimes against children, provided for in other sections of the Penal Code; and otherwise the instruction follows the language of the statute. We find, therefore, no merit in defendant's contention.

[4] Furthermore, our Supreme Court has enunciated a rule of law, applicable to this class of case, which provides that—

"Where a party in a criminal case fails to ask the court to give instructions to the jury upon a particular point, he cannot complain of error on the part of the court in not giving the instructions." People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 484, 126 Pac. 143, 146.

PEOPLE v. DAMAZONI. (Cr. 734.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 12, 1924.)

1. Indictment and Information $\S$ 138—
Grounds of motion to set aside information must be presented.

For defendant to avail himself of his right to have the information set aside under Pen. Code, $\S$ 995, the grounds therefor must be presented in the motion.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 241—Denial of motion to set aside information for commitment held not error.

Where the magistrate's commitment, on which an information in two counts charging sales of intoxicating liquor to different parties, was based, was in general language, and held defendant to trial for the "offense named in the within complaint," without specifying the different counts, the court did not err in denying defendant's motion to set aside the information on the ground that he was not legally committed. Pen. Code, $\S$ 995.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 238—Order of commitment held justified by defendant's admissions.

Defendant's admissions before a magistrate that he sold contraband liquor to a party named in the first count of an information having two counts charging sales to different persons held sufficient to justify an order of commitment as to such count, as well as the other, which was dismissed.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 238—Magistrate must commit for any offense disclosed by any testimony.

A magistrate must commit a person to trial in the superior court for any offense disclosed at the preliminary hearing by any testimony from any source.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 178—Dismissal of information to file new information not former jeopardy.

Dismissal of an information for the purpose of filing a new information does not bar further prosecution for the same offense.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 178—Particular matters held not to authorize plea of former jeopardy.

Dismissal of one count of an information charging sales of intoxicating liquors to different persons and withdrawal of defendant's plea of not guilty for the purpose of enabling him to move to set aside the information on grounds not in the record do not authorize a plea of former jeopardy.

HART, J. The information, following in that respect the complaint filed with the magistrate, was originally in two counts, the first charging that the defendant, on or about the 7th day of March, 1923, in the county of Napa, did willfully and unlawfully sell and furnish to one Frank Martinetti intoxicating liquor containing one-half of 1 per centum or more of alcohol by volume, etc., and the second likewise charging said defendant with selling and furnishing to Gussie Johnson and Evon Thiel like liquor, containing one-half of 1 per centum or more of alcohol by volume, etc. Upon his arraignment, and after a futile motion to set aside the first count of the information, the defendant entered a plea of not guilty to each of the counts set up in the information. When the case was called for trial, the court, upon motion of the district attorney, and with the express acquiescence of the attorney for the defendant, set aside the second count of the information. Thereupon the attorney for the defendant asked that the defendant be permitted to withdraw his plea of not guilty theretofore entered by him to the information, and the request was granted. The defendant then made a motion to set aside the information as it then stood on grounds not stated in his motion, so far as this record discloses. The motion was denied and thereupon the defendant interposed a plea of not guilty to the charge contained in the information, as set forth in the first and only remaining count thereof, and also a plea of once in jeopardy.

The trial was thereupon proceeded with upon the charge stated in the first count, and the jury found against the defendant on his plea of once in jeopardy and also found him guilty as charged. He brings this case to this court upon an appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant complains that the court erred by not granting his motion to set aside the information.

[1] There is not before us a reviewable record upon the question whether the court did or did not err in denying the motion to set aside the accusatory pleading. As seen, the grounds of the motion are not stated, and it is, of course, impossible for us to say whether the court committed error in its action in denying the motion. All that the record shows as to this matter is the following:

"The defendant now interposes a motion to set aside the first count of the information."

Section 995 of the Penal Code provides, among other things, that an information must be set aside when it is made to appear:

"1. That before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate.

"2. That it was not subscribed by the district attorney of the county, or city and county."

[2] It is a proposition requiring no discussion that in order that a defendant may avail himself of the right to have an information filed against him set aside, the ground or grounds upon which he bases that right must be presented so that the court may know whether the point thus made by him is or is not well taken. It would seem that authorities in confirmation of this proposition need not be cited. It may not be improper to say, however, that, the entire proceedings before the committing magistrate culminating in the holding of the defendant to trial having been admitted in evidence in purported support of the motion, it is probable that the ground upon which it was the intention of the defendant to press the motion was that he was not legally committed by the magistrate. Indeed, in the brief of counsel for the defendant it is so stated. Assuming this to be true, and the record was such as to make the point reviewable, still we would find no reason for upholding the position of the defendant that the court erred in denying his motion to set aside. The commitment issued by the magistrate and upon which the information was founded is in general language and holds the defendant to trial for the "offense named in the within complaint." It will thus be noted that the commitment was not specific as to the two different counts charged in the complaint.

[3, 4] It is contended that, while the depositions taken before the magistrate disclosed that probable cause existed for holding the accused for trial on the second count of the information (the count that was dismissed), there is no proof whatsoever revealed by said depositions tending to establish probable cause for holding the accused on the first count and it is hence argued that the commitment must be construed to refer to and embrace the second count only. There is no merit in the contention. The depositions taken before the magistrate clearly establish probable cause or reason for believing that the defendant committed both offenses at the times and places stated in the complaint and in the information. While it would perhaps have been the better practice for the magistrate to have specifically referred in his commitment to both offenses, it cannot be doubted that the order of commitment, considered by the light of the depositions, was sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute. It appears from the depositions that the defendant, when testifying in his own behalf before the magistrate, expressly admitted, in reply to a question by the district attorney, that he sold contraband liquor to the party named in the first count on the occasion stated therein. Manifestly, the magistrate was justified in making the order of commitment as to said count upon that admission. Indeed, a magistrate is enjoined by law to commit a person to trial in the superior court for any offense which may be disclosed at the preliminary hearing by any testimony, from whatsoever source it may come, given before him.

[5, 6] We do not understand what application the plea of once in jeopardy had to the case as it stood before the superior court after the dismissal of the offense charged in the second count of the information. Even if the mere fact of the dismissal of an information would have the effect of barring a further prosecution for the same offense (which is not the law where the information is dismissed for the purpose or with the intention of filing a new information), the plea of once in jeopardy in this case could under no conceivable circumstances be available to the defendant. As seen, the information was to all practical intents and purposes merely amended by eliminating therefrom one of the counts therein contained, and the withdrawal of the plea of not guilty was for the purpose of enabling the defendant to move to set aside the information on some ground or grounds which, as stated, are not made to appear in the record here. Obviously, jeopardy cannot attach under such circumstances.

We see no merit in this appeal. The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GREEN. (Cr. 1024.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 10, 1924.)

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 110(25)—Charge in language of statute held sufficient.

It is ordinarily sufficient to charge an offense in the language of a statute defining same or which describes acts constituting the offense, and held, that charge of assault with intent to commit the infamous crime against nature was sufficient under Pen. Code, $\S$ 220.

2. Indictment and information $\S$ 191(1)—Sodomy $\S$ 5—Information charging assault with intent to commit held not to charge lesser offense not required to designate intended victim of infamous crime.

If an information charging that accused "did willfully, unlawfully and feloniously commit an assault upon the person of P. M. with the intent then and there to commit the infamous crime against nature" can be deemed to include a charge of simple assault upon P. M. for the purpose of ridding accused of P. M.'s opposition in order that he might accomplish his purpose upon the person of another, such latter offense is nevertheless within Pen. Code, $\S$ 220, and would not amount to a lesser offense, and it is not necessary, on any theory of such inclusion, to designate in the information the intended victim of the infamous crime constituting the object of the assault.

3. Indictment and Information § 110(3) — Essentials of information charging offense under statute, stated.

The charge of an offense is sufficient if it shows the language of the statute prohibiting same and alleges all the facts and acts which the Legislature has said shall constitute the offense and is direct and certain as to the party charged and the particular offense charged.

4. Sodomy § 1—Offense of assault with intent to commit complete, though person assaulted was not assailant's objective.

Under Pen. Code, § 220, defining the crime of assault with intent to commit the infamous crime against nature, the offense is complete when the assault has been committed with such intent, whether accused's objective was the person assaulted or another.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

W. S. Green was convicted of assault with intent to commit the infamous crime against nature, and he appeals. Affirmed.

K. E. Schwinn and Miguel Estudillo, both of Riverside, and L. W. Blodget, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. Appellant was convicted in the superior court upon an information charging him with assault with intent to commit the infamous crime against nature, denounced by section 220 of the Penal Code; the charging part of which information, essential to this appeal, read as follows:

"W. S. Green is accused by the district attorney of Riverside county and state of California, by this information, of the crime of a felony committed as follows: The said W. S. Green on or about the 20th day of March, 1923, at the said county of Riverside, state of California, and before the filing of this information, did wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously commit an assault upon the person of Paul Maupin, with the intent then and there to commit the infamous crime against nature."

Two grounds are urged for reversal of the judgment and order denying appellant's motion for new trial: (1) That the information does not state facts sufficient to constitute an offense amounting to a felony, in that it fails to charge an attempt to commit an offense upon the person of a named individual; and (2) that the information therefore charges no more than assault, a misdemeanor, of which the superior court did not have jurisdiction.

Section 220, Penal Code, provides that—

"Every person who assaults another with intent to commit rape, the infamous crime against nature, mayhem, robbery, or grand larceny, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years."

The question presented by appellant, and which is decisive of both grounds of this appeal, is as to the necessity of designating in the information the intended victim of the infamous crime which constituted the object of the assault. Appellant cites authority to maintain the proposition that an accusation must contain all of the ingredients of the offense with which the defendant is charged, in direct language, leaving no essential to be reached by inference or argument. This is admittedly a correct statement of the law. It is also true that a charge is insufficient which states mere legal conclusions; but the distinction which is vital here is that between a mere legal conclusion and an ultimate fact. In 31 Corp. Jur. p. 711, § 266, it is said:

"Where a charge in the language of the statute charges a mere legal conclusion, or where it connects accused with the crime by mere inference or argument, a more particular statement of the facts is necessary. But a charge following the statute is sufficient where it states ultimate facts."

[1] It is ordinarily sufficient to charge an offense in the language of the statute if the latter defines it or describes the acts constituting the offense, especially where the words used have a well-recognized meaning. People v. Silva, 8 Cal. App. 349, 97 Pac. 202. The infamous crime against nature is not defined by the Penal Code, but every person of ordinary intelligence understands what that crime is. People v. Erwin, 4 Cal. App. 394, 88 Pac. 371.

[2] In the instant case the information charges in the language of the statute, and in so doing charges ultimate facts. It alleges a felonious assault upon the person of Paul Maupin, and also that this assault was with intent then and there to commit the infamous crime against nature. Extensive argument is advanced in support of the theory that had appellant intended committing a simple assault upon the said Maupin for the purpose of ridding himself of the latter's opposition, in order that he might accomplish his purpose upon the person of another, he might be guilty under this information, and it is assumed that the statute does include his situation. The evidence shows that such was not the case, but were this true we think it would fall within the scope of section 220, Penal Code, and would amount to no lesser offense.

Cases cited in behalf of appellant in support of the proposition that it is necessary to designate the intended victim of the assault arose under statutes by whose language the identity of a particular person was essential to a prosecution. In People v. Shaber, 32 Cal. 36, the defendant was charged with having broken into and entered the house of Jackson and Wood, with intent then in said house to commit larceny. It was urged that the indictment was defective, in that it failed to state that the defendant intended to steal property of said persons, or that there was any property in the house. The Supreme Court said:

"As a larceny actually committed is not made an element in the offense, it cannot be needful to allege one, either generally or by an averment of the facts entering into and constituting its definition. And as a forcible entry, etc., with a larcenous intent, is all that is made essential to the crime, we consider that a conviction would be due, even though it should appear that there were no goods in the building at the time the entry was made. The forcible entry and the intent being found or given, the crime would be complete, even though it should turn out that, contrary to the calculations of the burglar, the building was empty. The sting of the crime is, in short, the guilty purpose, without reference to the possibility of accomplishing it, in any given instance."

People v. Holland, 59 Cal. 364, and People v. Wells, 145 Cal. 138, 78 Pac. 470, are to the same effect.

[3] An information is sufficient if it follows the language of the statute, and alleges all the acts and facts which the Legislature has said shall constitute the offense, and is direct and certain as to the party to be charged and the particular offense charged. People v. Fowler, 88 Cal. 136, 25 Pac. 1110; People v. Patterson, 102 Cal. 239, 36 Pac. 436; People v. Girr, 53 Cal. 629.

[4] In the case at bar the assault, with the specific intent contemplated by the statute, was alleged and proven. The ultimate fact constituting the offense, as defined by section 220, Penal Code, was an assault upon the person of Paul Maupin, with such intent, and if appellant's objective were Maupin or another person the statute was nevertheless violated, and no allegation of the other intended offense except by way of naming its was necessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

MUSACHIA v. JONES et al.
(Civ. 2591, 2592.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 16, 1924.)

1. Master and servant — 330(3)—Evidence held to show truck was taken by employees for pleasure without master's consent.

In an action for injuries from being struck by a truck driven by an employee of defendant, evidence held to show that such employee and another took the truck for their own purpose to attend a dance without obtaining permission.

2. Master and servant — 302(6)—Master not liable for accident arising from return of automobile wrongfully taken.

Where automobile truck was wrongfully taken by employees for pleasure purposes without permission, it was their legal duty to return it, and for any act of negligence on their part in returning it neither the master nor any one else would be liable because of having directed or requested its return.

3. Master and servant — 330(1)—Agency not presumed when owner's car is not used in service.

As respects owner's liability for injury from negligent operation of his automobile by another, where it appears that the automobile was not being used in the service of the owner, the presumption of agency, which otherwise arises from the mere fact of ownership, does not arise.

4. Master and servant — 302(6)—Employee must be acting for master to render him liable.

If it appears that an employee in using an automobile was seeking exclusively his own ends of business or pleasure, the master is not liable for injuries to others from the operation of the automobile, and this is true, no matter how short a time the employee is acting in matters disconnected from the master's business, if the injury occurs during that time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Lillian Musachia against C. W. Jones and others. From a judgment against all defendants, the named defendant and A. S. Goodman appeal. Reversed.

Driver & Driver, and C. E. McLaughlin, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

Elliott & Atkinson and Wm. A. Sitton, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The two actions herein were tried as one, consolidated upon appeal, presented upon one transcript and one set of briefs, and will be considered and determined as one case.

[1] The cause of action arises from an injury received by the plaintiff by reason of being run into by a Ford automobile truck driven by the defendant William Nunes. Plaintiff had judgment against all the defendants, and Goodman and Jones appeal.

On Sunday, May 23, 1920, while on a public road near Walnut Grove in the county of Sacramento, the plaintiff was injured by a Ford truck then owned by C. W. Jones & Sons, and being driven by the defendant William Nunes. C. W. Jones & Sons as a copartnership consisted of defendant C. W. Jones, Fred C. Jones, and G. D. Jones, then engaged in farming a tract of land in the Delta region of the Sacramento river. Another copartnership mentioned and referred to in the testimony consisted of Goodman and

Jones, the members of which were A. S. Goodman, Fred C. Jones, and G. D. Jones. This copartnership was engaged in farming another and separate tract of land in the same locality. The defendant Nunes testified at first that he was working for C. W. Jones on the Saturday preceding and the Monday following the accident. Later his testimony shows that he was uncertain as for whom or which partnership he was working. The time books introduced in evidence and other evidence in the case indicate that he was working for the partnership of Goodman & Jones. On the Saturday evening preceding the Sunday on which the injury occurred it appears from the testimony that the firm of C. W. Jones & Sons had decided to retire the Ford truck from further use, and to this end the witness C. D. Jones, in conversation with the defendant A. S. Goodman, made the following request:

"If you come over Saturday night, I wish you would bring the Ford truck over and leave it at C. W. Jones' place."

This place is otherwise mentioned in the testimony as the Jones home place. In compliance with this request, according to the testimony of defendant Goodman, the defendant A. S. Goodman on the Saturday evening preceding the injury took the Ford truck to the C. W. Jones home place, and left it there. On his way to the Jones home place with the truck it appears from the testimony that A. S. Goodman took with him Victor Goodman, the defendant William Nunes, and two workmen named King and Wolf.

It further appears from the testimony that a dance was to be given at Walnut Grove, a town some miles distant from the Jones home place; that the defendant Goodman, Victor Goodman, and William Nunes were desirous of attending the same. It further appears that the defendant A. S. Goodman had asked and received permission to use a certain automobile known as and called the Dodge commercial car in going to this dance, and was intending to take with him Victor Goodman and the defendant William Nunes. Upon arriving at the Jones home place with the Ford truck the defendant Goodman went into one of the houses there for the purpose of shaving, and otherwise making preparation to attend the dance referred to, to be held at Walnut Grove, and while he was so doing, the defendant William Nunes and Victor Goodman, not wishing to be delayed in reaching Walnut Grove and so late at the dance, and wishing to have opportunity to arrive at Walnut Grove to shave or get shaved and properly dressed to attend the dance, without permission of any one, took the Ford truck, and drove to Walnut Grove, Victor Goodman doing the driving. The two workmen referred to as King and Wolf accompanied Victor Goodman and the defendant Nunes in the Ford truck to the town of Walnut Grove. It further appears from the testimony that the workman King had severed his employment with C. W. Jones & Sons, and was leaving by way of Walnut Grove. After the departure of the defendant Nunes and Victor Goodman for Walnut Grove in the Ford truck, the defendant A. S. Goodman proceeded to the same place in the Dodge commercial car, and on the evening of Saturday, the 23d, the following conversation took place between defendants A. S. Goodman and William Nunes. The testimony of William Nunes:

"Q. Prior to the driving of that machine, did you have any conversation that night at Walter Goodman's place with A. S. Goodman? A. No conversation, only I told him the lights were on the bum; he said he would come and fix them. That was all the conversation we had. Q. With whom did you have that conversation that the lights were on the bum? A. Yes. Q. With whom did you have that conversation? A. With A. S. Goodman. Q. Where was that conversation held? A. In Walter Goodman's house. Q. Just prior to your driving the truck away? A. Yes, sir. Q. What, if anything, was said by Goodman as to driving the machine? A. He just simply asked me if I would drive the truck home. Q. Repeat as near as you can, his words? A. Well, he turned around, asked me if I would drive the machine home, over to C. W. Jones' ranch on Grand Island. Q. Was that where the truck belonged? A. Yes; that is where the truck was left. Q. Who told you it was to be left there? A. Arthur Goodman—A. S. Goodman. Q. The man who asked you to drive the Ford truck—did he tell you where it was going, where you had to drive it? A. He told me to take it over to the ranch; leave it there, at C. W. Jones', leave it, he would meet me with the other car, take me over to the ranch. Q. Did you come in town into Walnut Grove in that truck? A. I did. Q. When? A. Saturday night. Q. Who, if any one, came with you? A. Victor Goodman, and a man by the name of Wolf, I do not know his first name. Q. Do you know who he was? A. No—just a ranch hand, all I know about him. Q. Was he working where you were working? A. Yes, sir. Q. That is, on Saturday night, you came into town, you and Walter Goodman, and this man Wolf came in this truck. A. Not Walter Goodman—Victor Goodman. Q. Victor, and yourself? A. Yes. Q. A. S. Goodman—apparently there are three Goodmans; there is Walter Goodman, Victor, and A. S.? A. Yes, and Arthur. Q. A. S. the defendant? A. Yes. Q. Where, if you know, was Victor Goodman working? A. I could not say for sure; I think he was working for Goodman & Jones—Jones & Goodman. Q. Where did you get into the truck on that Saturday night when you came into Walnut Grove? A. On Ryer's Island. Q. Who, if any one, was in the truck when you got in the truck that night? A. Victor Goodman, myself, Jack King, and Wolf. Q. Were the others in the truck when you climbed aboard—or did you all get in the truck together at that point? A. I could not state; I guess we all got in together, I could not state. Q. You mentioned a man by the name of King? A. Yes. Q. He was in the truck?

A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know where he had been working? A. I could not say for sure where he was working; I think he was working for Jones & Goodman, I am pretty sure. Q. Where was Jones & Goodman's place where the truck was? A. Known as unit 2. Q. As a matter of fact, Mr. Nunes, was not he working in the same place where you were working? A. I could not state; I do not think he was. Q. What is it? A. I do not think he was. Q. That truck, had you driven it before? A. No, sir. Q. How long had you been working for Jones & Sons? Prior to the accident? A. I was over on Liberty Farms for eight months; to say how long I worked for Jones & Sons, I could not say. I worked for Jones & Goodman or for Jones & Sons. Q. When you speak of Liberty Farms, what property do you refer to? A. That is unit 2. Q. Do you know who owns unit 1? A. No.—. Mr. Driver: Objected to as incompetent. The Court: If he knows. Mr. Atkinson: Q. Do you know who operates the place known as No. 1? A. C. W. Jones & Sons, No. 1. Q. Who operates No. 2? A. Jones & Goodman. Q. The defendant Goodman? A. Yes, sir. Q. Or C. W. Jones & Sons? A. At times I was working for C. W. Jones & Sons and at times Jones & Goodman. Q. From whom did you get your instructions, if any one, while you were working there on unit No. 1, and unit No. 2? A. I got my instructions most of the time from Goodman."

Shortly after leaving Walnut Grove the Ford truck while being driven by the defendant William Nunes had come into collision with the person of the plaintiff, and furnishes the basis for the cause of action herein.

On the part of the appellants it is insisted that there is no testimony upon which any legal liability can be fixed as against either of the defendants C. W. Jones or A. S. Goodman. On the part of the respondent it is contended that the defendant A. S. Goodman was the general superintendent of C. W. Jones & Sons, and as such had authority to give directions to the defendant William Nunes, and that, while driving the Ford truck on its way from Walnut Grove back to the C. W. Jones home place, the defendant William Nunes was acting as an agent, servant, and employee of the defendant C. W. Jones, and also under the immediate direction and supervision of the defendant A. S. Goodman. The testimony in the case is of considerable length, and, of course, cannot be set forth in full, but it appears therefrom without contradiction that, whether the defendant Nunes was on the 22d day of May, 1920, in the employ of C. W. Jones & Sons or in the employ of Goodman & Jones, he was, at least, from the evening of that day until and including the following Sunday at Walnut Grove on his own time and in pursuit of his own pleasure. It also appears without any contradiction that the Ford truck was taken from the Jones home place and driven to Walnut Grove without permission so to do being asked of any one, by any one, or given by any one. The contention that the Ford truck was in the service of either C. W. Jones & Sons or Goodman & Jones by reason of the fact that a workman known as Jack King, who, by the testimony of the defendant William Nunes, may have been at work for the copartnership known as C. W. Jones & Sons, but by the time book of Goodman & Jones appears to have been at work for the latter named copartnership, accompanied Victor Goodman and William Nunes in the Ford truck, requires only a statement of facts to show that such a contention is untenable. The fact that the Ford truck may have previously been used to take workmen to town who had severed their connection with either of the partners does not controvert the fact that upon the night in question the Ford truck was taken from the Jones home place without direction or permission, for the purpose of enabling Victor Goodman and William Nunes to speed up their arrival at Walnut Grove in order that they might fitly prepare themselves for the coming dance. They were not directed to take the Ford truck to Walnut Grove for the purpose of conveying thereto any other workmen. It further appears from the testimony that the defendant A. S. Goodman, while in Walnut Grove on Sunday, May 23d, obtained the services of a workman by the name of Smith, and brought this workman to the locality of the ranches herein referred to, and that on the 25th day of May, 1920, the man Smith began to work for the partnership of C. W. Jones & Sons. This workman was brought from Walnut Grove to the farm referred to in the Dodge commercial car. It also appears from the testimony that this workman may have been employed for services on the ranch or farm operated by Goodman & Jones, as the time book introduced in evidence shows that a man by the name of Smith began work for Goodman & Jones on May 24th, and continued in such service until May 31st of the year 1920. It further appears that the defendant Nunes was tractor engineer, and his employment, whether working for C. W. Jones & Sons or Goodman & Jones, was along that line, and that the employment upon the two ranches and for the two copartnerships varied from time to time as the occasion required; that is, he would be employed for a period of time on one ranch and then upon the other. The scope of his employment wherever he was at work was in driving a tractor or caring for the same. As to the relation of the defendant A. S. Goodman with the copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons during the month of May, there is much discussion by the respective counsel. The testimony of the defendant Goodman is to the effect that he was not the general superintendent and had no legal relation whatever to the copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons during the month of May, 1920, that it had been severed some time previous to that month. Upon this question and as to who was the general superintendent of C.

W. Jones & Sons, the testimony appearing in the transcript is as follows:

"Q. Your name is G. D. Jones? A. Yes, sir. Q. C. W. Jones is your father? A. Yes, sir. Q. Are you a member of the copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons? A. Yes, sir. Q. Does C. W. Jones & Sons operate—that is, in May, 1920, did C. W. Jones & Sons operate the ranch known as unit No. 1 that has been referred to here? A. Yes, sir. Q. During the month of May, 1920, who was foreman and superintendent of that ranch? A. Charles Beaton. Q. And did Charles Beaton at that time have full charge of the running of that ranch, when some member of the firm of Jones & Sons was not there? A. Absolutely—he had, absolutely. Q. He had charge at all times? A. Yes, sir. Q. During the month of May? A. Yes, sir. Do you remember the occasion of this accident concerning which this suit is concerned? A. Yes, sir. Q. You heard that talked about? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were you on Ryer Island—I mean at unit No. 2 on May 22d, the day before the accident—1920? A. Yes, I was on unit No. 1; and also unit No. 2. Q. Did you have any conversations with the defendant Goodman concerning the Dodge—not the Dodge—concerning the Ford truck? A. Yes, we were talking to each other. Q. Just relate what you said. A. We were talking about a dance— Mr. Atkinson: We object as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. The Court: Objection overruled. A. We were talking about a dance, he was going to a dance; I said, 'If you come over Saturday night I wish you would bring the Ford truck over and leave it at C. W. Jones' place.' The Court: Who was that conversation with? A. A. S. Goodman. * * * Q. You requested Mr. Goodman, one of the defendants, to take that truck from where it was to the home place? A. I absolutely did not. Q. I beg your pardon—what did you say? A. I asked him if he would. Q. What was my question then—question withdrawn. Did you ask Mr. Goodman, one of the defendants in this case, to take that Ford truck to the home place? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had you been accustomed to look out for matters for him from time to time? A. He was a partner of mine. Q. Have you frequently asked Goodman to attend to matters for the copartnership of Jones & Sons? A. He was a partner of mine. Q. You frequently asked Mr. Goodman to attend to matters for the copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons? A. I was not in the habit of it, no. Q. Have you ever before? A. No, sir; not to my knowledge. Q. Why did you want the truck taken down to the home place? A. I wanted to take it to Sacramento myself to sell it; it was not giving satisfaction. Q. So that it was desirable from a business standpoint for Jones & Sons to have the truck down from Ryer Island to the home place of Jones & Sons, is that it—what is it? A. He was coming over; I simply asked him if he would bring the truck over."

The copartnership referred to by the witnesses herein is that of Goodman & Jones, sometimes called Jones & Goodman, and not the copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons. The copartnership of Goodman & Jones had to do with what is known as and called unit No. 2. The copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons had to do with the ranch known as and called unit No. 1. Both were situated on Ryer Island, and some three or four miles apart.

Upon the question as to who was the superintendent and had charge of unit No. 1, the ranch operated by C. W. Jones & Sons during the month of May, 1920, the testimony of Charles G. Beaton is as follows:

"My business is that of farming superintendent. During the month of May, 1920, I was employed by C. W. Jones & Sons on unit No. 1, Liberty Farms. I was farm superintendent. My business was keeping the time; setting the men to work. I hired men, sometimes I came down and got them. I told them what to do and where to do it. I know a man named Jack King, I know George Jones, Fred Jones, C. W. Jones, Victor Goodman, a man named Yancy, and A. S. Goodman. On May 22, 1920, Yancy was working for C. W. Jones & Sons. During the month of May Victor Goodman was working for C. W. Jones & Sons. On the 22d day of May, 1920, King was working for Jones & Goodman. At that time A. S. Goodman (the defendant) was working on his own ranch. A. S. Goodman was a partner in the firm of Goodman & Jones. A. S. Goodman was not working on unit No. 1 that I know of about the 22d of May, 1920. A. S. Goodman stayed at unit No. 1 at nights. He usually went from unit No. 1 to unit No. 2 by boat. He got his meals at unit No. 1. On May 22, 1920, I believe, William Nunes was working for Goodman & Jones. He was not working on unit No. 1 on May 22d; he was working for Goodman & Jones on unit No. 2. I have a book that shows when Nunes was working for Goodman & Jones and for Jones & Sons. It is a time book kept by me as foreman for C. W. Jones & Sons' ranch. Previous to the time I went the book is not in my handwriting, after that it is entirely in my handwriting. I made no entries until April, 1920. The book was kept in the boathouse in unit No. 1. The boathouse was used as a boathouse and sleeping quarters. I made the entries every night. Mr. William Nunes quit work for Jones & Sons on May 15, 1920; did not work for Jones & Sons on unit No. 1 after May 15, 1920. During that month I had occasion to go to Sacramento after men. I went in a Ford truck. I never drove the Ford truck to Walnut Grove after anybody to work on unit No. 1. On one occasion I took a man who had quit work to Sacramento in the Ford truck. The Ford truck had been used by A. S. Goodman several times for the purpose of bringing men to work and taking men away who had quit or been discharged. I went to work for Jones & Sons about the 5th or 6th of April, 1920. Pages 1, 2, and 3 of the time book are in my handwriting. The words, 'A. S. Goodman,' under the title of 'C. W. Jones & Sons, Time Book for the Month of April, 1920,' is in my handwriting. I asked Mr. Goodman if he was on the payroll of C. W. Jones & Sons. He told me he did not know. I put his name on the book, I had no instructions to carry his time. I never spoke to Mr. Jones about this entry. Opposite the name of A. S. Goodman is the sum of $200. That is in my own handwriting. That indicates Goodman was paid $200 for services on unit No. 1 for the month of April, 1920. That is what he had been paid; he told me that those were his wages. When I was hired, C. W. Jones and George Jones came to the Golden State Company; they stated that A. S. Goodman would instruct me until such time as I was able to take the ranch over and run it. I got instructions from them when I was hired on unit No. 1 that A. S. Goodman would instruct me how to run the place until I became familiar with the work, and that he would sign all checks that were there. The conversation as nearly as I can relate it is as follows: 'C. W. Jones and George Jones came to the Golden State, and wished me to go over. I decided finally to go over there. They said A. S. Goodman was working for them at the upper place and also the lower place, units No. 2 and 1. They wanted a man there the whole time that could keep the records and keep the work going at unit No. 1, so A. S. Goodman could devote most of his time to unit No. 2. I asked G. D. Jones in what manner they would pay off the men when they were discharged; he said I just give them checks, and A. S. Goodman would sign them. Nothing was said as to the position then occupied by Goodman. They did not say he was running it as boss or foreman. They said that he could be over there, that both C. W. Jones and George Jones would be over there two or three days to make any suggestions necessary until the time I got hold of the ropes. They did not say anything about taking instructions about unit No. 1 from A. S. Goodman; just to work in co-operation with him. Q. I thought you testified that at the time of your employment you were told to report at unit No. 1 to Mr. Goodman, who would tell you what to do. A. I did not say so—to work with him. Mr. Goodman would be there until such time as I got hold of the ropes and could run the ranch. I did confer with A. S. Goodman. He gave me suggestions about the place and the checks which I made out. Checks were signed C. W. Jones, per A. S. Goodman, for C. W. Jones & Sons. Those checks were made out by him in payment of wages of employees on unit No. 1. I used to keep the time book for A. S. Goodman; I helped him out on that work; he would tell me about his men; also make out the checks. They were made out and signed by Jones & Goodman for A. S. Goodman. I have paid in checks for work for C. W. Jones & Sons, signed C. W. Jones & Sons, per A. S. Goodman. Q. I understand your testimony, these figures '$200' opposite the name of Goodman in ink, show so far as the record you kept is concerned, Goodman was paid in the month of April, 1920, $200 by C. W. Jones & Sons for work on unit No. 1. A. I do not know whether he was paid or not. I just put that in there as a matter of record. I got the figures from A. S. Goodman. He said that was the salary he had been receiving. I just put it in that month. I didn't make out a check for him. I was told by C. W. Jones and George Jones that Goodman would put me onto the ropes of running the place, how to run the ranch. I understood from C. W. Jones that I had charge of the place. The checks that were signed by A. S. Goodman were made out by me. A. S. Goodman understood that men were in demand on unit No. 1. He brought Smith to unit No. 1. He said: 'Here is Smith; I hired him for you.' The checks referred to were made out both before and after the accident."

The defendant A. S. Goodman testified upon the points involved as follows:

"I am a member of the copartnership of Goodman & Jones. In the month of May, 1920, the members of that partnership were A. S. Goodman, G. D. Jones, and F. C. Jones. C. W. Jones was not a member of that partnership. C. W. Jones is the father of G. D. and F. C. Jones. I was not employed by the firm of C. W. Jones & Sons during the month of May, 1920. During the month of May, 1920, I was operating the farm in which I am interested, unit No. 2, Liberty Farms, Solano county, Cal. At one time I was foreman for C. W. Jones & Sons. I ceased being foreman on the 25th day of February, 1920. I know a man by the name of King, also Nunes, Beaton, and Yancy. On the afternoon of May 22, 1920, I left unit No. 2, went to unit No. 1, and from there on to Ryer Island to C. W. Jones' home on Grand Island. I went by a Ford truck. G. W. Jones asked me coming over on Saturday night to take the Ford truck over to the C. W. Jones home place on Grand Island and leave it there. I took the truck to the C. W. Jones home place, and left it there. Victor Goodman, Jack King, and William Nunes went with me. After reaching the C. W. Jones home place I went in the house to see Mr. Jones. I asked him if I could use the Dodge commercial. He gave me permission to use it. I took the Dodge to Walnut Grove. I stayed in Walnut Grove all night. The Ford truck was in Walnut Grove. Q. On Sunday night May 23d, did you tell William Nunes to take the Ford truck back to C. W. Jones' place? A. No, sir. Q. By the Court: Did you have any conversation with him about the car? A. Not with him—in general I just spoke up, 'Who was going to take the truck back.' He spoke up and said: 'I will take it back.' Q. Did you ever give Nunes any orders about the work at unit No. 1? A. No, sir. Q. To the men that were working there? A. No, sir. I had driven the Ford truck before May 22, 1920. Had driven it to Sacramento; drove it there on business of C. W. Jones & Sons. When I was foreman I employed men for C. W. Jones & Sons. I have employed the Ford truck in carrying employees of Jones & Sons to Ryer Island. I used the truck in taking men to and from Ryer Island. Have not done so since I ceased to be their foreman. C. Smith worked one day for Jones & Goodman on unit No. 2 on the 24th day of May. Then he went to work for C. W. Jones & Sons. I received no pay from C. W. Jones & Sons after February. I told Beaton my compensation was $200 a month. (Page 3 of Defendant's Exhibit 1 is then admitted in evidence as follows: "A. S. Goodman," under the month of April, 1920, the sum of "$200"; under date of March, 1920, A. S. Goodman $200.) I consulted with G. D. Jones about the conversation I had with him in relation to driving the Ford truck over to the C. W. Jones home place."

The testimony of witness A. S. Goodman as to duties in other matters than this referred to herein was somewhat conflicting. Whether this was due to the fact that the witness apparently was hard of hearing, had a poor memory, or was attempting to prevaricate does not seem to us very material, because upon the main questions involved there is, in fact, when carefully considered, no conflict in the testimony.

Victor Goodman, who accompanied the defendant Nunes in the Ford truck on the night of May 22, 1920, testified as follows:

"I am a brother of A. S. Goodman, the defendant. During the month of May, 1920, I was working for C. W. Jones & Sons; I was working for them on May 22d; I know the defendant William Nunes. I know the witness Yancy. I know Fred Jones, George Jones, C. W. Jones, and Mr. Beaton. During the month of May, while I was working for Jones & Sons, I took my orders from Beaton. I was working on unit No. 1, on Liberty Island. Mr. Yancy worked there at the same time. I left the island, unit No. 1, on the evening of May 22d, 1920. Mr. Yancy left the same day. We first got a ride in the motor boat. After we got out of the boat, we took the car and went to the Jones home place on Grand Island. When we got to the Jones home place, Jack King and A. S. Goodman got out of the machine. I inquired around how long I was going to wait before I got started. I did not get the information, so I just drove off, went off to Walnut Grove. I had to be shaved and get a bath. I was going to the dance; going in a Ford truck. A. S. Goodman drove the Ford truck from the ferry to the home place. I took the truck and went to Walnut Grove. I went there for the purpose of shaving and dressing up to go to the dance. I did not see any of the Joneses when I got there. I did not ask anybody for permission to take the car; just took it. The launch we went in belonged to Goodman & Jones—came from unit No. 1 to unit No. 2—A. S. Goodman brought it down. Nunes and Jack King were along. When we got to Ryer Island, we got out of the motor boat and drove to the C. W. Jones place. I had not been accustomed to take the truck in going from Ryer Island to Walnut Grove. That particular Saturday night was the first time I ever took the truck. It was customary for the men to get off from unit No. 1 on Saturday night. They went from there the best way they could. If the Ford truck was going down, he gave them a ride. If it was not, they would walk. My brother was superintendent of unit No. 1 at one time. There was no boss with me when I worked the ranch. My brother drove the car down to the Jones home place. I do not know how he got the car."

The testimony of Jack King is to the effect that he accompanied the person mentioned from unit No. 2 to Ryer Island by the motor boat, and then by the Ford truck to the C.

W. Jones home place; that he and A. S. Goodman got out of the Ford truck and let the others start off in the Ford truck.

The defendant C. W. Jones testified that he was a member of the firm of C. W. Jones & Sons; that the Ford truck belonged to the copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons; and that nobody else was interested in the ownership of the truck.

From the foregoing résumé of the testimony it seems to us clear that there is not a scintilla of evidence showing that the defendant A. S. Goodman was either a general superintendent or a farming superintendent of the ranch known as unit No. 1, owned and operated by the copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons during the month of May, 1920. It does appear that during said month he had authority and did sign checks for the copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons that had been drawn by the witness Charles G. Beaton. This testimony does not show any superintendency or right of control or any authorization to exercise control over any of the employees belonging to C. W. Jones & Sons, or any of his property, and we do not see how any reasonable inference can arise that such authority was given or exercised from the mere fact of signing checks. The extent of that authority was not inquired into, but is made the basis of an argument that the defendant A. S. Goodman was thereby vested with general authority as superintendent over the ranch known as unit No. 1, belonging to the copartnership of C. W. Jones & Sons, and the personal property used in connection therewith. We do not see how any such conclusion can be reached from the premises laid down, or how C. W. Jones can be charged with the negligence of the defendant William Nunes, because the defendant A. S. Goodman had signed the copartnership name of C. W. Jones & Sons to checks made out by Charles G. Beaton for the payment of employees working on unit No. 1.

[2] The testimony clearly establishes that Victor Goodman and the defendant Nunes were off on their own mission, seeking their own pleasure; that they took the Ford truck as a matter of their own convenience, without permission of any one, to reach Walnut Grove in time to enable them to get ready to attend a dance to be held there on Saturday evening, May 22, 1920. Under such circumstances it was the legal duty of the persons who had taken the truck to return it to the place from whence it had been taken. If the defendant C. W. Jones had learned of the taking of the Ford truck without permission by Victor Goodman and the defendant Nunes, and had called either one of them up at Walnut Grove, and directed or requested that they return the truck to the place from which it was taken without permission, and to which place it was their legal duty to return the truck, we do not see how any one could reasonably argue that the defendant C. W. Jones would by so doing render himself liable for any act of negligence in returning the truck by the person who had wrongfully taken it away, and whose legal duty it was to make the return. If this is true, the interposition of the defendant A. S. Goodman, whether he made inquiry as to who was to return the truck or gave orders for its return, would not make any difference, or transfer any liability upon the defendant C. W. Jones. Nor is there anything in the testimony that we have been able to find which fixes any legal liability upon the defendant A. S. Goodman. He is not shown to be an agent of any one having the ownership in the truck, and whatever he did do he did of his own volition and not as one having authority in the premises over either Victor Goodman or the defendant William Nunes.

[3] As to whether the court erred in denying the defendants' motion for a nonsuit is, from the view we take of the whole case, wholly immaterial, nor is it necessary to discuss the authorities as to the presumption of agency, arising from testimony showing ownership of an automobile. When all the facts are laid before the court and it appears therefrom that the automobile in question was not used, and was not being used, in the service of the owner, then the presumption which otherwise arises from the mere fact of ownership is completely met. Maupin v. Solomon, 41 Cal. App. 323, 183 Pac. 198, and Brown v. Chevrolet, 39 Cal. App. 740, 179 Pac. 697.

[4] Nor does it seem to us necessary to lengthen this opinion by either a discussion or an analysis of the decisions of the various supreme courts cited by counsel other than to state that all the authorities hold that in order to hold the principal liable for the act of his agent, even where the agency is shown or admitted, it must also appear that the agent was acting in the service of his principal. If it appears that the agent was seeking his own ends exclusively, in pursuit of his own business or pleasure, then and in that case the master is not liable. And this is true, no matter how short a time the agent is acting in matters disconnected from the business of his principal, if the injury complained of occurs during that period of time. In the case at bar counsel for the respective parties do not differ as to the law involved, but simply seek to draw different conclusions from the testimony in the case, and then make application of the authorities cited. But, holding as we do that there is nothing in the testimony showing or fixing legal liability for the act of William Nunes upon either of the defendants A. S. Goodman or C. W. Jones, in that there was no showing whatever that at the time of the injury William Nunes was acting as the agent of C. W.

Jones, or that he was under any obligations to obey either the request or command of the defendant A. S. Goodman, or that A. S. Goodman had any authority invested in him to act for C. W. Jones & Sons in relation to their Ford truck, we do not deem it necessary to set forth the law or refer to the decisions having to do with the subject of principal or agent.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment against the defendants A. S. Goodman and C. W. Jones should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. Jan. 17, 1924.)

1. Divorce — 130—Uncontradicted evidence showed husband's extreme cruelty.

In wife's action for a divorce, uncontradicted and undisputed evidence held sufficient to justify divorce for extreme cruelty.

2. Evidence — 594—Uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony not to be disregarded by trial court.

Uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony, tending to establish an issuable fact, may not be arbitrarily disregarded by the trial court, and must be accepted as proof.

3. Divorce — 150(2), 186—Findings of fact not required in default decree; reversal should carry directions to enter judgment.

A decree of divorce by default requires no findings of fact, and reversal of trial court's decree should carry directions to enter judgment in accordance with finding on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by Florence D. Shepard against Harold E. Shepard. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for appellant.

NOURSE, J. [1] The plaintiff sued for a divorce from the defendant upon the grounds of extreme cruelty. The complaint alleged that the parties intermarried in June, 1909; that they resided in the county of Humboldt for the statutory period, that two children were born of the marriage, and that they separated on the 18th of February, 1922. The charge of cruelty found in the complaint related to the conduct of the defendant regarding his association with other women, and it was alleged that during the period of two years last past defendant had received many letters of a loving and affectionate nature from many women other than plaintiff, that he continually flirted with and made love to other women, and that in the month of November, 1921, he stated to plaintiff that he had certain relations of an immoral character with two women. Plaintiff prayed for an interlocutory decree and the custody of her two children. No answer was filed on the part of the defendant, and, his default having been entered, the cause came on for trial on the allegations of the complaint just referred to. The testimony of the plaintiff was plain and unambiguous and clearly established the allegations of cruelty. She testified that for a period of about eight years the defendant had been guilty of the conduct of which she complained; that she had often seen letters which were written to him by other women, some of which were shown to her by the defendant and which she had read; that he had frequently stayed out until 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning and sometimes had remained away from home altogether in the company of other women; that a short time before the commencement of the action the defendant had shown her a large number of letters which he had received from other women, and upon his promise to discontinue his objectionable conduct she had destroyed them; that in December, 1921, the defendant had contracted a venereal disease through his association with another woman; and that plaintiff thereupon, with her two children, separated from him. She was corroborated by the witness Moore, who testified that during the period referred to he had spent two months with the defendant and had seen him almost nightly write letters to other women; that he had read portions of letters which the defendant received from other women; that they were all in the nature of love letters; and that the defendant frequently told him that he had been engaged in such conduct for a number of years, that it had caused a great deal of trouble between him and his wife, and that he regretted very much that he had been guilty of such conduct as he felt that he had thereby lost the affection of his wife and that she would demand a legal separation from him. These two witnesses, as well as the plaintiff's counsel, were all subjected to a grilling examination by the trial court upon matters which were not brought out on their direct examination, but which tended to show that the trial court suspected that there was some collusion between the parties for the purpose of obtaining a divorce for the plaintiff. At the close of the trial the trial court entered judgment denying the interlocutory decree, and from this judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

On this appeal the appellant relies upon the rule which now seems to be fairly established that a trial court may not arbitrarily disregard the uncontradicted evidence in the case, and base his judgment on mere suspicions which he may have in his own mind, and which are not supported by the record.

No appearance has been made on behalf of respondent, but on September 20, 1922, about one week after appellant's opening brief in this case was filed, there was filed with the clerk of the Supreme Court, at the request of the trial judge, a document designated "opinion of the court," which is not dated and which does not appear in the official transcript on file herein. It does not appear when the opinion was prepared, or whether it was at any time filed in the superior court where the cause was tried. It seems to be rather an answer to some of the contentions made by appellant's brief on this appeal. No findings being necessary because of the default, we are uncertain as to how to treat this document. A brief reference to it, however, will indicate plainly that the denial of the divorce was based upon the suspicions of the trial judge and not upon the evidence brought before him at the trial. Reference is made to the testimony of the appellant as to the admissions of misconduct made to her by her husband. The trial court says: "This is all hearsay, and framed up for the purpose of this divorce." Of course, this was not hearsay. It was incumbent upon the appellant to show that the misconduct of her husband had come to her attention, otherwise there would have been no cruelty. She had already given sufficient positive testimony to prove that such misconduct existed. At this time she was testifying as to the method of her knowledge of that misconduct and the statements of her husband were positive evidence of that fact and not hearsay. The court's conclusion that this was framed up for the purpose of the divorce was a mere matter of suspicion which is not borne out by any evidence in the record.

The opinion refers to the letter of appellant's counsel addressed to her husband, suggesting that if he would drop in to the sheriff's office at Yreka and accept service of the summons he would save the expense of the sheriff's fees and mileage in traveling out into the country to serve him. This letter the trial court points to as evidence of collusion on the part of the respondent. It seems to us that in a case of this nature, where no large property rights were involved, and where the attorney for the appellant had been paid but $25 for his services, it was but natural for him to suggest a method whereby the expense of the trial would not be curtailed, and we find nothing in the letter or in the evidence justifying the court's suspicion of collusion.

Reference is also made to the testimony of the witness Moore, and here it is said that this testimony covered nothing but the admissions of the husband regarding his conduct, but the record does not support this statement. One of the charges of the complaint was that the husband flirted with and made love to other women, and that he carried on a voluminous correspondence with such women. The witness Moore testified positively that he had seen the husband write letters to other women, and had seen and read portions of letters which he had received from them. This in itself was sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the wife, and, taking the record as a whole, there is ample evidence to warrant an interlocutory decree in favor of the wife.

[2] We come then to the only point of law involved on this appeal, and that this is whether the trial court may reject all the evidence in the case and based his judgment upon his own suspicions arising outside of the record. The last expression of the Supreme Court is found in the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Lennon in Stewart v. Silva, 221 Pac. 191, in which he says:

"That it is the general rule that the uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony of a witness tending to establish an issuable fact in the case may not be arbitrarily disregarded by the trial court. Hayward v. Rogers, 62 Cal. 348, 372; Gage v. Billing, 12 Cal. App. 688, 108 Pac. 664; 10 Cal. Jur. p. 1143. To the contrary, such testimony must be accepted as proof of the fact which it is offered to establish, unless it can be said that such testimony is so inherently incredible and improbable as to amount to no evidence at all. Hutchison v. Holland, 47 Cal. App. 710, 190 Pac. 1072; Hynes v. White, 47 Cal. App. 549, 190 Pac. 836."

This is precisely the situation which is presented in this record. All the evidence material to the case is found in the testimony of two witnesses, the appellant and the witness Moore. The appellant fully and clearly stated the facts in support of the allegations of her complaint, and the witness Moore sufficiently corroborated her in all material respects. Her counsel was called to the court and compelled to be sworn by the trial judge in order to answer questions covering the court's suspicions that he might be guilty of collusion or that he might have knowledge of collusion on the part of the parties. Throughout the court's examination of these witnesses reference was made to rumors of misconduct on the part of the wife, and statements are found in the court's questions which indicate that rumors and suspicions were afloat regarding the wife and her purpose in seeking this divorce; but in every instance the suspicions of the trial court were denied, and there is therefore not a particle of evidence in the record tending to contradict the evidence in support of the allegations of the complaint.

[3] We are satisfied that the judgment must be reversed, and, inasmuch as no findings were required by reason of the default (Waldecker v. Waldecker, 178 Cal. 566, 568, 174 Pac. 36), the reversal should carry directions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of the appellant (Brautigam v. Brautigam, 181 Cal. 157, 183 Pac. 529).

Judgment reversed with directions to enter judgment for appellant as prayed.

In a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, consisting of membership in the I. W. W., the exclusion of literature of that organization, composed largely of arguments in defense of the organization and in condemnation of the prosecution of members thereof, held proper.

12. Criminal law ⚡656(3)—Remarks of court concerning literature of I. W. W. held prejudicial error.

Remarks of the court in sustaining objection to literature of the I. W. W. offered by defendants in a prosecution for criminal syndicalism, "I think it is nothing but a reasonable article. It isn't the truth. * * * The very statement is a conglomeration of falsehoods and reasonable in itself," held prejudicial error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

William Flanagan and others were convicted of a violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act, and they appeal from judgments of conviction and orders denying motions for new trials. Judgments and orders reversed.

R. W. Henderson, of San Francisco, and T. F. Allen, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants were jointly charged with being members of the Industrial Workers of the World, in violation of the Criminal Syndicalism Act. (Stats. 1919, p. 281.) They were jointly tried. Flanagan and Stagland were convicted and the other defendants, three in number, were acquitted. The convicted defendants moved for new trials, and their motions were denied. They were thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the terms provided by law, not less than one nor more than fourteen years. They have appealed from the judgments of conviction and the orders denying their motions for new trials. The appeals are prosecuted on a single record.

[1] Admittedly the defendants were all members of the I. W. W. The evidence was sufficient to show the criminal character of the organization. It was similar to that in the many cases heretofore reviewed on appeal, and no useful purpose would be served by setting it out in this opinion. It is urged that the evidence is insufficient to establish knowledge on the part of the defendants of the criminal character of the organization. The only evidence tending to connect the defendants with the criminal conspiracy is the mere fact of their membership. Persons, however, do not usually join an organization without some knowledge of its character and purposes. The general character and purposes of the I. W. W. have been given such wide publicity, as shown by the evidence, that it is reasonable to assume, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that any person of mature judgment and understanding is possessed of sufficient knowledge thereof to put him upon inquiry at least as to the nature of the organization. The intent of the defendants must be determined from their voluntary connection with the conspiracy, viewed in the light of the circumstances which they knew or ought to have known. It must be held that the evidence is sufficient to justify the inference that the defendants had knowledge of the purposes of the organization.

[2] It was the theory of the prosecution and of the trial court that it was not necessary, in order to convict, for the jury to find that the defendants had any knowledge of the character of the organization. The defendant Flanagan testified that he was born July 18, 1902; that on the 27th of November, 1922, a man on the street showed defendant a membership card and asked him if he wanted to join the organization, informing defendant that it is "a labor organization"; that the defendant thereupon gave the man $2.50, and was handed a membership card; that he never knew of such an organization prior to that time, and had never had any experience with members thereof; that he had never heard that "any of the purposes announced in the preamble were to be carried out by the use of force and violence." He was then asked:

"Did you have such an understanding, that that was the plan or scheme of the Industrial Workers of the World, when—"

The court then interrupted counsel for defendant and said:

"Well, that is immaterial, whether he has or not; if he is a member, and the organization is one organized for the purposes of doing the things prohibited by statute, it doesn't make any difference what he understands."

Stagland did not take the witness stand. It would have been futile for him to have attempted to prove want of guilty knowledge after the ruling mentioned. The court refused to instruct the jury that proof of knowledge by defendants of the character of the organization was essential to a conviction. One of the proposed instructions upon the question of such knowledge is faulty in stating that to justify a conviction the jury must find that "the Industrial Workers of the World was organized in the county of Sacramento." The other instruction upon that question, which the court refused, correctly states the law. After the jurors had retired to deliberate they returned into court, and the foreman inquired:

"If the jury finds that a man joins an organization, and was stopped from investigating it very much before he became fully cognizant of what the organization was, and, in fact, the jury believes that he would have repudiated it had he known it was a criminal syndicate, should the jury take that evidence into consideration?"

The court replied:

"It is not necessary, and the law does not require, that the prosecution establish that he knew the character of the organization. * * * It does not require that they know the character of the organization when they joined it. * * * The word 'knowingly' there means that he must know that he joined the organization. If he was under the influence of some kind of a narcotic, and didn't know what he was doing, or was insane, then he would not knowingly join it; but if he knew that he joined the organization, and if you find that it is a criminal organization, that is all that the law requires to be established."

From the foregoing it is clear that the court not only ruled out testimony tending to show want of guilty knowledge, but instructed the jury that guilty knowledge is not an essential element of the offense charged. Flanagan became a member, in the manner stated, on the 27th of November, 1922. He was arrested the following day while on the picket line with some Hetch Hetchy strike bulletins in his possession. He was taken before the police judge three days later and discharged. He was again arrested on the 2d day of December, and was thereafter confined in jail until the time of the trial. There was no advocacy of crime or violence contained in the strike bulletin. While the jurors were not required to accept as true the testimony given by the defendant, he had the right to have the same considered by them.

It is argued that the intent of a defendant is not an element of the crime denounced by the Criminal Syndicalism Act, but that the statute makes a violation of its terms a crime regardless of intent. The contention finds support in the cases of State v. Hennessy, 114 Wash. 351, 195 Pac. 211, and State v. Laundy, 103 Or. 443, 204 Pac. 958, 206 Pac. 290. In Matter of Application of Ahart, 172 Cal. 762, 159 Pac. 160, the petitioner was charged under an ordinance prohibiting the transportation of intoxicating liquor "to any place, the establishing or keeping of which is prohibited by this ordinance." It was contended that "the ordinance itself would make guilty of crime any person who, without knowledge of the character of the place and without intent to violate the law, innocently and in ignorance of the character of the place transported to it forbidden liquors." The court said:

"We do not construe section 5 of the Covina ordinance as designed to inflict punishment upon an innocent person who shall so transport intoxicants. The case comes quite clearly within the reasoning and principle of the English case of Regina v. Tolson, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 168 (1889), s. c., 40 Alb. L. J. 250. * * * The case was a criminal charge against a woman for a bigamous marriage. * * * The woman had married five years instead of seven years after her husband's desertion of her, under the belief held in good faith that her husband was dead. The proposition considered was whether honest belief and good faith constituted a defense. It was conceded that the prisoner 'falls within the very words of the statute.' Cave, J., said: 'At common law an honest and reasonable belief in the existence of circumstances, which, if true, would make the act for which the person is indicted an innocent act, has always been held to be a good defense. * * * So far as I am aware it has never been suggested that these exceptions do not equally apply to the case of statutory offenses, unless they are excluded expressly or by necessary implication.'"

[3,4] The contention here made need be examined only in relation to the crime charged. The act provides that "any person who * * * is * * * a member of, any organization, society, group or assemblage of persons organized or assembled to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism * * * is guilty of a felony." The defendants were, in effect, charged with conspiring "to advocate, teach or aid and abet criminal syndicalism." People v. Steelik, 187 Cal. 361, 376, 203 Pac. 78; People v. La Rue

(Cal. App.) 216 Pac. 627, 629. A criminal conspiracy is a partnership in criminal purposes, and is constituted by an agreement, though, of course, the agreement need not be formal. United States v. Kissel, 218 U. S. 601, 31 Sup. Ct. 124, 54 L. Ed. 1168. Every person who joins a conspiracy after it is constituted comes into it by a like agreement on his part. The conspiracy here charged is complete without the commission of an overt act. Since the mere agreement is punishable, no reason appears why the rules applicable to civil contracts should not apply. One of the essentials of a civil contract is that the consent of the parties must be free. Civ. Code, § 1565. "An apparent consent is not real or free when obtained through * * * mistake." Civ. Code, § 1567. It would be a harsh rule which would punish a defendant, not guilty of culpable negligence, for merely agreeing to further a purpose, if he is honestly mistaken as to the nature of the purpose. Every person is presumed to know the law, and ignorance thereof is no defense to a charge of crime, but the defense here sought to be shown is not ignorance of the law, but of a fact. In a case where the defendants were charged with conspiracy to obstruct the administration of justice, it is said:

"Undoubtedly it is a condition of penal laws that ignorance of them constitutes no defense to an indictment for their violation, but that rule has no application here. The obstruction of the due administration of justice in any court of the United States, corruptly or by threats or force, is indeed made criminal, but such obstruction can only arise when justice is being administered. Unless that fact exists, the statutory offense cannot be committed; and while, with knowledge or notice of that fact, the intent to offend accompanies obstructive action, without such knowledge or notice the evil intent is lacking. It is enough if the thing is done which the statute forbids, provided the situation invokes the protection of the law, and the accused is chargeable with knowledge or notice of the situation; but not otherwise." Pettibone v. United States, 148 U. S. 197, 13 Sup. Ct. 542, 37 L. Ed. 419.

See, also, United States v. Milburn (D. C.) 288 Fed. 573; Harrington v. United States (C. C. A.) 267 Fed. 97; United States v. Jenks (D. C.) 258 Fed. 763; United States v. McHugh (D. C.) 253 Fed. 224; Buchanan v. United States, 233 Fed. 257, 147 C. C. A. 263; Salla v. United States, 104 Fed. 544, 44 C. C. A. 26; Ford v. United States, 12 Ariz. 23, 94 Pac. 1102; State v. Cole (Del. Gen. Sess.) 114 Atl. 201; State v. Gregory, 93 N. J. Law, 205, 107 Atl. 459; People v. Lloyd, 304 Ill. 23, 136 N. E. 505; State v. Stewart, 59 Vt. 273, 9 Atl. 559, 59 Am. Rep. 710; State v. Crowley, 41 Wis. 271, 22 Am. Rep. 719. The intention of the parties to an agreement is not only an essential element, but the most important element thereof. This is true of an agreement of conspiracy.

"Joint evil intent is necessary to constitute the offense. 'The confederation must be corrupt. This is implied in the meaning of the term conspiracy.'" Wharton's Crim. Law (11th Ed.) § 1606.

"The formation of a common design by two or more persons is never simpliciter a criminal conspiracy. * * * In many cases this inference [of criminal intent] would be irresistible, in others the jury might find that, although the object of the agreement and the overt act were unlawful, nevertheless the parties charged acted under a misconception or in ignorance, without any actual criminal motive. If that conclusion should be reached by the jury, then, whatever other criminal penalties the parties might have incurred, the crime of conspiracy would not have been established." People v. Flack, 125 N. Y. 324, 26 N. E. 267, 11 L. R. A. 807.

In the case of People v. Lloyd, supra, where a conviction under the criminal syndicalism law of Illinois was involved, the court said:

"The criminal quality of the common design of two or more persons resides in the intention of the parties to the agreement, construed in connection with the purpose contemplated, and as the accused may deny any criminal intent, the question of intent becomes one of fact. * * * This question of intent, therefore, cannot be ruled as a question of law, but must be submitted to the jury."

[5] While the question under consideration has not been expressly decided by the higher courts of this state, it may be implied from the opinion in the case of People v. Steelik, supra, that knowledge of the purposes of the organization is an essential element of the crime here charged. It is there said that "there was * * * evidence before the jury that the defendant * * * knowingly belonged to a conspiracy to commit crimes"; that it was alleged "that the defendant was a member of the I. W. W., knowing its alleged purposes"; that "the testimony as to his statements and activities were admissible to show his knowledge of and sympathy with the purposes of the organization"; and that the evidence justified the conviction of the defendant "in that he knowingly belonged to an organization which in its nature was a criminal conspiracy."

[6] Hearsay evidence, of a character similar to that held to have been erroneously admitted in the case of People v. La Rue, supra, being declarations of past acts, was admitted over the objections of defendants. In People v. Irwin, 77 Cal. 494, 504, 20 Pac. 56, 59, it is said:

"Declarations showing past acts, or expressing merely the opinion or desire of the conspirator making them, are not binding upon any one except himself, or those in whose presence they are made."

For other authorities to the same effect see People v. Smith, 151 Cal. 619, 626, 91 Pac. 511; State v. Dingham (Idaho) 219 Pac. 760; State v. Gibson, 115 Wash. 512, 197 Pac. 611;

State v. Pettilla, 116 Wash. 589, 200 Pac. 332; and State v. Kowalchuk, 116 Wash. 592, 200 Pac. 333. The hearsay statements erroneously admitted were not made at any meeting of the organization, or to or by an officer or representative thereof, or in the way of propaganda to further its purposes, but the facts sought to be proved by the declarations were the commission of criminal acts by its members.

[7] Appellants contend that witnesses for the prosecution were permitted to give their opinions and conclusions as to the character and purposes of the I. W. W. One of the principal witnesses for the prosecution testified that he joined the organization in the year 1908, when he was 19 or 20 years of age, and remained a member for 6 months; that he was again a member for 6 months in 1911; that he joined again on the 22d day of July, 1916, and remained a member until July, 1922; that from 1916 to 1920 he traveled through many states, and actively participated in many cowardly crimes to further the purposes of the organization, such as malicious damage to machinery; putting emery dust in bearings; placing pieces of iron in shocks of grain to damage threshing machines; "jabbing the horses with a pitchfork and making them run away and tear up the wagon"; perforating airtight cans containing meat, being packed for the use of the American soldiers in France, to "cause ptomaine poisoning"; and frequently robbing laborers who were not members of the organization, at the point of a gun. In the year 1919 the witness forsook his wife and child, and clung to the organization. He testified:

"I left my wife and child for the I. W. W. She told me to give her up or give the I. W. W. up, * * * and in June, 1919, I took two suitcases of literature * * * and went down into Kansas, and I returned back up into Nebraska, and worked with the organization the rest of the year. * * * I voluntarily quit the organization in the month of October or November, 1920. I quit the organization in principle. I quit believing in the organization, and I quit, and I continued my membership until including the month of July, 1922. * * * I just reformed, the same as any criminal would reform."

The reformation of the witness, like the reformation which the defendants claim took place in the organization itself, followed closely upon the enactment of stringent criminal syndicalism laws in many of the states, and vigorous prosecutions thereunder. These facts may be mere coincidences or they may tend to support the old-fashioned doctrine that the commission of crime is more effectively prevented by punishment than by coddling criminals. There is no intention here to imply that the reformation of the witness was not real and sincere or that his testimony was not given under "the whip of his own repentance," as these were questions for the exclusive determination of the jury, but such a witness should be held strictly to a statement of facts, to the exclusion of mere opinions and conclusions. In many cases the prosecution must of necessity rely upon the testimony of criminals, but in such cases there should be a rigid adherence to the rules governing the admission of evidence. It appears from a reading of the testimony of the witness that the complaint of appellants is not without foundation.

[8-10] The same witness was permitted to testify that in the utopia of industrial and political perfection which is proposed to be established by the I. W. W. there will be no homes; children will be taken from their mothers at the age of two and a half years and will be given but three or four years' schooling; men's farms will be taken away from them, and they will become workers, as will the owners of "small business houses"; there will be no marriage relation, but "free love" will be the rule; jails and penitentiaries will be abolished; there will be no churches, "as religion is the greatest enemy that the radical movement has"; courts will be abolished, and the men in prisons and jails will be released; "the I. W. W. terms themselves as on an equal footing with Christ. * * * They say the only difference between the I. W. W.'s of today and Christ is that he rode a jackass and they ride freight trains; * * * that religion is a sham to keep people in ignorance; * * * The I. W. W. call Jesus Christ Jerusalem Slim." In the foregoing testimony there is not a single fact material to any issue being tried, but every juror could find something therein appealing to his prejudices. There are many law-abiding citizens in this country who do not believe in the divinity of Christ—persons of other religious faiths, as well as some "modernist" Christians—but it is not proper to admit evidence of such lack of faith as tending to establish a charge of crime against one of them. The defendants were not on trial for their or other conspirators' moral or religious beliefs, or for the character of the industrial and political scheme which the organization proposes to establish; but for the unlawful means to be advocated and employed by the conspiracy in effecting its ultimate object. However beneficent that object may be, the conspiracy is criminal if it advocates the accomplishment thereof by "unlawful acts of force and violence, or unlawful methods of terrorism," and however baneful the ultimate object, the law does not make criminal the advocacy thereof if peaceful means only, such as are sanctioned by our Constitutions and laws, are employed. The admission of the foregoing evidence was error. It was proper for the prosecution to prove that the organization proposes to accomplish an industrial and political change, but such purpose is shown by practically every piece of I. W. W. literature admitted in evidence, and no member or witness has ever denied that the organization advocates making a change. The character of the system to be established is immaterial in the trial of a case arising under the act.

[11] The court permitted the defendants to introduce certain I. W. W. literature tending to show that the means advocated by the organization were lawful. Other literature offered by them was rejected. That rejected was composed largely of arguments in defense of the organization and in condemnation of the prosecution of members thereof, and was properly excluded.

If any portions thereof were admissible, such portions should have been offered separately.

[12] It is urged that the court was guilty of prejudicial misconduct in the following statement made in the presence of the jury in sustaining objection to one piece of literature offered by the defendants, but which was not read before the jury:

"I think it is nothing but a treasonable article. It isn't the truth. The statement here is not the truth, and I think it is really unbecoming of anybody to offer such an article in defense of any one. The very statement in there is a conglomeration of falsehoods and treasonable in itself."

At the request of counsel for defendants the court instructed the jury to disregard the statement. In view of the fact that the character of the organization which issued the literature in question was an issue in the case, it is doubtful whether any instruction to the jury could have removed the prejudicial effect of the statement.

The other alleged errors will probably not occur in the retrial of the case, and need not be specifically noticed.

The judgments and the orders are reversed.

HEWELCKE v. SHIPMAN. (Civ. 4654.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 14, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 14, 1924.)

1. Malicious prosecution §20 — "Probable cause" defined.

"Probable cause" is a suspicion founded upon circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in believing that a charge is true.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Probable Cause (In Malicious Prosecution).]

2. Malicious prosecution §56—Plaintiff has burden of proving want of probable cause.

The burden of proving want of probable cause rests upon the plaintiff in an action for malicious prosecution.

3. Malicious prosecution §21(2)—Defendant held to have had probable cause for instituting prosecution.

Where plaintiff was employed by one for whom defendant had been sales agent to audit his books, and while so engaged plaintiff removed the books and accounts, and refused to return them to defendant on demand, and defendant, acting on advice of counsel and the district attorney had plaintiff arrested, held, that defendant had probable cause for instituting the prosecution.

4. Malicious prosecution §31—Defendant's passion held not to show malice in causing arrest.

Where plaintiff was employed by one for whom defendant had acted as sales agent to audit his books, and while so engaged removed the books and accounts, and refused to return them to defendant on demand, the fact that defendant on learning of the matter flew into a passion held insufficient to show malice on part of defendant in having plaintiff arrested.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Herman R. Hewelcke against Carroll Shipman. Judgment for plaintiff; defendant appeals. Reversed.

O'Gara & De Martini, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action to recover damages for malicious prosecution. Trial was had by jury, which gave plaintiff a verdict for $1,500, upon which judgment was entered. Defendant appeals from the judgment and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Defendant claims, in support of this appeal, that the evidence is insufficient that he instituted a criminal action without probable cause. Probable cause is a suspicion founded upon circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the charge is true. Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 221. It is necessary to chronologically narrate the facts contained in the record in order to show the situation of the parties and the circumstances of their business relationship preceding and up to the trouble which resulted in this litigation.

Plaintiff, Hewelcke, is a public accountant. Defendant, Shipman, for a number of years prior to April 20, 1920, had been the exclusive sales agent for the Automatic Refrigerating Company of Hartford, Conn., of which I. K. Hamilton, Jr., and M. F. Owens were at all times respectively president and secretary. The business of the corporation is the erection of refrigerating plants and the manufacture and sale of refrigerating equipments, appliances, and materials. Shipman resigned said agency on April 20. For several years Shipman held a lease of rooms in the Holbrook building, where he transacted business on behalf of the Automatic Refrigerating Company. On May 1, 1920, the business of the Automatic Refrigerating Company, its books, and property were removed from the Holbrook building to new offices in the Hearst building.

By the terms of his contract with the Automatic Refrigerating Company, Shipman was entitled to a salary of \$1,500 a year, payable in weekly installments, and was also entitled to an allowance for rent and for clerical hire. In addition, Shipman was entitled to a commission of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of all contracts which were closed through his office. In case the volume of contracts turned in by him during any calendar year equalled or exceeded 10 per cent. of the amount of his salary and expenses, then he was entitled to a bonus in an amount equal to 10 per cent. of the total contracts closed through his office during the year, less his salary, traveling expenses, office expenses, and the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. commission. In 1917 he was allowed an additional salary of \$3 per day for time which he might give in superintending construction work. It was the practice between Shipman and the Automatic Refrigerating Company for an accounting to be made by the company following the 1st day of January and the 1st day of July of each year. Usually two or three months passed before Shipman received his commission earned during the preceding six months. At the time when he ceased to act for the company, on April 20, 1920, the company had not accounted to him for his commission earned since July 1, 1919. The Automatic Refrigerating Company had a thoroughly organized accounting system at its principal place of business in Hartford, Conn. Shipman was not required to, and did not, keep a regular set of books. He made weekly reports to the company, showing, for example, his salary earned or expenses paid out, which were utilized by the company in making up its books of account. He kept for his own protection a carbon copy of each report, using a printed form supplied by the company. In due time the company sent to Shipman a check drawn on a Hartford bank and payable to the order of Carroll Shipman, for the account of his salary or his expenses or both, as previously reported in the weekly statement. Attached to such check was a so-called "check voucher," upon which was printed:

"The attached check is in full payment of items listed below a copy of which is retained in this office. No receipt is necessary. In case of error return without detaching check. Detach before depositing check."

These "check vouchers" were regularly detached and retained by Shipman. For the conduct of his personal and business affairs Shipman opened three separate accounts at the First National Bank of San Francisco. The first was under the name of "Carroll Shipman," the second was designated "Carroll Shipman, San Francisco Manager of the Automatic Refrigerating Company," and the third "Carroll Shipman, Special." The records of Shipman's office, which Shipman claimed were stolen by Hewelcke, comprised carbon copies of the weekly reports, "check vouchers," bank statements, canceled checks, and the corresponding check book stubs.

Following his resignation Shipman commenced doing business on behalf of the American Ice Machine Company, a corporation organized by himself. This new concern engaged in the same line of business that he had previously transacted for the Automatic Refrigerating Company.

About April 25, 1920, Shipman employed plaintiff, Hewelcke, the accountant, to examine the records of his office, and to report to him as to the condition of his affairs, with special reference to certain irregularities alleged to have been committed by a man named Shafer, a former employee of Shipman. Hewelcke conducted his examination of said records at the rooms in the Holbrook building, made his report to Shipman, and was paid for his services by Shipman about the 7th of May, 1920.

Soon after completing said audit for Shipman, Hewelcke was employed by Shipman to act as bookkeeper for the American Ice Machine Company and other concerns in which Shipman was interested. By the terms of this second employment Hewelcke was at liberty to do the work at his own convenience, provided he kept the work up to date. Hewelcke entered upon said employment, and was supposed to work in pursuance thereof up to the 28th day of July, 1920.

Hewelcke, while in the employ of Shipman as aforesaid, met Owens, secretary and general manager of the Automatic Refrigerating Company, at the office of Shipman. Later Owens employed Hewelcke to examine the records in Shipman's office. Owens called on Shipman, and expressed a desire to have an audit made. This was agreeable to Shipman, and he consented. Subsequently Hewelcke, who was not present at the conversation with Owens, called on Shipman, stated that Owens had employed him to make an audit, and arranged to see the records. Shipman told him to go ahead and examine them, which Hewelcke proceeded to do. Up to this time the records were in Shipman's office, under his exclusive control, and no one had questioned his ownership or right to possession of them.

Hewelcke removed the records from Shipman's office to his own office in another building. Shipman testified that he did not consent to the taking of any of the records from his office. Hewelcke testified that Shipman did consent to the taking of the records to Hewelcke's office. But Hewelcke further testified that when he removed the papers to his own office he intended to return them to Shipman's office when the examination was finished.

It is undisputed that on a day shortly prior to July 28, 1920, Shipman telephoned Hewelcke and asked him if he, Hewelcke, had his, Shipman's records. It is admitted that Hewelcke then replied that he did have the records. Shipman testifies that he then demanded the return of the records, which Hewelcke denies.

After he had made the audit for the Automatic Refrigerating Company, Hewelcke made a report to its president, Mr. Hamilton. He next saw Shipman in the latter's office on July 28. Shipman asked Hewelcke if he had completed his report, and Hewelcke informed him that he had, and Shipman then asked where the records were, and Hewelcke told him they were in the office of Mr. Hatch, an attorney for the Automatic Refrigerating Company. Shipman became very angry, and Hewelcke says there followed an outburst of language he did not care to repeat. In describing the incident Shipman said:

"Of course I was angry. I was as angry as I could be. I don't think I was so angry in my life before. The whole thing I had, all my books and everything else, had been taken. The Automatic Refrigerating Company could frame up anything they wanted to on me, and not having any proof against them—I was angry."

Shipman hastened to the office of his friend and counselor, Colonel Neal Power, attorney at law. After hearing Shipman's story, Power telephoned to attorney Hatch's office, demanding the return of Shipman's records, and his demand was refused. Power advised Shipman that Hewelcke had committed a crime, either embezzlement or grand larceny, and that he, Shipman, should consult the district attorney as to the proper charge. Power gave Shipman a letter of introduction to District Attorney Brady, but Shipman went instead to the office of the bond and warrant clerk. Skillin, an attorney, and an assistant of the bond and warrant clerk, issued a citation. In answer Hewelcke appeared, and Skillin heard the statements of both Shipman and Hewelcke. Skillin told Hewelcke to return the records to Shipman. Hewelcke telephoned to Hatch, and then reported that Hatch would not return the records. Skillin announced that a warrant would be applied for, and at once prepared a complaint charging Hewelcke with embezzlement as the agent of Shipman. By the advice of Skillin, Shipman swore to this complaint. The embezzlement charge was heard by Police Judge Sullivan, and promptly dismissed.

The hearing before Judge Sullivan was summary, and Shipman reported to Power that the case had not been fully presented. In this report Shipman was supported by J. C. Flannery, a duly licensed attorney associated with Power, who was present at the hearing. Power advised Shipman that Hewelcke had committed a crime, and told him to see the district attorney in person. Power wrote a second letter to District Attorney Brady, which Shipman delivered. Thereupon Brady heard Shipman's statement of the case, and also called on Heidelberg, the assistant who presented the case before Judge Sullivan, for his statement. After hearing Heidelberg's statement, the district attorney stated to Shipman that in his opinion Hewelcke was guilty of grand larceny, and told him to sign a new complaint charging grand larceny. This Shipman did at once; the new complaint being prepared upon Brady's instructions personally given. It is this second complaint which is the basis of this action.

Power testified and Brady testified for defendant, Shipman, at the trial. Each of them was certain of the result of Shipman's statement, and as to the advice given him as stated herein. Besides being advised with respect to the grand larceny charge by Power and the district attorney, Shipman was also advised by J. C. Flannery, a duly licensed attorney associated with Power. Flannery testified for defendant, Shipman, and showed affirmatively that Shipman made a full and fair statement of the facts of the case to him, and that he also advised Shipman that in his opinion Hewelcke was guilty of grand larceny.

The complaint sworn to by Shipman charged Hewelcke with the commission of the crime of grand larceny, for that he did steal, take, and carry away certain canceled checks, check book stubs, bank statements, "check vouchers," and copies of weekly statements, the property of Shipman. The value of the property was alleged to be $6,000. The warrant issued, and Hewelcke was arrested and kept in prison for an hour. After the hearing, Police Judge McAtee dismissed the case. This action resulted.

The only issues raised by the pleadings herein are on the subject of want of probable cause, the existence of malice, and the infliction of damages.

From the story told by the record it appears that all was serene between Hewelcke and Shipman up to July 28th. Indeed, Hewelcke was at that time in Shipman's employ. Shipman was willing that there should be an examination of his records by Hewelcke for the Automatic Refrigerating Company. There is a dispute between Shipman and Hewelcke as to whether or not the records were removed by Hewelcke to his office with or without Shipman's consent. But there is no dispute that Shipman demanded the return of his records of Hewelcke on July 28th. Here is what witness Hewelcke says about such demand:

"Q. Mr. Stafford. Tell us what you said to him and what he said to you, especially with reference to the telegram, if anything was said with reference to it. (Upon receipt of Hewelcke's report Hamilton, president of the Automatic Refrigerating Company, had wired witness to turn the records over to Hatch, the attorney for the company.) A. He asked me whether I had completed the report, and I said that I had completed the report, and that the same had been forwarded to Mr. Hamilton in Hartford, Conn., and he asked me where the records were. I told him (Shipman) I had turned them over to Mr. Hatch, the attorney for the Automatic Refrigerating Company. He says: 'Under what authority?' I says: 'On the telegram I had received from Mr. Hamilton,' and then I showed him the telegram. He says: 'I don't give a damn what that telegram says, or anything, those are my records, and you had no right to turn them over to anybody but me.'"

These were the records for the larceny of which plaintiff was arrested. These records included 29 statements issued by the First National Bank for "Carroll Shipman, Special," the first being of date December 31, 1917, and the last dated April 20, 1920; also 29 bank statements issued by the same bank to "Carroll Shipman for account S. F. Manager of the Automatic Refrigerating Company," covering the same dates. Also bank checks consisting of 1,106 bank checks in the name of "Carroll Shipman, Special"; 1,383 canceled checks, "Carroll Shipman, S. F. Manager Automatic Refrigerating Company"; four books of check book stubs for the account of "Carroll Shipman, Special"; five books of check book stubs for the account of "Carroll Shipman, S. F. Manager Automatic Refrigerating Company"; also "check vouchers" or statements covering a period for office expenses from September 1, 1914, to April 30, 1920, and also separate statements covering construction expenses for the same period, and, finally, carbon copies of weekly statements divided into three different classes, one of expense account entered "Carroll Shipman, S. F. office," from September 14, 1910, to April 20, 1920; the second entitled "Expense account Carroll Shipman, Personal," for the same period; and the third of said expense accounts entitled "Carroll Shipman, Construction," for the period from December 1, 1913, to April 30, 1920. These records taken by Hewelcke constituted Shipman's only books of account; and they were necessary for his protection in order to establish his claims against the Automatic Refrigerating Company and others, and to resist any false claims which might be made against him by the Automatic Refrigerating Company or any other person. It was no part of Shipman's duties to collect money for the Automatic Refrigerating Company, and he never did collect any money for the company.

It is suggested that these records were of little or no value. When witness Shipman was asked how he fixed the value of them at $6,000, he replied that he had at that time a claim against the Automatic Refrigerating Company, which was afterwards settled with him for $1,500; that he had at that time a claim against the First National Bank, which was afterwards settled for $1,500; and that he has a claim against one Burgess for $3,500; that "there is an argument about some of the items that might reduce it to $3,000." There is no denial of this testimony. Even if there was, we cannot see that the intrinsic or market value of the records would make any difference. They were certainly of great value to Shipman, consisting, as they did, of the only records he had of his financial business transactions covering a period of years.

[2-4] We agree with counsel for plaintiff that the only question involved in this appeal is whether the defendant, Shipman, in making the complaint against plaintiff, Hewelcke, acted maliciously and without probable cause. The burden of proving want of probable cause rests upon the plaintiff. Potter v. Seale, 8 Cal. 217, 221; Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644; Levy v. Brannan, 39 Cal. 485; Anderson v. Coleman, 53 Cal. 188; Jones v. Jones, 71 Cal. 89, 11 Pac. 817; Lacey v. Porter, 103 Cal. 597, 37 Pac. 635; Davis v. Pacific Telephone Co., 127 Cal. 313, 57 Pac. 764, 59 Pac. 698; McKenna v. Heinlen, 128 Cal. 97, 60 Pac. 668; Lee v. Levison, 173 Cal. 166, 159 Pac. 438; Jirku v. Brod, 42 Cal. App. 796; Squires v. Southern Pacific Co., 42 Cal. App. 459, 183 Pac. 695. Plaintiff, Hewelcke, argues that the evidence shows malice by defendant, Shipman, against him, because when Shipman demanded the return of his records he became very angry with him, called him vile names, threatened him with arrest, and later had him arrested. Shipman admits that he was angry, but denies the use of vile language. Considering all of the circumstances, we think that an outburst of passion on Shipman's part was perfectly natural. The evidence shows that he had as an excuse for his anger an honest belief that he had been grievously wronged by Hewelcke in being deprived by him of his property. This belief was not founded upon mere suspicion, but upon his actual knowledge that Hewelcke had taken and retained his property. Shipman had an honest belief in Hewelcke's guilt, and the undisputed evidence shows that he was justified as a reasonable man in such belief. In addition, the evidence shows that Shipman laid the facts of his case fully and fairly before counsel, and that he acted in good faith upon the opinion given him by counsel. There is no evidence whatever to show bad faith in defendant, Shipman.

Our conclusion, based upon the evidence adduced at the trial and the law applicable thereto, is that there was probable cause for the arrest of plaintiff, Hewelcke. We have read every California case upon the subject of malicious prosecution, from Potter v. Seale, supra, to and including the recent decision of our Supreme Court in Franzen v. Shenk, 221 Pac. 932, and we think our view is supported by the authorities. The Franzen Case was an action to recover damages for the malicious prosecution of a proceeding wherein, by affidavit filed by the defendant before a justice of the peace, the plaintiff was charged with being an insane person. The Supreme Court pointed out that there was "manifestly a conflict in the evidence relating to the facts from which the existence or want of probable cause for the prosecution of the insanity proceeding must be determined." In the case before us there is no dispute concerning the facts relied upon to show probable cause, nor was advice of counsel based upon any false statement of fact. Here the question presented by the evidence was one of law, and should have been determined by the court. The case upon the evidence should never have been submitted to the jury for its verdict, unless, under proper instructions of the court, to find in favor of the defendant.

The judgment is reversed.

ROOT et al. v. CONLIN et al. (Civ. 4199.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 11, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 10, 1924.)

1. Quieting title §35(3)—Averment of ownership equivalent to allegation of right of possession of property.

Averment in complaint in action to quiet title that plaintiffs were the owners of and for long time prior to action had been the owners of and entitled to possession of the property was equivalent to allegation that they were entitled to possession when suit was begun; right of possession following as matter of law from ownership.

2. Trial §82—Objection to admission of evidence must be specific.

Objection to the admissibility of evidence, to have weight and merit attention, must be specific.

3. Evidence §366(11)—Judgment and execution not merely preliminary to sheriff's deed as evidence of transfer of title.

Judgment and execution are not merely preliminary, as technical items of foundation, to sheriff's deed as the final and real evidence of transfer of title.

4. Trial §75—Failure to object to admission of sheriff's deed waived production of evidence of judgment and execution basis thereof.

In action to quiet title, where sheriff's deed purporting to convey to one of plaintiffs was admitted, although there was no offer of any judgment or execution as a basis for the sale pursuant to which the deed was executed, failure to specifically object to the admission of the deed on that ground waived the production of evidence of judgment and execution.

5. Trial §75—On specific objection to offered evidence, objections not made are waived.

Where specific objection is made to offered evidence, all objections not made are waived.

6. Trial §75—Objection to admission of evidence waived at trial cannot be urged in motion for nonsuit.

Where, in an action to quiet title, a sheriff's deed was offered in evidence, and objection thereto that it was not preceded by proof of judgment and execution was not made, and such objection was thereby waived by the form of objection made, the waiver operated at once, and was not affected by presentation of such point in motion for nonsuit.

7. Trial §69—On motion for nonsuit, trial court may refuse to permit case to be reopened.

A motion for nonsuit does not necessarily allow plaintiff to reopen his case to supply missing evidence, as the trial court, in exercise of discretion, may refuse to permit it to be reopened.

8. Trial §105(4)—Production of preliminary evidence waived by failure to object to its absence.

Production of preliminary evidence before introduction of sheriff's deed is waived by failure to object to its absence.

9. Trial §84(3)—Objection to admission of sheriff's deed as not showing interest in corporation referred to therein held not good.

Where, in action to quiet title, plaintiffs introduced sheriff's deed as proof of title in themselves, without proof of judgment and execution authorizing it, and evidence showed that the corporation referred to in the deed had an interest in the property prior to execution, defendant's objection to its admission as showing no interest in the corporation was not good.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action to quiet title by L. V. Root and others against C. B. Conlin and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named and E. C. Eddie appeal. Affirmed.

Z. B. Stuart and J. W. Hocker, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action to quiet title to a group of mining claims, and to enjoin defendants from removing certain improvements, fixtures, and machinery therefrom. Decree went for plaintiffs, and two of the defendants appeal.

[1] The first point made by appellants is that the complaint is insufficient, in that it contains no allegation that respondents were entitled to the possession of the claims at the time of the commencement of the action. There is an averment in the pleading, "that the plaintiffs are now the owners of, and for a long time prior to the commencement of this action have been owners of, and entitled to the possession of," the property in suit. This allegation is equivalent to an allegation that plaintiffs were entitled to possession when the suit was begun, as the right to the possession of property follows as a matter of law from the ownership of it. Jones v. Peck (Cal. App.) 218 Pac. 1030.

The controlling point on the appeal is that next presented by appellants. The trial court admitted in evidence a sheriff's deed purporting to convey to one of respondents the mining claims in question in the suit, although there was no offer of any judgment or execution as a basis for the sale pursuant to which the deed was executed. The deed contained the usual recitals as to judgment and execution. The contention of appellants is that the court erred in admitting the deed without proof of judgment and execution. Respondents make reply that the point thus made cannot now advantage appellants for the reason that it was not presented by objection to the deed at the time it was offered in evidence. The only objection was:

"We object to the introduction of the deed; it purports to convey the interest of a corporation in a certain mining claim; until they go back and show that interest it does not convey any title at all; they cannot build up a title on a sheriff's deed, except on a showing that the party whose interest purports to have been sold had some title."

There is no doubt that the point which appellants now make would have been good if it had been urged as an objection to the admissibility of the deed, and that respondents, upon such an objection being pressed, would have been driven to offer a judgment and execution for the purpose of showing the authority of the sheriff to sell and convey. The cases upon this particular point are numerous. The question now to be considered, however, is whether the point made by appellants was waived by the failure to include it in the objection to the admission of the deed in evidence.

[2] It has long been the rule in this state, as well as elsewhere, that objections to the admissibility of evidence, in order to have weight and to merit attention, must be specific. It was said in Brumley v. Flint, 87 Cal. 471, 25 Pac. 683:

"The general rule is, that 'a party objecting to the admission of evidence must specify the ground of his objection when the evidence is offered, and will be considered as having waived all objections not so specified.' People v. Manning, 48 Cal. 338. It is true that a general objection is sufficient, if the evidence objected to is absolutely inadmissible for any purpose. Nightingale v. Scannell, 18 Cal. 315. But otherwise, to entitle the objection to notice, 'the party should have laid his finger on the point at the time.' Martin v. Travers, 12 Cal. 243; Cochran v. O'Keefe, 34 Cal. 558."

Stress has been laid upon this point in a great number of other cases, many of which will be found cited below in support of cognate or attendant propositions of law.

The mere statement of the rule just enunciated would seem to settle the question now before us. The point, however, is not to be solved so easily. It has been said in many cases that the rule that objections are waived which are not specifically made can be applied only to objections relating strictly to the admissibility of evidence, and can have no reference to its evidentiary value after its admission. In other words, it has been said that the absence of a given foundation for admitted evidence will not be waived if the missing foundation affects the evidentiary value of that which is admitted. Among the cases closely touching this rule are Hulick v. Scovil, 4 Gilman (Ill.) 159; Lowe v. Bliss, 24 Ill. 168, 76 Am. Dec. 742; Bartlett v. O'Donoghue, 72 Mo. 563; Pettis County v. Gibson, 73 Mo. 502; State v. Kaufman, 45 Mo. App. 656. Without attempting to dissect these cases we shall now take up the labor of determining whether the general rule announced by them has an application to the specific question confronting us here. Before we begin that work it is to be noted, to come nearer home, that the rule mentioned is announced in Roberts v. Chan Tin Pen, 23 Cal. 259, and has received a passing notice in Palmer v. Guaranty T. & S. Bank, 45 Cal. App. 572, 188 Pac. 302.

[3] It will conduce to a settlement of the question now presented if we pay some attention to the relationship under the law between a judgment and an execution on the one hand, and the sheriff's deed which follows them in a given instance on the other. Under the California cases it is conclusively established that judgment and execution are not merely preliminary, as technical items of foundation, to the sheriff's deed as the final and real evidence of transfer of title:

"The claim of title by the defendant, by virtue of a sheriff's deed, is insufficient, without showing the judgment which authorized the sale. By the most accepted authorities the judgment is a muniment of title, and for sound reasons it is the safest rule." Sullivan v. Davis, 4 Cal. 291.

"The rule undoubtedly is that, when one seeks to obtain or hold possession of real property under a sheriff's deed, he must prove the judgment and execution under which the sheriff acted in making the sale. * * * The title of the purchaser in such a case rests upon the judgment, execution, sale, and deed." Peterson v. Weissbein, 75 Cal. 174, 16 Pac. 769.

Among the many other cases touching this question more or less directly are Hibberd v. Smith, 1 Cal. Unrep. 554; Kelley v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 517. While, however, judgment and execution are muniments of title, they are not so in the sense in which the sheriff's deed itself occupies a place in that classification. Judgment and execution are muniments of title of the same class with powers of attorney in those instances in which a deed in a chain of title is executed by an attorney in fact for his principal. The sheriff's deed conveys the title, while the judgment and execution constitute the sheriff's authority to convey.

"The judgment and execution go to the sheriff's power to sell, and to his power to recite a sale, and to his power to give a deed also. * * * Hihn v. Peck, 30 Cal. 280.

"The sheriff in making the sale acts under a naked statutory power, dependent for its existence upon the existence of the judgment which he is attempting to execute, and if there is no judgment in support of the writ of execution, under which he makes the sale, the power to make the sale is wanting. * * * "The sheriff, in making sale of property under process of the court, acts under a power, and if the power does not exist, no title passes, even to an innocent purchaser. * * * " Bullard v. McArdle, 98 Cal. 355, 33 Pac. 193, 35 Am. St. Rep. 176.

It is apparent from these quotations that it is not going afield to assert that in legal effect the judgment and execution together may be likened to a power of attorney authorizing the sheriff to make a sale and to execute a conveyance. With this idea in mind, then, and reverting to one of the rules of law above stated, it is difficult to perceive in the present instance why, if the sheriff's deed was admissible because of the failure specifically to object that no showing of judgment and execution preceded the offer of the instrument, it did not possess full evidentiary value. The deed was in form perfect. Within itself it was an impeccable transfer of title. We do not see, even under the rule which apparently stands to some extent in the way of an easy solution of the question before us, why proof of the sheriff's authority could not be waived, nor why, under all the circumstances of the present case, it was not actually waived. A comparison of the facts here present with those of the cases announcing what we have called the interfering rule will demonstrate that it is different from them.

[4] A consideration of several lines of argument will enable us finally to assert with confidence that appellants waived the production of evidence of judgment and execution. We pursue further the idea that judgment and execution are in effect a power of attorney authorizing a sheriff to convey. In a certain case a deed, executed jointly, under an order of court, by an assignee in bankruptcy and a trustee under a deed of trust, was received in evidence in the trial court without proof of the order. The higher court said, on appeal:

"The objection to the deed was that it was 'incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, because it is not shown that the parties had any power to make the deed.' The deed recites that it was sold under an order of the court in bankruptcy and under the provisions of the deed of trust. It also recites that the sale was approved by the court. There was no objection on the ground that the orders of the court were not shown in evidence. We hold that the objection was properly overruled." Stone v. Kansas City & W. B. Ry. Co., 261 Mo. 61, 169 S. W. 88.

Considering judgment and execution as equivalent to a power of attorney authorizing a sheriff to convey, we are furnished with an analogy even closer than that provided by the case just cited, in the text of a standard commentary. The italics are in the original:

"When the opponent fails to object to the admission of the document, this is, of course, on general principles * * * a waiver as to the need of any evidence authenticating its genuineness; and this waiver is commonly held to extend to the fact of authority of an agent purporting to sign the document for a principal, but not as to the legal sufficiency of the instrument for any purpose." Wigmore, Ev. § 2132.

It is plain that in this last statement, that concerning "the legal sufficiency of the instrument," the learned author has in mind the sufficiency of the admitted instrument within itself. It is only upon such a view that force may be given to his language as a whole. The utterance clearly means that evidence of the authority of the agent is waived by a failure to object that the authority is not shown. The text of this commentator is supported by McClung v. McPherson, 47 Or. 73, 81 Pac. 567, 82 Pac. 13, and by several illuminating cases cited in the second opinion in that cause rendered.

If we still keep in mind the apparently just view that judgment and execution are analogous to a power of attorney to the sheriff to perform the actual function of making conveyance, we may cite in abundance decisions of the Supreme Court of this state which support the view that appellants waived the production of evidence of judgment and execution. See People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; Gardiner v. Schmaelzle, 47 Cal. 588; Crocker v. Carpenter, 98 Cal. 418, 33 Pac. 271; Colton L. & W. Co. v. Swartz, 99 Cal. 278, 33

Pac. 878; People v. Owens, 123 Cal. 482, 56 Pac. 251; Bundy v. Sierra Lumber Co., 149 Cal. 772, 87 Pac. 622. In making application of these cases to the present one it is to be observed that in each of them the objection made was merely general—that the offered evidence was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, or the like. In no one of them was a special objection of any nature interposed. Here the objection was of such a character as to furnish even a firmer ground for the application of the doctrine of waiver than is evident in those cases. The objection was that no title had been shown in the corporation whose property was sought to be conveyed by the sheriff's deed. This objection was not only specific, but it was of a nature similar to that other objection which appellants might have made but which they did not make, at least to the extent that the two would most naturally have gone hand in hand. The sheriff's deed recited the fact that judgment had been rendered against the corporation in an action in which certain named persons were parties. The court by which the judgment was rendered was named, the date of the judgment was given, and the fact that execution had issued upon the judgment was recited. The date upon which execution had issued was also set forth. With this information before them, appellants, in limiting their objection to the point that title in the corporation had not been shown, in effect said: "We have no objection on any other ground. We concede the authority of the sheriff to execute the deed." That this was the result of the objection made is apparent when we remember the ground upon which is rested the principle that one waives the production of evidence, preliminary to offered evidence, by a failure to object that the preliminary evidence has not been produced. It is said in several of the opinions in the cases last above cited that objections to offered evidence must be specific, to the end that missing links in the chain of evidence may be supplied and cases be tried on their merits. Other cases announcing this rule are Owen v. Frink, 24 Cal. 171; Mayo v. Mazeaux, 38 Cal. 442; McKay v. Riley, 65 Cal. 623, 4 Pac. 667; Eversdon v. Mayhew, 85 Cal. 1, 21 Pac. 431, 24 Pac. 382; Howland v. Oakland C. St. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 513, 42 Pac. 983; Starkweather v. Dawson, 14 Cal. App. 666, 112 Pac. 736. A perusal of the opinions in all these cases will convince that such a waiver as we here have under consideration arises upon principles akin to those of estoppel. The present case furnishes an excellent example for the application of those principles. If objection had been made that proof of judgment and execution was lacking, that proof doubtless would have been produced. That it was not produced was doubtless owing to the form of the objection which was actually made. At any rate, appellants cannot be heard to say that their objection did not so result.

[5] In view of what is said in the preceding paragraph, and notwithstanding the manner in which we have closed it, we may appropriately cite authority for the proposition of law that, where specific objections are made to offered evidence, all objections not made are waived. Jones, Ev. § 894; Triggs v. Jones, 46 Minn. 277, 48 N. W. 1113; Bailey v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 3 S. D. 531, 54 N. W. 596.

[6-8] Appellants made a motion for nonsuit at the trial upon the ground that the offer of the sheriff's deed had not been preceded by proof of judgment and execution, and the motion was denied. It is claimed that this ruling was error, but it is our opinion, for the reasons already stated, that the point was made too late on motion for nonsuit. If the objection which was not made was waived by the form of the objection which was made, the waiver operated at once, and it was not affected by the presentation of the point on motion for nonsuit. This conclusion seems obvious. It finds support, however, in Birney v. Haim, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 262; Starkweather v. Dawson, 14 Cal. App. 666, 112 Pac. 736. It is to be observed, also, that the presentation of such a ground on motion for nonsuit does not necessarily allow a plaintiff the right to a reopening of his case in order to supply missing evidence, as a trial court may, in the exercise of a sound discretion, refuse to permit a case to be reopened on such a motion. See San Pedro Lumber Co. v. Schroeter, 156 Cal. 158, 103 Pac. 888. We are prompted to this remark upon consideration of the rule already stated, that the production of preliminary evidence is waived by a failure to object to its absence, for the reason that, if objection were made, the evidence would naturally be forthcoming.

[9] It is insisted that the objection to the sheriff's deed actually made at the trial was good. We think it was not good. There was evidence to show that the corporation referred to in the deed had an interest in the claims prior to the execution of the instrument, and there are admissions to the same effect in appellants' briefs.

Other points are made by appellants, but they are all either concluded by our disposition of what we have characterized as the controlling question in the case, or they do not merit a separate consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

RYAN v. RILEY, State Controller.
(Civ. 2743.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 7, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 6, 1924.)

1. States ⇨131—Appropriation must be definite and certain.

Where an appropriation is made by the Legislature and the money is to be paid out of the general fund, the appropriation must be specific both as to purpose and amount.

2. States ⇨131—Motor Vehicle Act held to properly make appropriation for payment of traffic officers.

The Motor Vehicle Act sufficiently makes appropriation out of fund created by the act for payment of traffic officers under section 30.

3. States ⇨131—Motor Vehicle Act held not to make appropriation for more than single purpose.

The Motor Vehicle Act, providing for payment of inspectors and traffic officers out of fund created thereby, does not contravene Const. art. 4, § 34, providing that no bill making an appropriation of money shall contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for a single and certain purpose to be therein expressed; all moneys appropriated or referred to in the act having to do with the highways of the state and the regulation of traffic thereon.

4. Highways ⇨93—Act providing for appointment of traffic officers to act in particular counties held valid.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 30, is not unconstitutional because it permits the appointment of traffic officers, who are state officers, to act in particular counties.

5. Constitutional law ⇨62—Motor Vehicle Act, § 30, held not an unwarranted delegation of legislative power.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 30, in providing for the appointment of such number of traffic officers as the chief of the motor vehicle division may deem necessary, and the fixing of the salaries thereof by the boards of supervisors of the various counties in connection with the chief of the motor vehicle department, and in further providing that the amount of the salary shall be fixed by contract, held not an unwarranted delegation of legislative power, and so violative of Const. art. 3, § 1.

6. Officers ⇨3—No particular language necessary for creation of office.

No particular language is necessary for the creation of an office; it being sufficient if the intent of the Legislature is so manifested by the language used.

7. Highways ⇨93—Motor Vehicle Act giving power to appoint traffic officers held not void for failure to specify number.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 30, empowering the chief of the motor vehicle division to appoint such number of traffic officers as he may deem necessary, is not void because it does not limit or specify the number of traffic officers to be appointed.

8. Statutes ⇨212—Presumed Legislature adopted language used in view of prior construction.

It must be presumed that the Legislature in using language which had received judicial construction adopted the language in view of such judicial construction.

9. Statutes ⇨73(2)—Motor Vehicle Act held not void as not being uniform in its operation.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 30, relating to appointment of inspectors and traffic officers by the chief of the division of motor vehicles, is not void as not being uniform in its operation, though whether it shall be put into effect in all the counties of the state is discretionary with the chief of the motor vehicle department.

10. Counties ⇨160—Payment of traffic officers held not unlawful interference with county funds.

Payment of traffic officers, appointed by the chief of the division of motor vehicles under Motor Vehicle Act, § 30, as state officers, is not an unlawful interference with county funds, in view of section 159 of such act; such officers being paid out of the money received by motor vehicle department as fees, etc.

11. States ⇨131—Motor Vehicle Act held not to violate constitutional provision as to budget.

The Motor Vehicle Act, in so far as it makes provision for the payment of inspectors and traffic officers and appropriation for salaries, is not violative of Const. art. 4, § 34, generally known as the budget amendment; the Motor Vehicle Act being passed and approved after the budget bill had been disposed of, since, when the budget bill has been disposed of, other appropriations may be considered, passed, and approved.

12. Constitutional law ⇨48—Construction given, if possible, which will uphold act.

Such construction shall be given as will uphold an act of the Legislature when such a construction may reasonably be given, and where a reasonable doubt exists as to the constitutional exercise of power, or where it does not clearly appear that any constitutional limitation has been transgressed.

Application for writ of mandate by T. M. Ryan prayed to be directed to Ray L. Riley, as State Controller of the State of California, to require him to draw a warrant for services as traffic officer. Writ granted.

Percy E. Towne and Peter A. Breen, both of San Francisco, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., amici curiæ, for petitioner.

Ralph W. Smith, of Sacramento, Wesley E. Marten, of San Francisco, and Louis B. Diavila, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On rehearing. This is an original petition seeking a writ of mandate directing and requiring the respondent as the state controller of the state of California to draw a warrant in favor of the petitioner in the sum of $175, alleged to be due him as salary for services rendered as a traffic officer in and for the county of Sacramento, appointed under the provisions of section 30 of the California Motor Vehicle Act, approved May 30, 1923 (St. 1923, p. 517).

The petition sets forth the various acts taken and performed by the chief of the motor vehicle department of the state of California and the board of supervisors of the county of Sacramento, from which it appears that the petitioner and the board of supervisors of said county entered into a contract providing for the payment to the petitioner of a monthly salary in the sum of $175 per month, and recommended the petitioner's appointment, as provided by said section; that said contract was also entered into by Will H. Marsh, as chief of the division of motor vehicles, and that, in accordance with the recommendation made by the board of supervisors of said county of Sacramento, the petitioner was appointed a traffic officer in and for the county of Sacramento by the said Will H. Marsh, chief of the division of motor vehicles of the state of California. Application was made by the said petitioner to the respondent for the issuance of the warrant herein referred to, which was refused by the respondent on the ground that the provisions of section 30 of the Motor Vehicle Act are unconstitutional. Section 30 of the Motor Vehicle Act contains the following provisions:

"The chief of the division of motor vehicles is hereby authorized to appoint all necessary state inspectors at large and in addition thereto a sufficient number of state inspectors and traffic officers to enforce the provisions of this act in each of the counties of the state and all inspectors and traffic officers appointed as provided herein are hereby vested with the authority of peace officers for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act.

"Boards of supervisors in their respective counties and the chief of the division of motor vehicles are hereby authorized to enter into contracts providing for the appointment by the chief of the division of a sufficient number of inspectors and traffic officers to serve in such counties respectively and providing for the amount of their compensation.

"Boards of supervisors in their respective counties may submit to the chief of the division a list of names of proposed traffic officers from which list the chief of the division may in his discretion make such appointments.

"The compensation of such inspectors and traffic officers appointed to serve in any particular county shall be paid by the state out of that portion of the net receipts of the motor vehicle fund which such county is entitled to receive under the provisions of this act."

Subdivision 5 of said section 30 exempts inspectors and traffic officers from the various provisions of the act creating the civil service commission of the state of California.

By section 159 of the same act, a fund is created in the state treasury to be known as the "Motor Vehicle Fund." It is in that section provided that the state treasurer shall deposit all moneys received by him from the division, or under the provisions of this act, into the motor vehicle fund. Subdivision (b) of section 159 of the act is as follows:

"There is hereby appropriated out of such fund all moneys received as operators' license fees, and chauffeurs' license fees and duplicate operators' and chauffeurs' license fees and in addition thereto such portion of the remainder of such motor vehicle fund not exceeding in any registration year twenty per cent. thereof as may be necessary for the maintenance of the division of motor vehicles to be expended by the division in carrying out the provisions of this act. * * * The balance of said fund after the expenditure of so much as may be permitted by this act for the support of the division of motor vehicles shall be known as the 'net receipts' and shall be devoted to the purposes and in the manner herein specified."

Subdivision (c) of said section 159, so far as involved in this proceeding, reads as follows:

"One-half of such 'net receipts' is hereby appropriated and shall be paid from the motor vehicle fund to the counties of this state in proportion to the number of vehicles registered in such counties as determined by the places of residence of the owners to whom the registration certificates are issued; provided, that there shall be deducted from the amount to be paid hereunder to any county all amounts that may have been expended under the provisions of this act during the preceding six months to pay the compensation of state inspectors and traffic officers appointed to serve in such county. * * *

Subdivision (e) of section 159 of said act requires that the state controller shall in the months of February and August of each year draw his warrants upon the motor vehicle fund in favor of the county treasurer of each county for the amount to which said county is entitled, etc.

Eight different reasons are assigned by the respondent why the provisions of section 30 of the Motor Vehicle Act are void, and therefore why the petitioner is not entitled to a warrant drawn against any of the motor vehicle funds now in the state treasury. These reasons are as follows: (1) The controller has no means of knowing if funds are available for payment of the petitioner's claim under the contract. (2) The controller is not authorized to draw his warrant except upon an appropriation made by the Legislature. The "California Vehicle Act" makes no appropriation for the payment of traffic officers. (3) There is more than one item of appropriation contained in the "California Vehicle Act." (4) Traffic officers appointed to act in the various counties are state officers. (5) The Legislature cannot delegate to the chief of the motor vehicle division and the board of county supervisors the power to fix salaries of, and create offices of, state traffic officers in the various counties. (6) The "California Vehicle Act" is not uniform in its operation. (7) The payment of traffic officers under the "California Vehicle Act" is an unlawful interference with county funds. (8) The Budget Act of the Legislature of 1923 makes no provision for the payment of inspectors or traffic officers.

Owing to the fact that it was admitted upon argument herein that there are sufficient funds in the hands of the controller available for meeting the demands of the petitioner herein, if otherwise valid, objection No. (1) need not be further considered.

Section 22, article 4, of the state Constitution reads: "No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriation made by law, and upon warrants duly drawn thereon by the controller," and subdivision 17, section 433, of the Political Code, also specifies: That "no warrant must be drawn unless authorized by law, and upon an unexhausted specific appropriation provided by law to meet the same." Does the Motor Vehicle Act make an appropriation for the payment of traffic officers under the provisions just quoted? The definition of an appropriation given in Ingram v. Colgan, 106 Cal. 117, 38 Pac. 315, 39 Pac. 437, 28 L. R. A. 187, 46 Am. St. Rep. 221, appears to be the one adopted by all the cases having to do with this question, to wit, "to an appropriation within the meaning of the Constitution nothing more is requisite than a designation of the amount and the fund out of which it shall be paid."

[1] There must be a setting apart from the public revenues of a certain sum of money for a specified object in such manner that the executive officers are authorized to use that money and no more for such specified purposes. In applying this principle in the various cases defining the word "appropriation," and the cases based upon the different acts of the Legislature in making appropriations, there must be kept in mind the distinction made between the setting aside of revenues derived from a particular source to be used for a particular purpose, and moneys ordinarily intended to be paid out of the general funds of the state. Where the appropriation is made by the Legislature and the money is to be paid out of the general fund, there seems to be no conflict in the cases, and the appropriation must be specific both as to purpose and amount; neither of these requisites can be left indefinite nor uncertain. This is shown by the principal case cited by respondent and relied upon by the Supreme Court of this state and many other courts, to wit, the case of Ristine v. State of Indiana, 20 Ind. 328.

The Ristine Case makes the distinction which we have above indicated. It is there said:

"An appropriation may be made in different modes. It may be made by an act setting apart and specially appropriating the money derived from a particular source of revenue to a particular purpose. Our swamp land act is of this character."

Section 26 of the Swamp Land Act of Indiana (1 Gavin & Hord 1870, p. 602) reads:

"The amount of money paid into the office of the treasurer of state, from the different counties, for the sale of swamp lands, shall constitute a special fund for the following purposes, and for no other, to wit: First. To pay the expenses of the selection thereof under the act of Congress donating them, as ascertained by law. Second. To pay the expenses of preparing maps and plats thereof, the expense of the sale thereof, and all other expenses necessarily incurred in the sale thereof. Third. To pay the commissioners and engineers for their services, as hereinafter provided. Fourth. To pay for the expenses of reclaiming by ditching, dyking, or other necessary and proper means [in so reclaiming] the said swamp lands."

In Lange v. Stover, 19 Ind. 175, the Supreme Court of Indiana, in passing upon the sufficiency of the act just quoted to constitute an appropriation, said:

"We think the statutes on the subject of swamp lands make an ample appropriation of the swamp land fund to the payment of legitimate claims against that fund. * * * The auditor is authorized to draw his warrant, in a proper case, upon these funds, and no other or further appropriation is necessary than is found in the statutes above referred to."

The same ruling is found in Dodd v. Miller, 14 Ind. 433. In that case, however, it was found that the fund was exhausted, and for that reason the writ of mandate prayed for was denied.

In Blaine County Inv. Co. v. Gallet, 35 Idaho, 102, 204 Pac. 1066, the Supreme Court of Idaho, in passing upon the validity of an attempted appropriation, refers to this distinction and also as to the intent of the Legislature in making an appropriation of the entire general fund, and where it is clear that the entire general fund is not appropriated or intended to be appropriated then and in that case there must be the specific designation and limitation set forth in the case of Ingram v. Colgan, supra, and also in Ristine v. State, supra, and other cases following the same rule as to what constitutes an appropriation.

[2] Referring to subdivision (b) of section 159 of the Motor Vehicle Act of this state, it will be observed that the Legislature, after having created a motor vehicle fund in subdivision (a), explicitly appropriates out of such fund all moneys received from certain specified sources to be applied toward paying the expenses of maintaining the motor vehicle department and the expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, and after deducting such expenses the balance of said fund shall constitute what is known as net receipts, and by subdivision (c) of the same section one-half of such net receipts is appropriated to the counties in proportion to the number of motor vehicles registered, less whatever sum has been paid out as salary or compensation to traffic officers and inspectors. If the act is otherwise valid, we think this would amount to an appropriation of the entire one-half of the net receipts for the payment of traffic officers and inspectors, if in the exercise of his discretion the chief of the motor vehicle department saw fit to expend such sum or sums. Were the various items of money to be paid out of the general fund, we think the objection urged by respondent would be good, but, as against a special fund created by the Legislature for a special purpose and derived from a special source, we think the exception pointed out in the Ristine Case is an exception to the general rule, and is applicable to the case at bar.

[3] As we read the Motor Vehicle Act, we do not find anything therein contravening section 34 of article 4 of the Constitution, which provides as follows:

"No bill making an appropriation of money, except the budget bill, shall contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for one single and certain purpose to be therein expressed."

There is but one general purpose sought to be accomplished by the Motor Vehicle Act, i. e., the regulation of traffic upon the public highways of the state, and the appropriation of moneys contained in the Motor Vehicle Act is simply a designation of funds to be used in maintaining the different branches of the motor vehicle department and furthering the purposes intended to be secured or obtained in the adoption of the motor vehicle law. All the officers referred to in the Motor Vehicle Act are intended to be and we think may reasonably be denominated members of the general staff or corps making up the motor vehicle department in charge of one person denominated the chief of the motor vehicle department.

It is also to be noted in this connection that the funds dealt with by the motor vehicle law are special funds arising from the use of the highways by the people of the state, and are not derived by general taxation or from general sources, and that the remainder of the funds so specially raised, after paying expenses of providing for safeguarding the highways, are to be used in connection with the maintenance of the same. In other words, all moneys appropriated or referred to in the Motor Vehicle Act have to do with the highways of the state and the regulation of traffic thereon.

[4] That the traffic officers contemplated to be appointed under the provisions of section 30 of the Motor Vehicle Act are state officers may be admitted, but this fact does not appear to us to involve any constitutional question, even though the officer was appointed for and required by his appointment to perform his duties in a particular county. It may also be admitted that traffic officers come under the definition of what is known as public officers as distinguished from mere employees. We find no constitutional provision bearing upon this particular question, and hence there is no reason to conclude that the power of the Legislature to make provision for such officers is in any wise limited. Objection No. (4), therefore, seems to us devoid of merit.

[5-8] Objection No. (5), to wit, "that the Legislature cannot delegate to the chief of the motor vehicle division and the board of county supervisors the power to fix salaries of, and create offices of, state traffic officers in the various counties," is one that has given us much concern, and which has caused us to give further consideration to the questions presented by the petition for a writ of mandate herein.

Section 1 of article 3 of the state Constitution provides:

"The powers of the government of the state of California shall be divided into three separate departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial; and no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the other, except as in this Constitution expressly directed or permitted."

Section 4 of article 20 of the Constitution reads:

"All officers or commissioners whose election or appointment is not provided for by this Constitution, and all officers or commissioners whose offices or duties may hereafter be created by law, shall be elected by the people, or appointed, as the Legislature may direct."

Under section 4 of article 20 of the Constitution, the offices being statutory and not constitutional, if the office of traffic officers is in fact created by the act of the Legislature and the other requirements complied with, the fact that the appointment is in and of itself left with the chief of the motor vehicle department or with the chief of the motor vehicle department and the board of supervisors of any particular county, would not in and of itself be an unwarranted delegation of legislative power. The language of section 4 of article 20 expressly contemplates that the election or the appointment of such officers may be made just as the Legislature may direct. In other words, the Legislature might have directed the appointment to be made by the chief of the motor vehicle department or by the boards of supervisors of the respective counties without in any way contravening the provisions of the section just referred to. The manner of appointment is purely optional with the Legislature. Does the first subdivision of section 30 of the Motor Vehicle Act create the office of traffic officer? It reads as follows:

"The chief of the division of motor vehicles is hereby authorized to appoint all necessary state inspectors at large and in addition thereto a sufficient number of state inspectors and traffic officers to enforce the provisions of this act in each of the counties of the state," etc.

Upon first impression it might appear questionable as to whether any such office was in fact created, but upon further consideration and investigation it seems clear that the language used conveys the intent as well as embodies the intent of the Legislature to call into existence such an office, notwithstanding the fact that the functions of that office are to be gathered only from the general terms of the section, to wit, to enforce the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, and that the number of persons exercising the functions of such office or to exercise the same is not specifically set forth. In other words, it is an office with functions to be performed by one or more persons, so that the question of vacancy or unoccupied position does not enter into the question of determining the existence or nonexistence of the office.

The language used is almost identical with that which occurs in the provisions of the statutes and the codes having to do with many of the other departments of the state government, such as prison directors, fish and game commissioners, lunacy commission, directors of industrial homes, board of directors of California schools for deaf, dumb, and blind, board of pilot commissioners, etc.

No particular language appears to be necessary for the creation of an office. It is sufficient if the intent of the Legislature is so manifested by the language used. Childs v. State, 4 Okl. Cr. 474, 113 Pac. 545, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 563. That the language used in the first subdivision of section 30 of the Motor Vehicle Act sufficiently manifests the intent of the Legislature to create the office of traffic officer is supported by the case of Scott v. Boyle, 164 Cal. 321, 128 Pac. 941, where an act of the Legislature approved March 18, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 383), was held sufficient to create the position of sealer of weights and measures. Section 4 of that act reads as follows:

"The respective counties, incorporated cities, incorporated towns and incorporated cities and counties of the state are hereby authorized to appoint sealers of weights and measures."

Further illustrations might be given, but we deem the foregoing sufficient.

The number of officers to fill the office or to exercise the functions thereof is not designated, and no compensation or salary is fixed by the Legislature. The necessity for the appointment of a person or persons to be designated as such officer or officers and the number for each county are left to the discretion of the chief of the motor vehicle department. The amount of the salary to be paid or the compensation to be awarded is left to the boards of supervisors and the chief of the motor vehicle division, and is to be ascertained by contracting with the person or persons to be appointed to exercise the function of traffic officer. Do the various provisions of section 30 of the Motor Vehicle Act, in providing for the appointment of such number of traffic officers as the chief of the motor vehicle division may deem necessary, and the fixing of the salaries thereof by the boards of supervisors of the various counties in connection with the chief of the motor vehicle department, and further providing that the amount of the salary shall be fixed by contract, constitute an unwarranted delegation of legislative power, and so violative of section 1 of article 3 of the Constitution heretofore referred to?

It is not difficult to quote general definitions as to powers which may be exercised by the respective departments of the state government, but to make application of such definitions under the constantly changing conditions as they are presented from day to day, and so apply the language of the Constitution as not to hinder such development, and yet give true expression to the fundamental law as expressed in the Constitution adopted by the people, is not always easy or free from uncertainty. The language of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in the case of Appointment of a Revisor, as reported in 141 Wis. 597, 124 N. W. 671, 18 Ann. Cas. page 1177, expressed clearly the idea we have in mind:

"It is easy to give general definitions of the three great governmental powers. The legislative power is the power which makes the laws; the executive, the power which enforces them; and the judicial, the power which expounds and applies them. Would that it were as easy to apply these general definitions to a concrete case! It is familiar to all who have considered the subject at all that between these several powers, which seem so distinct in their general character, there are great borderlands of power which may be said to approach nearer and nearer until they merge gradually into each other. In these borderlands it is often difficult to tell where one power ends and the other begins. This was not so marked a condition in earlier and simpler conditions of society as it is to-day. With the development of the complex conditions of modern civilization there have come governmental necessities undreamed of by our fathers. Fifty years ago there was no necessity for that new and remarkable governmental agency known as the 'commission,' while now it fills a wonderful and increasingly important place in our governmental scheme. Though not named in the Constitutions and not dreamed of by their makers, the commissions which regulate and control public utilities of the states and the nation are to-day wielding powers scarce second to the powers of either of the three original departments of the government. Though they are truly executive agencies and have neither legislative nor judicial powers, they are daily doing many things which vitally affect the life, liberty, and happiness of the people, and in doing these acts they are exercising powers trenching closely on the judicial and the legislative. In effect they decide real controversies like courts, and they daily coerce vast interests by regulations which fifty years ago would have been thought to be nothing short of legislation; yet in the exercise of these powers they have been almost universally sustained. This does not mean that the distinction between legislative, executive, and judicial functions has passed away, or that the constitutional division of powers is worn out, but simply that as matter of fact it is impossible to say at any given place: Here is a line where legislative power ends and judicial power begins; all on one side of this line is legislative and all on the other side is judicial, and no single power can be both. Each department has exclusive functions which no other department can perform, but this does not mean that there may not be functions common to all the departments. It is the exclusive function of the Legislature to make laws, and it is the exclusive function of the courts to expound the laws; but the power of neither department is exhausted by the performance of such exclusive function. There are many other governmental operations and duties not properly to be classified under either head, nor exclusively executive in their character, and which may be performed by inferior officers or agents in aid of the functions of either great department.

"Appointment to office, while generally called an executive function, cannot under our Constitution be classed as exclusively a function of either of the three great departments."

It will be noted that section 4 of article 20 of the Constitution is silent upon the subject of the manner in which the salaries of the officers provided to be appointed in accordance with that section shall be fixed. In other words, it contains no words of limitation or prohibition, and therefore under the ordinary rules of construction leaves the matter entirely with the Legislature. There are no limitations or specifications as found in the section of the Constitution having to do with the fixing of salaries of county officers wherein it is distinctly provided that the Legislature must fix the same according to duties to be performed.

It is generally held in those states where there is no constitutional provision setting forth the manner or the mode of fixing the salaries of county officers that such matters may be properly delegated to local authorities. In 12 C. J. 859, we find the general rule stated as follows:

"In general, statutes authorizing local authorities to fix the salaries of local officers are valid; as, for example, a statute authorizing the board of county commissioners to regulate the fees of justices of the peace in certain cases, and to fix the salaries of county officers; a statute authorizing police commissioners to fix the salaries of policemen; a statute authorizing a district or county court to fix the salary of the county attorney, or deputies or assistants of the court; and it has even been held that municipal corporations may be authorized to fix the salaries of certain county officers whose duties are performed within such corporations. But when the Constitution provides that the compensation of certain local officers shall be regulated by general and uniform legislative acts, a board of supervisors cannot be empowered by the Legislature to change or to suspend the provisions of such an act in relation to a particular officer. Nor can the Legislature delegate the power of determining such compensation to county commissioners."

A distinction is also made between the delegation of a power which may be rightfully exercised by the Legislature and one which must be exercised by the Legislature. In the former it has been held that such delegation is largely discretionary, while in the latter that such delegation is not permissible. In other words, what the Constitution provides that the Legislature itself must do cannot be delegated to some other person or body of persons. The rule as to power of appointment is set forth in 29 Cyc. 1369 in these words:

"It is one of the principles of the law of the United States that, in the absence of a constitutional provision to the contrary, any one of the three departments of the government may, under the authority of a statute, appoint its own subordinates. Although there is some conflict, the better rule would seem to be that in the absence of some constitutional provision the power to appoint may also, if the statutes of the legislature so provide, be exercised for any class of officers by any of the three governmental departments."

And on the question of compensation in the same volume, page 1426, it is said:

"The amount of compensation is, in the absence of other provision, to be fixed by the Legislature which may, however, delegate its power, and which of course must observe all constitutional limitations. A common limitation is that the compensation of officers must be fixed by general law. Where the provision of law fixing the compensation is not clear, it should be given the construction most favorable to the government."

There being no language used in section 4 of article 20 of the Constitution limiting the power of the Legislature to provide the manner in which the compensation of traffic officers may be fixed, we conclude that such matter was left within and lies within the discretion of the Legislature to be determined in such mode and manner as it may see fit and prescribe. In State v. Turner, 37 N. D. 635, 164 N. W. 924, the Supreme Court of North Dakota, having under consideration an act known as the Uniform State Grading Act of that state (Laws 1917, p. 388), providing for the appointment of inspectors and for the fixing of salaries thereof, disposed of this question as follows:

"The only power that is delegated is the power to fix salaries and to determine the number of inspectors, etc. It is true that no limit is placed on the cost of the upkeep of the buildings where scales are kept, but this, of course, must be reasonable, and all of the expense must be within the limit of the sum total of the fees collected. If such a statute is unconstitutional, then all statutes are unconstitutional which create boards of trustees of our state university, agricultural college, or normal schools, and other schools and public institutions."

The objection which we have denominated No. (5) raises the further question that the section is void because it does not limit or specify the number of traffic officers to be appointed. In this particular the act is very similar to the several acts creating the various departments and institutions to which we have referred. The language of subdivision 1, section 642 of the Political Code relating to the duties of fish and game commissioners is very similar. That subdivision reads as follows: "To see that the laws for the protection and preservation of" fish and game "are strictly enforced, and for that purpose they may, from time to time, employ such assistants as they shall consider necessary, which persons so appointed as assistants shall be public officers and shall have all the powers and authority of sheriffs and other peace officers to make arrests for violations of such laws and to serve all processes and notices, throughout the state." A number of acts creating the different boards and commissions provided for the appointment of secretaries, clerks, and assistants without specifying the number or fixing the amount of the compensation to be allowed the persons so appointed. It is suggested that most of these persons denominated officers, etc., are in reality only employees. This may be true in many instances, but wherever such person, whether called an employee or an officer, exercises a part or portion howsoever small of the sovereignty of the state, such as the power to make arrest, then and in that case he is a public officer, whether called an employee or an officer under the statute providing for his appointment. By reference to subdivision 1 of section 642 of the Political Code, which we have just quoted, it will be seen that the persons whose appointments are therein provided for are not only denominated public officers, but are invested with the exercise of a part of the general sovereignty of the people of the state of California, to wit, the power to make arrest. This is true of the persons employed as guards at the state prison and other public institutions, the safeguarding of which necessitates investing such employees or officers with the power to make arrest. Nor is the language used in the first subdivision of section 30 such as to give unlimited power to the chief of the motor vehicle department in the appointment of traffic officers. The reading of that subdivision in this particular is:

"Appoint all necessary state inspectors at large and in addition thereto a sufficient number of state inspectors and traffic officers to enforce the provisions of this act, * * * and all inspectors and traffic officers appointed as provided herein are hereby vested with the authority of peace officers. * * *"

While this language would ordinarily appear to give unlimited authority as to the number of traffic officers to be appointed, this language has received judicial construction, and, following the usual course of reasoning in such cases, it must be presumed that the Legislature adopted the language used in the act in view of the construction theretofore given it by the courts. In Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 589, 185 Pac. 855, 8 A. L. R. 418, in dealing with the power to license realty brokers, etc., where the language used is practically the same as above quoted, the Supreme Court says:

"Another * * * objection is that the act is invalid because it gives the commissioner arbitrary power to determine who may have a license, and therefore who may lawfully engage in the real estate business. If such arbitrary power were in fact conferred by the act, it may well be that the objection would be good. But such power is not conferred either in the granting of licenses or in their revocation."

The objection to the act on this ground was held not well taken. In Tarpey v. McClure, 213 Pac. 983, the Supreme Court of this state affirms the case of Riley v. Chambers, and also construes the phrase "such as he may deem necessary" as follows:

"The provision in section 1 authorizing the state engineer to employ such engineers, attorneys, and other assistants as he may deem necessary, and to fix their compensation, does not contravene the rule in Farrell v. Board of Trustees, 85 Cal. 408, 24 Pac. 863, for two reasons: First, because the assistants here provided for are not officers, but mere employees; second, because the discretion as to the number to be employed is not unguided, as it was in the Farrell Case. The phrase 'such as he may deem necessary,' as here used, is precisely analogous to the provision under consideration in the case of Riley v. Chambers, supra, and which was there held not to confer arbitrary power. * * *"

In Scott v. Boyle, 164 Cal. 321, 128 Pac. 941, sections 4 and 5 of the act, approved March 18, 1911, were upheld. Section 4 provided for the appointment in the plural number, without stating the number, and section 5 provided that the appointing power "shall fix the compensation of such officer and may provide deputies for such officer and fix their compensation." The case of Scott v. Boyle also points out another distinction which is applicable, and differentiates it from acts applying to the ordinary political functions of counties and cities, and of many boards and commissions, to wit: The exercise of the general police power of the state which is involved in the enforcement of the laws adopted to protect the lives and property of persons using the highways. The several questions involved herein are referred to by the Supreme Court in that case as follows:

"It is further suggested that they are county officers, that section 5 of article 9 provides that the Legislature shall regulate the compensation of all such officers in proportion to duties, and, consequently, that it cannot delegate to the board of supervisors of the county or city and county the duty of fixing the salaries of such officers instead of doing so itself. It is true that the general principle is that, when the people by their Constitution impose an express duty of this kind on the Legislature, that body cannot, in general, delegate such duty to any subordinate body. Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601 (16 L. R. A. 161, 28 Pac. 834, 29 Pac. 1092). That case decided that said section 5 confided to the Legislature itself the duty to regulate and fix the compensation of county officers, and that it could not delegate this duty, or any part of it, to a county board of supervisors. We are of the opinion that the provision of that section requiring the Legislature to regulate the compensation of the officers referred to therein does not apply to offices created by the Legislature, under said section 14, to exercise a part of the police powers of the state which the provisions of the latter section, both in its original form and as amended, recognize as something distinct from the general political functions of counties and cities and the general scheme of county or municipal government.

"The act applies throughout the state to all the counties, cities, and municipalities thereof. It is therefore uniform in its operation. The fact that it does not make it compulsory upon the respective counties and municipalities to appoint such sealers does not render it lacking in the uniformity necessary to a compliance with section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution, nor make it a special law within the meaning of subdivisions 9, 28, and 29 of section 25 of article 4."

We come now to the consideration of the cases which, upon first reading, may very readily be held to prohibit the legislation with which we have been dealing by reason of the general language used therein, but which, upon closer inspection and further analysis, are distinguishable from and not decisive of the issues herein involved. The case of Farrell v. Board of Trustees, 85 Cal. 408, 24 Pac. 868, cited in argument, and referred to by many of the subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court, had to do with the attempted investing of the police commissioners of the city of Sacramento with the power to appoint policemen, not exceeding 30 in number, and consequently the construing of subdivision 28 of section 25 of article

4 of the Constitution, forbidding the Legislature to pass special laws creating offices, or prescribing the powers and duties of officers, in counties, cities, and counties, etc. In the decision of the Farrell Case, the case of Ford v. Board of Harbor Commissioners, 81 Cal. 19, 22 Pac. 278, was taken up and considered. In the Ford Case it was pointed out that three of the justices held that the power to create an office and to make appointment thereto could be delegated, and that two of the justices dissented therefrom. The question was then asked why is not the power to create an office a legislative power? It is not necessary to construe the language used as an attempted answer to this question. It is sufficient to say that the opinion does hold that where the Legislature has created the office it may vest the appointment thereto in such individual or officers as it may think proper. It was then held that the provisions of the Constitution to which we have referred were prohibitory of the power attempted to be delegated. Similar questions were before the Supreme Court of this state in the case of People v. Wheeler, 136 Cal. 652, 69 Pac. 435, and in Logan v. Shields, 214 Pac. 45. As the latter case refers to the former, and adopts its language, we quote from the latter case, to wit:

"In the case of People v. Wheeler, 136 Cal. 652, 69 Pac. 435, this court held that a county physician was not an officer within the meaning of the constitutional provision above quoted. [Referring to section 5 of article 2.] With reference to the question as to whether or not an office was created by the appointment of the county physician it was said:

"It may be added that if the act could be thus construed, it would be clearly unconstitutional. For the effect of the act would then be to delegate to the board of supervisors the power to create an indefinite number of public officers, with varying duties and compensation; which cannot be regarded as within the constitutional powers of the Legislature. "The Legislature cannot commit to the discretion of others the important function of creating public offices in unlimited or indefinite number." Ford v. Harbor Commissioners, 81 Cal. 37; Farrell v. Board of Trustees, 85 Cal. 415. Still more obviously would this be the case if the supposed office be regarded as a county office, as, "if an office at all," it should be. People v. Harrington, 63 Cal. 260. For with relation to county offices it is the constitutional duty of the Legislature, not only to provide for the election of the officers, but also to fix their terms of office, to prescribe their duties, and to regulate their salaries or compensation; and this duty could not be delegated to the board of supervisors or others. Const. art. 2, § 5."

In Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 Pac. 120, the court had under consideration a statute attempting to authorize the board of supervisors to employ a county engineer and fix his salary, and it was held that such delegation was beyond the power of the Legislature. The language used in the Wheeler Case, supra, and also in the case of Logan v. Shields, supra, indicates that the conferring of the power to appoint an officer delegated the power to create the office. The distinction between the two powers exists which we have pointed out, and, not being necessary to the decision of any of the cases to which we are now referring, was probably not called to the attention of the court, and no occasion therefor arose for drawing the line between the exercise of the two powers which we are here called upon to do. Again these cases have to do with the powers conferred and the limitations set forth in section 5 of article 11, relating particularly and explicitly to county officers. That section provides that the Legislature shall by general and uniform acts provide for the election or appointment of county officers, prescribe their duties, fix their terms of office, regulate their compensation, etc. Section 5 of article 11 is mandatory in its terms as to what the Legislature itself shall do, and thus expressly limits the power of the Legislature as to what it may authorize others to do.

None of these mandatory provisions or limitations appear in section 20 of article 4 of the Constitution, wherein the Legislature is authorized to provide for the election or appointment of all officers or commissioners not provided for by this Constitution. It necessarily follows that in the general language used in the cases having to do with questions governed by the language found in section 5, article 11, must be read in connection with the issues actually presented and actually decided. Thus the language found in People v. Wheeler, supra, and approved in Logan v. Shields, to wit: "The Legislature cannot commit to the discretion of others the important function of creating public offices in unlimited or indefinite number," must be held to refer to and be governed by the limitations and proscriptions set forth in the section and article of the Constitution having to do with the creation of county offices, as that was the question then and there being decided. In the case at bar we have to do with public officers of the state created by the Legislature of the state, and appointed as hereinbefore set forth for the purpose of exercising the general police powers of the state. In view of what we have said, and, also, in view of the general course of legislation pursued by the state of California for a number of years, and in view of the distinction which we have heretofore drawn between the various sections of the Constitution referred to, we are constrained to hold that the fifth objection dealt with herein is untenable, and, in so holding, the language of Associate Justice Hart used in the case of Stephens v. Chambers, 34 Cal. App. 660, 168 Pac. 595, best expresses our views:

"A written Constitution, like a statute, cannot so deal with particulars as to meet or provide for every case or contingency which may arise and of which legislative cognizance is allowable if necessary to the complete enjoyment of those privileges, immunities, and rights which are of the essence, and, indeed, the primary and foremost objects of a government in which, like ours, ultimate sovereignty is in the people themselves. By this we do not mean to say that the limitations or barriers contained in the Constitution against the exercise of legislative power may be set aside or disregarded, or that the intent of the organic law, as it is to be gathered from the instrument itself, shall not in all cases prevail. Nor do we intend thus to imply that the courts, in the construction of a written Constitution, may be governed by a change in public sentiment as to any subject to which express attention is given and as to which limitations are fixed by the Constitution. But what we do maintain is that, since a written Constitution is intended as and is the mere frame work according to whose general outlines specific legislation must be framed and modeled, and is therefore, as stated and as is essentially true, necessarily couched in general terms or language, it is not to be interpreted according to narrow or supertechnical principles, but liberally and on broad general lines, so that it may accomplish in full measure the objects of its establishment and so carry out the great principles of government."

[9] The sixth objection urged by respondent has been answered in some of the cases cited herein, in dealing with objection No. (5). The act is uniform in its operation, but whether it shall be put into effect in all of the counties of the state is discretionary with the chief of the motor vehicle department, and is similar in that respect to statutes upheld, having to do with the appointment of county health officers, etc.

[10] The seventh objection urged by respondent is that the payment of the traffic officers as officers of the state is an unlawful interference with county funds. The wording of section 159 of the Motor Vehicle Act in itself answers this objection. No funds belonging to any of the counties of the state are used in the payment of traffic officers. The payment of traffic officers may diminish the fund or funds which, under the terms and provisions of the motor vehicle law, may finally become county funds, but that is not an interference with funds belonging to any of the counties of the state. The payment of traffic officers out of the money received by the motor vehicle department as fees, etc., from the citizens of the various counties of the state is payment made out of state funds, and this is true, even though the payment to a particular traffic officer appointed for a particular county is paid out of the funds received as fees from the citizens or residents of the particular county involved.

[11] It is further objected that the Motor Vehicle Act, in so far as it makes provision for the payment of officers and appropriation for salaries, is violative of section 34 of article 4, generally known as the budget amendment to the Constitution, in that the budget act, approved May 7, 1923 (St. 1923, p. 242), makes no provision whatever for the support of the motor vehicle department.

The budget amendment provides that:

"The Governor shall, within the first thirty days of each regular session of the Legislature * * * submit to the Legislature * * * a budget containing a complete plan and itemized statement of all proposed expenditures of the state provided by existing law or recommended by him, and of all its institutions, departments, boards, bureaus," etc., "* * * for each fiscal year of the ensuing biennial period," etc.

A recommendation was made by the Governor as to the number of state inspectors, etc., but the budget act itself, as finally passed by the Legislature and approved by the Governor, contained, as hereinbefore stated, no provisions whatever for the support of the motor vehicle department. Does this militate against the motor vehicle law? We think not. The section of the Constitution referred to contains the further provision:

"Until the budget bill has been finally enacted, neither house shall place upon final passage any other appropriation bill, except emergency bills recommended by the Governor, or appropriations for the salaries, mileage and expenses of the Senate and Assembly. * * * In any appropriation bill passed by the Legislature, the Governor may reduce or eliminate any one or more items of appropriation of money while approving other portions of the bill," etc.

It thus plainly appears that the power of the Legislature to pass other appropriation bills than the budget bill is only limited in point of time, i. e., no such bill can be passed until the budget bill is first disposed of, which necessarily carries with it a correlative interpretation that when the budget bill has been disposed of other appropriation bills may be considered, passed by the Legislature, and presented to the Governor for approval. The budget bill passed by the Legislature in 1923 was approved on the 7th day of May of that year. The Motor Vehicle Act, now before us for consideration, was approved on May 30, 1923. It thus appears that the very terms of the Constitution were complied with, and the Motor Vehicle Act was not acted upon until the Legislature had the power so to do, and the Governor possessed the authority to affix his approval to such legislation. While necessity does not authorize reading into a section of the Constitution words not therein found, yet the very necessities of the case called for the insertion in the amendment of the provision giving power to the Legislature which we have just set forth. Otherwise any omission on the part of the Governor in relation to the preparation of the budget bill, or any omission on the part of the Legislature to include therein appropriations for the various departments of the state, would render it impossible to correct errors or omissions in legislation, and tend to leave the state crippled or hampered in its departmental functions, whenever in any case the necessities and requirements of the different departments have not been fully set forth in the budget bill, as passed by the Legislature. As we read the constitutional amendment providing for the submission to the Legislature by the Governor of the budget bill, we find no limitation to the power either of the Governor to recommend or the Legislature to pass acts such as the motor vehicle law containing provisions for the support and maintenance of the department dealt with and intended to be maintained.

[12] Adopting and following, without setting forth the general rules applicable to the construction of statutes and the determination of their validity when constitutional questions are raised, that such construction shall be given as will uphold the act of the Legislature when such a construction may reasonably be given, and, also, where a reasonable doubt exists as to the constitutional exercise of the power, and also where it does not clearly appear that any constitutional limitations have been transgressed, that the act under consideration should be upheld, we conclude, upon this rehearing and reconsideration, that the sections of the Motor Vehicle Act referred to are valid and subsisting provisions of the motor vehicle law, and that the petitioner herein is entitled to a writ of mandate, directing the drawing of a warrant for his salary in the sum of $175, as prayed for.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

MARKET ST. RY. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.
(S. F. 10815.)(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 2, 1924.
Rehearing Denied March 3, 1924.)1. Master and servant ☞417(7)—Compensation Commission's finding on evidence final.

A finding by the Commission on the question of the extent of dependency of the parents of a deceased employee sustained by the evidence is not reviewable on certiorari, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67, subd. (c).

2. Master and servant ☞386(1)—Measure of compensation to partially dependent parents of deceased employee.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, partially dependent parents of a deceased employee are entitled to death benefits computed on the rate of the annual contribution at the time of injury, and not the gross amount deceased happened to pay through any past year or through any other period.

3. Master and servant ☞386(1)—Compensation awarded to partial dependent parents of deceased employee held excessive.

Where for a number of years partially dependent parents had received contributions approximating $25 a month, in addition to a monthly rental of $50, from their son's property which he sold, receiving in part payment $900 cash, which he gave to his father who used part and deposited $500 to which the father had recourse as occasion required, and for nine months after the sale the son had contributed, and at the time of his death was contributing $25 a month to his parents' support, that sum was the correct basis for an allowance, and an award greater than three times that amount was in excess of the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission, as having no support in law or fact.

4. Master and servant ☞417(7)—Finding without evidence in compensation case reviewable by court.

Where there is an entire lack of evidence to support a finding of fact on which an award is made by the Industrial Accident Commission, the proceeding is reviewable by the court.

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Woolf Shapero and wife, claiming compensation for the death of their son, opposed by the Market Street Railway Company, employer. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the employer brings certiorari. Award annulled, and case remanded.

William M. Abbott, K. W. Cannon, and Cyril Appel, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren N. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. This is a proceeding in review to determine the legality of a death benefit allowed by the respondent Commission to a father and mother, the partial dependents of a street car conductor in the employ of the petitioner. It was stipulated before the Commission that the injury which caused the death of the employee arose out of and occurred in the course of his employment. Some six years before his death the decedent left Calgary, Canada, where his parents resided, and came to San Francisco and obtained employment. Thereafter, and until his death, it was his custom to send to his parents in Canada, for their support, monthly sums, the total contribution from this source being about $300 a year. He had acquired a piece of real property in Canada which rented for $50 a month. This amount he appears to have also regularly turned over to his parents. The son sold this property in March, 1922, receiving in payment $900 in cash and a mortgage for the remainder of the purchase price. He gave the $900 to the father, who used a portion of the money for the payment of bills and placed $500 of the amount in bank, together with other funds he had on deposit. His total deposits in two banks at that time amounted to about $1,100 or $1,200. These bank accounts appear to have been in the sole and exclusive control of the father of the decedent, who deposited and withdrew varying amounts at different times. No fixed sums were regularly withdrawn; recourse to the bank accounts being had as any occasion required. For the nine months after making this sale the son continued as before to send his parents sums averaging about $25 a month. He was killed in December, 1922. The parents had more than $1,000 in bank when he died. They then closed the bank accounts and came to San Francisco.

[1] The Commission found the applicants to be partially dependent upon the deceased employee for support. Petitioner contends that the finding as to who constituted the dependents of the decedent, and the extent of their dependency, is not supported by the evidence, and is not in accordance with the facts existing at the time of the death of the employee. We find evidence in the record to sustain the finding, and the determination of the Commission in that regard must be taken as final and binding, in so far as this inquiry is concerned. Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 876), § 67, subd. (c).

The real issue presented by this proceeding is whether or not the Commission made an award in excess of its jurisdiction. It is the lawfulness of the amount of the award that is here under consideration. The Commission found the annual amount contributed by the employee to the applicants was the sum of $900, which entitled them to a death benefit in the sum of $2,700. In arriving at the annual amount contributed by the employee to the support of his father and mother, the Commission based its finding upon the testimony that for a number of years the parents of the decedent had regularly received and used as their own the monthly rental of $50 derived from the real property in Canada, and in addition thereto an amount approximating $25 a month, which he had contributed from his earnings. But, as already noted, the property was sold in March, 1922, and thereafter, and for a period of some months prior to his death, the only amount devoted by the decedent to the support of the applicants was approximately $25 per month. It is the contention of the respondent that the $900 resulting from the real estate transaction was given to the parents as a substitute for the $50 rental of the property which was sold in March, and was turned over to the parents as a sort of fund, to be drawn on as needed for their support, and that, as the $900 was purposely drawn upon from time to time, rather than spent in one lump sum, the Commission was justified in considering that contributions at the rate of $75 per month were actually being made by the decedent at the time of his injury and death. Respondent therefore says that it was complying with the criteria set forth in Great Western Power Co. v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 1009, as well as in the case of Spreckels Sugar Co. v. I. A. C., 186 Cal. 256, 199 Pac. 8, in determining the amount devoted by the decedent to the support of the dependents.

[2] Respondent is mistaken in its contention. The cases relied on by it hold the whole theory of the Compensation Act as to death cases to be that the dependents of the employee, killed through some hazard of his employment, shall be compensated for the loss of the support they were receiving from him at the time of his injury. This necessarily means that the death benefit must be computed upon the rate of contribution at that time. It is the rate that is the measure of the loss, not the gross amount the decedent had happened to pay through any past year or through any other period of time. The act provides that not only shall the question of the condition of dependency, as to entire or partial, be determined as of the date of the injury to the employee, but also that the extent of dependency shall be determined as of that date. The provision of the statute that in cases of partial dependency the death benefit shall be proportionate to the amount of the annual contribution of the employee is but a provision that the death benefit shall be proportionate to the extent of the dependency, so that the effect of the two provisions is that it is the annual contribution as of the time of the injury that is to be taken. This can only be a rate of contribution, since it is a point and not a period of time by which the contribution is to be determined. Spreckels Sugar Co. v. I. A. C., supra, at pages 253, 259 (199 Pac. 8); Great Western Power Co. v. I. A. C., supra, 218 Pac. 1009.

[3] For a period of nine months preceding the death of the decedent he had contributed, and at the time of his death was devoting an amount approximating $25 a month, and no more, to the support of his partial dependents. The rate of the annual contribution of the deceased to the support of his dependents at the time of the injury was therefore $25 a month, or $300 per year. That sum was the correct basis for an allowance, and an award greater than three times that amount, having no support in law or fact, is in excess of and without the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission. Spreckels Sugar Co. v. I. A. C., supra.

[4] There is in this case that entire lack of evidence to support the finding on which the award was made, which subjects the proceeding to a review by this court. Pruitt v. I. A. C., 189 Cal. 459, 209 Pac. 31; Dearborn v. I. A. C., 187 Cal. 591, 594, 203 Pac. 112.

The award is annulled, and the proceeding is remanded to the Industrial Accident Commission for such further proceedings and order as are not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

65 Cal. App. 413

BOARDMAN v. CHRISTIN et al. (Civ. 4131.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Jan. 23, 1924.)

1. Attorney and client ⇨143—Principle that doing what one is legally bound to do not consideration, held not applicable.

Where plaintiff, attorney at law, who, as guardian of a ward's estate, was authorized by a court order to bring an action against a railroad company to determine the latter's water rights affecting a certain ranch in which the ward and defendant each owned a parcel of land by reason of which defendant was interested in the action, plaintiff was not, as an attorney at law, under duty to render any professional services in that action, so that his promise to render such services on behalf of the ward, in consideration of defendant's promise to pay a stipulated fee, was supported by a sufficient consideration.

2. Attorney and client ⇨144—General rule for construing ambiguous contract stated.

If a contract between attorney and client concerning compensation is ambiguous, that construction should be adopted which is most favorable to the client.

3. Attorney and client ⇨145—Contract held to require full performance as condition precedent to attorney's right to recover stipulated compensation.

A contract whereby defendant agreed to pay plaintiff, as attorney at law, $1,000 for services rendered by him in the prosecution of an action, as authorized by a court order, on behalf of a minor who was defendant's brother, to determine a railway company's water rights on a certain ranch in which the minor and defendant each owned parcels of land, the contract reading, "I am interested with said minor in procuring a judgment determining the rights aforesaid," held an entire contract requiring full performance and a prosecution of the action to judgment by plaintiff as a condition precedent to his right to recover the stipulated compensation.

4. Attorney and client ⇨145—Attorney may recover in quantum meruit when complete performance becomes impossible without fault of either party.

When complete performance by an attorney of his contract of employment becomes impossible without fault on part of either party, the attorney may recover in quantum meruit the value of the services actually rendered by him.

5. Attorney and client ⇨145—Attorney, prevented from fully performing held entitled to reasonable value of services rendered.

Where plaintiff, attorney at law, who agreed to prosecute an action on behalf of a minor, in consideration of defendant's promise to pay a stipulated fee, was prevented from fully performing his contract, without fault of either himself or defendant, by reason of the minor's selection, upon attaining his majority, of another attorney, held that, while plaintiff was not entitled to recover the stipulated sum, he was entitled to recover in quantum meruit the reasonable value of services actually performed under the contract.

6. Attorney and client ⇨165—In suit on express contract for compensation, no recovery on quantum meruit without amendment.

An attorney, suing on an express contract to recover compensation stipulated therein cannot recover on quantum meruit without amending his complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Louis P. Boardman against Estelle C. Christin and her husband. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions to allow amendment to complaint.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, L. M. Chapman, and Ward Chapman, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Philip C. Boardman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action by an attorney at law to recover compensation for services alleged to have been rendered by him under a contract with the defendant Estelle C. Christin, whose husband, C. A. Christin, is made a party defendant solely because, as the law stood when the action was commenced, the husband was required to be joined with the wife. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. The grounds of the appeal are that Mrs. Christin's promise to pay plaintiff is not supported by any consideration, and that plaintiff failed to perform the obligation of his contract.

[1] The facts in brief are these: Mrs. Christin, née Estelle C. Porter, is the sister of Benjamin F. Porter, of whose estate plaintiff was the guardian when Mrs. Christin executed the contract in question. Plaintiff's appointment was made some time prior to February 16, 1912, and he continued to be such guardian until the ward attained his majority on September 24, 1916. Mrs. Christin and her brother each own a parcel of land in the Rancho ex-Mission de San Fernando in Los Angeles county. The two parcels adjoin each other, and each is contiguous to the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. On February 16, 1912, the court in which the guardianship proceeding was pending made an order authorizing and directing plaintiff, as guardian of the estate of Benjamin F. Porter, to commence and prosecute such action as might be necessary to determine the right of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and its successors to appropriate or use waters from the cienegas or springs on the Rancho ex-Mission de San Fernando. The order directed the guardian to procure a judgment establishing the amount of water which the railroad company and its successors were entitled to take, and to secure a final adjudication of the respective rights of the minor and of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company or its successors in and to the waters. Mrs. Christin, as the owner of the piece of land contiguous to the parcel owned by her brother, was interested in securing the entry of such judgment.

On June 5, 1912, Mrs. Christin, then Estelle C. Porter, executed the instrument whereby she promised to pay respondent. That document, so far as pertinent, reads:

"Whereas, Louis P. Boardman, as the guardian of the estate of Benjamin F. Porter, a minor, has been authorized and directed by an order of the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles * * * to commence and prosecute to final judgment an action in a court of proper jurisdiction to finally determine the right of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors or assigns, to use or appropriate any of the waters from the cienegas or springs on the Rancho ex-Mission de San Fernando; * * * and whereas, as an owner of lands contiguous to the lands of said minor, constituting his said estate, and adjacent to the right of way of said Southern Pacific Railroad Company. I am interested with said minor in procuring a judgment determining the rights aforesaid, I do hereby agree to pay the said Louis P. Boardman, as attorney at law in the prosecution of said action on behalf of said minor, on account of attorney's fees and expenses of said action, a sum of money equivalent to the amount which shall be allowed to said Louis P. Boardman by the said superior court of the county of Los Angeles, for his services and expenses rendered and incurred on behalf of said minor in said action, which amount to be so paid by me shall be in full payment of all services rendered and expenses to be incurred by the said Louis P. Boardman on my behalf in and about the prosecution of said action."

Thereafter plaintiff, as guardian of the estate of the minor and pursuant to the order of court directing him so to do, caused an action to be commenced in the superior court for Los Angeles county, in the name of his ward, against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and its successor, the Southern Pacific Company, to secure a judgment determining the respective rights of the minor and of the railroad companies in and to the waters of the above-mentioned springs and cienegas. The only parties to that action were the minor, suing by his guardian, and the two railroad companies. The guardian did not employ an attorney to represent him in the action. He himself is an attorney at law, and he elected to act as his own counsel in the case. He made preparations for the trial, but before the issues of fact were determined his ward attained his majority. Thereafter, and before the trial of the action, other counsel were substituted as attorneys for Benjamin F. Porter. Plaintiff thereupon filed his accounts as guardian and rendered to the court a statement of the nature and amount of the services performed by him in the action which he had brought on behalf of the ward. With his accounts he filed a report wherein he exhibited to the court the contract between him and Miss Porter. The court allowed plaintiff the sum of $1,000 for the services which, as guardian, he had performed in the action which he had caused to be brought by his ward. Thereupon plaintiff, deeming himself entitled to recover an equivalent sum from Mrs. Christin under the terms of her written promise, brought this action to recover from her the sum of $1,000.

We think there was sufficient consideration for Mrs. Christin's promise to pay respondent for his professional services. Because respondent, as guardian, was bound to commence and prosecute the action against the railroad companies when, as an attorney at law, he entered into the contract with Mrs. Christin, it is earnestly urged by appellants that the case is within the doctrine that a promise to do what the promisor is already bound to do is not a consideration. It is conceded by respondent, as indeed it must be, that a promise by a party to do what he already is bound to do is of no value as a consideration to support a promise by the other party to the contract; for, if the latter gets nothing in return for his promise but that to which he already is entitled, the consideration, in so far as he is concerned, is unreal. But that principle is not applicable to the facts of this case. Here, it is true, respondent, by reason of the court's order directing him to bring the action against the railroad companies, was, as guardian, legally bound to cause the action to be brought on behalf of his ward. But he was under no obligation, as an attorney at law, to render any professional services in that action. If we assume that the order commanding him to bring the action was not of itself sufficient authorization for the employment by him of counsel, and if we therefore further assume that, had he employed other counsel and the court in the guardianship proceeding had refused to make an allowance for counsel fees, he might have found himself in the predicament of having to pay the fees out of his own pocket, still no obligation rested upon him to do aught as an attorney at law in the case which he, as guardian, caused to be brought by his ward. Without in anywise violating the order of the court directing him, as guardian, to bring the action, and without in the least degree falling short of the full performance of his duties thereunder, respondent could have employed other counsel to render all the professional services required to be performed in the action. But Mrs. Christin evidently desired to have the professional services in that action performed by respondent, and not by some one else. Accordingly, though no duty rested upon respondent as guardian to render any services as an attorney at law, we find Mrs. Christin, in her contract with respondent, agreeing to pay him "as attorney at law in the prosecution of such action on behalf of said minor, on account of attorney's fees * * * a sum of money equivalent to the amount which" the court might allow respondent for his services as guardian in the prosecution of the action. It is not beyond the realm of possibility that Mrs. Christin was so impressed with what she conceived to be respondent's superior attainments as a lawyer that she wanted him, and not some other attorney, to perform all the services as counsel in the action. But respondent, simply by reason of the order of court directed to him as guardian, was not bound to render such professional services. His performance of such services was, therefore, something which Mrs. Christin would not have received in any event by reason of the court's order. Indeed, but for his contract with Mrs. Christin, respondent might have been unwilling to act as counsel in the case. For these reasons it is clear that his promise to Mrs. Christin to render services as an attorney at law was a sufficient consideration for the latter's promise to pay him for such services.

[2, 3] Has respondent fulfilled the obligation of his contract? And if he has not, is he entitled to recover the agreed compensation? We think it clear that the contract between respondent and Mrs. Christin contemplated that the former should prosecute his ward's action to final judgment. In section 2253 of Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) vol. 2, the author says:

"An attorney who is retained generally to conduct a legal proceeding is presumed, in the absence of anything to indicate a contrary intent, to enter into an entire contract to conduct the proceeding to its termination."

There is nothing in the language of Mrs. Christin's contract tending to show that the parties contemplated any departure from this general presumption. On the contrary, the language of the contract points unerringly to the conclusion that Mrs. Christin was contracting for professional services which would eventuate in a judgment finally determining the rights of the respective parties litigant in and to the waters which were in controversy. The language of her contract is, "I am interested with said minor in procuring a judgment determining the rights aforsaid." It is difficult to conceive how she could have been benefited in any degree from the mere prosecution of an action in the name of her minor brother—an action to which she was not a party—unless it terminated in a judgment fixing the rights of the railroad companies and determining what amount of water, if any, they might take from the springs or cienegas. The general rule is that in construing contracts between attorneys and clients concerning compensation if there is any ambiguity as to the intent of the parties that construction should be adopted which is most favorable to the client. Pinto v. Seely, 22 Cal. App. 326, 135 Pac. 43.

[4, 5] Though we are of the opinion that respondent's contract with Mrs. Christin was an entire contract, and that it required full performance on respondent's part as a condition precedent to his right to recover the stipulated compensation in an action on the contract, we do not think he is entirely remediless. True, there is nothing in the record before us necessitating the conclusion that Mrs. Christin prevented performance before respondent had entirely fulfilled the obligations of his contract. But it is equally true that there is nothing to indicate that respondent's failure fully to perform his contract was due to any fault on his part. Both parties evidently supposed that in the ordinary course of events the litigation, inaugurated a little more than four years before the minor would reach his majority, would terminate in a final judgment during the guardianship. But the unexpected seems to have happened, with the result that respondent's guardianship came to an end before he could fully perform his contract with Mrs. Christin; and, of course, when the guardianship terminated, the ward, who was then of age, was at liberty to choose his own counsel and to do that which he actually did do, viz. cause other attorneys to be substituted in the place and stead of this respondent. Under these circumstances, while he cannot recover the stipulated compensation in an action on his contract with Mrs. Christin, respondent is entitled to recover in quantum meruit the reasonable value of such services as he actually did perform under his contract. The rule is that when complete performance by an attorney of his contract of employment becomes impossible without fault on the part of either party, the attorney may recover in quantum meruit the value of the services actually rendered by him. Moore v. Robinson, 92 Ill. 491; Baird v. Ratcliff, 10 Tex. 81; Corson v. Lewis, 77 Neb. 449, 114 N. W. 281; Thornton on Attorneys, § 452; 6 C. J. p. 726, par. 297.

[6] The complaint in this action is based, not on an implied assumpsit for the reasonable value of the services performed, but upon the express contract; and respondent seeks to recover the stipulated amount provided for in the contract. To entitle him to a recovery it will be necessary for him to amend his complaint so as to allege an action for quantum meruit on Mrs. Christin's implied assumpsit.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the lower court to allow respondent to amend his complaint if so advised.

PARK et al. v. HILLMAN. (Civ. 4686.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 30, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence on hearing of motion to vacate default not disturbed.

Where, on the hearing of defendant's motion, supported by affidavit, to vacate a default judgment based on failure to serve him with notice of trial as required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 594, and on his actual lack of knowledge of time of trial, there was a conflict between the statements of fact in defendant's affidavit and the inferences to be drawn from the statements in the counter affidavit and the other evidence relied upon by plaintiffs, the trial court's finding in defendant's favor held not subject to review on appeal.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 957(1)—Order vacating default judgment not disturbed, unless abuse of discretion appears.

Trial court's order vacating default judgment will not be disturbed, unless it is clear that discretion has been abused.

3. Judgment $\S$ 158—Affidavit of merits not indispensable to granting motion to set aside default judgment.

Trial court's order setting aside default judgment pursuant to defendant's motion based on a failure to serve him with notice of time of trial, as required by Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 594, and on his lack of actual knowledge of time of trial, was not erroneous for a failure of an affidavit of merits to accompany the motions to vacate, in view of statute which does not make such an affidavit a condition precedent to the granting of relief, and in view of allegations contained in defendant's verified answer which the trial court was justified in taking into consideration in reaching his conclusion as to the showing of a meritorious defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Bertram A. Park and others and Rita Park, as administratrix of the estate of Edwin R. Park, deceased, against C. D. Hillman. From an order setting aside a default judgment against defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Eckhoff, of San Francisco, for appellants.

R. W. Cantrell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, setting aside a judgment rendered in their favor against the defendant after the entry of his default. The order complained of was made upon two motions of the defendant, one upon the ground that said judgment was irregularly given and made through inadvertence upon the part of the trial court in that no proof was made of the notice to defendant of the time of trial, prior to the date of the actual trial of the said cause, as provided for in section 594, Code of Civil Procedure, and as required by rule 18 of the rules of practice of said court. The other motion of the defendant was upon the ground that the judgment was taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect. The first motion is based upon the notice of motion and the judgment roll, and the second motion upon the notice of motion, all the papers, pleadings, and records on file in the action, and the affidavit of the defendant.

The affidavit of defendant is to the effect that prior to November 13, 1922, he had no notice of the entry of judgment against him on September 6, 1922; that at all times since the commencement of the action he had been a resident of the state of California; that at all times since the date of the filing of the complaint (October 17, 1919), with the exception of short periods of time, he had been actually within the state of California and that during all of said time communications addressed to him at his place of residence and other addresses mentioned in the affidavit would have been delivered to him in due course, and that at no time since the withdrawal of Frank Orwitz as his attorney at law in said matter (November 23, 1921) had he been personally served with notice of the time of trial of the action nor had he received through the mails any notice or communication advising him of the time of trial of said action; that at no time previous to the 30th day of August, 1922, nor on the 30th day of August, 1922, did he have any notice, information, or knowledge of any kind, character, or description that the trial of the above-entitled cause had been set for or would be tried on the 30th day of August, 1922.

The order setting aside the judgment was made upon the ground that said judgment was rendered through the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of the defendant in that the defendant was not served with notice of the time of the trial of said cause, as required by section 594, Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, and, further, that said defendant did not have actual or any knowledge of the time of the trial of said cause as appears from his affidavit on file herein.

[1, 2] There was a conflict between the statements of fact in the defendant's affidavit and the inferences to be drawn from the statements in the counter affidavit and the other evidence relied upon by the plaintiffs, but this conflict has been resolved in favor of the defendant by the trial court, and is not a matter subject to our review. Not only does a broad discretion in such matters rest with the trial court, but the law favors the determination of an action after a trial upon the merits and not upon technicality or default. When, therefore, the trial court has exercised its discretion in a manner to effectuate this policy of our law, as in the present case, it must clearly and conclusively appear that there has been an abuse of discretion to warrant interference with such action by an appellate court. We think the record in the instant case does not present such a situation.

[3] It is contended by the appellants that the order is erroneous because no affidavit of merits accompanied the motions and that such an affidavit is a prerequisite to the relief sought. Several cases are cited which seem to support this view. An examination of the statute discloses that an affidavit of merits is not made a condition precedent to the granting of the relief, and in the case of Melde v. Reynolds, 129 Cal. 308, 61 Pac. 932, it was held that an affidavit of merits is not a jurisdictional element for granting relief from a judgment and may be dispensed with when the court is otherwise satisfied that the application is meritorious and made in good faith. It was also held in that case that when a verified answer of defendant, contradicting all averments of the complaint, is on file, it may be considered by the court for the purpose of determining whether or not there exists a meritorious defense to the action. The case of Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 124 Cal. 134, 143, 56 Pac. 797, contains language to the same effect.

In the present action there was on file a verified answer of the defendant in which he denied the allegations of the complaint and set up certain facts as a defense to the action. The complaint alleged that the defendant had received, without right, certain rents and profits of land owned by them and had not accounted therefor. Defendant alleged that during the times mentioned in the complaint he was in possession of the land described in the complaint by virtue of a lease from Edwin R. Park, deceased, whose interest was represented in the present action by his administratrix, and that said Edwin R. Park, deceased, in making said lease to defendant acted for the other plaintiffs, co-owners with him of the land, under authority from them, and that said Edwin R. Park, deceased, had accepted from defendant, on behalf of himself and the other plaintiffs, rent for said land. These allegations were contained in a verified answer of the defendant, and the trial court was justified in taking them into consideration in reaching its conclusion that a showing of a meritorious defense had been made by the defendant.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ONESSIMO. (Cr. 1142.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 19, 1924.)

1. Rape ☞57(5)—Intent to commit rape question of fact for jury.

The intent with which an alleged assault to commit rape was committed is a question of fact for the jury, whose verdict will not be disturbed, unless the facts proven afford no reasonable ground for the inference drawn.

2. Rape ☞53(2)—Conviction of assault to commit rape held supported by evidence.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of assault with intent to commit rape.

3. Criminal law ☞717—Counsel should not be allowed to read law to jury.

Generally the practice of allowing counsel to read law to the jury should not be tolerated, its usual effect being to confuse rather than enlighten the jury.

4. Criminal law ☞798½—Instruction referring to only two of three possible verdicts held not misleading.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, where the court instructed the jury that he had prepared three forms of verdict and that they should adopt the one conforming to their views and fully and fairly instructed them as to the law and defendant's rights, an instruction mentioning only the first two for the purpose of distinguishing between assault with intent to commit rape and simple assault, held not misleading in making no reference to the third, which was that of not guilty.

5. Criminal law ☞829(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by instructions given not error.

Refusal of instructions fully or in the main covered by instructions given is not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Joe Onessimo was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

John Thompson, of Monterey, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ST. SURE, J. Defendant, an Indian boy 19 years of age, was convicted of an assault with intent to commit rape on a white woman of 36 years. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The prosecuting witness is a married woman with two children, living on a ranch in Monterey county. From the ranch across Carmel river to a trail leading to the county road, on which was the ranch mail box, is a suspension footbridge. Near the county road, but some little distance from the trail, is the home of the defendant. The trail is fringed with trees and underbrush, but at a certain point can be seen from the county road. On the morning in question the prosecutrix had been across the bridge, over the trail and to the mail box for her mail. On returning she saw the defendant standing near the entrance to the trail, which sloped steeply up to the bridge. She waited for the defendant to cross and come down the trail. She was afraid to meet him on the footbridge. As the defendant approached she said something about its being a nice day, and she noticed that defendant's trousers, with the exception of the top button, were open. The trail was narrow, and she waited for defendant to pass. "He was in my way," testified the prosecutrix. "The trail was quite narrow, and as I stated this blackberry bush was on one side, and there was a barb-wire fence there. I don't believe the trail was a foot wide, and I thought he would walk on and let me go home, so he didn't make any move, and I said, 'Joe, are you working on this side of the river?' and he said, 'Yes;' and I said, 'Where are you working, at Walter's Ranch?' and he said, 'No; the other place;' and it was getting along towards dinner time, so I started up the trail to pass him."

Defendant suddenly exposed himself, calling her attention, and then began "grabbing at" her ankles, having hold of her once, and touching her several times. She says she fought him, dancing with her feet to keep him from laying hold of her. She also seized his hat. She did not drop the mail she was holding. She screamed the name of a hired man she knew to be on the ranch, and he came running. He says he saw the defendant running away as he came. The prosecuting witness says the defendant did not resist and run away until he heard the hired man reply; that he then said, "No, no," started running away, came back, snatched his hat, and ran off into the brush. He did not go home that night, but went home for breakfast next morning, according to his mother and sister. He was captured while going through the brush by one of the men out searching for him.

Defendant contends that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the inference that he was actuated in what he did by the alleged felonious intent. He argues that the evidence shows that he voluntarily abandoned his purpose before any independent agent intervened, and that he did not intend to accomplish his purpose by force. Defendant, when arrested, said a white boy in Carmel had outlined to him the procedure he followed.

[1, 2] Counsel for defendant admits that, while the testimony of the prosecutrix was uncorroborated, the jury evidently believed her story, and therefore it will have to be taken as true upon appeal. He urges, however, that the "evidence does not show the intent in the mind of the defendant which the law requires." In such cases as this the intent with which an assault is committed is a fact which can only be inferred from the outward act and the surrounding circumstances. It is, in other words, a question of fact for the jury and not a question of law for the court, except in a case where the facts proven afford no reasonable ground for the inference drawn. People v. Moore, 155 Cal. 237, 240, 100 Pac. 688. Upon a consideration of all of the evidence we are unable to say that the facts proven afforded the jury no reasonable ground for the inference that defendant was actuated in what he did by a felonious intent.

[3] Defendant's next assignment is that the trial court erred in refusing to permit counsel to read law to the jury. Counsel concedes that "the law should come from the court," also that "the trial court in the instructions gave the principle of law" he wished to read to the jury, but he thinks he should have been permitted to proceed with his argument without interruption. As a general rule, the practice of allowing counsel, in either civil or criminal actions, to read law to the jury, is objectionable, and ought not to be tolerated. Its usual effect is to confuse rather than enlighten the jury. People v. Anderson, 44 Cal. 65, 70. It has even been held that it is within the discretion of the court to refuse to allow counsel in his argument to read to the jury certain sections of the Civil Code. Meyer v. Foster, 147 Cal. 166, 171, 81 Pac. 402.

[4] There is no merit in the contention that the trial court erred in giving instruction No. 20. The instruction given by the court was, in part:

"I have prepared three forms of verdict, and you will adopt the one that conforms to your views. If, from the evidence, you believe the defendant guilty of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, beyond all reasonable doubt, you should find him guilty as charged in the information, namely of assault with intent to commit rape. If you believe the defendant guilty beyond all reasonable doubt of assault often spoken of and called simple assault, but do not find him guilty of assault with intent to commit rape, then you should find him guilty of assault."

The jury was not misled by this instruction. Obviously when the trial judge gave the instruction he had before him three forms of verdict, viz.: One finding the defendant guilty of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape; the second, guilty of assault; and, the third, not guilty. The court mentioned the first two for the purpose of distinguishing between "assault with intent to commit rape" and "simple assault." The court had fully and fairly instructed the jury as to the law and the rights of the defendant, and upon reading the charge we think that it was, upon the whole, fair and favorable to the defendant.

[5] We see no error in the refusal of the court to give instructions Nos. 29, 21, 34, and 86, requested by defendant. The principle of law which defendant sought to place before the jury in No. 29 is fully covered in instructions Nos. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, which were given. We have read and considered the additional instructions requested by defendant and refused, upon which assignment of error is made. We find that they were in the main covered by the many instructions given, and, where they were not, their refusal was proper.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PRITCHARD v. MERCANTILE TRUST CO.
et al. (Civ. 4532.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 18, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 17, 1924.)

1. Partnership ⇨258(7)—Surviving partner's complaint to recover deposits as partnership funds held insufficient.

Surviving partner's complaint against deceased partner's administratrix and a bank in which the deceased partner had money on deposit at the time of his death, to recover such amount as funds of the copartnership, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, held insufficient to plead that deposits were partnership funds.

2. Pleading ⇨8(11)—Allegation by surviving partner that deposit was partnership funds held mere statement of conclusion.

In surviving partner's action against deceased partner's administratrix and bank for deposits which had been made in such bank by deceased partner, allegation that the deposit was "the moneys and funds of the said partnership" held insufficient, without statement of the facts, to plead that the deposits were partnership funds, the quoted allegation being merely the statement of a conclusion of the pleader.

3. Partnership ⇨258(2)—Surviving partner could not recover deposits as against deceased partner's administratrix without compliance with statute.

Surviving partner could not recover, as against deceased partner's administratrix, money which had been deposited in bank by deceased partner on theory that deposits constituted partnership funds, without compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1585, providing for a settlement of the partnership business by the surviving partner without delay, for appraisal of deceased partner's interest and rendition of account to deceased partner's executor or administrator.

4. Partnership ⇨258(2)—Surviving partner has no cause of action against deceased partner's estate where firm assets ample to wind up partnership.

Where, at the death of a partner, there is an abundance of partnership assets to enable the surviving partner to wind up the partnership without making any claim on the estate of the decedent, the surviving partner has no cause of action against the estate on account of a deposit by the decedent in bank of moneys alleged to be partnership funds.

5. Appeal and error ⇨1040(9)—Appellant cannot complain of rulings on demurrers to superseded pleadings.

An appellant cannot complain of the rulings made by the trial court sustaining demurrers to former pleadings superseded by the pleadings on which the case was tried.

6. Partnership ⇨258(6)—Administratrix of deceased partner held necessary party in surviving partner's action against bank for deposits.

In surviving partner's action against the bank to recover deposits made in bank by deceased partner, on theory that they constituted funds of the partnership, the deceased partner's administratrix, who claimed an interest in the deposits, was a necessary party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Sadie E. Pritchard against the Mercantile Trust Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George Clark Sargent, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The trial court sustained demurrers of the defendants to the plaintiff's fourth amended complaint and refused the plaintiff permission to further amend, and thereafter a judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment.

[1-4] In her complaint the plaintiff alleged that she and Fred G. King did, in the year 1892, enter into a partnership agreement. The business to be conducted by the partnership was that of dealing in mines and mining properties. The plaintiff agreed to furnish moneys to the partnership from time to time, and the said Fred G. King agreed to devote his services as a mining engineer and as the business manager of the partnership business. It was further agreed that the profits of the business should be divided between the plaintiff and the said Fred G. King, share and share alike. The plaintiff further alleges that she thereafter contributed $30,000 to the partnership business, and that she has been repaid $14,000 and no more. She alleges that the partnership made gross profits to the extent of $750,000, and that at the date of the death of Fred G. King the decedent left $300,000 in "tangible property of said partnership." The plaintiff alleges that, when she entered into the partnership agreement, said Fred G. King had no moneys or properties of his own, but the pleading contains no allegation that after the year 1892 the said Fred G. King did not acquire moneys or properties in his capacity as an individual. She alleges that at the date of the death of King

she did not have possession of any of the partnership property and none of it has since come into her possession, but there is no allegation whether at that time she had possession, or has since obtained possession, of any of the partnership books, records, or papers. Except as hereinafter stated, there is no allegation that any one of the defendants holds any of the partnership property. The only allegation in that behalf is that on the date of the death of Fred G. King he had on deposit in the Crocker National Bank $18,183, and that the deposit was "the moneys and funds of the said partnership." It is then alleged that, after the death of King, said Hazel H. King obtained letters of administration and had the deposit transferred from the Crocker National Bank to the defendant Mercantile Trust Company, and it is further averred that, after demand made, said Hazel H. King and the Mercantile Trust Company have refused to pay over the amount of the deposit to the plaintiff. There is no allegation that the plaintiff has served or filed any claim against the estate of the decedent. The pleading contains no allegation to the effect that the plaintiff cannot get possession of all of the remaining portion of the $300,000 of tangible assets, nor is there any allegation that the partnership is in debt to any extent whatsoever. No facts are alleged showing from what source the decedent received the $18,183, or that said sum was the proceeds of any kind of a mining venture, partnership or otherwise. Nor is there any allegation that the money was deposited by the decedent in the Crocker National Bank in the name of the partnership or in the names of the decedent and the plaintiff. The sole allegation in that respect is that the deposit was "the moneys and funds of the said partnership." That expression is but the conclusion of the pleader. 31 Cyc. 61, 62; Callanan v. Keeseville, A. C. L. C. R. Co., 48 Misc. Rep. 476, 95 N. Y. Supp. 513, 515; Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 148 Cal. 548, 83 Pac. 999. Nevertheless, if it be assumed that Fred G. King collected partnership moneys and deposited them in his bank account, he was acting within his rights as a partner. The effect of the act may have resulted in causing him to become indebted to the partnership; but that fact, standing alone, would not warrant the plaintiff maintaining an action to recover those moneys. She must also show that she had complied with the provisions of section 1585 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is but reasonable to assume that, in view of all the facts alleged by the plaintiff, there will be an abundance of funds in the $300,000 estate to enable the plaintiff to wind up the partnership without making any claim whatsoever on the estate of the decedent. Under such circumstances the surviving partner has no cause of action against the estate of her deceased partner. Painter v. Estate of Painter, 68 Cal. 395, 9 Pac. 450; McKay v. Joy, 2 Cal. Unrep. 639, 9 Pac. 940; Mares v. Mares, 60 Mont. 36, 199 Pac. 267, 271, 272.

[5] As we understand the appellant, she complains also of the rulings made by the trial court sustaining other demurrers to former pleadings filed by the appellant; but those pleadings were superseded by the pleadings which are before us, and which are set forth in the record.

[6] The appellant calls attention to the fact that the defendant, as administratrix, was made a party and brought in pursuant to an order made by the trial court. She does not claim that there was a defect in form in the moving papers, but she complains that the order was improperly made and that no duty rested on the appellant to make the administratrix a party. In view of what we have said above, we think it is clear that Hazel Hubbard King, as administratrix, was a necessary party and that she claimed, as administratrix, to have interest in the moneys which the decedent had deposited in the Crocker National Bank.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Bills and notes $\S$ 83—Resort to another instrument held necessary in determining terms of acceptance of order.

Where a bill of exchange or order is accepted according to the provisions of a particular contract, resort must be had to that contract to ascertain the terms of the acceptance.

2. Bills and notes $\S$ 83—Conditional acceptance becomes absolute on happening of condition.

A conditional acceptance becomes absolute on performance, or the happening of the condition, but such acceptance is not enforceable until complete fulfillment of the condition.

3. Bills and notes $\S$ 83—Order construed as to when liability of drawee became fixed.

Where drawee accepted an order, the payment of which was conditioned as of the time when the final payment was made on a ranch that he had purchased from drawer, it was unnecessary that drawee should have actually made the final payment provided for in the agreement before his liability under the order became enforceable, the condition being satisfied if drawee became liable to make that payment.

4. Bills and notes 83—Condition on happening of which payment of order depended held not to have been fulfilled.

An order, in which the payment was conditioned as of the time when final payment on a contract for the sale of a ranch was made never became due where, under the contract, vendor was required to place in escrow a deed conveying the property free and clear of incumbrance and then to furnish for an examination of purchaser an abstract or certificate of title showing that the deed conveyed the property free from incumbrance, at which time purchaser was to pay his money and to receive the deed, and where vendor complied with contract only to the extent of depositing the deed in escrow.

WORKS, J. These two actions were tried separately, and they are briefed separately on the appeal. They are, however, companion cases. The evidence on the two trials was similar, and the points which will dispose of the appeal are exactly the same. Such statement of facts as we find it necessary to make will apply in substance to both cases, although we shall frame our language, for clarity and convenience, as if only the first of the two, No. 3846, were involved.

One J. F. McCloskey entered into a written agreement with defendant, dated June 5, 1918, whereby McCloskey agreed to sell and defendant agreed to buy a parcel of real property. The following portions of this agreement are material to the present controversy:

The purchase price * * * is $51,300.00, * * * which" Jones "agrees to pay * * * as follows: Five thousand dollars on the date hereof, receipt whereof * * * is hereby acknowledged: Twenty-three thousand eight hundred dollars," as early, under certain conditions, as November 1, 1918, but not later than January 1, 1919; "and the balance of said purchase price, to wit: The sum of twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars by note and mortgage as hereinafter stipulated. Upon the payment of said second installment of" $23,800, "and the execution and delivery of said note and mortgage, * * *" McCloskey "agrees to execute and deliver to" Jones "a deed conveying to him the said real property free and clear of lien or incumbrance and to furnish to him an abstract or certificate of title thereto; provided that said deed shall be executed immediately and placed in escrow in a bank at Santa Maria with instructions to deliver same upon the performance of such conditions and the abstract or certificate of title shall be furnished for examination at the earliest convenient date; and" Jones, "simultaneously with the delivery of said deed and as a condition thereto, shall execute and deliver to" McCloskey "his promissory note for the principal sum of" $22,500, " * * * which said promissory note shall be secured by a mortgage constituting a good and sufficient first lien upon the premises."

On June 12, 1918, McCloskey executed to one Viah his certain order, directed to Jones, as follows:

"Pay to the order of V. S. Viah seven hundred eighty-seven 50/100 dollars, value received, and charge the same to account of above [?], to be paid when final payment of $22,500.00 is made on my ranch."

Viah presented this paper to Jones, and it was by the latter accepted. It is conceded that the payment referred to in the order was the payment of $22,500 mentioned in the agreement from which quotation is above made. Plaintiff became the owner and holder of the order, which defendant has never paid, nor has he ever made any payment on the real property described in the agreement for purchase and sale between him and McCloskey, except the initial payment of $5,000, nor has he ever delivered the note and mortgage mentioned in the agreement. This action was commenced for the purpose of recovering on the order. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

[1-3] It is, of course, the law that, where a bill of exchange or order is "accepted according to the provisions of a particular contract, resort must be had to that contract to ascertain the terms of the acceptance" (8 C. J. 326), and that "a conditional acceptance becomes absolute on the performance or the happening of the condition, but such acceptance is not enforceable until complete fulfillment of the condition" (Id. 326, 327; see, also, Pohlman v. Wilcox, 146 Cal. 440, 80 Pac. 625); although it is probable that this last expression does not mean, to translate it into the terms of the present case, that appellant should have actually made the final payment provided for in the agreement for purchase and sale before his liability under the order became enforceable. The condition in the order was doubtless satisfied if appellant became liable to make that payment. The cause was tried upon such a theory, and appellant now concedes the correctness of the theory. We shall proceed upon the assumption that it is correct, without the citation of authority to support it.

[4] In pursuit of the theory just mentioned, the complaint contains the necessary allegation that McCloskey "has fully complied with each and all the terms and conditions of said agreement of sale. * * *" The trial court found that this averment was true, and appellant contends that the finding is not supported by the evidence. As a step toward the settlement of this question, and because of the somewhat involved manner in which the agreement is couched, we epitomize certain of its provisions, in the order of their performance as contemplated by the instrument, thus: (1) McCloskey was to place in escrow a deed conveying the real property to Jones free and clear of lien or incumbrance; (2) he was to furnish to Jones, for examination, an abstract or certificate of title showing that the deed conveyed the property free and clear of incumbrance; (3) Jones was to pay $23,800 and deliver the notes and mortgage, and, simultaneously, the escrow holder was to deliver to him the deed. If there be any doubt upon a cursory reading of the agreement whether these successive steps in its performance are properly set forth, that doubt is removed, inevitably, by a closer scrutiny of the instrument. It is plain that the first step was to have been the delivery of the deed in escrow. It is certain that the deed so delivered was to convey the property free and clear of incumbrance. A little reflection will demonstrate that the furnishing of the abstract or certificate of title was to have been the next step in order. The agreement was dated June 5, 1918, and in no event was the $23,800 to be paid, or the note and mortgage to be delivered, or the deed to pass from the escrow holder, earlier than November 1 of that year, a period of nearly five months elapsing between the two dates. That the furnishing of the abstract or certificate was to have been the second step in the performance of the agreement is predicable of at least two reasons: (1) While this document was not to have been furnished at any specified time, it was to have been forthcoming as soon as convenient. The use of this phrase is practically conclusive of the idea that the parties contemplated the furnishing of the abstract or certificate within less than five months. (2) The deal was not to have been completed, naturally, until McCloskey showed that he could convey a clear title, and the furnishing of an abstract or certificate was designated in the agreement as the usual means whereby the state of a title is ascertained. The parties plainly contemplated that Jones should not part with his money, or deliver the note and mortgage, or accept a deed, until the matter of the title was settled.

The evidence was insufficient to support the questioned finding. McCloskey never did more than deposit the deed in escrow. Therefore Jones was never put in default. The payment of $23,800 was never due from him, and he never became liable to deliver the note and mortgage. Therefore, also, his liability under the order sued on never became fixed.

It is unnecessary to discuss other points made by appellant.

Judgment in each case reversed.

SHAW v. PALMER. (Civ. 2643.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Jan. 25, 1924. As Corrected, Feb. 7, 1924.)

1. Wills $\S$ 742—Executor's compliance with agreement by which devisee surrendered his interest in a testator's estate held immaterial in determining devisee's claim to his separate property.

Where it was mutually agreed between the executor of decedent's will and a devisee that, if devisee would surrender whatever interest and claim he had in the estate of deceased, the executor would furnish him a suitable home for his natural life, and also pay the children of devisee by his former wife the legacies provided for them in the will of deceased, that the executor carried out the agreement was immaterial in determining devisee's claim to his separate property, consisting of five shares of stock which had been included in the property of the estate and distributed as an asset thereof, where the terms of the agreement which executor carried out were in harmony with the terms of the will.

2. Wills $\S$ 742—Agreement by devisee to relinquish his claim in decedent's estate held not applicable to certain property.

An agreement by the devisee under a will to relinquish whatever interest or claim he might have in the estate of decedent could not have any application to any property which was not specifically mentioned in the will or included in the inventory at the time that the agreement was made; it appearing that the agreement was made before the filing of the original inventory, and that there was no residuary clause in the will of deceased.

3. Judgment $\S$ 470—Judgment of court having jurisdiction of subject-matter conclusive, and not subject to collateral attack.

A judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the litigation of which such judgment is a culmination is conclusive, and cannot be challenged or attacked in a collateral proceeding.

4. Executors and administrators $\S$ 315(6)—Effect of decree of distribution in case of testacy stated.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1666, providing that decrees of distribution are conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees, in case of testacy, such decrees, in absence of a showing of mistake or fraud, are irrevocable, save upon appeal within the time provided by law, even though in contravention of the terms of the will.

5. Executors and administrators ☞315(6)—Devisee held not prevented by decree of distribution from claiming that certain property was his, and not decedent's.

Where plaintiff was a devisee under the will of his deceased wife, and property which he claimed as his separate right was not mentioned in the will nor in the inventory originally filed, but was by the executor of the will subsequently included in the assets of the estate, and devisee had no notice of the fact that his property had been so included and distributed, a decree of final distribution was not conclusive as against devisee, and therefore did not operate as an estoppel against his claim of title to such property.

6. Courts ☞200½—Probate court has no authority to determine disputed title to deceased person's property.

The superior court sitting in probate has no jurisdiction or authority to determine disputed titles to the property of the estate of a deceased person.

7. Executors and administrators ☞315(6)—Devisee, claiming property in his own right entitled to have question of title tried in court of competent jurisdiction.

Where plaintiff was a devisee under the will of his deceased wife, and the property which he claimed to be his in his own separate right was not mentioned in the will nor the inventory originally filed, but was by the executor subsequently included in the list of assets of the estate, devisee had the right to have the question of his title thereto litigated and adjudicated by a court having jurisdiction to try and determine questions of title to the property.

8. Executors and administrators ☞315(6)—Devisee bound by decree of distribution only so far as he was devisee.

A devisee under a will is bound by the decree of distribution of the probate court only so far as he is a devisee, and is not bound by such decree in so far as it purports to distribute his separate property.

9. Trover and conversion ☞13—Proper remedy.

If a party converts the personal property of another, it is immaterial by what means the conversion is effected; the owner being entitled to proceed in conversion for damages for the wrongful act, or in replevin to recover the specific property, or damages if it cannot be restored.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Elias Shaw against W. E. Palmer, also known as William Ellsworth Palmer. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

V. L. Hatfield and W. H. Hatfield, both of Sacramento (J. T. McMenamin, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action in conversion, and involves the question of the alleged wrongful conversion by defendant of five shares of stock in the Associated Oil Company, a corporation.

The complaint alleges that the certificate of said shares of stock was on or about the 18th day of December, 1920, the property and in the possession of the plaintiff, but that on the said 18th day of December the defendant "wrongfully took the said certificate from the possession of plaintiff, and converted and disposed of it to his own use, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $500." It is alleged that at said time the said certificate of stock had been indorsed in blank by the plaintiff. The prayer is for judgment for the sum named, with interest, etc.

The answer specifically denies the averments of the complaint, and alleges that the defendant, during all the time mentioned in the complaint, was, "and is now," the owner and entitled to the possession of the said certificate of stock and the shares of the capital stock in the said Associated Oil Company covered thereby; that long prior to the commencement of this action "the said plaintiff transferred and conveyed all the right, title, and interest he ever had in and to said certificate." The following special defense is set up: That, prior to the 18th day of December, 1920, one Mary Jane Shaw was the owner and entitled to the possession of the said certificate of stock; that said Mary Jane Shaw died intestate, in the county of Sonoma, state of California, prior to said 18th day of December, 1920; that her last will and testament was thereafter duly probated, and that on the 31st day of May, 1921, a decree of distribution of her estate was regularly made and entered; that in and by said decree of distribution the said certificate of stock was distributed to the defendant, and that "thereupon he became, and ever since has been, and is now, the owner thereof, and the said decree of distribution is final and conclusive, and the same has never been modified, annulled, or revoked, and no appeal has ever been taken therefrom, and the said Mary Jane Shaw above mentioned, was the wife of said plaintiff."

It appears that the defendant was the son of the deceased by a former husband; that the plaintiff, prior to his intermarriage with the deceased, some 30 or more years prior to her decease, had been married to another and that 9 children were the result of that union; that the real property owned by the deceased had several years prior to her death been given and transferred to her by the plaintiff. It further appears that the stock in controversy was issued to the plaintiff, and that it was indorsed in blank by him immediately upon its issuance and delivery to him.

By her will the deceased devised to the defendant the real property mentioned and described therein, subject, however, to a life estate in said property to the plaintiff, and bequeathed to the sons and daughters of the plaintiff by his former marriage the aggregate sum of $4,000, to be divided equally among them. Bequests of certain other stock were made to the defendant and one Stephen Meeker. The will made no mention or reference to the stock in dispute. Nor was it included among the assets of the estate as returned or reported in the original inventory. The will did not name a residuary legatee, all of the property of the deceased mentioned in the will being thereby specifically disposed of.

There was testimony that, after the petition for the settlement of the final account and final distribution of the estate had been filed, the certificate of stock in question was for the first time discovered, and the defendant testified that it was found in a tin box belonging to the deceased, in which her will had previously been found, and which was in the possession of a bank at Sebastopol, Sonoma county, where it had always been kept by the deceased in her lifetime. Claiming that the stock was the property of the deceased, notwithstanding that it was in the name of the plaintiff, the defendant, as executor of the will of deceased, took possession thereof, and by supplemental proceedings caused the stock to be included in the inventory (section 1451, Code Civ. Proc.), and the decree of final distribution was accordingly so amended as that said stock was distributed to the defendant as the "residuary legatee," contrary to the terms of the will, there being, as seen, no residuary legatee mentioned in the instrument.

[1] It was shown that on January 22, 1921, shortly after the filing of the petition for the probate of the will of the deceased, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into an agreement, in writing, whereby it was mutually agreed that the plaintiff would relinquish and surrender whatever interest he had or might claim in and to the estate of the deceased, upon the consideration that the defendant would provide and furnish the plaintiff a suitable home "and necessary provision" for his natural life, on the premises known as the "Shaw Home Place," and also pay to the children of the plaintiff by his former wife the legacies provided for them in the will of the deceased.

[2] The court found that this agreement was carried out by the defendant. This, however, would, in any event, be of little consequence in the decision of this case, since the terms of the agreement are in harmony with the terms of the will. Indeed, the agreement could not have any application to any property which was not specifically mentioned in the will or included in the inventory at the time that the agreement was made, it appearing that the agreement was made on the 22d day of January, 1921, and that the original inventory, while made on January 21, 1921, was not filed until January 27, 1921, and it also appearing, as has been shown, that there was no residuary clause in the will of the deceased.

The court also found that the petition for a decree of final distribution of the estate was duly and regularly filed and due legal notice of the time and place fixed for the hearing thereof given, and on the day and at the time so fixed the said matter came on for hearing, and that no person appeared to interpose any objection to or protest against the final account and decree, or filed any written objections thereto; that the final account was thereupon settled and the decree entered. The court found as a fact and concluded as a matter of law that the said decree was and has been from the time of its entry final and conclusive as to plaintiff and all other persons, "and by reason thereof the said plaintiff is estopped from asserting any title to the said certificate of stock and from maintaining this action."

Judgment passed accordingly, and a motion for a new trial was denied. The appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment. The issues of fact to which evidence was addressed in the court below were as to the ownership of the stock, and, as incidental to that question, or as bearing more or less upon the question of ownership, whether the certificate of stock in dispute was, after the death of the deceased, found in the tin box belonging to her, and which was held for her by the bank. The court made no finding upon that issue, basing its decision, as will be observed, upon the theory that the decree of final distribution was conclusive as against the plaintiff, and consequently operated as an estoppel against his claim of title to the stock in controversy. It will therefore not be necessary to present a detailed statement of the testimony. It will suffice to say, generally, that the plaintiff testified that he bought the shares of stock with his own separate money; that he had never sold or transferred the same to any other person, and that said property still belonged to him. The defendant, on the other hand, testified that the stock was purchased by his mother, the deceased, and at her request, and for the reason, as she declared when the stock was purchased by her, that she did not desire to be annoyed with the consequences of a stockholder's liability, she authorized the certificate to be issued in the name of her husband, the plaintiff herein, and that it was for that reason that the plaintiff indorsed the stock in blank, etc.

[3, 4] The conclusion of the trial court, as crystallized in its decision and judgment, is founded on an erroneous theory. It is, of course, manifestly true, and, indeed, elementary, that the judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the litigation of which such judgment is the culmination is conclusive upon the whole world, and that, as a necessary corollary of that doctrine, it cannot be challenged or attacked in a collateral proceeding. The remedy of the party aggrieved by the judgment must be by a direct attack on the judgment, as by appeal; or, in case the time for appealing has lapsed, then by a suit in equity, if there exist grounds—for instance, extrinsic fraud or mistake brought about by fraud—for vitiating the effect of the judgment which will justify a court of equity in interposing its remedial aid in behalf of the party claiming to be aggrieved thereby; or by proceeding, within the time prescribed, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As to the conclusiveness of decrees of final distribution, section 1666 of the Code of Civil Procedure controls. It provides, inter alia, that such decrees are “conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees, subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal.” And by virtue of the terms of that section, in the case of testacy, the decree, “in the absence of a showing of mistake or fraud, is irrevocable, save upon appeal within the time provided by law, even though it was in contravention of the terms of the will.” Miller v. Pitman, 189 Cal. 544, 182 Pac. 50.

[5] But, obviously, such decree cannot have the effect of conclusiveness as against a party, whether he be an heir or a devisee or a legatee under the will, where he is either a claimant in his own right in antagonism to the estate, or his individual property has been, without his knowledge or consent, included among the assets of the estate, and has been assigned by the decree to the heirs, legatees, or devisees under the will. Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 Pac. 724; Matter of the Estate of Jane Rowland, Deceased, 74 Cal. 523, 526, 16 Pac. 315, 5 Am. St. Rep. 464; In re Clark's Estate (Cal. Sup.) 212 Pac. 622; Estate of Wenks, 171 Cal. 607, 154 Pac. 24.

In Bath v. Valdez, supra, the action was to quiet title to certain real property of which the plaintiff claimed ownership, but which the court, sitting in probate had previously, by its decree of distribution, entered in the matter of the estate of Julian Valdez, deceased, distributed to the defendant. The defendant, in the action to quiet title, interposed, among other defenses, the plea of estoppel, based on the decree of distribution in the probate proceedings in the estate of said Julian Valdez, deceased. The trial court upheld the plea of estoppel and gave judgment to the defendant. On appeal the judgment was reversed, the court saying, after disposing of another point:

“The real question, however, remains, and is, Was he [plaintiff] estopped by the decree from setting up the independent estate which he had acquired under the statute of limitations? Had the plaintiff appeared in the probate proceedings and set up his title adverse to the estate, acquired by him under the statute of limitations, the court had no authority to hear and determine the question thus raised. ‘The probate court has jurisdiction to settle the estate of a deceased person, and has no power, save in certain excepted instances, to determine disputes between the heirs or representatives of the deceased and third persons.’ [Citing Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447.] It is the estate of the deceased upon which the probate court administers. It is the title which the deceased had in and to real property at the time of his death, or which has inured to the estate after death and before distribution, which passes to the heirs and devisees. If there are outstanding or adverse claims to the estate vested in third parties, they are not affected by the probate proceedings, save as in cases of liens, etc., especially provided for by statute. Actions may be maintained by the executor or administrator of an estate to recover possession of the real property, for partition thereof, or to quiet title thereto. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1581, 1582. The probate court may inquire if the estate has an interest in or title to real property, and if this question is decided in the affirmative, may distribute such estate; but it has no jurisdiction to determine the quality of the title, whether it be good or bad, but will leave the parties to pursue their remedies in a proper form. Estate of John Dunn, Myrick's Prob. Rep. 122.”

In Re Estate of Rowland, supra, the appellant made claim in the probate court that certain money and property in the hands of the executors of the will of the deceased constituted community property of the appellant and deceased, and asked that the same be segregated from the separate property of the testatrix and delivered to him instead of being distributed to a legatee under the will. It was the contention on appeal that the claim of the appellant was concluded by the decree of distribution. The court, holding that contention to be untenable, said:

“Under section 1666, Code of Civil Procedure, the decree is only made conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, and devisees. As appellant does not, as to the claim, come within the category of these, he will not be bound thereby. He appears in a two-fold capacity: (1) As a legatee under the will, and as to his rights as such he will be bound by the decree; and (2) as a claimant, in his own right, antagonistic to the estate. In this latter capacity he will be no more concluded than a third party would be, who might chance to claim real estate adversely to decedent and his representatives. Freeman on Judgments, § 66, and cases cited; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 359. If, as may well be, his demand only amounts to a claim against the estate, which should have been presented to the executors, it cannot alter the case as presented here.”

In this case the situation is simply this: That the plaintiff was a devisee under the will of his deceased wife; that property which he claimed to be his in his own separate right was not mentioned in the will, nor in the inventory originally filed, but was by the executor of the will subsequently included in the list of the assets of the estate; that the plaintiff had no other or further notice of the fact that said property was a part of the estate administered upon and distributed to one of the heirs and devisees under the will than the constructive notice prescribed by law; in other words, he had no actual notice of the fact that his separate property had been included in the property of the estate and distributed as an asset of the estate.

[6-8] The superior court, sitting in probate, has no jurisdiction or authority to determine disputed titles to the property of the estate of a deceased person. See cases above cited. The plaintiff claims to be and to have always been the owner in his separate right of the stock in controversy, and, as that claim is disputed by the party to whom the stock was distributed, he has the right to have the question of his title thereto litigated and adjudicated by a court having jurisdiction to try and determine questions of title to property. The fact that the plaintiff was also a devisee under the will of the deceased does not alter the situation. As stated in the cases above cited, he was bound by the decree only in so far as he was an heir, a devisee, or a legatee. He certainly could not be bound by the decree in so far as it purported to distribute his separate property no more than could a third party or an entire stranger to the will of the deceased and the proceedings attending the administration of the estate could be bound thereby. Let it be supposed that the executor of a will of a deceased person should cause to be included in the inventory setting forth the property and other assets of the estate of the deceased the real or personal property of a person in no way connected with the deceased or her estate and not mentioned in the will, and that such property was distributed to the heirs according to the terms of the will. Could it be said that in such case such party would be bound by the decree of distribution so that he could not maintain an action for the recovery of such property against the heirs to whom the same had been distributed by the probate court? The question answers itself. The plaintiff here is, as to the property in dispute, if it be his separate property, as much a stranger to the probate proceedings in which his wife's estate was administered as though he were not an heir or a devisee under the will of the deceased. It is a maxim of our law that there is no wrong without a remedy, but, if a party were to be held bound by a decree of distribution giving his individual property to some other person, he would be wholly remediless, since the question of title cannot be tried in the superior court sitting in probate, and to the maxim referred to we would, in its application, meet with a manifestly absurd as well as a disastrous exception. Of course, if the plaintiff in this case, at the time the estate was undergoing administration and the final decree was entered, had actual knowledge of the fact that the stock had been listed as a portion of the estate of the deceased and that a decree distributing the property to the defendant had been entered, and he at no time made any protest against or objection thereto, there being no fraud or misrepresentation or mistake at the bottom of his silence, he might be held to be estopped, not by the judgment or decree, however, but by estoppel in pais, particularly if the property so distributed had, before he took any steps to have the matter corrected, gotten into the hands of innocent purchasers. Or he would probably be bound if, after obtaining knowledge of the fact that his property had thus been disposed of, he failed to proceed to assert his rights until after the statute of limitations had barred them. But this case comes within neither of the exceptions just referred to.

[9] We conclude that an action in conversion affords the proper remedy for the relief sought by the plaintiff. If a party converts the personal property of another, it matters not by what means the conversion is effected, the owner of the property may either proceed in conversion for damages for the wrongful act or in replevin to recover the specific property or damages if it cannot be restored.

The judgment is reversed.

65 Cal. App. 331

PEOPLE v. HIGHTOWER. (Cr. 1068.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Jan. 18, 1924.)

1. Homicide $\S$ 250—Circumstantial evidence held to show guilt of murder to moral certainty.

Facts and circumstances held to show guilt of murder to a moral certainty, and conviction therefor not unjust.

2. Witnesses $\S$ 330(1)—Limiting cross-examination of state witness as to means of recollection of date of crime held within court's discretion.

Where state's witness stated she had been with defendant up to about 7:30 p. m. on the night of the homicide, and on cross-examination fixed the date from having gone to a theater with another man after leaving defendant after her dinner with him in a restaurant, the court was within its discretion in limiting further cross-examination when it was evident that her answers would throw no more light on the subject.

3. Witnesses ⇨267—Limiting cross-examination of witness corroborating state witness held within court's discretion.

Where state's witness fixed the homicide as of the date she attended a theater with another man after having had dinner with defendant at a restaurant, restricting cross-examination of the other man, corroborating her evidence, concerning his occupation, was within trial court's discretion.

4. Criminal law ⇨656(9)—Trial court's remarks held to be on expert's qualification, and not on weight of his evidence.

In murder prosecution, during cross-examination of an expert witness, court's remarks that, considering the expert's standing, it would be sufficient, after examination of exemplars in evidence, to give his opinion as to the authorship of a letter, and that he had been an expert for more than a quarter of a century in the court, referred to witness' qualification, and not to the weight of his evidence.

5. Criminal law ⇨730(4)—District attorney's reading in jury's presence of affidavit concerning conduct of juror held without prejudice.

In murder prosecution, where during course of trial one of defendant's attorneys drove a woman juror about town in his automobile, defendant was not prejudiced by the reading by the district attorney of an affidavit in jury's presence concerning the incident, in view of the exoneration of the attorney and the juror of contempt, and court's instruction not to permit the matter to be considered.

6. Criminal law ⇨730(3)—District attorney's good-faith question to defendant's character witness as to specific acts inconsistent with good character held not prejudicial.

In murder prosecution, where character witness had stated that defendant's reputation for peace and quiet was good, district attorney's good-faith question to him as to his knowledge of defendant's having constructed a trap gun to kill a Mexican, which did kill him, and of his being buried by defendant held, if improper, without prejudice; an objection to the question having been sustained, and the jury instructed to disregard it.

7. Witnesses ⇨274(2)—Character witness may be cross-examined as to knowledge of reports of particular charges inconsistent with good character.

A character witness may be cross-examined as to his knowledge of reports of particular and specific charges of the commission of acts inconsistent with the character which he is called on to prove.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

William A. Hightower was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William F. Herron, of San Francisco, E. J. Emmons, of Bakersfield, Albert Mansfield, of Redwood City, and W. W. Laidley, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant was accused by information of the crime of murder. He was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and this is an appeal from the order denying the motion and from the judgment.

It is not contended that the evidence is insufficient to convict, but it is claimed that it is of such a character as to leave room for grave doubt as to the defendant's guilt, and, this being so, that the errors complained of become important where they might be considered otherwise under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution in a case where they did not result in an unjust conviction.

[1] The crime itself which gave occasion to this trial is of its nature the most horrid and atrocious that can well be conceived by the human mind, and words are inadequate to express in proper colors its barbarous enormity.

Father Patrick Heslin, a man over 60 years of age, was the priest of Holy Angels parish at the town of Colma, San Mateo county. He resided at the parish house adjoining the church, which is a few hundred feet from the state highway, which forms the main thoroughfare of that little community. Miss Magdalena Wendell was Father Heslin's housekeeper. On the evening of August 2, 1921, at about 9 o'clock, while the priest was in his study, a Ford automobile stopped in front of the premises, and the occupant of the machine rang the parish doorbell. Miss Wendell answered the call. She was confronted by a strange man wearing a slouch hat and large, dark-colored glasses. He inquired if the father was in, and, on being informed that he was, the visitor expressed a desire to see him. He was invited to enter the house. This invitation he refused, giving as a reason that he was in a hurry. Father Heslin was then called by his housekeeper, and he immediately came to the door, spoke a few words with the visitor, re-entered the house, went up stairs, and a few moments later descended with his hat and his stole (a religious vestment). He carried with him a morocco-bound case containing the sacrament and holy oils for anointing the sick. Upon being asked by his housekeeper if it was a sick case, he answered her in the affirmative. He then entered the church, and shortly thereafter joined the visitor, who in the meantime had turned his machine around so that it pointed away from San Francisco and in the direction of Salada Beach, a small settlement some six miles distant, located close to the sea to the west. Father Heslin entered the machine; it was operated from the seat by the driver, indicating that it was equipped with a self-starter. The occupants then proceeded upon their journey, and Father Heslin was never thereafter seen alive. The next morning, August 3d, the church bell failed to ring at the accustomed hour, and the housekeeper, upon making an investigation, discovered the edifice locked. Other circumstances aroused her suspicions, caused her to become apprehensive, and she notified the authorities. The same morning, at about 10 or 11 o'clock and before Father Heslin's disappearance had become generally known, there was received at St. Mary's Cathedral, in San Francisco, a letter, dated August 3d. This letter was opened, and it proved to be a lengthy anonymous document, partly typed and partly written, and in substance it contained the information that the writer had Father Heslin in a bootleg cellar. The sum of $6,500 was demanded in currency for his release. The letter also contained the information that the priest had been injured, was unconscious from brain pressure, and it advised haste. It was suggested that the money be brought to the parish house where the priest had lived at 9 o'clock that evening, at which time and place, so it was stated, a messenger would furnish instructions. The letter contained certain threats as to what might happen in the event that the instructions were not followed and the money not forthcoming.

Subsequent to the receipt of this letter various rewards were on the 8th day of August offered by the Roman Catholic archbishop and public authorities for the return of Father Heslin, dead or alive. On the evening of August 10th defendant appeared at the residence of the archbishop in San Francisco for the stated purpose of registering for the offered reward. He claimed that he had a clue to the grave of the missing priest. At the very moment of his call an Examiner representative was admitted to the home of the archbishop. Before an interview was accorded either visitor defendant entered into conversation with the newspaper representative concerning his supposed clue, and informed him that the place was in the vicinity of Colma. Upon repeating this statement to the archbishop defendant was advised to communicate with the police. He expressed his reluctance to do so, giving as his reasons that his right to the reward might be jeopardized, he fearing the police would claim it. He further stated that he had in mind the possibility that his clue might reveal a liquor cache, in which event he did not want the police to know anything about it, as he desired to give the liquor to the friend who gave him the information, as she was engaged in that business.

After this interview with the archbishop defendant agreed to accompany the newspaper man to the office of the Examiner, where he imparted his information to the city editor of the paper. His story, in substance, was to the effect that he had met a woman of the night life on the street, who told him that one of her patrons, while drunk, had stated to her that he had something valuable buried "in a cave" which was being guarded by a man "cooking hot cakes." Defendant recalled, so he stated, that there was an Albers flapjack flour sign just off the road which ran between Colma and Salada Beach, having a picture thereon depicting a man frying flapjacks. He further stated that the following day he visited this place and was attracted to a niche or cave in the cliff which was near the sign; that he dug around in the sand until he extracted a piece of bur-lap covered with blood and had found several discharged pistol cartridges near there. Several days later he made another tour of inspection, and by prodding into the sand with a stick had turned up a piece of black cloth, but had made no further investigation. Upon receiving this information the city editor telephoned the police. Certain police officers and newspaper men made up a party to investigate defendant's story. The party was led by him to a spot which proved to be the priest's grave. The place was a shelf or ledge some 10 feet below the rim of the cliff. The body of the priest was removed, and the autopsy subsequently held revealed that death had resulted from a blow on the top of the head and two bullet wounds in the side. It was the opinion of the autopsy surgeon that the body had been dead for a week or more. The next day a thorough search was made by the authorities in the vicinity of Father Heslin's grave. There was there found several articles which subsequently proved to be important. They consisted of pieces of lumber which had a string or cord tied about them. The string bore evidence of having been cut with a knife. There was also imbedded in the sands tent stakes and a cinch block used to tighten the guy ropes of a tent.

Following the finding of the body defendant was detained for questioning. He repeated his story to the police that a woman of the underworld, named Dolly Mason, had informed him of a conversation which she had had with a drunken foreigner, and that, acting on this information, he had made his discovery. On the night of the priest's disappearance defendant was living at a downtown hotel with a woman named Dorris Shirley, who had accompanied him to San Francisco from Salt Lake City. His room was visited and searched by the authorities and a tent with stakes and a cinch block were there found of the same make and similar in design to those found at the priest's grave. In the seams of the tent was sand and on the side thereof in large block letters was printed the word "Tuberculosis." Defendant admitted having printed the word upon the tent with his fountain pen, giving as a reason that prowlers would not bother him in his use of the same. The tent had attached to it pieces of string which bore evidence of having been cut with a knife.

Upon examination this string proved to be identical in material and structure with that tied around the planks found at the grave. Other articles found in the room consisted of an incomplete machine gun, defendant's own invention, and another of his inventions consisting of shotgun shells grouped together and described in the record as an infernal machine. This contrivance was wrapped in a piece of burlap covered with human blood. Defendant had had this contrivance buried in the vicinity of the priest's grave, so he stated, prior to the time he had located it, having taken it there to experiment with. He further stated he had brought the machine back to San Francisco wrapped in the bloody piece of burlap above referred to.

Defendant was thereafter charged with the murder of Father Heslin. It was proved at the trial that he had been seen in the vicinity of Salada Beach prior to the time when the crime was committed, and other evidence showed that he was familiar with the country. The niche where the body was found was about 10 feet below the rim of the surface, and in front thereof was a narrow ledge, the overhang of which formed almost a perpendicular cliff which dropped off abruptly a considerable distance to the beach below. At the time defendant first led the authorities to the grave he showed his familiarity with the surroundings by immediately jumping down upon the narrow ledge and locating the exact position of the body, although the night was thick in darkness between Colma and the ocean by reason of a drizzling fog which prevented the searchers from seeing a few feet ahead. The party had no artificial light except that furnished by matches, which it was impossible to keep burning on account of the strong wind which was blowing, and no light was procured until after the body was found. It was proved that defendant had rented a self-starter Ford automobile on August 1, 1921, but had not used it except for a short period until August 2d. This machine was left by him in front of the premises of the owner some time after 11 o'clock of the evening of that day, the owner's place of business being then closed. In accounting for his whereabouts on the evening of the murder defendant stated to the authorities different stories on different occasions. He first claimed that he was driving the hired machine back and forth on the state highway between the towns of Colma and Redwood City for the purpose of meeting a stranger on a motorcycle to arrange with the stranger for the purchase of bootleg whisky. Again he stated that he was driving the machine with Dorris Shirley as a companion; that he had started about dusk and had gone to San Jose; and he entered into a detailed description of the trip, and claimed that he had returned somewhere about midnight. It further appeared that defendant had met Dorris Shirley in Salt Lake City, and that she had accompanied him to San Francisco, where they had lived together as man and wife in various hotels. She testified that while she had gone to dinner with defendant the early part of the evening of August 2d she had left him immediately thereafter, and had accompanied one Lee Putman to Pantages Theatre, where she spent the entire evening, and that she was not with defendant on a trip to San Jose or to any other place. Defendant admitted that his statement that the Shirley woman had gone to San Jose with him was false in this particular, but he still maintained that the object of renting the machine was to meet a bootlegger, and that he had driven the machine as far down the highway as Redwood City for that purpose. Defendant was questioned concerning a .45-caliber automatic pistol that he had purchased from a man in Nevada. He admitted that he had made the purchase, but claimed that he had sold the same to a stranger in a park prior to the time the murder was committed. He also admitted he had pawned the holster of the weapon with three cartridges in it similar to those found at the priest's grave. In pawning this article defendant gave the name of Davis. Other facts were proved at the trial. Experts in handwriting testified positively that the block letters contained in the ransom letter were written by defendant, and Marie Wendell, the housekeeper, positively identified defendant as the nocturnal visitor with whom the dead priest was last seen alive. When arrested a knife was found on defendant's person. A microscopical examination was made of it with the object of determining the purpose of its last use. Two photomicrographs were also made and enlarged, and they showed that attached to a nick in the blade were pieces of cotton fiber similar to and corresponding with the cord used on the tent.

Taking all these facts together, we cannot agree with counsel for the defense that the case presents a situation where there is a grave doubt as to defendant's guilt. In our opinion the facts and circumstances show guilt to a moral certainty, and the evidence is so strong as to be less fallible than any result arrived at by direct evidence. Where, as here, it is so convincing as to necessarily produce certainty and conviction, it matters not that it is of a circumstantial character, and indeed it affords at least as satisfactory proof as if it were direct. Evidence of facts that might have thrown light upon his acts is missing. The very existence of several persons, namely, Dolly Mason, the purchaser of the revolver, one Sairgrease, to whom defendant claims he loaned the tent, and the persons with whom he stated he used it in connection with a picnic are wholly unaccounted for, and indeed, it would seem they are purely mythical. Other facts might be commented upon, but we believe no useful purpose would be subserved thereby, as no complaint is made as to the insufficiency of the evidence.

[2, 3] As ground for reversal appellant first complains of misconduct on the part of the trial judge in restricting the cross-examination of the Putnams. The Putnam woman, also known as Dorris Shirley, testified upon her direct examination that upon the evening of August 2, 1921, the date of the disappearance of the priest, she had ridden with defendant in the Ford machine down to Market street and had dinner with him; that she left him on that street at about 7:30 p. m.; that she later met Putman, with whom she visited the Pantages Theatre, and that when she started home she looked at her watch and it was 10 minutes of 11; that she undressed and went to bed, and that some time later defendant arrived, but she could not fix the hour. Upon cross-examination she was asked how she fixed August 2d as the date on which she visited the theater with Putman, and she answered that she met Putman on the 1st and went there with him the following evening. When asked how she knew it was the first of the month that she met Putman, she answered, "By the date —by the calendar." The defense sought to pursue the inquiry further by testing her recollection as to her action upon other dates, but it was manifest from her answers that she could throw no further light upon the subject, and the court properly exercised its discretion in closing the inquiry. Lee Putman corroborated her with reference to the date of their visit to the theater, and the trial court restricted his cross-examination concerning his occupation. This matter was also one for the proper exercise of the court's discretion. The same may be said with reference to the cross-examination of Marie Wendell, the housekeeper.

[4] As further ground for reversal appellant complains of certain remarks of the trial judge referring to the qualifications of one of the experts. The remarks were made during cross-examination and after the witness had qualified. In order to expedite the proceedings the court stated:

"I assume, gentlemen, that, considering the standing of this expert, it would be sufficient for him to say after a sufficient examination with these exemplars that have been admitted in evidence and the letter which was received at the cathedral, it would be sufficient for him to give his opinion as to the authorship of that letter and then stop and let the matter rest."

And again, in reference to this same witness, the court restated:

"He has been an expert for more than a quarter of a century in my court. Of course if you think it essential you may proceed."

We fail to see how these remarks affected the substantial rights of the defendant. They merely referred to the qualification of the witness, which it was the duty of the court to pass upon, and not to the weight of his evidence. Furthermore, no objection was made by counsel for the defendant to either of the remarks.

[5] It is also urged that the trial judge was likewise guilty of misconduct in permitting the district attorney to read in the presence of the jury an affidavit concerning one of the women members thereof and one of defendant's counsel. The incident grew out of the act of the attorney driving the juror about town in his automobile during the course of the trial. Upon the conclusion of the reading of the affidavit the court declined to hear the attorney, and cited both him and the juror for contempt of court. We fail to see how this incident affected the rights of the defendant. Both the attorney and the juror were subsequently exonerated, the jurors so advised, and they were instructed not to permit the matter to enter into their consideration in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant, but to obliterate it entirely from their minds.

[6, 7] And, finally, it is claimed that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct. Defendant had produced certain character witnesses. One of these witnesses had testified that the reputation of defendant for peace and quiet was good when defendant had lived in Bakersfield. He was then asked by the district attorney if he did not know that defendant had been hired to construct a contrivance consisting of shotgun shells so arranged as to kill a Mexican when he crossed a certain path, and that the Mexican was killed and buried by defendant. An objection to this line of examination was sustained, and the jury was instructed to pay no attention to it whatever. A character witness may be cross-examined as to his knowledge of reports of particular and specific charges of the commission of acts inconsistent with the character which he is called upon to prove, such questions go to the weight of his evidence. Underhill on Crim. Ev. (2d Ed.) 82. There is nothing in the record to show that the district attorney did not act in good faith in asking the question. The question in our opinion was within the proper bounds of cross-examination. People v. Fodera, 33 al. App. 8, 164 Pac. 22. But, even if it be assumed the question was improper, we do not think the asking of it in any manner prejudiced the substantial rights of the defendant, as an objection to it was sustained, and the jury admonished to disregard it.

In conclusion it may be said that the record upon the whole shows that defendant was given a fair and impartial trial, and the evidence of his guilt seems so clear and convincing that one reading it cannot escape the conclusion that he has been very leniently dealt with. There certainly has been no miscarriage of justice so far as he is concerned.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BOYLES v. LEONARDO. (Civ. 4442.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 17, 1924.) Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 17, 1924.)

1. Attorney and client ⇨143—Contract to pay fee held supported by consideration.

Contract of woman seeking divorce from her husband, to pay attorney's fees in return for services, held supported by a consideration.

2. Work and labor ⇨10—Attorney entitled to reasonable value of services though guilty of fraud.

Even though an attorney was guilty of fraud in inducing client to sign contract, in that he overreached the client in the matter of charges, the attorney was entitled to recover the reasonable value of the services rendered on an implied contract.

3. Attorney and client ⇨143—$5,000 fee for services held not so excessive as to show fraud in contract therefor.

A contract to pay attorney $5,000 for services in divorce case held not shown fraudulent in that client was overreached in the matter of the size of the charge.

4. Attorney and client ⇨166(3) — Evidence held admissible on question of reasonableness of fee charged.

Where plaintiff attorney believing that one element in setting the fee in a divorce case was the amount involved, and defendant, apparently believing that in setting the fee the sole question was the amount of time that should have been consumed and not the amount of time that was actually consumed, asked certain questions accordingly, the court did not err in sustaining in the matter of admission of evidence the theory of the plaintiff, and in overruling the theory of the defendant, which was incorrect.

5. Appeal and error ⇨173(2)—Question of fraud in procuring allowance of fees held not before appellate court in action to recover agreed compensation.

In an action by attorney to recover agreed compensation of $5,000 from woman employing him in divorce case, defendant cannot claim that fraud was practiced on the trial court in that plaintiff placed defendant on the stand to ask an allowance of attorney's fees under Civ. Code, § 137, the question not then being presented.

6. Divorce ⇨197—Attorney. In divorce case held entitled to recover agreed compensation notwithstanding allowance by court of attorney's fees.

An attorney was entitled to recover $5,000 agreed compensation for services in divorce case, though he placed defendant client on the stand to ask an allowance of attorney's fees under Civ. Code, § 137, and $5,000 was then allowed, defendant committing no act that destroyed her valid contract, under sections 1697-1699, and since facts working an estoppel as to her will not necessarily work an estoppel as to plaintiff, who was once her attorney and who sues sui juris, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1908.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by E. M. Boyles against Mary Leonardo. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. Gonsalves, of Oakland (J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The action was brought to recover a judgment for attorney fees which the plaintiff alleged were performed by his assignors for the plaintiff in a certain divorce case commenced by the defendant. The trial court awarded the plaintiff a decree, and the defendant has appealed therefrom.

Prior to May 23, 1921, Joseph J. Leonardo and Mary Leonardo had been husband and wife. Either as his separate property in part, or as community property at least in part, they were at that time possessed of a number of pieces of property of considerable value. Some of those properties were in Portugal, and some were in California. Prior to the date last mentioned, Mary Leonardo called on plaintiff's assignors, complained to them that her husband was in the habit of brutally beating and whipping her, and consulted them as to her rights. Mr. Donahue at first took charge of the matter and commenced a series of conversations in which he attempted to settle the troubles existing between the Leonardos. Failing in that effort, a further conference took place between him and Mrs. Leonardo. At that time it was determined to commence the divorce case. Mr. Donahue testified that at that time he stated the fee would be $5,000, and Mrs. Leonardo said, "All right." Thereupon, May 23, 1921, the action in divorce was filed. Later an application for temporary maintenance and for costs and an attorney fee was made. The application was brought to a hearing and on June 3, 1921, an order was made awarding the plaintiff $250 per month pending suit, $250 costs, and $500 on account of her attorney fees. While the court proceedings stood at that stage, the attorneys for the respective parties conducted such negotiations as led to a tentative property settlement. On July 11, 1921, the husband paid $500 to his wife for attorney fees, and on the same day a conversation was had between plaintiff's assignors and their client which resulted in a writing dated July 11, 1921, which is as follows:

"When a settlement is made between J. J. Leonardo and myself entered into this day and when said ten thousand dollars is paid and said note for $35,000.00 is executed I agree to pay to Donahue and Hynes the sum of $4,500.00 less $500.00 already paid by said J. J. Leonardo, for attorney's fees and costs. Dated: July 11th, 1921. Mary Leonardo."

Mr. Donahue testified that when that paper was written by him that Mrs. Leonardo signed it and expressed her satisfaction with the terms stated in it. Later several papers were written and signed by the respective parties, but they were not delivered because the husband had some trouble in getting the cash to make a cash payment. Consultations and conferences continued. Later matters so fell out that the wife did not accept or act on the tentative agreement as to a settlement of property rights, and furthermore she caused the divorce action to be dismissed. However, she did accept a property settlement which was drawn up by her husband's attorney.

Shortly after the dismissal of the divorce action the plaintiff filed this action. The complaint pleads the rights of the plaintiff in two counts. The first count pleads an express contract. The second count pleads an implied contract resting on the reasonable value of the services rendered. The defendant filed an answer in which she denied the material allegations contained in the complaint, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting without a jury. The court made findings in favor of the plaintiff on the issues presented by the first count and the answer thereto.

[1] The appellant contends that the contract was without any consideration. A most casual reading of the record shows the point is without merit as thus stated. Later the question arises from another aspect, and then it is more serious. We pass it for the present.

[2, 3] The appellant's second point is that the contract was vitiated by fraud. In this connection the appellant's argument is twofold. She claims the contract was fraudulent as being an attempt on the part of an attorney to overreach his client in the matter of charges. Even though the charge had been sustained as to the first count, nevertheless the plaintiff would have been entitled to the reasonable value of the services rendered in response to the issues tendered by the second count. However, the plaintiff assumed the full burden of proving the issues as tendered by both counts. He introduced proof, which, if the court believed it, would have warranted a judgment on either count. The trial court saw fit to rest its judgment on the first count. Clearly we have no power to disturb it on such a record. Two disinterested attorneys testified that the charge was reasonable, and Mr. Donahue testified the same way and submitted himself to a cross-examination which did not break down his testimony given on direct examination. There was no overreaching proved.

[4] At this time and in this connection it may be stated that the appellant made objections to questions, the objections were overruled, and she noted exceptions to the rulings which are of one class and may be so treated. The respondent, believing that one element in setting a fee was the amount of money involved, and the appellant, apparently believing that in setting a fee the sole question was the amount of time that should have been consumed and not the amount of time that was actually consumed, asked certain questions accordingly. The theory of the respondent was clearly correct, and the theory of the appellant was incorrect.

[5, 6] The second ground on which appellant charges fraud is that a fraud has been practiced on the trial court. In other words, it is her contention that if the oral contract was made, as testified to by Mr. Donahue, then it followed that later Mrs. Leonardo should not have been placed on the stand to ask an allowance of attorney fees under the provisions of Civil Code, § 137. Be this as it may, the question was not then presented and is not now before this court. However, we have before us a claim that before appearance was made in the divorce case Mrs. Leonardo entered into a contract to pay an attorney fee of $5,000. She had a perfect right to do so. She committed no act thereafter that destroyed that valid contract. Civil Code, § 1697-1699. Neither did plaintiff's assignors. If Mrs. Leonardo were now suing on the contract, some question might arise as of the nature of estoppel. But she is not suing. Facts working an estoppel as to her will not necessarily nor ordinarily work an estoppel as to one who was once her attorney and who sues sui juris. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908. The question has not been passed on in this jurisdiction. The authorities in other jurisdictions are against this appellant and in favor of this respondent. Culley v. Badgley, 196 Mich. 414, 163 N. W. 33; State v. Superior Court, 58 Wash. 97, 107 Pac. 876.

The judgment is affirmed.

BATCHER et al. v. HOEPPNER et al.
(Civ. 2691; Sac. 3496.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 22, 1924. Rehearing Denied Feb. 20, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 21, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error —80(4)—Judgment calling for accounting held not final.

A judgment that plaintiffs take nothing by their action, except "in the manner hereinafter indicated," and that an accounting be forthwith had for the purpose of determining the actual amount of moneys which defendants expended in developing a mine under a contract, and that a sale be had upon the coming in of the account, held not a final judgment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1.

2. Sales —82(1)—Agreement to pay for properties out of profits and proceeds construed.

Where one enters into an agreement for the purchase of property, and payment therefor is to be made out of the net proceeds of the operation of the property or of the products thereof, a sale of the properties by the purchaser, or the putting them out of his power to produce any net proceeds, renders the agreement immediately enforceable, and the sums covenanted to be paid out of the proceeds due and payable, but this rule has no application, where the contract expressly provides for sale, and the amounts to be paid by the purchaser are only payable out of the profits received by him from a sale or out of dividends or profits received by him for and on account of his share in a corporation that may be organized to operate the properties.

3. Appeal and error —1036(6)—Permitting third party to file cross-complaint held not reversible.

In an action for judgment for purchase price of mining property, held, that, if it was error, it was not reversible to permit a corporation organized by defendant to operate the mine to file a cross-complaint, and thereby come into the case, the corporation simply coming in and admitting that it held the properties subject to the terms and conditions of the contract of sale, and praying for sale thereof to defray expenses and to terminate the contract and further useless expenditure of money, in view of the fact that plaintiffs cannot complain of disposition of property in which they have no ownership.

4. Appeal and error —877(2)—Third person cannot complain of manner of giving up property by corporation.

Plaintiffs suing an individual for money judgment for purchase price of mining property, transferred by defendant to a corporation for operation, cannot complain of the manner in which a corporation coming into court on a cross-complaint delivers over its properties for sale; plaintiffs not being members of the corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by John H. Batcher and others against E. A. Hoeppner and another, cross-complainant. Judgment for defendant and cross-complainant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in the Supreme Court.

Dozier & Dozier, of San Francisco, and C. F. Kimball, of Redding, for appellants.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiffs began this action to obtain a judgment against the defendant Hoeppner in the sum of $29,300, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 22d day of July, 1916. The defendant and cross-complainant had judgment herein, and plaintiffs appeal.

It appears from the pleadings in this action that prior to the 22d day of January, 1916, the plaintiffs were interested in certain mining properties situated in the county of Yuba, state of California, known as the B. A. Campbell, Reuben Clark, and Ida Ruff properties; that on or about the said 22d day of January, 1916, the plaintiff John H. Batcher, for and on behalf of himself and his coplaintiffs, made and entered into an agreement with the defendant E. A. Hoeppner concerning said properties, which agreement is in words and figures as follows, to wit:

"This agreement made and entered into this 22nd day of January, 1916, by and between John H. Batcher of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the party of the first part, and E. A. Hoeppner, of the same place, the party of the second part:

Witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the cancellation by said Hoeppner of said Batcher's note to said Hoeppner of three thousand ($3,000.00) dollars and the payment to said Batcher by said Hoeppner of the sum of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars gold coin, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged by said Batcher and the promises of said Hoeppner hereinafter contained, said Batcher hereby agrees to transfer to said Hoeppner all of his right, title and interest in and to all property both real and personal situate in section twenty-six (26) T. 19 N., R. 6 E., M. D. B. & M., and being the B. A. Campbell, Reuben Clark and Ida Ruff properties, more fully described in that certain deed to said Hoeppner dated the 22nd day of January, 1916, and executed by said Batcher, and said Batcher for the same consideration guarantees the complete transfer to said Hoeppner of all right, title and interest both real and personal of W. S. Graham and B. Hartley in and to the same property described in said deed and as a further consideration of the foregoing transfers said Hoeppner agrees to assume said Batcher's note to the Nevada City National Bank for the sum of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars, on account of which amount said Hoeppner has already paid said bank the sum of one thousand ($1,000.00) dollars; said Hoeppner also agrees to assume payment of said Batcher's obligation to reimburse B. Hartley in the sum of six thousand and three hundred ($6,300.00) dollars cash advanced by said Hartley and reimburse said Graham to the amount of six thousand ($6,000.00) dollars cash advanced by said Graham in the mining enterprise and partnership formerly carried on in connection with said property, said amounts to be paid only out of said Hoeppner's share of the net proceeds to be derived from the operation of said property or sale profits received by said Hoeppner or his share in any corporation which he may cause to be created to carry on such operations, and said Hoeppner further agrees to assume the California Extraction Company bill and all bills of the mining enterprise contracted during the partnership and operation of said property by said Hoeppner and said Batcher; said Hoeppner further agrees to pay said Batcher the further sum of seventeen thousand ($17,000.00) dollars, but only out of said net proceeds of operation or sale of said property that said Hoeppner may receive, and any money that may be paid said Batcher and Graham and Hartley out of said net proceeds on account of the amounts herein specified, shall be paid as follows: So that the amount to which said Batcher is entitled shall be first paid in full, and then the amounts to which said Graham and said Hartley are entitled shall thereafter be paid pro rata to said Hartley and Graham, said Hoeppner being entitled to retain the remaining one-half of said net proceeds for his own use.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands the day and year first above written.

E. A. Hoeppner.

"John H. Batcher."

It is further alleged in plaintiffs' complaint that the defendant Hoeppner, paid to the plaintiff Batcher the sum of $5,000 mentioned in said agreement, and also paid and discharged a note given by Batcher to the Nevada City National Bank in the sum of $3,000, and also assumed the indebtedness due from the mining copartnership of the plaintiffs and defendant E. A. Hoeppner to the California Extraction Company as provided in said agreement, but that the defendant Hoeppner had not paid to plaintiff Batcher the sum of $17,000 provided for in said agreement, or to the plaintiff Hartley the sum of $6,300 specified in said contract, or to the plaintiff Graham the sum of $6,000 as set forth in said contract or any portion of said sums.

It is also alleged in the complaint that said sums were to be paid within a reasonable time from and after the said 22d day of January, 1916; that a period of six months after said date was a reasonable time for the payment of said sums, and that a reasonable time for the payment thereof has wholly expired. It is further set forth that the defendant has wholly failed and neglected to operate said mining properties or to extract the gold or other minerals therefrom either in his proper person or by a corporation created to carry on said operations, and that the defendant has sold and conveyed said properties to another, and thereby put it out of his power to operate said property. It is further alleged that, after the execution of said agreement, the plaintiff Batcher delivered to the defendant a deed of conveyance transferring all of the right, title, and interest of the plaintiffs in and to the real and personal property mentioned in said contract, and conveyed and transferred the same to the defendant Hoeppner named in this action. It is further alleged that on the 22d day of July, 1916, under and by virtue of the terms and conditions of the contract hereinbefore set out, there became due and payable to the plaintiff Batcher the sum of $17,000, to the plaintiff Graham the sum of $6,000, and to the plaintiff Hartley the sum of $6,300, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the said 22d day of July, 1916.

The defendant Hoeppner filed an answer, admitting the execution of the contract, and denying all of the allegations as to his failure to comply with the terms and conditions thereof, and setting forth, among other things, that immediately after the execution of the contract referred to, he entered upon said premises, and by himself, and through the corporation created as provided for in said contract, had diligently operated said mining properties, extracted all the valuable ore found therein, and had expended in so doing a sum approximately of $150,000, but had only been able to realize and extract from said properties mineral-bearing ores of the value of $500. After the beginning of the trial of the action and the taking of some testimony therein, on the application of the defendant E. A. Hoeppner and the B. A. C. Company, a corporation, cross-complainant, the court made the following order:

"It is hereby ordered that the cross-complaint presented by the said cross-complainants against plaintiffs be filed herein, with leave to plaintiffs to plead to said cross-complaint within fifteen days after service upon them of notice of the filing of said cross-complaint."

This cross-complaint sets forth that the B. A. C. Company was incorporated on or about the 10th day of March, 1916, and then sets forth the execution of the contract by Hoeppner and Batcher, as hereinbefore referred to, and then alleges that the said E. A. Hoeppner on the said 10th day of March caused the B. A. C. Company, a corporation, to be organized for the purpose of operating the properties referred to in said contract. The transfer of the properties from Batcher to Hoeppner is then alleged, as hereinbefore mentioned, and that after the incorporation of said cross-complainant, with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the plaintiff Batcher, said Hoeppner, by deed of grant, bargain, and sale transferred the fee in all of said properties so received by him to the corporation B. A. C. Company. The amounts of money expendent in the operation of said properties is then set forth, and, in addition, the sum of $80,000 is alleged to have been expended for mining machinery and equipment. It is then alleged that the total proceeds derived from the operation of said properties during the course of several years was not to exceed the sum of $500.

The impossibility of ever receiving or realizing any net proceeds out of the operation of said properties is then set forth, and the cross-complainants concluded their pleading with a prayer that the amount expended upon said properties be ascertained by the court, and the properties sold to pay the same, and the balance, if any, applied in payment of the amounts contracted to be paid by the defendant Hoeppner to the plaintiffs herein out of the net proceeds of the operation or sale of said mining properties. After the conclusion of the trial and its submission to the court, the court made and entered its findings and conclusions of law, and entered judgment in said action substantially as follows, to wit: The findings are to the effect that the contract, as set forth herein, was entered into by the respective parties; that payment was to be made only out of the net proceeds derived from the operation of said properties or sale thereof; that the transfer of the properties by Hoeppner to the corporation was made for the purpose of operating the properties; that the corporation took, with knowledge of the agreement executed by Batcher and Hoeppner; that the properties had been operated for a number of years; that such operation had demonstrated that it was humanly impossible to ever realize any net proceeds therefrom; that there had been expended in such operation and also in the prospecting of said properties many thousands of dollars, to wit, $62,000, in operating said properties, paying the bills agreed to be paid, and over $98,000 in the purchase of materials used in connection with the operation of said properties, and over $13,000 on account of certain options relating to the Clark and Ruff properties. That, in making the transfer of the properties referred to by the defendant Hoeppner to the B. A. C. Company, said corporation received the same, subject to the terms and conditions of said contract, and assumed and agreed to carry out and perform all of the agreements, covenants, and conditions therein contained, to be performed and required to be performed by and on the part of the defendant Hoeppner. Upon these findings the court made and entered the following judgment:

"Now therefore, by virtue of the law and the findings aforesaid, it is by the court ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows:

"(1) That plaintiffs take nothing by their action herein, except as and in the manner hereinafter indicated and directed.

"(2) That an accounting in this action be forthwith had for the purpose of determining the actual amount of moneys which have been by the defendant E. A. Hoeppner and cross-complainant B. A. C. Company, a corporation, expended and actually and necessarily paid out in prospecting, developing, operating, working, and preserving the property hereinafter described and referred to and mentioned and referred to in the contract of January 22, 1916, in plaintiff's complaint in this action set forth; that thereupon all of said property be sold in the manner to be by this court directed and determined at the termination of said accounting, and that proceeds of said sale after payment of expenses of sale be applied, first, towards repaying and refunding to said defendant E. A. Hoeppner and said cross-complainant B. A. C. Company such an amount of said proceeds as by said accounting they and each of them may be determined entitled to, and the balance of said proceeds then remaining, if any, be applied and paid over next to plaintiff John H. Batcher to the extent of seventeen thousand dollars, or so much thereof as said balance of said proceeds will pay of the same, and the remainder of said proceeds of said sale, if any, shall be paid over next to said plaintiffs W. S. Graham and B. F. Hartley pro rata, in the payment to said W. S. Graham of the sum of $6,000, and to said B. F. Hartley $6,300, or so much of said respective sums as said remaining proceeds of said sale will pay of the same; and the balance of said proceeds of sale, if any, then remaining shall be paid over to said cross-complainant B. A. C. Company."

Thereafter an accounting was had ascertaining the exact amounts expended by the respondents under and by virtue of the agreement entered into between Hoeppner and Batcher, and judgment was entered directing the sale of the properties referred to and application of the proceeds, first in repayment of the amounts expended thereon as was found and ascertained, and the remainder, if any, to be applied upon payment of the various sums agreed to be paid the plaintiffs out of the net proceeds of the operation of said mines.

No appeal was taken from the judgment herein set forth but only from the judgment entered after the accounting had been had as therein provided to be taken, and it is insisted on the part of the respondent that such judgment is final in its terms, and has become conclusive upon the parties herein as to the matters therein adjudicated.

Upon the question of the finality of the decree adjudicating equitable rights, but reserving settlement of accounts upon the coming in of the report of the master, the authorities seem to be in hopeless conflict. 5 Ann. Cas. 176.

Respondent relies upon subdivision 1 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the cases of Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 161 Pac. 1161; Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 193, 7 Pac. 456, 635, 8 Pac. 709; People v. Bank of Mendocino County, 133 Cal. 107, 65 Pac. 124; and Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 138 Pac. 696.

In Rossi v. Caire, supra, in an action by a stockholder of a corporation which had forfeited its charter to enjoin the defendants, the former directors, from carrying on the business of the corporation, and to compel them, as trustees thereof, to wind up its affairs, pay its debts, and distribute its assets to the stockholders, orders directing the trustee to distribute moneys in their hands, derived from the property of the corporation, and to sell the remaining real and personal property of the corporation at public auction for cash, after giving a prescribed notice, it was held that such orders constituted a final judgment so far as the property to be disposed of was concerned, and appealable as such.

In Sharon v. Sharon, supra, it was held that a judgment that is conclusive as to any question is final as to that question.

In the Mendocino Case it was stated that the general rule applicable in determining whether a judgment is final or merely interlocutory is that, if anything further in the nature of judicial action on the part of the court is essential to a final determination of the rights of the parties, the judgment is interlocutory only.

In the Zappettini Case the court made an order dissolving a partnership, adjudging that the property of the partnership be sold in one parcel, and that the receiver appointed to make the sale, after deducting the costs and expenses of sale, pay the remainder of the proceeds into court to abide the further order of the court, adjudging that the proceeds of the sale be paid and applied as follows:

"(1) To the payment of fees and expenses of the receiver, the same to be fixed and determined by this court, (2) to the payment of the fees and expenses of a referee theretofore appointed, the same to be fixed and determined by the court, and (3) to the payment of the debts of said copartnership upon the determination thereof by this court, and that the determination thereof be and is hereby reserved by this court until after the return upon the sale of said property."

The court held such a judgment final, and in so doing said the partnership was dissolved, all the property was ordered sold, the manner in which the proceeds should be divided was finally adjudicated, including the respective proportions of the two partners in any money remaining after payment of costs of sale, fees of receiver, fees of referee, and the debts of the firm. Nothing remained to be done by the court, except the mere ascertainment of the amounts due to others than the parties on account of fees for services in the action and debts owing by the parties as partners, and to see that the decree already made was properly executed. In this case it appears that nothing further remained to be done except to carry the judgment into effect.

The last case upon this subject which has come to our attention is that of Pomper v. Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles (Cal. Sup.) 216 Pac. 577. The original action involved was one to quiet title to certain lands and to recover the rents, issues, and profits thereof. The court made and entered a judgment which was entitled an interlocutory judgment and decree, declaring the legal title vested in Emilia Pomper, expressly reserving for future determination the question of the amount of the rents, issues, and profits to be paid by the respective defendants, etc. The court said:

"While it is true that the so-called interlocutory judgment purported to settle the basic issue involved in the case, it expressly left for future determination the rights of the parties with relation to the rents, issues, and profits, which was one of the issues raised by the complaint, as the plaintiff prayed for judgment for the value thereof.

"The general rule is that, where a decree is made fixing the liability and rights of the parties which refers the case to a master or subordinate tribunal for a judicial purpose, such, for instance, as the statement of an account, upon which a further decree is to be entered, the decree is not final. 2 Cal. Juris. §§ 19, 20, p. 142; California National Bank v. Statelet, 171 U. S. 447, 19 Sup. Ct. 6, 43 L. Ed. 233; Clement v. Duncan (Cal. Sup.) 215 Pac. 1025; Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 453, 114 Pac. 579."

[1] Measured by these cases, is the judgment entered in this cause in words and figures, as hereinbefore set forth, final? We think not. The first paragraph of this judgment shows that as to the basic rights or claims of the plaintiffs the judgment is not determinative or conclusive of anything specific. This paragraph reads as follows: "That plaintiffs take nothing by their action herein except as and in the manner herein-after indicated and directed." It will be remembered that the plaintiffs have sued for the recovery of $29,300 and interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 22d day of July, 1916, until paid. This paragraph does not determine how much money the plaintiffs are to take, or how that money is to be obtained, or from what source it is to be derived. The second paragraph of the judgment provides that an accounting be forthwith had for the purpose of determining the actual amount of moneys which the defendant Hoepfner and the corporation has expended and actually paid out in prospecting, developing, operating, working, and preserving the properties, and that, upon the coming in of the account, or the ascertainment of such amounts, the property be sold in such manner as might be determined upon by the court, and that the proceeds of the sale should first be applied to the payment of such sums as the defendant Hoepfner and the company may be determined to be entitled to, and further provides as to how the remainder of the money derived from the sale of the properties shall be distributed. This paragraph requires a judicial determination of the amount of money necessarily paid out in prospecting, developing, and operating the properties covered by the contract. A considerable sum of money was expended in prospecting, a considerable sum of money was expended in development work, and a considerable sum of money was expended in operating the properties. Whether these sums of money were necessarily paid out or properly paid out under and in accordance with the terms and the conditions of the contract were and are questions calling for judicial action on the part of the trial court, and the plaintiffs could take nothing by reason of their action until all such matters were finally determined, the property sold, and the amount available for application toward the plaintiffs' claims ascertained and fixed by the trial court. It thus appears that the rights to enforce which the plaintiffs began their action were not finally determined, nor was it ascertained that they actually had any rights in the properties or to any of the proceeds thereof. The trial court did make a number of findings, all in accordance with the allegations of the answer filed by the defendant Hoepfner and the cross-complaint filed by the B. A. C. Company, and as a conclusion of law therefrom declared as follows: "That plaintiffs take nothing by their action herein." The judgment entered, however, to which we have referred, does not follow this conclusion of law, but makes this conclusion of law dependent upon certain contingencies and also facts thereafter to be adjudicated and determined, to be followed by sale of the properties in such manner as the court might order. Under these circumstances we think the principle of law announced in the Pomper Case, supra, applicable, and not the cases relied upon by respondents.

[2] The first point relied upon by appellant for reversal which we will consider is the claim that the defendant Hoepfner has sold and transferred the property to another, and has thereby put it out of his power to operate the properties referred to in the agreement or produce any net proceeds therefrom. To sustain this contention appellants rely upon the cases of Wolf v. Marsh, 54 Cal. 228; Poirier v. Gravel, 88 Cal. 79, 25 Pac. 962; Bagley v. Cohen, 121 Cal. 604, 53 Pac. 1117; and Linn v. Butler, 8 Colo. 355, 8 Pac. 588.

In the case of Wolf v. Marsh, the agreement reads:

"For value received, I promise to pay to S. Wolf, or order, $449. * * * This note is made with the express understanding that, if the coal mines in the Marsh ranch yield no profits to me, then this note is not to be paid, and the obligation herein expressed shall be null and void."

Some time after the execution of this note the defendant sold and transferred the properties referred to, and the court held that in so doing he voluntarily put it out of his power to comply with his contract, and the amount of money mentioned in the note immediately became due and payable.

In the case of Poirier v. Gravel, the contract, after fixing the amount to be paid, concluded in these words:

"The said sum of money to be paid only and exclusively from such products of said land as I may be entitled to, and no other property of mine shall be subject to said debt or obligation."

After entering into the contract and taking possession of the properties, the defendant sold the same, and put it out of his power to realize anything therefrom. Upon this state of facts the amount of money agreed to be paid out of the proceeds immediately became due and payable.

In the Bagley v. Cohen Case it was held that, where one agrees to pay a certain sum out of the specific business, and thereafter sells the business, the money agreed to be paid out of the profits of the business immediately became due and payable.

In the case of Linn v. Butler, supra, it was agreed that the sum of $5,000 should be payable only out of the net proceeds derived from the sale of ore taken from the mine, but it was also provided that in case of sale by the second parties the $5,000 should become immediately due and payable. A sale was made, and the court, in pursuance of the terms of the contract, held that the sum agreed to be paid forthwith became due and payable upon the sale of the properties.

It seems to be well settled that, where one enters into an agreement for the purchase of property, and payment therefor is to be made out of the net proceeds of the operation of the property or of the products thereof, a sale of the properties, or the putting them out of one's power to produce any net proceeds, renders the agreement immediately enforceable, and the sums covenanted to be paid out of the proceeds due and payable, unless there is something further or otherwise in the contract which prevents the application of the principle enunciated in the foregoing cases. Does such principle apply to the contract in this case? It is therein provided, after fixing the amount to be paid, that "said amounts to be paid only out of said Hoepfner's share of the net proceeds to be derived from the operation of said property or sale profits received by said Hoepfner or his share in any corporation which he may cause to be created to carry on such operations," and further, that "said Hoepfner agrees to pay said Batcher the further sum of $17,000, but only out of said proceeds of operation or sale of said property that said Hoepfner may receive," etc. The contract by its terms contemplates the creation of a corporation to carry on the operations of the mining properties conveyed by the plaintiff to Hoepfner. It is true that nothing appears in the contract as to the manner in which the corporation to be organized shall be vested with the power or authority to enter upon said premises and operate the same, but it is clearly within the intent, as well as the language of the contract, that a corporation is to be organized, and that the payments to be made by Hoepfner to the plaintiff herein are only to be made out of the proceeds of the properties mentioned therein or profits received by him, or his share in any corporation which he may cause to be created for the purpose of carrying on said operations. The language of the contract may be again repeated to make this thought clear. It reads:

"Said amounts to be paid only out of said Hoepfner's share of the net proceeds to be derived from the operation of said property or sale profits received by said Hoepfner or his share in any corporation which he may cause to be created to carry on such operations."

Even though Hoepfner should have disposed of the properties mentioned in the agreement absolutely and without any reference to the contract, and under such circumstances that a court of equity would not be justified in holding that this grantee took with knowledge of the contract and subject to its terms and conditions, yet, unless such transfer were tainted with fraud, the plaintiffs in this case would not be entitled to succeed, unless the testimony established the fact of Hoepfner having received net profits available to the payment of their claims, either by sale of the properties or by dividends or other income received on account of his share in the corporation or corporations organized by him to operate the properties.

From this it is apparent that the cases cited by appellants and other cases having to do with the same questions, wherein it is held that the sale of property out of which payment of the purchase price is to be made from profits derived from the operation of the property or the products grown thereon, have no application whatever to the case at bar, where the contract explicitly provides for sale, and that the amounts to be paid by Hoepfner are only payable out of the profits received by him from a sale or out of dividends or profits received by him for and on account of his share in the corporation or corporations that may be organized to operate the properties to such corporations as the properties mentioned in the contract may be transferred.

The pleadings in this case raise no questions of fraud or concealment, and tender only, so far as the defendant Hoepfner is concerned, the question of profits received from sale of the properties, that the transfer made by him as herein referred to rendered payments, provided for in the contract, immediately due and payable, and, also, that the operation of the mine might have been such as to have yielded sufficient profits to pay the several amounts alleged to be due to the plaintiffs herein. Considerable testimony was taken by the trial court upon the value of the properties involved in this action and referred to in the contract and as to the possibilities of being made to yield profitable returns. The court, upon conflicting testimony, has made and entered its findings herein concerning the value or valuelessness of such properties and also as to the issue of whether said properties have been intelligently and properly operated with the intent and purpose of obtaining a profit therefrom. Considerable testimony was introduced pro and con as to the value of the premises covered by the contract for mining purposes, some of the witnesses testifying that minerals of considerable value are contained therein, and others that the minerals are found in such varying quantities and infrequent places in the ledges as to render the mineral ores valueless and such as to render profitable returns impossible; that the expense of extracting the ores and the reduction of the same would never yield any net returns. These questions were all addressed to the trial court, which had to do with weighing the testimony given by the respective witnesses, also to consider the various theories advanced and determine the facts as to the worth or worthlessness of the premises for mining purposes.

The fact that here and there may be spots in the ledges which yield assays of promising value cannot justify this court in setting aside the findings of the trial court which had before it all the witnesses testifying to the value and also to the valuelessness of the properties in question, as well as the hopelessness of ever making them yield a profitable return, and hence the futility of further expenditures thereon by any of the parties to this action under obligations, contractual or otherwise, to the plaintiffs herein, and the trial court having determined from all the testimony that it is humanly impossible to ever realize any net proceeds from the operation of said mining premises, we cannot, from anything we find in the transcript, see any reason for disturbing such conclusion.

Before taking up the alleged errors of the trial court in permitting the B. A. C. Company, a corporation, to come into this action by way of filing a cross-complaint, we may state that, under the contract entered into by Batcher and Hoepfner in order for the plaintiffs to succeed, even though the corporation had not been permitted to come into the case, it will be necessary for the plaintiffs to establish that the defendant Hoepfner had first, out of the operation of the properties, derived net proceeds sufficient to pay the plaintiffs' claims or net proceeds properly applicable toward their payment, or that he had received "sale profits" from said properties that should be applied in payment of the plaintiff's demands, or that he had received as his share of the profits of the operation of the corporation which had been operating the premises dividends or profits applicable as net proceeds toward the payment of plaintiffs' demands, or that the defendant Hoepfner or the parties to whom he had transferred the properties had been guilty of fraud or of such negligent mismanagement as prevented the realization of any profits. All these issues have been decided by the trial court upon conflicting evidence against the contentions of the appellants herein. It is true, as appears from the testimony and the findings of the court, that the defendant Hoepfner received all but a little over 2,000 of the 10,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation, and also received on the books of the corporation a credit in his favor of something over $68,000. The court finds that none of the capital stock of the company was ever sold; that no one has ever received any profit therefrom; and that the mine has not yielded minerals in excess of around $500. The book credit of $68,000 appears from the testimony simply to be entries evidencing money advanced by Hoepfner; the testimony being to the effect that all of the moneys expended, as hereinbefore referred to, were advanced by the defendant Hoepfner. The corporation itself, as a corporation, has not any money, or secured any funds, except through the advances made by the defendant Hoepfner.

[3, 4] Even though we admit it to be irregular, does the ruling of the trial court in permitting the B. A. C. Company, a corporation, to file a cross-complaint in this action constitute reversible error? We think not, for the simple reason that under the terms and provisions of the contract hereinbefore set forth, and considered the appellants have not shown themselves to be in anywise injured. The corporation has simply come in and admitted that it held the properties subject to the terms and conditions of the contract referred to. We fail to see how the plaintiffs have or could suffer detriment by such admission. They are rather favored, because if there then existed any possibility of obtaining returns from the property the door was open for such opportunity. There is another view which seems to us to render the presence of the corporation in this action necessary to a determination of the rights of the parties thereto. The plaintiffs would have a right at any time to come in, establish what we have hereinbefore set forth as the requisite and necessary facts in order to lay sufficient foundation or show sufficient cause to warrant a judgment in their favor, because, as against the defendant Hoepfner and any one claiming under the contract through him, there would exist a continuing obligation to operate the properties for the purpose of securing net proceeds therefrom with which to discharge payments agreed to be paid to the plaintiffs by the defendant Hoepfner whenever so received by him. This obligation or continuing duty could only be terminated by a decree of court ascertaining and determining the impossibility of such profits ever being realized and the legal futility of expending any more money upon properties worthless for mining purposes.

It must also be borne in mind that the persons expending money in the operation of the properties covered by the contract are, by the very terms of the contract, to first receive repayment of the moneys so expended, and as soon as it is made to appear that such moneys never can be recovered by mining operations and the properties having been transferred by the plaintiffs without any provision for their return and without any intent that they should be returned, the only thing the trial court could do, or could have done, was to order a sale of the properties. Again, if such sale is irregular, the plaintiffs have no reason to complain; they having no ownership in the property. The trial court has found upon conflicting testimony that they never can be paid out of the operation of the premises, which works, perforce, an extinguishment of the liability of any one to make payment of the plaintiffs' demands. From this it follows that the ordering of a sale of the premises works no injury to the plaintiffs, but offers, though it may be very slight, the possibility of some money being derived or obtained that the court may say should be applied in making payment of the items set forth in plaintiffs' complaint. With our views thus expressed, we do not think it necessary to consider the questions tendered by appellants as to alleged conflict in the findings upon questions other than those hereinbefore set forth which are determinative, or whether a corporation, can in this manner deliver over its properties. Of this latter question the plaintiffs, not being members of the corporation, are not in a position to complain.

For the reasons set forth herein, we think the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court In Bank,
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the application for transfer and decision by this court, after judgment by the District Court of Appeal, we express no opinion upon the question of the finality or conclusiveness of the so-called "interlocutory judgment." The determination of that question was not necessary to the decision affirming the judgment appealed from. Assuming that the first judgment was not final or conclusive, and that the questions discussed by counsel herein were available to the appellants upon this appeal from the later judgment, we are satisfied with the reasoning and conclusion of the District Court of Appeal affirming the same.

RADICH v. CERNOKUS. (Civ. 2663.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 26, 1924. Rehearing Denied Feb. 25, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 24, 1924.)

1. Brokers ⇨42—Contract for sale of real estate not invalidated because agent was without license at time of execution.

Where owner authorized a real estate agent to sell his property, that agent at the time of execution was without a broker's license was immaterial where he had such license at the time he procured a purchaser.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Question is whether evidence is sufficient to support findings for prevailing party.

In determining whether the evidence is sufficient to support a judgment for the prevailing party, the question is not whether there is evidence which would support a judgment in favor of the losing party, but whether there is substantial evidence to justify the material findings in favor of the prevailing party, notwithstanding there may be ample evidence to support contrary findings.

3. Brokers ⇨86(1)—Evidence held to show sale lost through owner's unreasonable delay in accepting bona fide offer.

In a broker's action for commissions, evidence held to show that an opportunity to make a sale was lost through owner's unreasonable delay and refusal to accept a bona fide offer to purchase upon the terms authorized, and to sustain findings for the broker.

4. Brokers ⇨54—Broker entitled to commissions upon finding purchaser able and willing to buy on owner's terms.

Where a broker procured a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy the property upon the terms of the owner, he was entitled to the agreed commission.

5. Brokers ⇨40—Description in listing contract held sufficient.

Owner's property which was described in a listing contract as "forty acres located four miles of Fresno on Church Ave. road" was sufficiently described, where owner owned no other land at the time, and did not pretend that he did not understand what land was intended.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by R. P. Radich against George Cernokus. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild, Sam P. Coy, and Richard Stewart, all of Fresno, and Marion J. Mazuran and George D. Collins, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellant.

James W. Campbell and Frank Kauke, both of Fresno, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the amount of an alleged commission for finding a purchaser for defendant's land.

The complaint alleges that a real estate broker's license was issued to plaintiff on the 27th day of January, 1920; that in that month the defendant authorized plaintiff to sell defendant's land as the latter's agent; that plaintiff procured a proposed purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to buy, and who offered in writing to buy defendant's land at the price and on the terms provided in the authorization, but that defendant refused to sell.

Plaintiff's license, dated January 1, 1920, was admitted in evidence. In December, 1919, defendant signed a listing card appointing plaintiff his agent to sell the land, but the card was dated January 1, 1920, for the reason that defendant had theretofore listed the land with another agent whose authorization would not expire until the latter date. The written appointment of plaintiff as defendant's agent contained the following terms, the italicized parts being in writing and the others in print:

"I hereby appoint R. P. Radich of Fresno, my agent, with exclusive right to sell the property described on the reverse side of this card, for the price and under the conditions hereon described, or for any less amount hereafter authorized by me, and to receive deposit on the same. * * * I hereby agree to pay twenty-five hundred commission on the selling price. This authorization is to remain in full force and effect for 30 days, and thereafter until revoked by me in writing. * * * 40 acres $60,000. * * * Terms $60,000 cash; balance $18,000 cash 7 p. c. Amt. Mtg. on Place $4,000 Held by 4,000 Int. Int.—. How payable, —."

Neither party is proficient in the use of the English language and the listing card was written by another person at their request and was signed by defendant. It is apparent that the terms of the authorization to sell are uncertain. There was no uncertainty in the mind of the defendant, however, as to the terms intended by the parties in the execution of the listing contract. He testified as follows:

"Q. And the way you talked about the matter of selling, you were willing to sell for the $18,000 and $4,000 a year? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was satisfactory to you? A. Yes, sir. Q. And interest at 7 per cent? A. Yes, sir. * * * Q. So you remembered, didn't you, all clearly as to just how you were willing to sell the land, from the beginning on? You had in mind what you had told Radich, you would deal for $60,000, $18,000 cash, and $4,000 a year, and 7 per cent., the trays and boxes to go with the land? A. Yes, sir."

[1] Appellant contends that the listing contract is void because the plaintiff did not have a broker's license at the time of its execution. He had such a license at the time he procured a purchaser. The contention is without merit. Houston v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 267, 200 Pac. 55.

[2-4] It is urged that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment. In an effort to sustain this contention appellant sets out certain favorable parts of his own testimony. The question is not whether there is evidence which would support a judgment in favor of defendant, but whether there is substantial evidence to justify the material findings in favor of plaintiff, notwithstanding the fact that there may be ample evidence to have supported contrary findings. The plaintiff testified that on the 30th day of January, 1920, he procured a written offer from Alex Josephian to purchase the property on the terms agreed upon between plaintiff and defendant. The writing was addressed to defendant, and, omitting the description of the property, was as follows:

"I hereby offer to purchase your ranch * * * for the total purchase price of sixty thousand dollars. ($60,000) payable: Eighteen thousand dollars cash upon the execution and delivery of a written contract of sale; four thousand dollars yearly thereafter on the principal, together with interest on deferred payments at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable annually; and enter into usual written contract."

The plaintiff further testified: That at the same time Josephian gave the witness a check for $500 as a deposit on the purchase price; that on the same day he informed defendant of the transaction with Josephian, and it was agreed that the parties would meet the next day. That the next morning defendant said "he no feel like come through the deal, but he says, 'I going to think over what I'm going to do.'" That witness and Josephian went to defendant's place on the 3d of February, and there showed him the check for $500 and asked him to sign an acceptance of Josephian's offer, but that defendant said "he no want to sign anything. He says this all the time; he want his listing card back; and sometime he says his wife no like sell property. * * * He say he no sign anything, he no want to take that check for $500 deposit I offer him." That on the 11th of February defendant refused to accept the offer of Josephian, saying "he going to think over what he do." That on the 16th of February Josephian informed defendant that if he did not sign the contract then Josephian would "ask for his money back," and that defendant replied: "I no sign anything. * * * I like better spend two or three or five thousand dollars for fight than come through with this." That one or two days later the defendant said to plaintiff and Josephian, "I guess we going through with the deal; I drew the contract out;" and that Josephian replied, "It is too bad, now, I paid my money for the other property when I came back from your home."

Another witness for plaintiff testified that on the 11th of February certified checks in the sum of $18,000 were tendered to the defendant, and a formal demand made for the execution of a contract of sale in accordance with the terms of the listing contract, and that the defendant "declined to go ahead with the transaction."

There was much other evidence to corroborate plaintiff's testimony, as well as some in contradiction thereof, but enough has been stated to support the findings. The opportunity to make a sale to Josephian was lost through the defendant's unreasonable delay and refusal to accept a bona fide offer to purchase upon the terms authorized. Having procured a purchaser who was ready, willing, and able to buy the property upon such terms the plaintiff become entitled to the agreed commission.

[5] There is nothing in the contention that the property was not sufficiently described in the listing contract. It was described as "40 acres * * * located 4 miles of Fresno on Church Ave. road." The defendant testified that he owned no other land at the time the listing contract was executed, and there was no pretense at the trial that he did not understand what land was intended by the description.

It is contended that plaintiff was not entitled to a commission until a sale was consummated. The contention is fully answered by reference to the case of Purcell v. Firth, 175 Cal. 746, 167 Pac. 379, 3 A. L. R. 1396.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte LAKE. (Cr. 1166.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 24, 1924.)

1. Contempt ⚡67—Habeas corpus ⚡17—Remedy of person adjudged in contempt is by certiorari or habeas corpus.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1222, providing that the judgment in cases of contempt is final and conclusive, the only remedies of a person adjudged in contempt is habeas corpus or certiorari proceedings, involving the question of whether the court had jurisdiction or exceeded its jurisdiction to question the jurisdiction of the court.

2. Contempt ⚡67—Habeas corpus ⚡92(3)—Inquiry of court on certiorari or habeas corpus by person adjudged in contempt limited to determination of whether court had or exceeded jurisdiction.

In habeas corpus or certiorari by a person adjudged in contempt, the inquiry cannot go beyond the question of jurisdiction, and the review of the evidence is limited to the sole purpose of determining whether jurisdiction existed and whether jurisdiction was exceeded.

3. Contempt ⚡67—Habeas corpus ⚡92(3)—Review on habeas corpus or certiorari involving question of whether jurisdictional facts were proved extends to the evidence itself.

In habeas corpus or certiorari by a person adjudged in contempt, in which the question involved is whether jurisdictional facts were or were not proved, the review extends, not only to the entire record, but to the evidence itself.

4. Habeas corpus ⚡92(3)—Appellate court on application for writ of habeas corpus may inquire into question of whether contempt was in fact committed.

On an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person adjudged in contempt, the appellate court, in determining whether the lower court had jurisdiction, can inquire into the question whether the contempt was in fact committed.

5. Contempt ⚡54(1)—Affidavit essential on constructive contempt, but on direct contempt court may proceed summarily.

In case of a constructive contempt, an affidavit must be filed containing a formal charge upon which a hearing must be held, but, where a contempt has been committed in the immediate view and presence of the court, the court may proceed summarily without a charging affidavit, but must state the facts in order of commitment.

6. Contempt ⚡63(4)—Order of commitment in case of direct contempt must state facts establishing legal contempt.

In a case of direct contempt, the order of commitment must state the facts constituting the contempt, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1211, and is void, unless it shows on its face acts sufficient to constitute a legal contempt; mere conclusions being insufficient.

7. Contempt ⚡54(4)—Affidavit charging constructive contempt must state facts showing that contempt has been committed.

Affidavit charging constructive contempt to give the court jurisdiction must contain a statement of facts showing that a contempt has been committed; mere conclusions being insufficient.

8. Contempt ⚡40—Conviction can be supported only on a showing that acts charged come within a statutory definition of offense.

Contempt proceedings are of a criminal nature, and a conviction can be supported only on a showing that the acts charged come within the statutory definition of the offense.

9. Contempt ⚡63(3)—Order of commitment held insufficient to support adjudication.

Order of commitment adjudging an attorney in contempt for filing an affidavit of prejudice against the court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 170, and causing the affidavit to be read in open court in the immediate view and presence of the court, containing merely the conclusions of the trial judge that certain allegations in the affidavit were false, and that they contained imputations upon the motives of the judge, and an attack upon his integrity, and statements that certain allegations were made upon information and belief, rather than upon competent and substantial information, without finding that the affidavit was not prepared, filed, and presented in absolutely good faith, or that any contempt was willfully, maliciously, or intentionally committed, held void, being insufficient to show that the attorney had been guilty of disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior toward the judge, tending to interrupt the due course of the trial, or rather judicial proceedings, under section 1209, in view of the presumption that the attorney was innocent of all wrong and other presumption that the evidence as to the contempt, if produced, would have been favorable to the attorney.

10. Habeas corpus ⚡85(3)—Evidence presumed to have been favorable to person adjudged in contempt in absence thereof in habeas corpus proceeding.

In habeas corpus proceedings by a person adjudged in contempt, it will be presumed in the absence of the evidence as to the contempt that it would have been favorable to petitioner.

11. Contempt ⚡60(3)—Must be established by clear and satisfactory proof.

Contempt must be established by a clear and satisfactory proof; a mere preponderance of the evidence being insufficient.

12. Habeas corpus ⚡85(3)—Findings and conclusions of trial court as to contempt disregarded in habeas corpus proceedings where contrary to evidence in record and presumption available to petitioner.

In habeas corpus proceedings by a person adjudged in contempt, the findings and conclusions of the trial court as to the contempt must be disregarded where contrary to the evidence in the record, and the presumption available to the petitioner.

Application by Fred W. Lake for writ of habeas corpus directed to the sheriff of Alameda county to secure petitioner's release from custody on commitment for contempt of court. Writ granted.

Henry C. McPike, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley and M. W. Dobrzensky, all of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an application for relief under habeas corpus from a commitment of the petitioner on a judgment finding him guilty of contempt of court. The charges of contempt upon which the commitment was based arose out of the action of the petitioner in filing and presenting to the court in open session a certain affidavit charging the judge of the trial court with bias and prejudice in respect to the defendants in an action then pending before the court. That action was entitled Central Savings Bank of Oakland v. Fannie D. Lake, F. W. Lake, A. F. Lake, and E. D. Lake, and was an action in ejectment by the purchaser at a trustees' sale under a deed of trust given to secure the payment of a promissory note. The case was before this court on June 18, 1923 (Cal. App.) 217 Pac. 563, on an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of the superior court rendered by the same judge who issued the order of commitment involved in the pending proceeding. At that time we reversed the judgment, which was in favor of plaintiff, upon the ground that the recitals in the trustees' deed of the substitution and appointment of the trustees executing such deed in the place and stead of one of the trustees named in the deed of trust is not prima facie evidence of such substitution and appointment. Following this reversal the same cause was again called for trial before the same judge of the superior court, and at the opening of the second trial thereof the petitioner herein, as attorney for the defendants in that action, and acting under the authority of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, filed an affidavit claiming that the trial judge was disqualified because of interest in the subject-matter growing out of his business relations with the plaintiff bank and other interrelated corporations; personal bias and prejudice against the defendants; and a fixed and determined state of mind consisting in his prejudice against the character of defenses which the defendants were interposing against plaintiff's cause of action, which prejudice grew out of the judge's connection as a stockholder and director of a large title insurance and trust company, which company in turn was engaged in an extensive business with the plaintiff in that action and others, out of which there arose many actions which involved the same questions that were to be litigated in the action then pending before the court. It was the claim of the defendants' counsel, as set forth in the affidavit referred to, that, because of this state of mind of the trial judge, and because the defenses upon which he relied were more or less of a technical nature, the defendants would be unable to have a fair and impartial trial in that court. This claim was based to some extent upon the attitude of the trial judge at the first trial of the cause, but was based mainly upon the belief of the affiant that because of the judge's state of mind he would be unable to give to the defendants patient consideration of their defenses. On the filing of the affidavit the trial judge filed a counter affidavit, denying some of these allegations, and thereupon found that he was not prejudiced or biased and continued with the trial of the case. At the same time he stated that some of the matters contained in the petitioner's affidavit were contemptuous, and cited the petitioner to appear at the close of trial to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. The record of these proceedings is not before us, but we have the affidavits and the judgment or order of commitment, which recites that a hearing was had and that the petitioner was found guilty of contempt.

[1-3] On the hearing before us the petitioner urges that the order of commitment was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court because the record does not disclose that any contempt was committed. Respondent makes the preliminary attack that this court is without power to review the proceedings in habeas corpus, because the superior court had jurisdiction of both the person and the subject-matter, and its judgment is therefore final. This point has been raised and determined on so many occasions that we had assumed that it was no longer a debatable question. The statute, section 1222 of the Code of Civil Procedure, declares that the judgment in cases of contempt is final and conclusive. Thus, one who has been adjudged guilty of contempt has but two remedies—habeas corpus and certiorari. The scope of the inquiry which the court can make upon either habeas corpus or certiorari is precisely the same. Ex parte Drew, 188 Cal. 717, 207 Pac. 249, 250; Commercial Bank, etc., v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 220 Pac. 422, 423. While neither writ is one of error, both extend to the entire record of the court below and to the evidence itself when necessary to determine jurisdiction. Hotaling v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 73, 75. This inquiry, of course, cannot go beyond the question of jurisdiction, and the review of the evidence is limited to the sole purpose of determining, first, whether jurisdiction existed; and, second, whether jurisdiction was exceeded. Thus, where the question is whether jurisdictional facts were or were not proved, the review extends, not only to the entire record, but to the evidence itself. Stumpf v. Board of Supervi- ors, 131 Cal. 364, 367, 63 Pac. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350; McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, 419, 51 Pac. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691; Estate of Paulsen, 179 Cal. 528, 529, 530, 178 Pac. 143; Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 185, 149 Pac. 35; Van Hoosear v. Railroad Com., 189 Cal. 228, 207 Pac. 903, 907; Hotaling v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 73, 75. In Van Hoosear v. R. R. Com., supra, the Supreme Court, on this point, say (189 Cal. 236, 207 Pac. 906):

"That under a writ of review, the evidence of facts upon which the lower court or tribunal depended for its jurisdiction may be considered, and its judgment set aside if jurisdiction is without support in the evidence, is beyond dispute."

In the same case (189 Cal. 236, 207 Pac. 907) the court quoted with approval the following passage from McClatchy v. Superior Court, supra:

"While the writ of certiorari is not a writ of error, 'it is nevertheless,' as suggested in Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 112, 43 Pac. 580, 'a means by which the power of the court in the premises can be inquired into; and for this purpose the review extends, not only to the whole of the record of the court below, but even to the evidence itself, when necessary to determine the jurisdictional fact.' If, then, by looking at the evidence we can see that the court exceeded its power, we have a right to examine the evidence for that purpose."

[4] The next question which presents itself for consideration is: Does the inquiry whether a contempt has in fact been committed go to the jurisdiction of the lower tribunal? Upon the weight of authority this question must be answered in the affirmative. Van Hoosear v. R. R. Com., supra; Hotaling v. Superior Court, supra; Commercial Bank, etc., v. Superior Court, supra. In these cases the judgment of contempt was annulled by the Supreme Court and in the Hotaling Case it was said:

"But we think that, if all the facts alleged in the affidavits constituting the complaint had been proved by competent and conclusive evidence, this order should still be annulled because those facts do not amount to a contempt of court." (Italics ours.)

The reason for this rule is clearly stated in the Hotaling Case, from which we quote (217 Pac. 74):

"Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense. McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, 51 Pac. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691; Ex parte Gould, 99 Cal. 360, 33 Pac. 1112, 21 L. R. A. 751, 37 Am. St. Rep. 57; Ex parte Hollis, 59 Cal. 408; Reymert v. Smith, 5 Cal. App. 380, 90 Pac. 470. A contempt proceeding is not a civil action, either at law or in equity [herein disagreeing with Ex parte Salowsky, 64 Cal. Dec. 119, 120, 208 Pac. 99, 100], * * * but is a separate proceeding of a criminal nature and summary character (McClatchy v. Superior Court, supra; In re McCarty, 154 Cal. 534, 98 Pac. 540; Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 43 Pac. 580; Selowsky v. Superior Court, 180 Cal. 404, 181 Pac. 652), in which the court exercises but a limited jurisdiction. * * * The proceeding is of such a distinctly criminal nature that a mere preponderance of evidence is insufficient."

Following this statement of principles the court then announces the rule in such clear and succinct language that we can do no better than quote it in full:

"While the writ of certiorari is not a writ of error, it nevertheless extends to the whole of the record of the court below, and even to the evidence itself where necessary to determine jurisdiction. Schwarz v. Superior Court, supra; McClatchy v. Superior Court, supra; Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35. In reviewing this proceeding, the charge, the evidence, the findings and the judgment are all to be strictly construed in favor of the accused (Schwarz v. Superior Court, supra), and no intendments or presumptions can be indulged in aid of their sufficiency (Frowley v. Superior Court, supra). If the record of the proceedings, reviewed in the light of the foregoing rules, fails to show affirmatively upon its face the existence of all the necessary facts upon which jurisdiction depended, the order must be annulled. Frowley v. Superior Court, In re McCarty, and other cases above cited." (Emphasis ours.)

[5-7] The court was there considering a case of constructive contempt. The case before us is one charging a contempt committed in the immediate view and presence of the court. The difference is that in cases of constructive contempt an affidavit must be filed containing a formal charge upon which a hearing must be held while in these cases the court may proceed summarily without a charging affidavit. In the latter case the order of commitment must state the facts constituting the contempt (section 1211, Code Civ. Proc.), and, on review, this order must bear the same scrutiny as is given the affidavit in the former case. There is no deviation from the rule that, unless the affidavit charging constructive contempt "contains a statement of facts which shows on its face that a contempt has been committed, the court is without jurisdiction to proceed in the matter, and any judgment of contempt thereon is void." 5 Cal. Jur. pp. 938, 939. There is the same unanimity of opinion supporting the rule that in cases of direct contempt the order of commitment is void, "unless it shows on its face acts sufficient to constitute a legal contempt. The order must contain a statement of facts equivalent to those which the law says must be incorporated in an affidavit for constructive contempt; and such facts must prove the contempt. Mere conclusions are not sufficient." 5 Cal. Jur. pp. 950, 951.

[8] The proceeding being one of a criminal nature, a conviction of the offense can be supported only on a showing that the acts charged come within the definition of the offense. Contempt is defined in section 1209 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The only provisions of that section which could be applicable here are those contained in the first subdivision: "Disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior toward the judge while holding the court, tending to interrupt the due course of a trial or other judicial proceeding." With this in mind we come to the merits of the petition, which alleges that "no public offense, to wit, a contempt in respect to the said Hon. T. W. Harris or of the authority of the said superior court was committed by your petitioner." The order of commitment to which we must refer for the statement of the facts constituting the contempt sets forth that it lay "In the filing of said affidavit and the presentation of the same and causing the same to be read in open court and in the immediate view and presence of the court." Taking the entire judgment or order from beginning to end, we find nothing but the conclusions of the trial judge that certain allegations in the affidavit were false, that they contained imputations upon the motives of the judge and attacks upon his integrity, and that other allegations were made upon information and belief, but that the petitioner "relied primarily, if not exclusively, upon his beliefs and opinions rather than upon any competent or substantial information."

[9, 10] There is no charge or finding that the affidavit was not prepared, filed, and presented in absolute good faith, or that any contempt was willfully, maliciously, or intentionally committed. In this respect the petitioner is entitled to the benefit of all the presumptions, and particularly of the presumption of innocence of wrong. To charge him with having knowingly and intentionally made false allegations would have implied the charge of perjury. Another presumption available to petitioner herein is that from the failure to produce such evidence we must presume that if produced it would have been adverse—that is to say, it would have been favorable to petitioner. Here, as in Works v. Superior Court, 130 Cal. 304, 308, 62 Pac. 507, 508—

"There is no finding or recital or charge that the affidavit was presented otherwise than respectfully and properly, or with any other object than to secure the legal rights of petitioner's client, or with any intention to reflect upon or give offense to the judges of said court."

From the failure to so charge and so find it must be presumed that the affidavit was filed in good faith, because no presumptions can be indulged in to support the judgment. Hotaling v. Superior Court, supra. The rights of the petitioner are defined in Works

v. Superior Court, p. 307 (62 Pac. 508), from which we quote:

"For it cannot be doubted that since the amendment of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, adopted in 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 287), any party to an action may object to a judge upon the ground that he is so prejudiced and biased as to be incapable of trying the cause fairly and impartially, and that he may support his objection by affidavit showing such bias. Having this clear legal right, neither the party nor his attorney can be held guilty of a contempt of court in making the objection or in supporting it by proof, unless he goes out of his way to introduce something purposely and gratuitously offensive."

A case very similar to the one under consideration in Tjosevig v. U. S., 255 Fed. 5, 166 C. C. A. 333. There the Circuit Court of Appeals had under review a contempt order based upon an affidavit charging the judge with bias because of his close political intimacies with the plaintiff, and because the plaintiff had through his political influence been instrumental in securing the judge's appointment. Though the trial court found that the charges were false, that they were defamatory and scandalous, and not filed in good faith, the circuit court set aside the commitment, because the evidence was not sufficient to show bad faith. The rule of the case appears in the quotation made from 6 R. C. L. p. 494, as follows:

"An attorney may in a proper case, in a respectful manner, as, for example, on an application for change of venue, allege that the judge is prejudiced against his client, and unless the act is done with reckless disregard of truth, or with the express intention to reflect upon the honor and integrity of the judge, it is not a contempt."

Here the further finding is made that these allegations contained imputations upon the motives and integrity of the judge. This must be true to a certain degree of every charge made against a judge on the grounds of bias and prejudice, as well as in a charge of personal interest. Works v. Superior Court, supra. If a judge has a personal prejudice against a party or a bias as to the subject so that he cannot give the party a fair and impartial hearing, his motives in insisting upon conducting the trial are in a measure impugned. The question of bias or prejudice on the part of the judge is one which usually goes to his state of mind. To lay the foundation of the attack it is necessary for the party to allege what he believes to be the state of mind of the judge. If this charge is made in a proper and respectful manner, and in good faith, for the purpose of protecting the rights of his client, the attorney is not guilty of contempt unless he goes out of his way to introduce something, "purposely and gratuitously offensive." Works v. Superior Court, supra, 307 (62 Pac. 507). See, also, Mullin v.

People, 15 Colo. 437, 24 Pac. 880, 9 L. R. A. 566, 22 Am. St. Rep. 414; 13 Corpus Jur. p. 32; 6 R. C. L. pp. 494-495. Here there is no charge, recital, or finding that in the case before us any matter was included in the affidavit for the sole purpose of giving offense, or that the facts therein alleged from which the judge himself drew the inference that they were attacks upon his motives or integrity, were not alleged in good faith and without the intention to reflect upon the judge. Here, again, we must presume that good faith and good intentions existed.

Finally it is argued that certain matters alleged in the affidavit were based upon information and belief, and that, upon the oral examination of petitioner, it was determined that he "relied primarily if not exclusively upon his beliefs and opinions rather than upon any competent or substantial information." From this it is argued that we must apply the rule stated in Lamberson v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 458, 464, 91 Pac. 100, 102 (11 L. R. A. [N. S.] 619):

"So, while it is true that matters which are pertinent to the consideration and which are charged as facts are admissible, without reference to their effect upon the reputation of the judge, or of any one else, it is equally true that neither attorney nor litigant has any right to present such degrading accusations under the guise of mere belief, without the aid of a single supporting fact."

But in the Lamberson Case the affidavit charged the judge with corruption, and was thus contemptuous per se. Such is not the case here, because the affidavit merely charges bias growing out of the judge's business and social associations without any direct imputation upon the judge's motives or integrity. If, as seems to be urged by respondent, the failure to state the sources of information was contempt in itself, the answer is that this merely goes to the sufficiency of the affidavit as proof of the fact of bias. It never has been held that in the trial of an issuable fact an attorney is guilty of contempt in merely offering insufficient, or even incompetent, evidence in an effort to prove that fact.

[11, 12] Here the direct finding is that these allegations were not based "upon any competent or substantial information." Again we have the mere conclusion of the judge unsupported by any of the facts appearing on the oral hearing. The order recites that the affidavit of the petitioner and the counter affidavits were before the court, and were considered on the hearing. These comprise the only evidence in the record before us. Taking the record as we have it, it appears that the sworn affidavit of the petitioner alleges that he did have such information and belief. This allegation is not denied by the counter affidavit of the trial judge or by any other denials or evidence appearing in the record. It therefore stands as an admitted fact in the case. If the allegations were untrue, then the petitioner committed perjury when he supported them with his oath. The presumption, of course, is that he did not commit perjury. In the face of this presumption, taken with the clear record before us, it is necessary to conclude that the finding of the trial judge is unsupported. As said in Hotaling v. Superior Court, supra:

"The proceeding is of such a distinctly criminal nature that a mere preponderance of evidence is insufficient."

It was said in Re Buckley, 69 Cal. 1, 3, 10 Pac. 69, 70:

"We know of no rule of law in this state authorizing any court to fine and imprison a person on a mere preponderance of evidence as to his guilt. The guilt must be established by clear and satisfactory proof, and generally, if not always, in criminal actions, beyond a reasonable doubt."

So when the only evidence in the record and the presumptions available to the petitioner are contrary to the findings and conclusions of the trial court, these must be disregarded.

For the reasons given, the order of commitment is annulled, and the petitioner discharged.

2. Criminal law — 384—Refusal of evidence as to trail from place defendant was found to place his suit case was discovered, held proper.

Where defendant was discovered by a posse in pursuit of bank robbers off the beaten highway, and later his suit case was found near by, witness having gone to such places three months thereafter to ascertain whether there was a well-defined trail from the open space where defendant was found to the place his suit case was discovered, there was no error in refusing to permit witness to testify as to the trail, it not being shown that the conditions at the time of inspection were the same as at the time of defendant's apprehension.

3. Criminal law §658 — Jurors held not to have become disqualified because of trial incident committing witness for perjury.

Where during prosecution for robbery, while jury was absent, the court ordered a witness into custody and advised that question whether his testimony was perjurious be submitted to the grand jury, in absence of affidavits showing that newspaper publication of the incident was read by the jury or that they had obtained any knowledge of it, there was no evidence showing that jurors became disqualified by reason of the incident.

4. Criminal law §1163(1)—Prejudice must be shown from errors alleged.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, it is incumbent on the complaining party to make an affirmative showing that prejudice followed from the error relied upon.

5. Criminal law §658—Witnesses not intimidated by commitment of another witness for alleged perjury.

In a prosecution for robbery intimidation of other witnesses held not to follow from commitment of defense witness for alleged perjury.

6. Criminal law §655(5)—Rebuke of attorney for stating defense witness had been tampered with by district attorney held justified.

In a prosecution for robbery where there was no justification for accusation made by defense attorney that the district attorney had tampered with a witness for defendant, such remark justified a rebuke by the court.

7. Witnesses §277(2)—Cross-examination of defendant as to still he claimed he was attending at the time of robbery held proper.

In a prosecution for robbery where defense of one of accused was that at the time of the robbery he was attending a still for manufacturing whisky and that he was at the still continually for several days prior to and after the robbery, cross-examination as to the installation of the still ownership, whether by defendant alone or jointly with others, and whether any one assisted him in installing it, and the names of the parties who manufactured equipment, was proper.

8. Criminal law §1170½(5)—Threatening to strike testimony of contumacious witness if he did not disclose pertinent matter held without prejudice.

No rule is known authorizing a court to strike out testimony already given by a witness as a penalty for refusing to answer some specific proper question, and in prosecution for robbery, where it is proper on cross-examination to question defendant as to the person from whom he procured equipment for the still he claimed he was attending prior to, at the time, and after the robbery, and the court threatened to strike his entire testimony from the record if he persisted in his refusal, such method adopted to force an answer was without injury to defendant.

9. Criminal law §396(2)—Irrelevant and incompetent testimony not authorized by rule in statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1854, where a part of a conversation or a writing, material and relevant to the issue, is given in evidence, the other parts of the conversation or writing having relevant reference to the part given may be introduced, and if the part not given is explanatory, or in any way qualifies or modifies the part given, then the part not given by the witness may be shown, but irrelevant and incompetent testimony was not intended to be admitted under the authority of such section.

10. Criminal law §396(2)—Allowing redirect examination of state's witness as to terms under which defendant submitted to arrest not error.

In prosecution for robbery where defense had brought out fact that there was an agreement for defendant to surrender, but left it in such manner as to convey the impression that some pressure or undue influence had been practiced on him and his wife to induce a surrender in such way as to make it appear that he had done so under consciousness of guilt, state had the right to straighten this matter by proper cross-examination of the witness.

11. Criminal law §1186(4)—Errors in view of evidence of guilt held not to result in miscarriage of justice.

In a prosecution for robbery, in view of evidence of guilt near, if not entirely, conclusive, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, no miscarriage of justice would result on an affirmance of judgment, notwithstanding errors of which complaint was justly made.

12. Robbery §24(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In prosecution for robbery of a bank in the daytime, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Lawrence Mahach and another were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed. See, also, 213 P. 539.

T. H. Selvage and Eugene Selvage, both of Eureka, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendants, who are Indians, and who were, by an information filed in the superior court of Humboldt county, jointly charged with, and, upon their trial, found guilty by a jury of, the crime of robbery, have brought the case to this court by an appeal from the judgment of conviction. The appeal is supported by a transcript of all the proceedings in the case, including the testimony. The defendants made no motion for a new trial. The points upon which reliance is placed for a reversal of the judgment are that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment and that the court, in rulings involving questions of the admissibility of certain testimony, committed errors, the effect of which was to deny to the accused a fair and impartial trial.

[1] The Attorney General preliminarily urges the proposition that, the defendants having failed to apply for a new trial, and, therefore, there not being here an appeal from an order refusing a new trial, the question whether the evidence supports the verdict cannot be reviewed, since, so it is contended, such question is reviewable only upon an appeal from such order. It has been held that the question whether the evidence is sufficient to support a verdict in a criminal case is reviewable on appeal from the judgment. People v. Clayton, 33 Cal. App. 357, 165 Pac. 37; People v. Bailey, 33 Cal. App. 521, 176 Pac. 880. But granting that the question of the sufficiency of the evidence cannot, in a criminal case, be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, where no motion for a new trial has been made, and there is, consequently, no appeal from an order denying a new trial, it is still true that, since the adoption into our Constitution of section 4½ of article 6, it is, nevertheless, essential, where the correctness of rulings upon the evidence and the charge of the court is challenged, that all the evidence shall be brought up for review with the appeal from the judgment in order to enable the reviewing court to determine whether the errors so complained of, if errors they be, would result in a miscarriage of justice in the event the judgment be sustained. People v. Clayton, supra. And, in passing upon the points so raised, the appellate court would, in effect, be required to pass upon the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to uphold the verdict.

The record is unusually voluminous. It embraces some 1,200 pages of evidence, both direct and circumstantial, which, in our investigation of the case, has been carefully read and considered. The defendants testified and each took the witness stand and positively denied having any connection with the commission of the robbery or having any knowledge as to the identity of the perpetrators of the crime. They also contradicted, or attempted to explain, upon a theory consistent with their innocence, certain circumstances which, considered with other more direct proof of their guilt, were and are of an incriminatory character of more or less potent significance. Yet, with their denials and their explanations, the people presented a very strong case against them. Indeed, accepting, as it must be assumed that the jury did, the testimony of the witnesses introduced by the prosecution as verity, the case made by the people, in support of the charge stated in the information, is well nigh, if, indeed, not entirely conclusive of the guilt of the accused. If, therefore, the record here disclosed no errors in the rulings of the trial court admitting incompetent and irrelevant, or excluding competent and relevant, testimony, or in the charge to the jury, the judgment of conviction of the accused would stand supported by an impregnable foundation. There were, however, errors made by the court below in the trial of the case, and we are now called upon to examine these assignments by the light of the evidence presented by the people (for it is not the office of this court to determine evidentiary conflicts) and to say whether, after such examination, they involve errors of so egregious a nature from a legal point of view as to compel the conclusion that a miscarriage of justice would attend and follow an affirmation of the judgment. Much of the evidence is of multifarious circumstances. Hence, a detailed statement thereof cannot be presented herein. It is conceived to be sufficient, therefore, to state the facts in a general way.

The robbery charged in the information occurred in the town of Fortuna, Humboldt county, on Wednesday, the 3d day of May, 1922, near the hour of 11 o'clock a. m. It appears that, on the day just mentioned, two masked men entered the Bank of Fortuna situated in said town and, holding revolvers in their hands, and after closing the front door of the bank, ordered the parties then in charge of the bank to deliver to them "your money." The bandits not only had white handkerchiefs over their faces, but also had their foreheads and the back of their necks covered with talcum powder and rouge. They also wore gloves. One of the bandits jumped over the counter, through the cashier's window, and, with a revolver in one hand, proceeded to deposit all the currency in sight and other moneys which were in the vault, which, on his command, was opened by one of the officers of the bank, into a white sack a couple of feet in length. This sack the bandit took from some part of his clothing after he got behind the counter. The coin taken by the robbers was in a Federal Reserve Bank sack, and this sack with the coin was placed in the larger sack. While he was thus engaged, the other robber held at bay with a revolver two customers or visitors in the bank, commanding them to make no move. After securing all the money in sight or shown to them by the officers of the institution, the robber who operated back of the bank counter backed out of the door into the lobby of the bank, thence, still backing, went out of the building and carried the money in the sack to an Oldsmobile car which was parked in front of and next to the sidewalk of the bank building, and threw the sack into the front part of the car next to the driver's seat. While this was going on, the other robber held his revolver upon the people who were in the bank until the man with the sack had safely deposited it in the car, and he thereupon followed his confederate and jumped into the back part of the car. The car was then started by the man who carried the money away in the sack and proceeded at a rapid rate of speed "around the corner" of the street near which the bank was situated, and proceeded in a northerly direction from Fortuna. The sum of approximately $19,000 was taken by the robbers. Of this amount, a sum a trifle in excess of $3,000 was in gold and silver—the bulk thereof being in gold—and the balance in currency. Immediately following the departure of the robbers in an automobile from the bank building, the parties in the bank at the time of the commission of the crime rushed to the street and raised "a hue and cry" and so notified the people then about the streets, of the robbery. The fact that the crime had been committed immediately became known to substantially all the people of the town. The sheriff's office at Eureka, a distance of 30 or 35 miles from Fortuna, was at once apprised of the robbery by telephone, and, at the same time, a posse of Fortuna citizens, under the leadership of the local police officers, was being organized, and within less than half an hour after the robbery, the posse, consisting of some 30 or more people, was on its way in pursuit of the criminals, said posse going in automobiles in a southeasterly direction and towards the village of Carlotta, situated a distance of some eight or nine miles from Fortuna. Reaching a point about two miles from Carlotta, the posse discovered on the roadside the car—an Oldsmobile touring car—in which the bandits were seen to leave the bank building. When so found, the car was without an occupant, and no one in sight was near it.

At this juncture, it is appropriate to explain the theory of the district attorney in the prosecution of the case in the court below with respect to the Oldsmobile referred to and which theory seems to be well supported by the record. The evidence, without conflict, shows that, on the evening of the 29th day of April, 1922, one O. J. Pidgeon, a citizen of Eureka, drove his Oldsmobile to and parked it in front of the Elks' building in said city, and thereupon went to the Elks' lodgeroom to attend a session of the local organization of that order and also a banquet to be given in said hall upon the adjournment of the session. When Pidgeon returned to the sidewalk, near the hour of 11 p. m., his car was missing, and he did not recover it until the following Thursday, which was the day immediately succeeding that upon which the robbery of the bank occurred. The Oldsmobile above referred to as the one in which the robbers left the bank with the money they had taken from that institution and later found deserted on the highway near Carlotta was the car which was stolen from Pidgeon in Eureka on the night or evening of April 29, 1922. The hypothesis upon which the people proceeded in the presentation of the case against the defendants in the trial court was that the parties who committed the bank robbery had stolen and taken the Pidgeon car on the night of the 29th day of April from where it was parked in front of the Elks' building, in the city of Eureka, and used it to facilitate the commission of the crime and "a get-away" upon the success of their scheme to rob the bank. The importance of the testimony presented in support of this theory will presently more clearly be made to appear.

The country in the neighborhood of Carlotta is mountainous and covered with heavy growths of brush, wild bushes, and trees. Running through that country are several streams of water. Among these are Yager creek and the Van Duzen river. The first named is the nearest of the two to the village of Carlotta and the point on the highway at which the Oldsmobile was found. The posse of Fortuna citizens had started from where the Oldsmobile was left by the bandits and proceeded in a search for the fugitives before the officers connected with the sheriff's and district attorney's offices arrived on the scene. They observed footprints of two different persons leading from the highway near where the bandits left the car into the woods and these tracks they followed to a point between Yager creek and the highway. At said point they observed that the footprints or tracks of one of the parties pointed in the opposite direction from that in which it clearly appeared the two individuals had traveled together to the point referred to. One of the men in pursuit of the criminals—Emerson by name—followed a trail to some brush which he found had been broken through, and passing through the brush, came to an open space, formed by the brush and other timbers, in the shape of a horseshoe, and there he discovered the defendant Mahach lying on the grass. This "open space" immediately borders on Yager creek. Mahach was ordered by Emerson to rise to his feet and throw up his hands. He obeyed the command, but asked Emerson "What is the matter with you?" to which Emerson replied that the bank at Fortuna had been robbed and that the robbers were believed to be in hiding in that vicinity. Mahach then proceeded to explain that he had been the night before at a place called Wildwood (a distance of a few miles from Carlotta), and had there engaged in gambling and drinking liquor; that he became intoxicated and left Wildwood at a late hour of the night and unconsciously wandered in the direction of Carlotta; that he did not realize where he was until the dawn of day, when he recognized certain landmarks with which he was familiar, he having at one time been employed for several months at the Holmes lumber camp, which was situated only a few miles from Carlotta; that, being tired from the want of sleep and feeling sick, the effect of his excessive drinking the night before, he went into the brush and to the spot where he was found to lie down and sleep. He told Emerson that, in his wanderings during the night, he had lost his suit case. Emerson, not supposing that he was one of the bandits, said to Mahach that he had better leave that locality immediately, as the officers and other citizens were searching the woods thereabouts for the men who committed the crime and that he (Mahach) might be shot and injured by some one of the searchers; that he (Emerson) had only a few minutes before heard some shots. Mahach replied that he hoped they would capture the robbers, for then, so he declared, he would not be suspected of having been implicated in the robbery. Mahach thereupon left the place where he was found, and went to Holmes camp. Shortly after Mahach departed from the woods on his way to Holmes camp one of the posse, G. H. Hudson, who was with Emerson for a short time, found a suit case in some brush—a sort of thicket—a couple of hundred feet from the spot where Mahach was lying when found. It should here be stated that Mahach, when discovered, was attired in an overseas uniform, he having been a soldier in the late war. On opening the suit case an old suit of clothes, a brown cap, a pair of old tan shoes and seven or eight .38-caliber cartridges were found therein. The suit case also contained a box of talcum powder and some rouge. There was a sprinkle of talcum powder on the coat found in the suit case and also on the outside of the suit case, as well as on the ground near where Mahach was lying. On examining the shoes, they were found to be damp and in one of them there was a fresh green leaf from a tree or bush. It was also noticed that at the time he was found by Emerson Mahach's face appeared to have been recently washed and that there were indications near the edge of Yager creek near where he was found that he had washed his face in the water of said creek. Emerson and other witnesses testified that Mahach had talcum powder on the back of his neck and behind his ears. They also testified that the clothing, leggings, and shoes he had on when found did not have any mud, dust or other marks indicating that he had walked any considerable distance. All these circumstances were revealed to the sheriff upon his arrival, and also he had been informed of the fact that the men who committed the robbery had their necks and faces covered with talcum powder and rouge and therefrom he formed the belief that Mahach was one of the bandits who committed the crime. He, accompanied by one of his deputies, thereupon immediately went to Holmes camp and there placed Mahach under arrest and returned with him to the place where the automobile had been abandoned on the highway. The suit case found, as explained, was shown to Mahach on his return with the sheriff, and he admitted that it belonged to him. Mahach was thereafter taken to the bank where a mask and a cap were placed upon him and he required to walk back and forth in the bank in the presence of the bank officials and others who were present at the time the robbery took place. He was then taken by the officers in an automobile to Eureka. The witnesses in the bank at the time of the robbery testified that as thus exhibited to them his appearance and manner of walking were the same as those of the robber on the outside of the counter when the crime was committed. During the course of the trip to Eureka Mahach did not deny having been connected with the robbery nor did he admit that he was one of the robbers. He remarked, though, that it was just as well that he should go to prison, as there was no chance for him to secure work by which he could make a living. He further stated, in effect, that the bankers had said that he would get a long term for the robbery. As a matter of fact, Mahach, in his conversations with the officers and before he pleaded to the information, never did at any time make a specific denial that he was one of the two parties that committed the robbery.

On the 7th of May, J. H. McCallum, who, with others, spent several days in searching the woods near Carlotta for the bandits, discovered the coin (amounting to over $3,000) in a Federal Reserve Bank sack cached in a wood rat's nest, about 200 feet from where the Oldsmobile was found. The currency was not and had not, up to the time of the trial, been found.

About the time Mahach was discovered by Emerson there were, as stated by the latter to the former, several pistol shots heard. It appears that a member of the posse, Bert Robinson, followed the footprints of the two persons and came to a certain point in a thicket and heard a noise as if some person or persons had "jumped up," as the witness described the noise, and he proceeded in the direction from which the noise came. In the meantime he met a Mr. Stewart, the owner of the land near where the pursuit was being prosecuted, and he (Robinson) said to Stewart that he was going into the brush, and, if he (Stewart) should see any one, to whistle or give some alarm to attract him. Robinson had not proceeded far when Stewart whistled and the former came out of the brush in time to see a man running toward Yager creek with his shoes and a sack in his hands. He yelled at the man and commanded him to halt. The man hesitated a moment and then started to run when Robinson shot at him two or three times. Robinson saw the bare footprints of a man going in the direction in which he saw the fleeing individual, and he (Robinson) followed. The man was within his sight for a considerable distance. Robinson saw him running down the bank of Yager creek and passing under the cliff for a considerable distance when he left the creek and started toward the Van Duzen river, Robinson in pursuit. Finally the latter lost sight of the man, but proceeded to said river where there was a canoe moored to the bank. To this point the bare footprints of the man were plainly discernible; but it seems from there on the footprints were made by shoes, the theory being that he put his shoes on at that point. The man proceeded on until he reached a point of several hundred yards from where Robinson was and then forded the river, holding the sack in his hand and passed on up a hill into the woods, and there all further trace of him was lost.

The fact that Mahach and the defendant Rube were and had been constant companions ever since the former returned from the war was generally known in and about Eureka, Pepperwood, Scotia, Wildwood, Rio Dell, and other small towns in Humboldt county. The fact was known to the sheriff's office, and after the arrest of Mahach upon circumstances which have been detailed and which were extremely suspicious, it occurred to the sheriff and the other officers that the robbers were the defendants. The suspicion that such was the truth was strengthened by the fact that the parties who saw the fleeing man at whom the shots were fired described him as being of dark complexion and corresponding in build and stature with those physical characteristics of Rube. Rube resided with his family in Pepperwood and from the evening of the 3d until the evening of the 11th of May his residence was constantly watched and guarded day and night by the officers. Mrs. Rube was informed by one of the officers that her husband was suspected of being one of the parties who robbed the bank, and finally negotiations were entered into between her and the sheriff's office looking to the consummation of an arrangement whereby she would induce her husband to surrender. On the evening of the 11th of May he appeared at his home and immediately thereafter Deputy Sheriff John Long went to his residence and placed him under arrest. Rube was shortly thereafter taken to Eureka and placed in the county jail. When Rube entered the county jail, the first question he asked was whether the other bank robber was there. At no time did he deny being connected with the commission of the crime. When asked questions by the officers tending to elicit from him some information concerning the crime, Rube stated that he did not care to discuss the matter. He did, however, in substance, say to the officers that while they and the citizens were searching for him some of them came so near where he was in hiding that he could have shot some of them if he had had a pistol. It also appeared that the sheriff or one of his deputies stated to him that if the missing money was restored to the bank by him, his wife would receive the reward or a certain per centum on the amount of the money. Rube replied to the officer making this proposition by asking him: "How do you know that I took or have the money," or words to that effect.

We will next consider certain circumstances happening a few days before the day of the robbery, as well as those leading up to the time of the robbery on the 3d day of May. As has been shown, the Oldsmobile found on the highway near Carlotta was the property of the Mr. Pidgeon above referred to, it having been taken by some one from in front of the Elks' building in Eureka on the night of the 29th of April. The evidence shows, and, indeed, the defendants admitted the fact, that the latter were in the city of Eureka on the 29th day of April. In this connection it should be stated that, as before stated, Mahach and Rube were and had been for a long period of time constant companions. They traveled together from place to place in Humboldt and Del Norte counties, ostensibly in search of work. It was also shown that on the 25th day of April, 1922, one Ray Purcell sold to the defendant Mahach at Eureka a .38-caliber revolver. It was further shown that a few days thereafter and before the day of the robbery, Mahach and Rube were in Crescent City, Del Norte county, and occupied together a room in the Travelers' Hotel at said place and that an officer, having occasion to visit the room saw Mahach in the possession of a .38-caliber revolver. The evidence shows that on the morning of the 30th of April, which was Sunday, parties bent on fishing and picknicking, when passing through the woods about two miles from Pepperwood, saw an Oldsmobile, closely resembling the one in question, parked behind a large redwood tree about 200 or 300 yards from the highway. At the time the Oldsmobile was thus seen there was no one in or about it. Later in the afternoon some of these same parties repassed the spot where the car had been seen, and it was then not there. Several witnesses testified to having seen the Oldsmobile found on the highway near Carlotta, or one closely resembling it, being driven around a block in Pepperwood in the neighborhood of 9 o'clock on the morning of May 3d, the day of the robbery. A number of other witnesses—men employed on the highway between Pepperwood and Carlotta—saw an Oldsmobile between the hours of 9 and 10 o'clock on the morning of May 3d, being driven at a rapid rate of speed from the direction of Pepperwood and going in the direction of Fortuna. Neither at Pepperwood nor along the highway were the parties who saw the machine able to tell who was driving it. The curtains on the machine were drawn or down and if any one was sitting in the rear seat he could not be seen by reason of that fact.

Irwin Traverse, a student at the Fortuna High School, testified that at about 11:20 a. m. on Wednesday, the 3d day of May, he had been sent by the principal of the school to the Fortuna Bank to have a dollar changed into pennies "for the purposes of the school cafeteria"; that as he was approaching the bank he observed an Oldsmobile of a deep brown color parked in front thereof; that the curtains on the car were down so that the car was inclosed; he proceeded on, and when he reached the sidewalk and was about six feet of the door of the bank he saw a man with a mask and talcum powder and rouge on his face, wearing a brown jumper, emerge from the bank carrying a sack; that the man left the bank hurriedly and went to the front of the automobile and threw the sack "over in the seat where the second person in front would sit"; that the man then jumped into the car and drove away at a rapid rate of speed. He stated that he thought that there was at least one man in the car besides Rube at the time that he saw the latter throw the sack into the car. This witness positively and unqualifiedly identified the defendant Rube as the person who left the bank with the sack and placed it in the car.

Charles H. Haight, a merchant of Fortuna, testified that he was in the bank at the time that the bandits entered it and committed the robbery. He testified that after one of the men had jumped over the counter, secured the money and was in the act of leaving, his mask "dropped down as he passed by me" and thus he was enabled to and did recognize him. He positively testified that Rube was the man who had the sack. He also testified with equal positiveness that Mahach was the other bandit. This witness gave a full description of the circumstances under which the robbery was executed and of the actions of the bandits in executing it. These circumstances are related above. He and other witnesses in the bank at the time testified that the robber on the outside of the counter said to the bandit on the inside, "Make it snappy." The witness Thompson, one of the parties in the bank at the time of the robbery, testified that he had often heard Mahach talk, and one of his favorite expressions was "Make it snappy."

Either on the 28th or 29th of April Mrs. Rube went to a store in Pepperwood, and asked for talcum powder and some rouge. A Mrs. Holmes, who was in charge of the store at the time, stated that she had just received an invoice of "Armour's" talcum powder, but that the price mark had not yet been placed upon the boxes. Mrs. Rube bought the powder and rouge. Mrs. Holmes was shown the box of powder taken from the suit case of Mahach and declared that it was of the same make that she sold to Mrs.

Rube. The witness examined the box, and was unable to find any price mark thereon.

The parties who were in the bank at the time of the robbery, when testifying at the trial, were shown the cap and coat taken from Mahach's suit case, and testified that they were exactly like the cap and coat worn by one of the robbers at the time of the commission of the crime. All the parties in the bank when the robbery occurred testified that the defendants, as to size, build, complexion, color of hair and eyes, answered the description of the bandits. Some of the same parties testified that the pistols used by the robbers had the appearance of being .38-caliber weapons.

Bert Robinson and other persons who were at the spot where Mahach was found testified that the place where he was lying when found did not show any indication of having been used or lain upon for any considerable time. In fact, Robinson testified that the grass did not show that it had been used "as a bed" at all. He also testified, as did other witnesses, that Mahach showed no signs of intoxication or of having been intoxicated and that there was not discerned any odor of liquor from his breath.

There were many other circumstances of a less incriminating nature than those recited above to which attention need not herein be given. The above is a sufficient statement of the facts presented by the people for the purposes of this decision.

The defendants, as stated above, denied being in Fortuna on the 3d of May and of being implicated in the robbery. As to the incident of the stealing of Pidgeon's Oldsmobile, as above explained, Rube declared that, while it was true that he was in Eureka on the night of the 29th of April, 1922, and went to his home at Pepperwood, a distance of 25 or 30 miles from Eureka, that night, he was taken about 2 miles from there by a friend of his by the name of Burcham. Rube also explained his absence from his home for the period beginning with the 3d and ending on the 11th day of May, by testifying that he was at an illicit still which he was maintaining in the woods a short distance from Pepperwood. It was at this point that Burcham left him, he testified. He further testified that he went to his home on Monday night, the 8th of May, and remained there overnight, returning to the still the next morning. He also testified that his wife on the night of the 8th of May told him that the officers had been there and were guarding the house, as they suspected him of being one of the parties who robbed the bank. The man Burcham, referred to, corroborated Rube's testimony that he (Burcham) took Rube to Pepperwood, or a point near that place, from Eureka on the night of the 29th of April in an automobile which he had borrowed from a friend by the name of E. L. Hartwell. Mahach's testimony consisted of a denial of any connection with the robbery and an explanation, which it has herein hitherto been shown that he gave to Bert Robinson and others, of his presence near Carlotta on the day of the robbery. Mahach also testified that he was and had been for a long time accustomed to using talcum powder on his face and neck.

A witness by the name of McCovey testified that Mahach and Rube visited him at his place on the Klamath river on the 28th day of April, 1922, and that Rube left his place on the following day and Mahach on the 30th of April; that Mahach by mistake left a .38-caliber Smith & Wesson revolver at his (witness') place. McCovey testified that, although not subpoenaed as a witness in the case, he went to Eureka during the course of the trial and took the pistol with him; that he had never before the trial told any one that he had the pistol; that he met Mrs. Rube in Eureka on his arrival there and that, upon her suggestion, he, accompanied by her, called at the office of the attorneys for the defendants and told them of the pistol and how he came into possession of it. The pistol was introduced in evidence in connection with the testimony of the witness. He admitted that he was a particular friend of Mahach and was personally interested in his case.

Having now presented herein what is believed to be a fair and sufficiently full recital of the facts and circumstances developed by the people in support of the charge set forth in the information, and also a general, yet a sufficient, statement of the testimony introduced by the defendants to show the nature of their defense, it will be next in order to consider such of the assignments of error as it is conceived call for special notice herein for the purpose of determining the question whether any such errors were, in their effect upon the rights of the accused, so grievous or damaging as to forbid the conclusion that, in view of the entire record, a miscarriage of justice would not follow from an approval of the judgment. There are many of these assignments. Some of the rulings complained of, however, do not involve error. There are others which, while not strictly correct, resulted only in the bringing into the record and before the jury matters of such little importance that of them it can justly be said, when viewing them by the light of the evidence, that they could not have exerted any influence in bringing about the result arrived at below. There are then a few assignments which are more serious.

[2] The first assignment involves the ruling of the court refusing to allow a certain witness for the defendant to testify as to an alleged well-defined trail leading from the open space where Mahach was first found after the robbery to the place in the thicket where his suit case was found. The witness referred to, at the request of the defendants, went to the places mentioned during the progress of the trial—three months or more after the day of the robbery—to view the situation there and ascertain whether there was such a trail as we have just referred to. The object of the testimony was, manifestly, to show that Mahach did not purposely leave the suit case in the thick growth of brush in which it was found for the purpose of hiding or concealing it so that pursuers of the bandits would probably not come across it; that there was an open, well-marked trail to the spot which was readily noticeable by any one at the place where Mahach was found. The objection to the testimony was that it was not shown or attempted to be shown that conditions at the place and surroundings where the suit case was found were the same at the time that the witness visited the place during the course of the trial as they were when it was found. The ruling sustaining the people's objection to the proposed testimony on the ground stated was proper.

[3] After the witness Burcham had completed the giving of his testimony, and while the trial was still in progress, the court, the jury then being absent from the courtroom, stated that there were "probable grounds for believing that perjury had been committed by this witness" (referring to Burcham), and thereupon ordered Burcham into the custody of the sheriff and recommended or advised that the question whether his testimony, or certain portions thereof, was or were perjurious be submitted to the grand jury of the county. Counsel for the defendants in their brief state that the incident was given publicity through the columns of the local newspapers, and insist that the action of the court in that particular worked great prejudice to the rights of the accused. There is no showing here that the incident was referred to in the newspapers of the city of Eureka, but if we assume, as well we may, that the said papers made a news item, even under sensational headlines, out of the circumstance, still the assignment can be of no purpose to defendants, since there is no showing, by affidavits or any other appropriate legal mode, that the jurors, or any of them, obtained any knowledge of the incident, either by reading the item in regard thereto or otherwise. People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 576, 606, 114 Pac. 48, 54. There is, therefore, no evidence in this record showing or tending to show that the jurors or any of them became disqualified to fairly try the case by reason of said incident.

[4] Since the insertion of section 4½ into article 6 of the Constitution the rule is not, as formerly, that prejudice is presumed from error, but it is now incumbent upon the complaining party to make an affirmative showing that prejudice followed from the error relied upon. People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 65, 130 Pac. 1042; People v. Stephens, 29 Cal.

App. 616, 621, 157 Pac. 570, 572; People v. Lapara, 181 Cal. 66, 67, 183 Pac. 545; Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 554, 147 Pac. 238.

[5] In connection with the complaint that the conduct of the court in directing that Burcham be held for investigation on a charge of perjury was highly prejudicial to the defendants, we may pertinently consider the contention of counsel for the defendants that one of the results of that order of the court was to intimidate other witnesses for the defense to the extent that they were put in fear of giving an honest statement of any facts relevant to and in support of the defense of which they might have knowledge. As in verification of this contention, counsel call attention to the fact that the defendants' witness, Nelson, who resided near Carlotta on the day of the robbery, and saw the officers and certain members of the posse while in pursuit of the bandits, when asked by one of the attorneys for the defendants the course taken by certain of the posse from his (witness') place on the morning of the robbery, before answering the question stated that he desired some advice as to "the distance from one place to another" in his neighborhood; that he had stated on the witness stand the day before that it was "500 yards from my house up to the road. If it was measured and if there was any less or any more," he proceeded interrogatively, "do I break the laws of this country by not stating it right?" The court replied to the witness: "You give the best of your information, and I say you are not violating any laws of this country." There is nothing in the foregoing to show that the witness was intimidated, nor is there anything in his subsequent testimony or any showing by any other mode that he was intimidated. Moreover, no witness desiring or intending to tell the truth would or could be intimidated into telling an untruth or into refusing to tell all the pertinent facts he had knowledge of by any act or conduct of the court.

[6] In this connection, however, we may consider another proposition maintained by the defense, to wit: That the attorneys for the defendants brought out the fact by an examination of the witness that the preceding day said witness had been in the district attorney's office and was interviewed, presumably as to his testimony, by a deputy in that office, and thereupon the attorney for the defendants made the remark that "it is absolutely wrong for the district attorney's office to tamper with the witnesses," whereupon the court declared:

"Mr. Selva, there is no evidence here that the district attorney's office has tampered with any witness. Don't make a grandstand play before the jury now. You have no right to make any such remarks. If you want to play to the gallery, rent a hall and do it; don't come in here and make such remarks as that in the presence of the jury."

There does not appear to have been any justification for the accusation made by the attorney that the district attorney or any of his deputies had "tampered with" any of the witnesses in the case. Such a charge is a serious one, as to say that one has "tampered with" witnesses or jurors in a case implies that the tamperer has wrongfully and criminally induced or attempted to induce them to pursue a course as such which is contrary to the fact or the real truth of the matter to be judicially determined, and, in the absence of any ground for such a charge by an opposing attorney in a case and in the presence of those who are required to decide the facts, such remarks justify a rebuke of the accuser by the court. At the same time we are constrained to say that some of the language of the court, for obvious reasons, should have been omitted. While it is known that attorneys, in their zeal in espousing and defending the cause and protecting the rights of their clients, will sometimes transcend the limits of forensic propriety and thus exhaust the patience of the judge, the latter should always at least attempt to maintain that attitude of judicial equanimity which would stand in the way of any remarks coming from so high a position which might have the effect of depriving a party to the action of a fair and just trial of the issues. But, however this all may be, the record here shows that the court repeatedly, during the progress of the trial, admonished the jury in very clear and positive language that any remarks exchanged between court and counsel in the discussion of questions arising at the trial should not be considered by them in passing upon the question whether the defendants were or were not guilty; that that issue was to be determined by them solely upon the evidence, considered in the light of the law applicable to the case as given them by the court. We must assume that the jury heeded this admonition in their deliberations upon the case.

[7] The defendant Rube, in support of his claim of alibi, voluntarily, or through invitation by his own lawyers, stated that he was, and had been for some time prior to the commission of the robbery charged here, maintaining a whisky still in the woods about two miles from his home, and, as elsewhere herein shown, testified that he was at the still day and night, with the exception of Monday night, the 8th of May, from the 3d to the 11th day of May, 1922. On cross-examination, and over objections by the defendants, the people were permitted to inquire minutely into the matter of the installation of the still, the ownership thereof, whether in the defendant alone, or in him jointly with some other person or persons, whether any one assisted him in installing it and as to the names of the parties who made or manufactured the essential equipments thereof, etc. It was thus developed that the defendant had some barrels and other equipments of the plant made by a plumber in the city of Eureka. Upon being asked the name of the party, the defendant flatly and persistently refused, even when directed to do so by the court, to reveal the name of said party. The district attorney, after futile efforts to elicit information from the defendant as to the name of said party, made a motion that the entire testimony of Rube be stricken from the record. The court declared the conduct of Rube in refusing to answer a pertinent question to be contumacious, but that, since Rube was already confined in jail, an order committing him to jail until he was prepared to answer the question would possess no efficacy or force, and that, therefore, the only course open to the court to force obedience by Rube to the direction that he answer the question would be to grant the motion. The court then stated that the motion to strike would be granted unless the question was answered by the defendant. The latter finally answered the question, stating, however, that he did not know the name of the party but described the place where said party was conducting business in Eureka so that the district attorney was able to identify him. It is contended that the cross-examination was improper and that the court exceeded its authority when it threatened to strike out all of the defendant's testimony theretofore given as a penalty for not answering the question, thus intimidating the witness into returning an answer, and that the conduct of the court in the matter was, therefore, highly prejudicial to the accused. In the main, there was nothing improper in the cross-examination of Rube as to the still. The "plant" was the scene of his alibi, and the people were entitled to go into the questions as to who conducted it, whether he alone or assisted by others, whether he was the owner of it or only employed by others, and the name and names of any party or parties he had obtained the materials from to construct the still, all to the end that it might be determined, if thus it could be, whether, as a matter of fact, Rube was the owner of the still or interested to an extent that would cause him to remain there during the days that he was sought by the officers.

[8] As to the means adopted by the court to compel him to name the party from whom he had obtained the barrels, etc., it is sufficient to say that, while we know of no rule in this state authorizing a court to strike out the testimony already given by a witness as a penalty for refusing to answer some specific proper question propounded to him, yet it is perfectly plain that the method adopted by the court to force an answer to the question could not have injured the defendants or their case in the slightest degree. Indeed, Rube's refusal to return a candid answer to the question would seem to be more damaging in its effect upon the case of the defendants than the answer itself. He had voluntarily admitted that he had been for a long time engaged in breaking the law in maintaining a whisky still, and his refusal to name the party furnishing him the materials from which the still was made would be apt to leave the impression with the jury that he was not telling all the truth regarding the ownership and the establishment of the still. The answer could not have intensified or added to the gravity of the crime which he had already admitted having committed. The only motive that could have prompted him in refusing to answer the question, and doubtless that was his purpose in refusing to answer, would seem to be that thus he hoped to save the party from whom he had obtained the materials from prosecution in joining with him in the installation of the machinery necessary to the carrying on of an unlawful or a criminal occupation.

[9] The next and last of the assignments to which attention will herein be given, and which are regarded as involving the most serious complaints urged against the court's conduct of the case, relate to certain features of the redirect examination of the witness Long, the deputy sheriff who arrested Rube, and the cross-examination of Mrs. Rube by the district attorney. On cross-examination the attorney for the defense conducting it asked Long, referring to the circumstance of the arrest of Rube, the following questions, to which the answers following were made by the witness:

"Q. Marion Rube surrendered voluntarily that night to you? A. I don't know whether Marion done that or not; he did not state anything about surrendering voluntarily. Q. He was right there when you went into the house? A. He was in the house; yes, sir. Q. Was there not an agreement made between you and Mrs. Rube before that that he was to be at the house and surrender himself? A. She made an agreement in the sheriff's office on Sunday night, May 7th. Mr. Ross [the sheriff], Mr. Hill, and myself were present in the office. Q. And she was there in compliance with that agreement? A. She wished to see all parties; she wished to see Mr. Hill [deputy district attorney] herself that evening. Q. Mr. Long, Mr. Rube was at his own house because of an agreement entered into between you and Mrs. Rube? * * * A. Not to my knowledge. Q. Did Mrs. Rube make an agreement with any one that he would be there at that time and place? A. Well, speaking for myself, not with me."

On redirect examination the district attorney was permitted by the court to examine the witness in detail regarding the terms of said agreement. The district attorney was allowed to ask many questions which had no relevant bearing upon the case; for instance, he asked Long if Mrs. Rube did not say at the time that the alleged agreement was discussed that when "he [Rube] gets a job of work some one will say, 'There is the man that killed McCurdy,' then he loses his job."

Many other similar questions were propounded in the leading form to the witness, who was required by the court to answer them. Mrs. Rube was subjected to a similar line of cross-examination by the district attorney over the objection of counsel for the defense, many questions being asked which, like the one last above referred to, could not have thrown any light upon the issues of the case and had no relevancy to any agreement which might have been made for the surrender of Rube, and their effect could only be to place the accused in a bad light before the jury. The defense objected to the entire redirect examination of Long on the ground that it was not proper redirect examination, inasmuch as the terms or nature of the agreement were or was not shown or attempted to be shown by the cross-examination. They also objected upon the ground that the questions asked of Long on redirect examination and those asked of Mrs. Rube on cross-examination were not pertinent redirect or cross examination. The court allowed the redirect examination and cross examination referred to upon the theory that it came within the rule enunciated in section 1854 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads:

"When part of an act, declaration, conversation, or writing is given in evidence by one party, the whole on the same subject may be inquired into by the other; when a letter is read, the answer may be given; and when a detached act, declaration, conversation, or writing is given in evidence, any other act, declaration, conversation, or writing, which is necessary to make it understood, may also be given in evidence."

The court by its rulings subjected that section to a misinterpretation of its purpose and scope. What is meant thereby is that where a part of a conversation or a writing material and relevant to the issues of a case is given in evidence, the other parts of such conversation or writing having relevant reference to the part given may also be introduced. If the part not given is explanatory of or in any way qualifies or modifies the part given, then, in such case, the part not given by the witness may be shown. It was certainly never intended that under the guise of said section there may be lugged into the record of a case a mass of irrelevant and incompetent testimony which might have a tendency to militate seriously against the rights of the party against whom it was admitted.

[10] The court made no error when it allowed the people properly to question Long on redirect examination concerning the nature and terms of the agreement. The defense had brought out the fact that there was such an agreement, but left it in such manner as possibly to convey the impression to the jury that some sort of pressure or undue influence had been practiced by the officers on Rube and his wife to induce Rube to surrender in such way as to make it appear that he had done so under the force of a consciousness of guilt. The people, therefore, had the right to straighten this matter out by a proper examination of the witness for that purpose. As seen, however, the court permitted the people to go too far.

[11] But, by a careful examination and consideration of all the evidence in the case, we have been irresistibly persuaded to the conviction that, with all the errors of which complaint has justly, from a legal point of view, been made, some trifling and others which, in their nature and their effect, under other circumstances, would be of serious consequence, the evidence of the guilt of the accused is so near, if not entirely, conclusive, that, in obedience to the command of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, we are compelled to announce the conclusion that a miscarriage of justice would not and could not result from an affirmance of the judgment. Indeed, it is our unqualified belief generated from a thorough consideration of the evidence, that of the defense as well as that of the people, that should the judgment be reversed and the accused perchance escape conviction upon a second trial, a positive miscarriage of justice would follow.

[12] We need not essay a résumé of the facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence which seem unerringly to point to the defendants as the perpetrators of the robbery. It seems to us that no fair-minded person, after reading the evidence, even as in conspectus form it is herein produced, could fail to reach the conclusion that the jury by their verdict laid their hands squarely on the shoulders of the guilty parties. We have here a case in which there is not only positive identification of one of the defendants and almost like identification of the other as the robbers, but in which there was shown circumstance after circumstance of the most incriminatory nature that, taken together, alone would be sufficient to support a verdict of guilty. That the robbers were dark-skinned persons is shown, not alone by the positive testimony of eyewitnesses to the commission of the crime, but by the circumstance that the criminals undertook to conceal their identity, in addition to the use of masks for that purpose, by having plastered their foreheads and necks with large quantities of talcum powder and rouge and also the very significant circumstance that they wore gloves, presumably, in their minds, the surest means of concealing the color of their hands and hence the racial class to which they belong. All the circumstances following the enactment of the robbery—Mahach's presence in close proximity to the point in the highway at which the Oldsmobile was abandoned, the finding of talcum powder on his neck, coat, and in his suit case, and the resemblance of the fleeing bandit in color of face and hair, stature and build, to the defendant Rube, and the circumstance of the known companionship of Mahach and Rube for many months before the robbery, and the many other circumstances which have been above recited—would seem to lead with direct certainty to the defendants as the authors of the crime. As to the evidence presented in behalf of the defendants and their own testimony, the reading thereof will readily and upon slight reflection convince any person of average intelligence desiring to be fair and just, that, save the express denials by the accused of their guilt, there is no such inconsistency between it and the facts and circumstances brought to light by the people (except, also, the claim of Rube that he was at his still when the robbery occurred) as would have the effect of destroying one circumstance or fact making up the people's case. Rube's story on the witness stand from the beginning to the end thereof, was such as would not bear logical analysis. But, as stated, it is not necessary that there should be an analytical examination of the overwhelming testimony of guilt produced by the people to convince any fair-minded person that the result reached by the jury in this case is as it should be. If, in such a case, section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution does not apply, then it would be difficult to imagine a case wherein its application would be legally pertinent.

The judgment as to each of the defendants is affirmed.

L. C. MORGAN CO. v. CHRISTENSEN.
(Civ. 4729.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 1, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 31, 1924.)

Sales 77(1)—Contract for sale of railroad ties held to protect purchaser against fall in prices until he disposed of his ties.

Contract for sale of railroad ties on commission held to protect purchaser against fall in prices until he had disposed of ties already manufactured, to avoid a resulting oversupply.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by the L. C. Morgan Company against Con Christensen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Puter & Quinn, of Eureka, for appellant. Mahan & Mahan, of Eureka, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover moneys alleged to be due according to the terms of a written contract. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

On May 21, 1921, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written agreement as follows, to wit:

"May 21, 1921.

"Mr. Con Christensen, McCann, Calif.—Dear Sir: In harmony with our conversation of this date we agree to handle your ties at $1.00 per M feet commission from date until Nov. 1st 1921, applying same on our orders until filled. Basing the price at $27.00 per M feet until the railroads place additional orders to establish a price.

"Then if it is higher we are to pay you the additional amount and if lower you are to protect us on the decline.

"Payments to be made as soon as received from the company to whom they are sold.

"In the event that you get an order direct we will cancel this agreement.

"Yours truly, The L. C. Morgan Co.,
"By L. C. Morgan."

It was the theory of the plaintiff in the trial court, and is its theory in this court, that the above instrument by its terms, when properly construed, protected the purchaser against a fall in prices on railroad ties both before and after November 1, 1921, and until the plaintiff had sold and turned over the railroad ties which it had already manufactured. On the other hand, it was and is the theory of the defendant that said instrument protected the purchaser against a decline in prices down to, but not subsequent to, November 1, 1921. As we view the instrument a proper interpretation of it requires a consideration of the circumstances under which it was executed. Although the written instrument does not so state, the writing was executed in Humboldt county, and the subject-matter of the contract was railroad ties that had been manufactured and were then in the Humboldt redwood timber belt. Immediately before the paper was executed, Mr. L. C. Morgan, representing the plaintiff, and his brother, B. F. Morgan, another officer of the plaintiff corporation, and the defendant, Mr. Christensen, were together in the office of the plaintiff discussing the matter of the purchase by the plaintiff of railroad ties from the defendant. At that particular time the defendant had on hand a quantity of ties, and had not any orders for the purchase thereof. At the same time the plaintiff had on hand a quantity of ties, and was still engaged in manufacturing additional and other ties. Moreover, the plaintiff had secured orders covering its output. When the circumstances stood thus, the parties were assembled as above stated and endeavoring to contract one with the other. Regarding that conversation the witness L. C. Morgan testified:

"At the time the shipping season started Mr. Christensen came to me a number of times and asked me to let him ship his ties on our orders, as we had received some orders, and he had not been able to secure any. I told him that we had obligated ourselves to take all ties that we had orders for, and for that reason we could not take his ties, but to see Ogle and see if he could not go in on them. After several interviews he came out from Eureka on the 21st day of May a year ago, and told us that he was unable to make any sale of his ties, and that he needed money to meet certain demands and carry on his business; I again told him that we had—that we could not get additional orders if we took his ties on our orders, and we would have ties left of our own, that we had contracted for. For that reason we would not be able to do anything. So we discussed the matter at some length, and I finally suggested to him about taking his ties, having some left on hand, that we would be in a bad position, as the market looked like it would be lower, but that if he would be satisfied at whatever the market price on the ties would be, if he would be agreeable to taking that price that we would, as an accommodation, take those ties, or a part of his ties, if we could, and apply them on these orders of ours. He finally agreed to that, and then came up the way to determine what the price would be on the ties. I told him I was sure the price would be lower than they had been paying from the fact that they were not in the market, the supply was filled. I told him I was sure they would not be over $25. He insisted they would be more and he figured on a $30 price. I told him I would make up an agreement and allow for them whatever we could get for them from the railroads; we would work on the basis of $25. He said 'No,' he had to have money to operate, and would have to get higher prices. He thought he ought to have more money. We finally arrived at a rotary price, a basis of accounting at $27 from the fact that was the last price that the railroad had bought ties at. At that time we thought everything was thoroughly understood. We talked it over. After I wrote the little memorandum of agreement I passed it to my brother in the office, and he said we would have ties left over. Q. Was that in Christensen's presence? A. Yes, sir. He said we would have ties left over. I said we want them left over, and when the railroad bought them the price that we would get would be—we would be protected on any decline in the price."

Later the instrument was signed. Mr. B. F. Morgan was later called as a witness by the plaintiff, and the defendant took the stand as a witness in his own behalf. Neither one of those witnesses gave any testimony contrary to that given by Mr. L. C. Morgan of and concerning the conversation held by the parties at the time of the execution, or immediately prior or immediately subsequent to the execution of the written instrument.

By deciding the case in favor of the plaintiff it must be assumed that the trial court accepted as true the testimony given by the witness L. C. Morgan. If it did, it cannot be claimed that there was not presented to the trial court the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates. Furthermore, it is obvious that the written instrument did not purport to protect the purchaser against increased prices by the railroads if such increased prices should be made before November 1, 1921, because in that event the defendant would have had the right to go into the market and resell the same ties on the increased prices, and by the last clause in the instrument he was entitled to cancel it. The written instrument on its face showed that the plaintiff was to take the defendant's ties and apply them toward the fulfillment of orders which the plaintiff already held. Such an act on its part would manifestly result in the plaintiff having ties left over, and which, as it surmised, the plaintiff must market the following year at a figure lower, perhaps, than it was paying to the defendant. To avoid such a contingency the parties made "the price at $27 per M feet until the railroads place additional orders to establish a price." From the uncontradicted testimony it appears that the railroads did not place such additional orders until February and March thereafter, and that the price at which such additional orders were placed was $22 instead of $27. If the construction which the defendant contends for should prevail, it would render nugatory the last covenant contained in the written instrument. As we have pointed out above, that passage authorized the defendant to resell and at the same time have the plaintiff cancel the written contract with it. However, during the life of the contract an increase in price was available to the defendant without going to the trouble of negotiating a sale, because it had been provided above, "Then, if it is higher, we are to pay you the additional amount, and, if lower, you are to protect us on the decline." In other words, the clause last quoted is so broad as to include the covenant last stated in the instrument and more besides, but it is the duty of the courts to give some force and effect to each and every clause contained in the contract.

In the trial court the respondent contended that a custom prevailed in Humboldt county to the effect that the price on railroad ties is made by the railroad companies annually at some time during the months of December, January, and February. In the view that we have taken of the first point it is unnecessary for us to take up a discussion of the second point.

While the second point was being presented, some rulings regarding the admission of evidence were excepted to. For the reasons last stated it becomes unnecessary to discuss those rulings.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

CARNAHAN v. MOTOR TRANSIT CO. et al.
(Civ. 4420.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California, Jan. 23, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 20, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨193(1)—Objection to form of pleading cannot be first raised on appeal.

In the absence of any demurrer to a complaint, or of any objection to testimony offered in support thereof, objection to the form rather than the substance of its allegations cannot be first raised on appeal.

2. Pleading ⇨408, 433(5)—Sufficiency of facts alleged to constitute cause of action may be raised at any time during trial, or after judgment.

The objection that a complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action may be made at any stage of trial, even after judgment, where there is a total want of facts stated, rather than an imperfect or defective statement of necessary facts.

3. Carriers ⇨314(2)—Allegation of negligence of motor stage driver held sufficient.

A complaint in an action for personal injuries sustained when the motor stage in which deceased was riding collided with another automobile in the midst of a pool of oil on the highway, occasioned by the breaking of a nearby pipe line, which alleged that the driver "negligently and carelessly caused said stage to collide with the automobile," held to sufficiently allege negligence.

4. Negligence ⇨111(1)—General allegation sufficient.

Negligence may be pleaded in general terms.

5. Negligence ⇨119(4)—Evidence admissible under general allegation.

Under a pleading of general negligence, any evidence tending to prove negligence is admissible.

6. Carriers ⇨315(1)—Evidence of defective lights on motor stage admissible under general allegation of negligence of driver.

Under a general allegation of negligence, in that the driver of a motor stage caused it to collide with another automobile, evidence that the car was equipped with defective lights is admissible as tending to prove the charge of negligent driving.

7. Carriers ⇨316(4)—Burden on carrier to establish freedom from negligence causing collision.

When one seeking to recover for injuries sustained while a passenger in a motor stage from a collision with another automobile has shown defendant a common carrier, himself a passenger for hire, and that a collision occurred in which he was injured, the burden is upon defendant to prove freedom from negligence.

8. Carriers ⇨315(1)—Defense of surprise and lack of preparedness to meet issue of defective lights held not available to motor transportation company.

A motor transportation company being sued for personal injuries sustained by a passenger in a collision may not complain that it was surprised and unprepared to meet the issue of defective lights, since upon the making of a prima facie case by plaintiff the burden was upon it to establish its freedom from negligence, including proof of proper lighting equipment.

9. Trial ⇨243—Instructions as to use of defective lights and as to recovery for negligence not alleged held not conflicting.

In an action for personal injuries, where only general negligence of defendant transportation company had been alleged, an instruction permitting a recovery if defendant's motor stage was equipped with defective lights held not in conflict with other instructions that no recovery could be had for any negligence other than that charged in the complaint; the general allegation being inclusive of that of defective lights.

10. Negligence ⇨12—Care required in emergency.

One suddenly confronted with unexpected danger without fault on his part is only required to use such means for avoiding the danger as would be used by a person of ordinary prudence, and is not required to choose the most judicious course of action.

11. Negligence ⇨139(1)—Instruction on care required in emergency held erroneous.

An instruction which stated in effect, that a person suddenly confronted with unexpected danger, without fault on his part, would be required "to use that degree of care that would be required of a person under a stress of circumstances," but which did not specify the degree of care required of a person under a stress of circumstances as that degree of care which would be exercised by an ordinarily prudent person, held erroneous, and properly refused.

12. Carriers ⇨321(12)—Denial of instruction as to care required when confronted with sudden danger held not error.

In an action for personal injuries sustained by a passenger in a motor stage when it collided with another automobile due to its inability to stop because of oil on the pavement from a broken pipe line near by, denial of an instruction as to the degree of care required of the driver when confronted with the sudden danger held not erroneous where the principal negligence alleged consisted in his conduct before entering upon the oily portion of the pavement, and in the use of defective lights which failed to reveal the presence of the oil and the car with which the collision was had.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by H. L. Carnahan, as special administrator of the estate of George Schuster, deceased, against the Motor Transit Company and the General Pipe Line Company. From judgment for plaintiff, the first-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs, E. B. Drake and H. W. Kidd, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Carnahan & Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Appellant was the owner of an auto stage line operated between the city of Bakersfield and the city of Los Angeles. On September 17, 1920, respondent's intestate, George Schuster, was a passenger in one of appellant's stages, and shortly after leaving San Fernando on its regular trip from Bakersfield to Los Angeles, and while passing along and upon San Fernando boulevard, said stage collided with another automobile standing upon said highway, and as a result of said collision the said George Schuster was seriously injured. This action was instituted by him to recover damages against appellant and the defendant the General Pipe Line Company, a corporation. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of Schuster in the sum of $12,500 against both of the defendants in said action. Upon a motion for a new trial the court granted the same as to the defendant the General Pipe Line Company, but denied said motion as to appellant. After the perfecting of said appeal the said Schuster died, and respondent was appointed special administrator of his estate, and as such is contesting said appeal.

The circumstances of said collision were as follows:

San Fernando boulevard is a paved highway, the paved portion thereof being about 20 feet in width. Near to said highway, and parallel with it, the defendant the General Pipe Line Company maintains a pipe line for the purpose of conducting oil through the same. Shortly after dark on the day of the collision this pipe line broke, and the oil therein ran out upon said highway, and at the point in said highway where the collision occurred it extended across the entire width of the paved portion of said highway and was from 1 to 5 inches in depth. Just before the accident an Italian, with a truckload of watermelons, was traveling upon said highway going from a point near San Fernando to the city of Los Angeles. When his truck encountered the oil on the highway it began to slip and skid, and finally came to a full stop, practically across the highway and on the northerly side thereof, its rear wheels resting near the northerly edge of the pavement and its front wheels standing at about the center of said pavement, with its radiator pointing south. An auto stage, belonging to the Original Stage Line, which left San Fernando a few minutes before the one in which Schuster was riding, was following the truck, and was probably 500 feet behind the truck. The driver thereof, observing lights in front of him, drove his stage slightly to the south side of the highway, and stopped the same about opposite the truck standing across the highway, and about 3 feet therefrom. The stage of appellant, after leaving San Fernando for Los Angeles, proceeded down the highway, and encountered the oil thereon about 100 feet distant from the scene of the collision. The driver, however, failed to discover the presence of the oil until his car began to slip and skid on the highway as a result of oil being thereon. He testified that he then endeavored, by first applying his brakes, and then by changing to second speed and shutting off the power, to control his car. These efforts on his part were ineffectual, and his car crashed into the rear of the stage belonging to the Original Stage Line standing on the highway as above described. The grade of the highway from San Fernando to the point of collision was a slight down grade of about 2 per cent. The car in which the deceased was riding was equipped with two headlights and a spotlight, but these lights did not light up the highway in front of the car for a distance of over 100 feet. The highway was of asphaltum, and was similar in color to the black oil flowing thereon. The driver stated that he was traveling, at the time he encountered the oil at a rate of speed not exceeding 25 miles per hour, while there was other testimony which placed the speed of his car at this time as high as 40 miles per hour. There was nothing to obscure from his view the truck standing across the highway, nor the stage of the Original Stage Line standing opposite the truck, nor the tail light of the latter car, at least not until he ran into the oil, when, according to his testimony, the oil splashed against the windshield of his car and made it difficult to see objects ahead of him. The oil, however, was not encountered to any extent until he was within 100 feet of the point of the collision.

The first ground advanced by appellant for a reversal of the judgment is that the complaint does not state a cause of action against the appellant. It is alleged in the complaint that—

"The employee of defendant Motor Transit Company * * * negligently and carelessly caused said stage then and there to collide with, and vigorously to strike, an automobile."

[1] Appellant contends that in the foregoing allegation there is no fact alleged at all, but the mere conclusion of the pleader is stated, that is, that the driver "negligently and carelessly caused said stage to collide with an automobile." Had the complaint alleged that the employee of appellant carelessly and negligently drove his stage against another automobile, appellant concedes that it would have stated a good cause of action; but that when it alleges that the employee carelessly and negligently caused his stage to collide with another automobile it fails to state the necessary facts. No authority is cited by appellant which supports its contention. The case of Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 29, comes as near to being an authority in appellant's favor as any case cited in its brief, but the facts in that case were so different from those before us that it is of but little assistance in the decision of the present action. There was no demurrer, either general or special, filed to the complaint in this action. Neither was there any objection to any testimony offered in support thereof on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The case was tried upon the assumption that the complaint was sufficient, and, as the objection now made to it goes more to the form than to the substance of its allegations, it is too late to raise for the first time such an objection after judgment.

[2] It is true that the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action may be made at any stage of the trial, and even after judgment; but this rule only applies when there is a total want of facts stated in the complaint, and not to an imperfect or defective statement of the necessary facts. As was said in the case of Arnold v. American Insurance Co., 148 Cal. 660-663, 84 Pac. 182, 183 (25 L. R. A. [N. S.] 6):

"Facts essential to a cause of action appearing by reasonable implication only, and allegations made in the form of a legal conclusion, which merely implied the necessary material facts, have been held sufficient as against such an objection [one made after judgment]. An example of this is the case of Penrose v. Winter, 135 Cal. 289, 67 Pac. 772, where there was no other allegation of the essential fact of non-payment except the allegation that 'there is now due and owing,' etc. This was held sufficient after judgment, the ground of the ruling being that the objection was rather to the manner of pleading an essential fact than to the total failure to allege such fact, and that such faults, in the absence of demurrer, are cured by the judgment."

The complaint in this case is very similar, in its allegation of the fact of negligence, to that in the case of Renfro v. Fresno City Ry. Co., 2 Cal. App. 317, 84 Pac. 357, wherein it was charged that—

"The employees of said defendant * * * negligently and carelessly caused said car to be suddenly and violently jerked and started and put in rapid motion without allowing plaintiff sufficient time to alight therefrom."

A judgment in plaintiff's favor was sustained by the appellate court. Counsel for appellant in that case strenuously assailed the judgment, and, after an adverse ruling in the District Court of Appeal, filed petitions, for rehearing both in the District Court of Appeal and in the Supreme Court, each of which was denied. It is true that the particular objection made to the complaint in the present case was not urged in the Renfro Case, but, considering the strenuous efforts exerted by counsel in that case to secure a reversal of the judgment of the trial court, it is hardly to be conceived that they would have failed to have presented in the appellate courts the point now relied upon by appellant herein, had they considered that there was any merit in such a contention.

[3] The complaint was therefore, in our opinion, sufficient to sustain the judgment.

[4-6] Appellant's next contention is that the court erred in instructing the jury that they might find for the plaintiff if the evidence showed that the auto stage of appellant was equipped with defective lights, or lights failing to meet with the requirements of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397, as amended by St. 1917, p. 382, and by St. 1919, p. 191), and that the absence of such lights upon the stage was the proximate cause of the injury sustained by plaintiff. Appellant insists that no such issue is presented by the pleadings. Its counsel contend that the complaint, if it states any cause of action at all, charges only that the driver of the stage negligently operated the same so that it collided with another car, whereby plaintiff was injured, and that no mention whatever was made in the complaint of the defective lights upon the stage. We have already held that in our opinion the complaint states a cause of action. It is well settled in this state that negligence may be pleaded in general terms. Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 29; Stephenson v. S. P. Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407; Opitz v. Schenck, 178 Cal. 636-638, 174 Pac. 40. The effect of this rule, permitting plaintiff to allege negligence in general terms, is to make admissible in evidence any and all testimony which would tend to prove this allegation of negligence. The negligence might consist in driving upon the wrong side of the highway, or at an excessive rate of speed, or driving a car with defective brakes, or with insufficient lights, or of any other act of the owner or driver of the car which would amount to negligence in its operation. These specific acts need not be set forth in the complaint, in view of the rule permitting negligence to be pleaded in general terms; but, when any of said acts are sought to be proven, such evidence is to be received in proof of the allegations of the complaint, and, if it is sufficient to support said allegation, and no contributory negligence is shown on the part of the plaintiff, entitles plaintiff to a judgment in his favor. With such evidence before the court it becomes its duty to instruct the jury regarding the law applicable to such evidence. To be more specific, under the general charge of negligence in driving a car so that it collided with an object upon the highway, evidence that the car was equipped with defective lights would be admissible, and would tend to prove the charge of negligent driving. In such a case it would be the duty of the court to charge the jury to that effect. This the court did in the present action, and in so doing it committed no error.

In Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, at page 147 (34 Pac. 620), a reference is made to the following illustration taken from Bliss on Code Pleading:

"The driver upsets a stage coach and breaks a passenger's arm; careful driving will hardly have such a result; the passenger knows there has been negligence, but he may not know in what it consisted. The driver may have been drunk and asleep; he may have so harnessed the horses that they would not obey the rein, or may have made them unmanageable by improper treatment. The plaintiff can only prove that the coach was turned over; the presumption is that it was the result of negligence; if not, the defendant can show it."

The court used this illustration in explanation of the reason for the rule permitting negligence to be pleaded in general terms. In the supposed case mentioned therein all that the plaintiff need allege, to make out a case of negligence against the owner of the coach, was that the stage coach was negligently overturned. All that he need prove under such an allegation would be that the coach was overturned. If the evidence of the plaintiff should go farther, and show, or if the evidence of the defendants should show, that the cause of the overturning of the coach was the improper harnessing of the horses, then we apprehend that it would be within the province of the court to instruct the jury that, if they believed that the horses were improperly harnessed, and that the failure to properly harness them was the proximate cause of the overturning of the coach, then they should find for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the fact that the complaint merely alleged that the driver negligently drove the coach so that it was overturned.

[7, 8] Appellant claims that it was taken by surprise, and was not prepared to meet the issue of defective lights. This claim is untenable. Appellant is a common carrier, and the deceased, Schuster, was a passenger for hire in one of its stages. All the plaintiff was required to prove was that he was such a passenger, and that a collision happened in which he was injured. The burden was then upon appellant to prove that it was free from negligence. To do so it must show, among other things, that the car was properly equipped with all necessary appliances, including proper lights, so that the same could be safely operated. If it was not prepared with this evidence it was its misfortune, and not the fault of the pleadings.

[9] Nor did this instruction conflict with other instructions given by the court at the instance of appellant, wherein the court instructed the jury that they could not find the defendant the Motor Transit Company guilty of any other negligence than that charged in the complaint. The general allegation of negligence in the complaint embraced every specific act of negligence that might be proven thereunder. Therefore, if under the allegations of negligence contained in the complaint, evidence of improper lights with which appellant's stage was equipped was admissible, and we have held that it was, then, legally speaking, the complaint charges such negligence the same as if the condition of the lights had been specifically set out in the complaint.

What we have said regarding the objections made by appellant to the instructions given by the court answers the further point made by appellant that—

"This lawsuit was based solely upon one allegation of negligence (the negligent operation of the stage) and recovery was permitted upon another, to wit: A failure to have statutory headlights on the stage."

The general allegation of negligent operation of the stage included the operation thereof with defective headlights, or lights not complying with the statutory requirements, and under such a general allegation a recovery could be had by showing any act of the driver which directly contributed to the negligent operation of the stage, whether that act be driving without proper brakes, or with defective headlights, or at an excessive speed, or any, or all of such acts.

It is finally contended by appellant that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction:

"If you find that the driver of the autostage of the defendant Motor Transit Company was suddenly confronted with danger through the negligence, if any, of the General Pipe Line Company, by reason of oil being upon the highway, or if he was confronted with danger without fault on his part and got into same, then, even in the exercise of the highest degree of care he would only have to use that degree of care that would be required of a person when under a stress of circumstances, and not that degree of care that would be required of a person when not under a stress of circumstances, and you are not to decide whether the driver was guilty of negligence by what the after-developed facts may have shown would have been best for him to have done, or what you think he should have done. * * *"

[10, 11] A person suddenly confronted with an unexpected danger, without any fault on his part, is only required to use such means for avoiding the danger as would be used by a person of ordinary prudence, and he is not held to that strict accountability which would require that the course chosen be the most judicious one. McPhee v. Lavin, 183 Cal. 268, 191 Pac. 23. It was evidently the intention to state the above principle of law in the proposed instruction refused by the court. It is apparent, however, that there was a failure to carry out this intention. It is stated in effect in said proposed instruction that a person suddenly confronted with unexpected danger without any fault on his part would only have to use that degree of care that would be required of a person when under a stress of circumstances; but just what degree of care a person under a stress of circumstances would be required to use, the instruction fails to set forth. There is absolutely nothing in the instruction that would tend to inform the jury that a person so confronted would only be required to use such means for avoiding the danger as would be used by a person of ordinary prudence in a like situation. The proposed instruction, therefore, failed to correctly state the law applicable to the degree of care required of a person suddenly confronted with danger, and was therefore properly refused.

[12] Furthermore, the refusal to give the proposed instruction, even if it correctly stated the law, would not, under the facts proven in this case, have constituted error on the part of the trial court. The negligence which the evidence shows the appellant to be guilty of was not his failure to control his car after he encountered the oil on the highway, but was the driving of his car into the oil under such circumstances that he lost control thereof to such an extent that he was unable to prevent the collision. It may be conceded that it was beyond his power to control his car after he had driven on the highway where the oil covered the same the entire width of the paved portion thereof. There is evidence in the record that this condition only prevailed for a distance of 25 feet to the rear of the car with which the collision was had; but, admitting that the oil covered the paved portion of the highway to its full width 100 feet to the rear of said car, the negligence of the driver consisted in driving his car with lights so defective that he was unable to distinguish the oil on the highway in front of him, even though it was similar in color to the paved portion of the highway, and furthermore, that on account of his defective lights he failed to see the truck and the stage of the Original Stage Line as they stood on the highway in plain view of him. A cautious driver would have discovered objects upon the highway practically as soon as they came within the range of his lights, and, if the car of appellant had been equipped with proper lights, that is, lights throwing their rays at least 200 feet in front of the car, the driver thereof, in the exercise of that care and diligence enjoined upon one in charge of a vehicle of a common carrier, would have discovered the objects upon the highway in sufficient time to have brought his car under control before he reached the point in the highway where the oil completely covered the entire paved portion thereof. The proposed instruction only referred to the condition produced after the appellant's car encountered the oil on the highway, and, as the acts of the driver of the car which constituted the negligence in the case were all performed prior thereto, the proposed instruction was not applicable to the facts in the case, and was therefore properly refused.

Judgment is affirmed.

McCLENAHAN v. KEYES. (Civ. 4582.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 1, 1924. Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 31, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error §1099(7)—Review on second appeal held limited to determining whether different aspect was presented because of new evidence.

Where the Supreme Court in a former appeal has established the law of the case and determined the weight, sufficiency, and effect of the evidence given at the first trial, the question on appeal from a second trial is merely whether the case wears a different aspect because of any new evidence given at the second trial.

2. Physicians and surgeons §24(3)—Evidence held insufficient to prove mother's agreement to pay for medical services rendered to daughter.

In a physician's action against mother's executor for services rendered her wealthy daughter where there was no proof of any previous transaction tending to establish the relation of debtor and creditor between the physician and the mother, declarations of a nurse, that the mother had made statements to her angrily "storming" daughter that she would pay the physician, or that her lawyer got the physician, or that she had employed him herself, were insufficient to show such a relation.

3. Evidence §472(1)—Opinion of one performing services as to who is liable for them not admissible.

Whether a liability of one for services performed for another exists must be made to depend on facts in evidence uninfluenced by personal opinions of the one performing the services.

JOHNSON, Justice pro tem. This case is based upon a claim of $1,821 for professional services rendered by plaintiff as an alienist by reason of a serious mental disorder suffered by Miss Frances Howard, a daughter of the decedent, Anna Dwight Howard. The claim consists in part of a charge for medical treatment and observation of Miss Howard, beginning on January 8, 1915, and in part of a charge for attendance as an expert witness in certain contested proceedings instituted with a view to having Miss Howard declared incompetent and her person and estate placed under the care of a guardian. These proceedings were dismissed without prejudice in October, 1915. In the following January, however, a new proceeding was instituted, which was uncontested, and which, without testimony from plaintiff, resulted in the appointment of a guardian.

Thereafter plaintiff brought suit against Miss Howard to recover for the same services for which claim is made here. In that action plaintiff recovered judgment for only $45, and on his appeal the judgment was affirmed on the ground that, with the exception of attendance when Miss Howard was unconscious and in need of medical aid, the services of plaintiff could not be held to have been rendered at her request or for her benefit. McClenahan v. Howard, 50 Cal. App. 309, 195 Pac. 68. Thus failing to recover compensation in full from Miss Howard, plaintiff, in July, 1918, presented a claim, and in due time instituted the present action, against the estate of Miss Howard's mother, Anna Dwight Howard, who had meanwhile died, and by his complaint in this action plaintiff asserts that the services were rendered at the mother's special instance and request. The case has been tried twice. In the first trial judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor for $1,798.50. An appeal from the judgment was taken by the defendant and the judgment was reversed, primarily on the ground that no employment by the mother had been proved. McClenahan v. Keyes, 188 Cal. 574, 206 Pac. 454. Since that decision the case has been retried, with a judgment resulting in favor of the plaintiff for $1,821 and interest, and the case now comes here on appeal by the defendant, who contends that the same vice which impaired the former, infects the present, judgment.

[1] In the former appeal the Supreme Court established the law of the case and determined the weight, sufficiency, and effect of the evidence given at the first trial. Goldner v. Spencer, 31 Cal. App. 13, 15, 159 Pac. 462; Burr v. U. R. R., 173 Cal. 211, 212, 159 Pac. 584; Anderson v. Aronsohn (Cal. App.) 219 Pac. 1017.

Consequently, the question on this appeal is merely whether or not the case now wears a different aspect because of any new evidence given at the second trial.

[2] The facts being given in detail in the opinion of the Supreme Court, a brief statement will suffice here. Miss Howard was a young woman of about 33 years of age and possessed of property worth over $100,000. On January 7, 1915, her mental condition was such as to alarm her relatives, and she was placed in a sanitarium conducted by Dr. Bering, who on the following day, while Miss Howard was unconscious, summoned Dr. McClenahan to her aid. This was the beginning of a service which continued for a considerable period. At the time when plaintiff was first called, Miss Howard's mother was in the East, and on being informed of the daughter's condition, Mrs. Howard hastened to San Francisco in company with her son-in-law, Mr. Whitwell. When Mrs. Howard arrived she and Dr. McClenahan had a conference, as to which the testimony, embodied in the doctor's deposition, was precisely the same at both trials; and the Supreme Court has held that nothing occurring at that conference constituted an employment of the doctor by Mrs. Howard.

Prior to Mrs. Howard's arrival, Dr. McClenahan had had a meeting with Miss Howard's attorney, Halsey Rixford; and on that occasion Mr. Rixford showed the doctor a telegram which had come to Mr. Rixford from the East. The authorship of this telegram was left in doubt at the first trial, the evidence being that the message was sent either by Mrs. Howard or her son-in-law, Mr. Whitwell. At the second trial Mr. Rixford's recollection was that he received two telegrams; one before Mrs. Howard left Boston, which was either from her or Whitwell, the other while Mrs. Howard was on the way, which, as Mr. Rixford recalls, was signed by her and "expressed a maternal solicitude for her daughter's welfare," and stated the date of the mother's probable arrival in San Francisco. This latter telegram, however, was not, according to Rixford's recollection, shown to the doctor. The telegram which the doctor saw must then have been the first telegram received; and its authorship is left in the same doubt at the second trial as at the first. Accordingly, under the ruling of the Supreme Court, that telegram must be deemed immaterial. Even if the later telegram had been shown to the doctor, it contained nothing authorizing his employment; hence neither telegram serves to strengthen the plaintiff's case. Were it to be assumed, however, that Mr. Rixford did have express authority from Mrs. Howard to employ a physician, the testimony shows without conflict that no employment in her behalf was in fact attempted. Mr. Rixford testified positively that he did not undertake to employ Dr. McClenahan for any one, but gave the doctor to understand that if Miss Howard should be declared incompetent or insane, compensation for his services would be payable out of her estate. And the testimony of Dr. McClenahan himself in the guardianship proceedings, found also in the record here, shows that he made no arrangements for compensation, but that he expected Miss Howard, or some one in charge of her affairs, to compensate him adequately for his time and services. There is nothing, therefore, in the new testimony of Mr. Rixford that lends support to the plaintiff's case.

In an effort at the last trial to establish an employment by Mrs. Howard, the plaintiff called as a witness Mrs. Vandever, who did not appear at the previous trial. Mrs. Vandever was Miss Howard's nurse, and was present at several meetings, described as stormy, between Miss Howard and her mother, at which mention was made of the doctors. The first of these conversations was at the Adler Sanitarium in February, 1915, and the witness testified as follows:

"Every time the question came up, the daughter would say to the mother: 'How long am I to have these nurses? How long am I to have these doctors? I don't want them. There is nothing the matter with me.' That is what the daughter said always to the mother, and she would say, 'Frances, this will soon be settled, and then you will be all right.' She said, 'I don't want Dr. McClenahan, and I am not going to pay him.' That is the statement the daughter would make every time. The mother would say: 'Well, now, Frances, you are not to worry about paying. That is my business. I am going to pay Dr. McClenahan. It was me that got him in the first place, through my attorney.' She said, 'It was through the lawyer that I got Dr. McClenahan.'"

Speaking again of a conversation in April, the same witness said:

"The mother came to have lunch in San Mateo with the daughter and me, and after lunch, in the living room, Miss Frances Howard started the same question, and again the mother told her that: 'It is going to be settled in court, and you will probably go with me East, and I will take care of your affairs, and you don't have to pay. I am going to pay. I have employed Dr. McClenahan myself.' She made the statement that she was glad to have him."

Proceeding further the witness gave also the following testimony:

"I was with the daughter four times that I can remember at the Adler, and when the daughter did first ask the mother how she got the doctor, and I do not recall that she said exactly by telegraph, but I know she said: 'My lawyers got Dr. McClenahan. I want Dr. McClenahan, and I continued with him.' And at the San Mateo home and at the Peninsular Hotel the matter would come up at luncheon, during the time I was with Miss Howard.

"Q. You said at the Peninsular Hotel, did you not? A. Yes.

"Q. In San Mateo? A. Yes, in San Mateo. And there was no time that the daughter would not bring this same conversation up of how long she was going to have a doctor and how long she was going to have a nurse, and the same question, 'I am not going to pay them.' And the mother each time would try to make her quit talking money, and each time would say: 'I will take care of that for you. I will pay the doctor.' That statement was made every time to the daughter by the mother in my presence.

"Q. You are not able to state just exactly the date of each of the conversations, are you?

A. No.

"Q. The one at the sanitarium, the one at the home in San Mateo, and the one at the Peninsular Hotel? A. No, she would generally be storming—the daughter would storm with the mother.

"Q. Storm? A. Yes; be angry, you know, with the mother.

"Q. You mean, find fault with her? A. She was very noisy and very loud at times."

Such being the supplemental testimony, we are to determine whether with its aid the evidence as a whole can now be said to support a finding of an employment of Dr. McClenahan by Mrs. Howard.

In deciding the former appeal the Supreme Court declared the general rule of law to be that one who calls upon a physician to render services to another is not liable for those services, in the absence of an express agreement to pay therefor; and, though a parent requests medical service for an adult son or daughter, such request does not raise even an implied promise to pay.

The court further determined that nothing in the dealings had by Dr. McClenahan either with Mrs. Howard herself or any of the attorneys showed an employment of the doctor by Mrs. Howard, or a promise binding her either expressly or impliedly to pay his charges. That being the case, surely there is nothing in Mrs. Vandever's testimony which supplies proof ever so slight of an express promise on the part of Mrs. Howard to Dr. McClenahan.

In order to create a contract there must be a meeting of minds between parties treating either directly or through some agency. And without a shadow of proof of any previous transaction establishing the relation of debtor and creditor between Mrs. Howard and Dr. McClenahan, Mrs. Howard's statements to her angrily "storming" daughter that she herself would pay the doctor, or that her lawyers got the doctor, or that she had employed him herself, cannot give body to that which is bodiless or infuse the breath of life into the stuff of dreams. If there were any evidence of an actual contract, Mrs. Vandever's testimony would then be corroborative. But neither Mrs. Howard herself nor any attorney made to the doctor any promise to pay; and without evidence of some authentic contract previously made, there is no art in the law whereby such declarations can be made of themselves to speak into existence an indebtedness which before was not. See Bennett v. Potter, 180 Cal. 736, 745-746, 183 Pac. 156; Stimson Mill Co. v. Hughes Mfg. Co., 8 Cal. App. 559, 561-562, 97 Pac. 322.

To fashion a contract out of Mrs. Vandever's testimony it would be necessary to reject arbitrarily and unreasonably all the other evidence, including the actions and testimony of Dr. McClenahan himself, despite the fact that such other evidence affords clear, direct, and positive proof that Mrs. Howard never did obligate herself to pay the fees. The record does not justify, opposing conclusions, and under such circumstances it must be said that Mrs. Vandever's testimony does not, in legal intentment, conflict with the other testimony in the case. Seeley v. Osborne, 220 N. Y. 416, 422, 116 N. E. 97.

It is unfortunate and seemingly inequitable that Dr. McClenahan has had to go unpaid. He gave undoubtedly important and valuable aid much desired by Miss Howard's relatives. And the situation in which he is left is apparently due to the fact that, unmindful of his private interest, he trusted to be paid instead of exacting an express agreement from some one competent to act.

[3] In different trials the doctor has voiced different inferences or opinions as to who was his real debtor; but now, as on the former occasions, liability must be made to depend on the facts in evidence, uninfluenced by personal opinions. Burns v. Jackson, 59 Cal. App. 662, 666, 211 Pac. 821.

There has, however, at no time been variance in the testimony as to the governing facts; and since the record here presented is in all substantial particulars the same as that at the former trial, it follows that this appeal must be controlled by the law of the case heretofore promulgated. Inasmuch as the evidence, weighed by that standard, fails to support findings in favor of plaintiff, the judgment must be reversed. It is so ordered.

PRENDERGAST v. MITCHELL-SILLIMAN
CO. et al. (Civ. 4813.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 26, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 24, 1924.)

Venue $\Leftrightarrow$ 52 1/2—Right to change defeated by dismissal as to individual defendants after motion filed.

Where plaintiff would have right to have an action tried where brought, had it been against the corporation defendants alone, and, after appearance and filing of motion for change of place of trial by the individual defendants, he directed the clerk of court to dismiss the action as to them, the right to change, existing in such individual defendants only, was thereby defeated; right of plaintiff to dismiss existing, under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, at any time before the trial, and sections 392-397, as to venue, not being inconsistent therewith.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by S. J. Prendergast against the Mitchell-Silliman Company and others. From an order denying motion to change place of trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, and C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for appellants.

Philip C. Boardman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal from an order denying the motion of the defendant to change the place of trial. On May 17, 1921, the plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants by filing in the office of the county clerk of San Francisco a complaint in which he alleged that he had been employed by the defendants, had rendered service for them, and that the reasonable value of his services was $2,600, of which $1,823 remained unpaid. Thereafter summons was served on each of the defendants except the fictitious defendants John Doe and Richard Roe. Thereafter C. F. Lacey, Esq., as attorney for all defendants except the fictitious defendants, gave notice:

"Said motion will be made upon the ground that at the time of the commencement of said action the defendants O. P. Silliman, W. G. Silliman, and Lee Post were and are now residents of Monterey county, California, and the Mitchell-Silliman Company, a corporation, and the Monterey County Bank, a corporation, at the time of the commencement of said action had and maintained, and still have and maintain, their respective principal places of business in Monterey county, California, and that said Monterey county, California, is the proper county for the trial of said action."

That notice was accompanied by a demand signed by each of the defendants. It was also accompanied by affidavits as follows: (1) The affidavit of O. P. Silliman as president of the Mitchell-Silliman Company, a corporation, from which affidavit it appears that the principal place of business of the corporation is Salinas City, Monterey county; (2) the joint affidavit of O. P. Silliman, W. G. Silliman, and Lee Post, from which it appears that each of them was a resident of Monterey county when the action was commenced; and (3) the affidavit of Luther Rodgers, president of the Monterey County Bank, from which it appears that said bank is a corporation and has its principal place of business at Salinas City, Monterey county; and said moving papers were accompanied by a demurrer. Each of said papers was filed on October 13, 1921. The return date of the motion, as alleged in the notice of motion, was October 28, 1921.

After the service and filing of said papers the plaintiff appeared in the county clerk's office and directed the county clerk to dismiss the action as to the defendants O. P. Silliman, W. G. Silliman, and Lee Post. A few days later he filed his own affidavit to the effect that—

"The obligation and liability of said defendants thereunder, and breach thereof, arose in the city and county of San Francisco. * * *"

Later the motion was presented to the trial court, supported by the papers designated, the motion was denied, and a notice of appeal was filed which purports to be the appeal of each and all of the defendants except John Doe and Richard Roe. It is not disputed that the fictitious defendants are to be disregarded in determining a motion for the change of a place of trial. Ludington E. Co. v. La Fortuna Min. Co., 4 Cal. App. 369, 88 Pac. 290. Nor is there any contention that if the action had been brought against the corporations alone the plaintiff would have a right to have the action tried in San Francisco because the services are alleged to have been rendered there. Cook v. Ray Manufacturing Co., 159 Cal. 694, 115 Pac. 318. However, the appellants claim that right to a change of place of trial must be determined by the conditions existing when the defendants first appeared in the action. Donohoe v. Wooster, 163 Cal. 114, 124 Pac. 730; Remington S. M. Co. v. Cole, 62 Cal. 311; Hennessy v. Nicol, 105 Cal. 138, 38 Pac. 649; Ah Fong v. Sternes, 79 Cal. 30, 33, 21 Pac. 381; Buell v. Dodge, 57 Cal. 645. As to that contention the respondent replies that the effect of the filing of the appearances and moving papers was to prevent the plaintiff from asking or taking any judicial relief until the motion of the defendants had first been heard and determined; or, in other words, that the filing of those papers operated to intercept action by the court, but not action by the clerk of the court. To this statement the appellants reply that such an interpretation results in vesting more power in the clerk than is vested in the court of which he is a mere officer. The same reply could have been made concerning the power to file of record a complaint, or to issue a summons. The answer is, however, that the statute is so written.

The appellants urge that their theory must be supported to the end that the provisions of sections 392-397 of the Code of Civil Procedure be reconciled with the provisions of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But the vice of that contention is that the sections mentioned contain no conflict, and there is nothing to be reconciled. On the other hand, if the courts should hold with the appellants, then the latter section would be construed as though it were written as follows:

"An action may be dismissed, or a judgment of nonsuit entered, in the following cases: (1) By the plaintiff, by written request to the clerk, filed with the papers in the case, at any time before the trial, upon payment of his costs; provided, a counterclaim has not been set up, or affirmative relief sought by the cross-complaint or answer of the defendant, or no appearance and notice of motion to change the place of trial has been served or filed."

Appellants' contention would require us to read into the statute the whole of the expression as underlined. To do so would be to legislate instead of to interpret.

The individual defendants who had been joined with the corporations had the right, notwithstanding such joinder, to have the action tried in a county where they resided at the time the action was commenced. Ah Fong v. Sternes, supra. But that right on the part of the individual defendants was no concern of the codefendant corporations. Strassburger v. Sante Fé L. I. Co., 54 Cal. App. 7, 9, 200 Pac. 1065.

Notwithstanding the dismissal of the individual defendants and that such dismissal was a step in favor of those defendants, nevertheless they took a purported appeal. Such action was consistent with their theory, but certainly conferred on them no additional rights, neither did it confer any additional rights on the defendant corporations.

We find no prejudicial error in the record. The order is affirmed.

PECK v. SIMON NEWMAN CO. et al.
(Civ. 2682.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 24, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 24, 1924.)

I. Evidence §98—Failure of plaintiff to produce evidence on any issue justifying finding in favor of defendant on that issue.

Since plaintiff has the burden of proof, failure to produce evidence upon any issue justifies a finding in favor of defendant on such issue.

2. Landlord and tenant §332—Finding on issue of ownership of live stock sustained.

In an action by the lessor of a farm against an attachment creditor of the lessee for the conversion of live stock claimed by plaintiff by virtue of the lease, evidence held to sustain a finding that the property in controversy was purchased and paid for by lessee and was at all times in his actual possession, and that plaintiff at no time asserted any title to such property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by J. F. Peck against the Simon Newman Company and Emil S. Wagenheim. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. M. Peck and H. C. McPike, both of Oakland, for appellant.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants.

Plaintiff leased certain lands belonging to him to E. T. Wiggins, together with personal property thereon, including cows, bulls, heifers, calves, and hogs, for a term of seven years from January 1, 1916; the lessee to furnish the necessary labor in the operation and management of the property and the net proceeds to be divided equally between the parties. The lease provided:

"The lessee shall return to the lessor, at the end of the termination of the term, the same number of cows of the same ages of those leased, and at all times the cows upon the land which are purchased from the proceeds of the sales of the cows leased or acquired by exchange of said cows shall belong to the lessor and be a part of the property leased herewith and be held under the same terms as though the original cow had continued upon the place."

Like provisions were made as to the heifers, bulls, and hogs. It was further agreed:

"That, at all times, hogs, horses, mules and cattle, however acquired from funds derived, directly or indirectly, from said leased land or the produce thereof to the number of those leased shall belong to the lessor with the division herein provided for upon the termination of the lease. * * * At the termination of the term, the cows, hogs, calves, heifers and bulls shall be restored in kind and the remainder of the increase shall be divided as follows: If any of the remaining cows, calves, heifers, bulls or hogs have been purchased from the proceeds of the ranch, or the increase of those leased, these shall be equally divided between the lessor and the lessee as nearly as can be, according to their value, numbers and ages."

Further provision was made that one-half of the net proceeds "shall be paid to the lessor on the first day of each and every month."

[1] May 25, 1918, in an action brought by defendant Simon Newman Company against Wiggins, the live stock then on the land was attached; the company paying the mortgage liens thereon hereinafter mentioned. May 29, 1918, Wiggins gave the company a bill of sale of the live stock and the company took possession of the property. A part of the property included in the bill of sale was thereafter delivered by the company to the plaintiff, and this action involves only the hogs and the cattle described in the bill of sale. Plaintiff thereafter commenced this action of conversion and at the trial thereof sought to prove that he was the owner of the live stock by virtue of the terms of the lease, and further that, prior to the attachment, Wiggins had transferred the property to the plaintiff, pursuant to the provisions of the lease. The only ground urged for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. The evidence bearing upon some of the issues is very meager, and, since plaintiff had the burden of proof, failure to produce evidence upon any issue justifies a finding in favor of defendants upon such issue.

[2] To establish plaintiff's ownership of the live stock in controversy by virtue of the terms of the lease, it was necessary to show that the same were a part of the original stock or of the increase thereof, or had been "purchased from the proceeds of the sales" thereof, or "acquired by exchange," or acquired by the plaintiff himself by purchase or otherwise. The record is silent as to whether any of the hogs included in the bill of sale were a part of the original stock or had been acquired in such manner as to bring them within the terms of the lease. It is conceded in appellant's opening brief that "some time after entering into possession of the leased property, E. T. Wiggins disposed of all of the leased cows, heifers and calves." There is no claim that any of the cattle mentioned in the bill of sale are a part of the increase of the original stock. It remains to be ascertained whether they were purchased by plaintiff or "purchased from the proceeds of the sales" of live stock belonging to plaintiff. Relative to a part of the cattle in controversy, Wiggins testified:

"I * * * found this bunch of cattle and one of the boys was with me, and we decided that they were all right. I went up to Mr. J. F. Peck's office in Oakland and told him of the cattle, and he said to go ahead and buy them, and I asked him how about the money. He gave me a check out of his pocketbook and told me to give a personal check for the amount. * * * When I objected, he said that it was all right; that when the check came in he would take care of it. When the cattle came, I sent them to the ranch by the boys, myself going to Oakland. I asked Mr. Peck if he had taken care of said check. He said he had forgotten it."

A promissory note and a mortgage on the cattle purchased were then executed by Wiggins to the bank on which the check was drawn for the amount thereof. Plaintiff indorsed the note, but Wiggins seems not to have known of the indorsement. In answer to a question as to whether plaintiff said anything "as to why the chattel mortgage was to be placed in your name," Wiggins testified:

"Yes, sir; there was, but I don't know as I could recall the exact words. He did not care to have people down there think that he was buying cattle on time, or something to that effect."

He testified that plaintiff never made "any claim to any live stock on the ranch" prior to the execution of the bill of sale to the company. Another lot of cattle was purchased by Wiggins and a promissory note, secured by a mortgage on the cattle, was given to a partner of plaintiff for the amount necessary for payment of the purchase price. The plaintiff requested his partner to make the loan. Wiggins testified that he had no conversation with plaintiff "with reference to what was to be done with the live stock when the chattel mortgage would be paid, * * * only in a general way, that they were to be there on the place. The mortgage was given with the note and would be renewed from time to time until paid off by me"; that witness paid the sum of $600 out of his own funds for some of the cattle purchased; that nothing was said as to who was to be the owner of the mortgaged property "when the chattel mortgages were paid"; that after the company had paid the mortgages, the plaintiff said "that it was the money he wanted, not the stock." C. M. Peck, a son of the plaintiff, was plaintiff's agent during the term of the lease. He visited the ranch about twice a month and had general charge thereof. Included in the property delivered by Wiggins to the company pursuant to the bill of sale were some farming implements. Shortly after the property had been so delivered, C. M. Peck demanded the return of such farming implements but made no demand for the return of the live stock. He explained his failure to make such demand by saying that he had not at that time seen the lease and did not know whether the cattle belonged to plaintiff, and that plaintiff was then in Death Valley. A demand for the return of the live stock seems to have been made subsequently. The testimony of plaintiff throws no light upon the transactions between himself and Wiggins. If it be conceded that the foregoing evidence would support a finding to the effect that plaintiff was the owner of the property in question under the terms of the lease, it cannot be held that it requires such a finding.

C. M. Peck testified: That prior to the levy of the attachment Wiggins telephoned the witness, saying:

"I am going to give up this lease. * * * I am not going to fool with the live stock anymore."

That witness replied:

"You deliver the cattle at the place to Fred Hornback and I will get up there in the next day or so."

That witness went to the ranch two or three days later, before the attachment was levied, and that Wiggins there said:

"I will give up the cattle under the terms of the lease. * * * Hornback out there has already taken charge of them. * * * I delivered them to him in compliance with our telephone conversation the other day."

The testimony of the witness is corroborated by that of Glen Hornback and Fred Hornback. Wm. C. Wiggins testified that C. M. Peck was not at the ranch at the time stated by the latter. E. T. Wiggins testified that he was in the actual possession of the property up to the time of the attachment; that he did not have the telephone conversation with C. M. Peck as testified by the latter; and that he did not tell Hornback that C. M. Peck had said to turn the cattle over to Hornback. In weighing the evidence, the court may have considered of some importance the failure of C. M. Peck to demand the return of the live stock at the time he demanded the return of the farming implements as heretofore stated. If in fact the live stock was transferred to plaintiff prior to the attachment and the execution of the bill of sale, C. M. Peck had knowledge thereof, according to his own testimony, and it would have been most natural for him to demand the return thereof with the farming implements.

From the conflicting evidence, the court found that the personal property in controversy "was actually purchased by said E. T. Wiggins and paid for by him and was at all times in his actual possession and at no time was said property ever delivered by said Wiggins to plaintiff, but plaintiff knew that said E. T. Wiggins claimed to be the owner thereof and was in the actual possession of said property, and at no time did said plaintiff assert any title to said property." There is sufficient evidence to support the findings, notwithstanding the contradictory evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONTEVERDE v. BROOKE REALTY CO.
(CN. 2715.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 24, 1924. Rehearing Denied Feb. 23, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 24, 1924.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨49—Covenant by vendor of real estate to construct, grade, and improve highways held substantially complied with.

A covenant by a vendor of lots to construct, grade, and improve highways in the subdivision was substantially complied with when the streets were graded, in absence of a showing of the surrounding circumstances and mutual understanding of the parties as to the character of the street improvements.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨339—Purchaser justified in treating contract abandoned on refusal of vendor to comply with covenant therein.

In a contract for the sale of lots with a covenant by vendor to pipe water thereto, when vendor refused to comply with the covenant, purchaser was released from the duty of making further demand and was justified in treating the contract as abandoned and suing for recovery of the money paid without any demand other than the suit.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨341(1)—Purchase price recoverable on vendor's refusal to perform covenant before time for performance.

In a contract for the sale of lots with a covenant by vendor to pipe water thereto, upon completion of dwelling, that purchaser had not constructed a dwelling house did not preclude action for the purchase money paid, when vendor informed purchaser that he would not comply with the covenant.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨58, 110 — Covenants held dependent; vendor's agreement to pipe water held a covenant, breach of which was ground for rescission.

In a contract for the sale of building lots, a covenant by vendor to pipe water thereto and covenant by purchaser to pay the purchase price were dependent, and vendor's covenant being material, a breach thereof justified a rescission by purchaser.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨49 — Vendor's agreement to pipe water not complied with by putting down a well.

The putting down of a well on building lots was not a performance of vendor's covenant to pipe water thereto.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨341(3)—Burden on vendor to excuse performance of agreement to pipe water to property sold.

Where vendor of lots covenanted to pipe water thereto, if there was anything to excuse performance thereof, the burden was on vendor to show it in purchaser's action to recover payments made.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇨114—Vendor could not set up delay of purchaser in disaffirming contract.

A covenant by vendor to pipe water to lots sold being dependent, and vendor having it in his power to perform it, and not having suffered because of purchaser's delay in demanding performance of the covenant, he could not set up such delay in an action by purchaser for the purchase money.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by John J. Monteverde against the Brooke Realty Company, a corporation. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

V. L. Hatfield and W. H. Hatfield, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Dunn & Brand, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The complaint alleges that on or about the 24th day of January, 1921, the defendant became indebted to Mary Monteverde in the sum of $1,239.22 "as and for money had and received by the defendant from the said Mary Monteverde in successive and continuous monthly payments * * * for the use and benefit of said Mary Monteverde"; that she assigned her claim for said money to plaintiff; and that no part thereof has been paid. The answer denies the allegations of the complaint. The court found that the claim of Mary Monteverde had been duly assigned to plaintiff as alleged, but that the other aforesaid allegations of the complaint are untrue and gave the de-defendant judgment for costs. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The case was submitted in the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts. From such statement it appears that by two written contracts, dated respectively July 5 and July 12, 1911, the defendant agreed to sell, and Mary Monteverde agreed to buy, two lots in North Sacramento Heights at the price of $700 each, an initial payment of $70 to be made on the first lot and $10 on the other; the remainder to be paid at the rate of $10 a month on each lot. The terms of the two contracts were the same except as to the descriptions of the lots and the amounts of the initial payments. The lots were unimproved and have remained unimproved and vacant at all times. Monthly payments were made from time to time, but not regularly as provided in the contracts. Defendant, however, took no steps to forfeit the purchaser's rights under the contracts, and in May, 1921, all installments of the purchase price had been paid except the total sum of $205. May 4th, the defendant tendered a deed on condition of the payment of the sum of $205, and the next day the purchaser offered to make the payment on condition of the performance by defendant of a covenant of the contracts reading as follows:

"The seller agrees to pipe or cause to be piped water in sufficient quantities for domestic use along the street or alley adjoining the herein described premises within two (2) years from this date, or furnish water immediately upon notification in writing of the completion of a dwelling house by said vendee. Also to construct, grade and improve the streets and highways in said subdivision."

During May, 1921, plaintiff, as agent of Mary Monteverde, "demanded of defendant that water be piped to said lots," but defendant refused, but "did offer to dig a well and place a pump thereon." During 1911 and 1912 the defendant "graded said streets by scraping the dirt from the sides of said streets or highways, leaving a crown in the center with a gradual slope to the gutters, the center being approximately 12 inches higher than the gutters; scraped, harrowed, and rolled the said streets and highways, making a smooth even surface. * * * No curbs, gutters or sidewalks were actually constructed or laid, except dirt curb and gutters." Water was at no time piped along the street or alley adjoining the lots.

In September, 1921, W. H. Hatfield, as agent and attorney for plaintiff and Mary Monteverde, made formal demand upon defendant that the street "be constructed, graded and improved" and was informed by defendant that no further work would be done thereon. Thereupon Hatfield wrote defendant that Mary Monteverde accepted defendant's refusal as an abandonment of the contracts and demanded the return of all moneys paid thereon. The defendant replied in writing, saying:

"If you will take this matter up with Dunn & Brand, they have full authority to act in the matter."

Thereafter Hatfield took the matter up with Clyde Brand, of the firm of Dunn & Brand, and was informed that the defendant "would do no further street work than had already been done, * * * nor would defendant company pipe water to said lots, but that it would dig a well and provide a pump for the purpose of supplying water therefor." This action was then commenced for the recovery of the moneys paid on the contract.

[1] In so far as concerns the alleged failure of defendant to "construct, grade and improve the streets," the plaintiff failed to make a case. The streets were graded. The covenant to construct and improve the streets has no fixed and certain meaning. The surrounding circumstances and the mutual understanding of the parties as to the character of the street improvements contemplated are not shown. As said in Blahnik v. Small Farms Improvement Co., 181 Cal. 379, 382, 184 Pac. 661, 662:

"The contract was altogether silent in regard to the character and kind of work that was to be done upon the roads. If there was any agreement on that subject, or any plan relating thereto adopted by defendant and acquiesced in by the plaintiffs, it was not set forth in the contract. So far as appears, it was in parol only. Such an agreement would be collateral and supplemental to the contract contained in the writing, and, as parol evidence thereof would not be inconsistent with the contract and would not alter it in any respect, evidence thereof would be admissible if material to the issues."

[2] It appears from the stipulated facts, however, that the defendant refused to perform its covenant to pipe water to the lots and informed plaintiff's agent and attorney that it would not perform such covenant. It is true that when demand was made for the return of the moneys paid on the contract, such demand was based upon defendant's refusal to do further street work; but, when defendant thereafter declared that it would not pipe water to the lots, the plaintiff was thereby released from the duty of making further demand that the defendant so provide water and was justified in treating the contracts as abandoned by the defendant and suing for recovery of the money paid, without any demand other than the suit. San Deigo Construction Co. v. Mannix, 175 Cal. 548, 553, 166 Pac. 325; Walker v. Harbor Business Blocks Co., 181 Cal. 773-778, 186 Pac. 356; Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 10, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

[3] Respondent states in its brief:

"Since there has been no completion of a dwelling house upon the lot covered by the contract, the time for the performance of the contract in this respect has not yet arrived."

Conceding, for the purposes of the argument only, that this contention is well founded, when the defendant informed the plaintiff's agent that it would not pipe water to the lots, "it was not necessary for the plaintiff to defer bringing his action until the full time had expired during which the defendant might have made the improvements." Walker v. Harbor Business Blocks Co., supra.

[4-6] It must be kept in mind that the contracts were executory and that the covenants of the parties were dependent. Mills v. Richmond Co., Inc., 56 Cal. App. 774, 776, 206 Pac. 486. Authorities relating to covenants contained in executed contracts have no necessary bearing upon the questions here involved.

"The consideration for which the plaintiff and his assignor agreed to pay the sums specified was the lots improved according to the terms of the contract. * * * It is thus apparent that there was a failure of the consideration of the obligation to pay to the extent that the lots were less valuable without the improvements than with them; also, that it was a failure of the consideration 'in a material respect' before it was rendered, that is to say, before the title was conveyed. The cost of these improvements would certainly amount to a considerable sum, and the value such improvements would add to the lots must be presumed to be a material part of the consideration to the vendees." Walker v. Harbor Business Blocks Co., supra.

It certainly requires no argument to show that the value of having water piped to a residence lot is material or that putting down a well and installing a pump is not the performance of a covenant to so pipe water. The covenant is clear and certain, and if there was anything to excuse performance thereof the burden was on defendant to show it.

[7] Respondent contends that the plaintiff and his assignor were guilty of laches, though this argument is directed largely to the question of failure to improve the streets. If directed to the failure of defendant to pipe water to the lots, it is inconsistent with respondent's contention that "the time for the performance of the contract in this respect has not yet arrived." In any event, a party to an executory contract, who still has it in his power to perform a dependent covenant, and who has in no wise suffered loss by reason of the other party's delay in demanding performance, is in no position to set up such delay as a defense in an action such as this. The defendant could have avoided loss or injury by doing what it had agreed to do. The plaintiff, under the agreed statement of facts, was entitled to judgment on the ground of the defendant's refusal to perform its covenant to pipe water to the property.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Highways ⇨172(1)—Operating vehicle on public highway without proper brakes constitutes negligence.

It is negligence to operate a vehicle on the public highway, without brakes adequate to check the speed thereof, and to stop the vehicle as required by Motor Vehicle Law 1923, § 94.

2. Highways ⇨183—Liability of car driver with defective brakes to person riding in another's car not affected by negligence of other driver.

If the negligence of an automobile driver in operating a car without proper brakes contributed to the injuries of a person riding in another's car, his liability was fixed irrespective of any negligence of the driver of the car in which such person was riding.

3. Assignments ⇨137—Evidence held insufficient to show assignment of cause of action for damages to automobile.

In an action for damages to an automobile by an alleged assignee of the owner, evidence that a witness was a brother of the "assignor" was insufficient to show an assignment of the cause of action.

4. Assignments ⇨134—Assignment must be proved when denied to enable assignee to recover.

Where an assignment of the cause of action sued on is denied, proof of assignment must be made to enable assignee to recover.

On Petition for Rehearing.

5. Trial ⇨37—Attention to more important issues not a waiver of proof of minor issue.

That more attention was given by the respective parties to the more important issues involved was not a waiver of the necessary proof on a minor issue.

Where, in an action for damages to an automobile, there was a failure of evidence only as to the assignment of the cause of action to plaintiff, in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 53, the case will be remanded on reversal for determination of that question only.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Clarence Gilmore against Thomas Caswell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for appellant.

Gumpert & Mazzera, of Stockton, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him for and on account of a certain automobile collision due to the alleged negligence of the defendant and on an assignment for damages to the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding. It appears from the transcript that on or about the 7th day of October, 1922, the plaintiff was a passenger in a certain automobile, being driven in an easterly direction by one Clarence Buthenuth upon a certain main public highway in the county of San Joaquin, leading to the town of Modesto, at a point on said highway where it is intersected by a certain other highway known as and called the Atlanta-Ripon road. The complaint sets up two causes of action: First, for the injuries sustained by the plaintiff; secondly, for damages to the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding in the sum of $423.50, alleged to have been assigned to the plaintiff by the owner of the automobile in which the plaintiff was a passenger at the time of the injury. On the part of the appellant it is insisted that the testimony shows that the injuries received by the plaintiff were due solely and exclusively to the negligence of the owner and driver of the automobile in which the plaintiff was a passenger. On the part of the respondent it is contended that the injuries received by the plaintiff were due exclusively to the negligence of the defendant and that in any event, if the plaintiff was also negligent, the plaintiff not having anything to do with the control of the automobile in which he was riding would nevertheless be entitled to recover. The action was tried before the court without a jury. On the conclusion of the trial the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, and awarded judgment to the plaintiff on the first cause of action in the sum of $512.40 and upon the second cause of action, to wit, for damages to the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding, in the sum of $423.50.

So far as this appeal is concerned upon the question of damages to the plaintiff for personal injuries sustained by him, and as to the liability by the defendant, we do not need to inquire as to whether or not the owner and driver of the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding was or was not also careless and negligent or whether his negligence concurred in causing the injuries to the plaintiff; for, as stated above, if the defendant's negligence concurred in causing the injuries and the injuries would not have been inflicted had the defendant's negligence not so concurred, then and in that case the judgment for the injuries sustained by the plaintiff must be affirmed.

Without reciting the testimony, it is sufficient to state that the testimony of the defendant, as well as the testimony of Clarence Buthenuth, of Chester Mello, and George C. Buthenuth, all show that the defendant was driving a car unequipped with proper brakes—that is, that the brakes upon the car being driven by the defendant were so defective that they offered practically no resistance to its momentum—and that if the car had been equipped with proper brakes, in view of the speed at which the defendant claimed he was driving for a few moments preceding the collision, the application of the brakes would have sufficed to avoid the collision.

[1, 2] The Motor Vehicle Law (St. 1923, p. 545, § 94) requires that every automobile operated upon the public highway shall be provided at all times with brakes adequate to promptly check the speed thereof and to stop said vehicle. A failure in this respect is negligence, and if such negligence contributed to the injuries of the plaintiff in this action his liability is fixed irrespective of any negligence on the part of the automobile driver of the car in which the plaintiff was riding as a passenger. The testimony to which we have referred was sufficient to authorize the trial court in making its findings, as above set forth.

[3, 4] As to the second cause of action, to wit, upon the claim for damages to the automobile in which the plaintiff was a passenger and alleged to have been assigned to the plaintiff, the appellant urges there is no testimony in the case showing such assignment. The transcript of the testimony shows the following questions and answers upon this point:

"Q. What is your name? A. Albert L. Buthenuth. Q. What is your occupation? A. Letter carrier. Q. Do you reside in Stockton? A. Stockton. Q. You are a brother of the plaintiff—of the assignor herein in this case? A. Yes, sir. Q. Clarence Buthenuth? A. Yes, sir."

"We do not see in this testimony any proof of an assignment of any claim by Clarence Buthenuth to the plaintiff, Clarence Gilmore, in this action. This is the testimony of a brother of the alleged assignor and amounts at most only to proof of relationship. The answer filed by the defendant denies the assignment, and, in order for the plaintiff to prevail in this action upon the second cause of action set out in his complaint, it is necessary under such circumstances to make proof of such assignment. It cannot be assumed or taken for granted. The contention of the appellant, therefore, that there is no proof in support of plaintiff's second cause of action, must be sustained. As the plaintiff's right to succeed upon his second cause of action depends upon the determination of the fact of whether his assignor was or was not guilty of negligence, contributing to the collision, which must be determined by the trial court, we have purposely refrained from expressing any opinion upon the testimony contained in the transcript touching this question. For the reasons hereinbefore given, the judgment of the trial court upon the plaintiff's first cause of action, to wit, that part asserting and fixing the amount of damages he is entitled to recover and have on account of personal injuries sustained by him, will be and the same is hereby affirmed. As to the second cause of action stated in plaintiff's complaint, to wit, for the amount of damages claimed for and on account of the injuries to the automobile in which he was riding, the judgment will be and the same is hereby reversed and remanded for a new trial upon said second cause of action only. It is also ordered that the appellant have and recover his costs incurred upon appeal herein.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; YOUNG, Justice pro tem.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. This matter is before the court on a petition for rehearing. In our former opinion we held that there was no evidence justifying the finding of the trial court that the second cause of action set out in plaintiff's complaint had been assigned to him. The evidence on this point appearing in the transcript is set out in that opinion.

[5] It is now insisted by respondent that:

"An appellate court will assume the existence of facts which were assumed to exist in the court below, notwithstanding the fact that they were put in issue by the pleadings."

"To support this statement a number of cases have been cited. The respondent's statement of the law we readily concede to be correct, but the authorities cited fail to support the application of the principle contained in said statement to the cause at bar. An examination of the cases all show that something was said or done which justified the assumption of the existence of the facts necessary to appear and to be made to appear in order to support the judgment. We only need to cite one case in this state which illustrates this point, National Union Fire Ins. Co. v. Nason, 21 Cal. App. 297, where, on page 299, 131 Pac. 755, 756, of said report, the circumstances taking place in the case are all set forth preceding the statement of the law by the court in that cause as hereinabove quoted.

We have searched the record in vain to ascertain if anything occurred to dispense with the testimony showing an assignment of the cause of action to the plaintiff, and we find nothing therein except what is set forth in our first opinion in this case.

This case is very similar in principle upon this point to that of Rudneck v. Southern California M. & R. Co., 184 Cal. 274, 193 Pac. 775. That was an action begun by a partnership in which the complaint alleged compliance with sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code; that is, that the certificate of copartnership was filed as required by law and also published as required by law. This allegation was controverted in the answer. At the trial the plaintiff proved the filing of the partnership certificate, but introduced no evidence of its publication, and went to trial upon the other issues presented by the pleadings. The court found that such publication was made. This finding was held to be without support in the evidence. The point was made that the objection was waived, and the court answered as follows:

"As to the waiver, suffice it to say that we find nothing to justify the claim that it occurred."

The issue was in the case, and the burden of proof rested upon the party having the affirmative, and there being no evidence to support the affirmative allegation only one result could follow. The finding was without support unless waived, and there being nothing in the record showing the waiver a reversal of the case was necessary. As we read the record in this case it presents simply a question of failure of proof upon what might be considered a minor issue and we cannot hold such failure to be a waiver of the necessary proof simply because more attention was given by the respective parties to what might be called the more important issues involved in the controversy.

[6] However, in the reconsideration of this cause and in view of the two cases decided by the Supreme Court of this state which we will hereafter consider, we think the necessities of justice demand a modification of the former order made by this court. With this in mind, we have carefully read all the evidence in the transcript, and conclude that there was sufficient evidence presented to the trial court to sustain its findings on the question of damages both as to the first and also as to the second causes of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint and that there is a failure of evidence only as to the finding as to the right of this plaintiff to maintain the second cause of action by assignment thereof to him by the owner of the damaged automobile. Therefore, in remanding the cause for further hearing, pursuant to section 53 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we think the further proceedings in the trial court should be limited to the determination of the one issue; that is, the ascertainment if the second cause of action was actually assigned to the plaintiff prior to the commencement thereof. In the case of Collins v. Ramish, 182 Cal. 360, 188 Pac. 550, the Supreme Court, in considering what directions should be given where a judgment is reversed for insufficiency of evidence to sustain a finding, says:

"No good reason appears why the new trial that must be had should not be limited to the matters in regard to which error has been shown,"

—and ordered the new trial limited to the one issue. In the case of Rudneck v. Southern California M. & R. Co., supra, the case to which we have above referred, where no proof was made as to the publication of certificate of copartnership, the cause was reversed and sent back for trial upon that one issue, the judgment of the court being as follows:

"Judgment reversed for a new trial, in accordance with this opinion, upon the single issue as to publication by the plaintiffs of their certificate of partnership, as required by law, with directions that if such issue be determined in favor of the plaintiffs, judgment be given for them in accordance with the findings upon the other issues of the cause, and that if such issue be found against the plaintiffs, the action be dismissed without prejudice."

All the other issues in this cause having been fully and fairly tried and no error in any of them having been called to the attention of this court, there appears to us no reason why a new trial ordered in this case as to the second cause of action should not be limited to the issue relating to the assignment thereof to the plaintiff herein.

It is therefore directed that the order heretofore entered in this cause should be and the same is hereby modified to read as follows: That the order heretofore made as to the plaintiff's second cause of action is hereby reversed and remanded to the lower court for a new trial in accordance with this opinion upon the single issue as to whether said second cause of action was assigned to the plaintiff by the owner of the damaged automobile prior to the commencement of the action, and, if the testimony introduced on this question satisfies the trial court that such assignment was made, then and in that case judgment should be entered in favor of the plaintiff upon the second cause of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint fixing the amount of damages as already sufficiently found by the trial court. If the testimony does not show such assignment of the second cause of action herein referred to, then and in that case judgment is hereby directed to be entered in favor of the defendant. In all other respects the judgment of the trial court is affirmed. It is further ordered that the appellant recover his costs incurred on this appeal.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Ex parte BRADY. (Cr. 1041.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Jan. 19, 1924.)

1. Courts ⇨74, 75—Superior court holds sessions only at time and place provided by statute.

There is no constitutional provision fixing time or place where the superior courts shall sit; but, the Legislature having spoken (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 73, 142) as to the place at which sessions of the superior court may be held, the rule that the statement of one thing is the exclusion of another is applicable, and permits no sessions of the court except as provided by the statute.

2. Statutes ⇨71—Arbitrary classification not compliance with constitutional requirement of uniform operation of general law.

An arbitrary classification or one based purely on whimsical or fanciful reasons is not a compliance with Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring laws of a general nature to have uniform operation; but if the distinction is one for which the Constitution provides, or is one which on its face appears to be perfectly obvious, or has substantial reason for existence, the provision is not violated.

3. Statutes ⇨74(2), 76(3), 79(1)—Act providing that superior court may hold sessions in city other than county seat held invalid.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 73, 142, providing that, in counties of the first class, one session of the superior court may be held in each city of the county containing not less than 50,000 population where the city hall is not less than 15 miles from the county courthouse, are violative of Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring laws of general nature to have uniform operation; article 4, § 25, subd. 33, providing that no special laws shall be passed where a general law would be applicable, and article 1, § 21, as conferring special privileges on the citizens of a particular county.

4. Evidence ⇨25(1)—Judicial notice taken that Los Angeles is only county of first class in state.

Counties of the first class under Pol. Code, § 4006, containing 500,000 population, judicial notice may be taken of the fact that Los Angeles county is the only county of the first class in the state.

5. Statutes ⇨71—General law must have uniform operation.

A strictly general law, according to Const. art. 1, § 11, must have a uniform operation.

6. Statutes ⇨71—Legislature may enact law applicable to one class only.

Where an act is based on a difference for which a substantial reason may be supplied, the Legislature may enact a law which shall be applicable only to one class.

7. Constitutional law ⇨48—Legislative power presumed rightfully exercised.

The presumption is that the legislative power has been rightfully exercised, and, while great regard is due to the expressed will of the Legislature, greater deference must be accorded to constitutional mandates.

Original application by William G. Brady for writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure release of petitioner from detention on commitment for contempt. Writ granted.

Charles D. Wallace, of Long Beach, for petitioner.

Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and A. H. Van Cott, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, and P. E. Keeler, Spicer, Meacham & Mason, Knight, Lane & Goddard, McWhinney & Clock, and Doyle, Clark & Thomas, all of Long Beach, for respondent.

Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, and Roy W. Dowds, Deputy County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

HOUSER, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus based upon the alleged illegal detention of petitioner by the sheriff of Los Angeles county, acting under an order of the superior court, in and for said county, committing petitioner for a contempt of said court.

It appears that in an action pending before one of the departments of the superior court sitting in the city of Long Beach, in accordance with an order made by the judge of said department, petitioner had been served with a subpoena duces tecum. Petitioner failed and refused to respond to the said subpoena, and was thereafter brought before the court upon an attachment. Thereupon the court adjudged petitioner guilty of a contempt in said matter, and sentenced him to pay a fine. In default of such payment he was remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

Petitioner attacks the jurisdiction of the superior court, basing his objection on the alleged unconstitutionality of amendments of section 73 and section 142 of the Code of Civil Procedure under and by virtue of which the said superior court was sitting in the city of Long Beach. Among other things, section 142, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended, provides:

"That in counties of the first class at least one session of the superior court shall be held in each city of said county containing a population of not less than fifty thousand * * * wherein the city hall of said city is not less than fifteen miles distant from the site of the county courthouse."

Section 73, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended, contains language to the same effect.

It is understood that the city of Long Beach has a population of more than 50,000 people, and that its city hall is located more than 15 miles from the site of the county courthouse of Los Angeles county, being the county in which the city of Long Beach is situated.

With reference to the limitation on the power of the Legislature to enact laws of the character of the act in question, the Constitution provides:

"All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Section 11, art. 1.

"The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws * * * where a general law can be made applicable." Subdivision 33, § 25, art. 4.

"* * * Nor shall any citizen, or class of citizens, be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens." Section 21, art. 1.

[1] There is no constitutional provision which fixes either the time when or the place where the several superior courts shall sit, but section 73 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "they shall hold their sessions at the county seats of the several counties, or cities and counties, except as otherwise provided by section one hundred forty-two of this Code," and which section, in addition to what has heretofore been set forth, authorizes the judge or judges of any county to change the location of the court when war, insurrection, pestilence, or other public calamity, etc., may render it necessary, or, in the discretion of the court, whenever necessary or advisable, at any place in the county not less than 120 miles distant from the county seat. It is not contended that the session of the superior court sitting within the city of Long Beach comes within the terms of either of said exceptions, and it is conceded by counsel representing the respective parties that if such act is unconstitutional the order of commitment of petitioner is void.

The Legislature having spoken as to the place at which sessions of the superior court may be held, the rule that the statement of one thing is the exclusion of another is applicable and permits no sessions of the superior court except as provided by the statute. Whitener v. Belknap & Co., 89 Tex. 273, 34 S. W. 594; Williams v. Reutzel, 60 Ark. 155, 29 S. W. 374; Coulter v. Routt County, 9 Colo. 258, 11 Pac. 199; Von Schmidt v. Widber, 99 Cal. 511, 34 Pac. 109; Shepherd v. Superior Court, 54 Cal. App. 673, 202 Pac. 466; Patton v. State, 160 Ala. 111, 49 South. 809; People v. McWeeney, 259 Ill. 161, 102 N. E. 233, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 34; Carter v. State, 100 Miss. 342, 56 South. 454, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 369; Rhodes v. Bell, 230 Mo. 138, 130 S. W. 465; Shold v. Van Treeck, 82 Neb. 99, 117 N. W. 113. Even in the absence of express statutory requirement that the sessions of the court be held at the county seat, it has been held that a universal practice to do so gave the practice the legality of positive law, and that an order of the court made while sitting at a place other than the county seat was void. Board of Commissioners v. Gwin, 136 Ind. 562, 36 N. E. 237, 22 L. R. A. 402.

If it be determined that the law here under consideration is general in its nature and that it has a uniform operation, necessarily it is not a special law. At various times the Supreme Court of this state has announced the rule in substance that in order that a statute be a general law it is not necessary that it apply to all the people in the state, but if it affect all individuals falling within a proper classification of them the constitutional requirement is met. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 251, 27 Pac. 604; McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71; Darcy v. Mayor of San Jose, 104 Cal. 642, 38 Pac. 500; Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73; Title, etc., Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199; Ex parte King, 157 Cal. 161, 106 Pac. 578.

[2] The statute here does not purport to affect all the people, nor all the counties of the state, but concerns counties of the first class only, and a proper inquiry in that regard is whether or not the Legislature was warranted in making such a classification. While a great deal of latitude is rightly accorded legislative acts and the presumption of legality should obtain, nevertheless an arbitrary classification, or one based purely upon whimsical or fanciful reasons, is not a compliance with the constitutional mandate; but it is well settled that wherever the distinction is one for which the Constitution expressly provides, or is one which on its face appears to be perfectly obvious, or is yet one for which there is some substantial reason for its existence, the constitutional provision is not violated. As has been frequently said by our Supreme Court, the distinction must rest on either a constitutional, or a natural, or an intrinsic difference.

[3] It is apparent at the most superficial investigation of the statute that it is not general in the sense that it directly affects all of the people of the state. If it all comes within a requirement that laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, it must be because of its applicability to a class. In this respect the act provides that it shall be effective "in counties of the first class," thereby segregating one class of counties from each and all of the other classes of counties of the state and making the proposed law operative in one class of counties only. The act provides an additional classification in that it applies, first, as to cities of not less than 50,000 population; and, secondly, to such cities of such population only whose city halls are over 15 miles distant from the site of the county courthouse.

[4] But it is contended that there is no authority vested in the Legislature to classify counties by population, excepting for the sole purpose of establishing the compensation and fees of county officers. Section 5, art. 11, Const. For such purpose the Legislature has by other statutes brought about such a classification. It has said (section 4006, Pol. Code) that counties containing a population of 500,000 persons and over shall belong to and be known as counties of the first class; that counties containing a certain lesser population shall be counties of the second class, and so on down through the list of counties of the state, giving to each group a designated classification. The court may take judicial notice of the fact that Los Angeles county is the only county of the first class in the state. People v. Wong Wang, 92 Cal. 277, 28 Pac. 270; People v. Williams, 64 Cal. 87, 27 Pac. 939; Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219, 33 Pac. 66. In the case of Pratt v. Browne, 135 Cal. 651, 67 Pac. 1082, an act fixing the salary of the official reporter in a county of the thirtieth class was under consideration. In the course of the opinion it is said:

"It is the same as if Ventura county had been mentioned by name. No change of words or phrases, or calling Ventura county by another name, can change the result. The portion of the act in dispute must therefore be considered as an act fixing the salary of the reporter (whoever he may be) of Ventura county at the sum of one hundred dollars per month."

So this court may say that the act here in question is the same as though, instead of using the designation "first class," the act had provided that in Los Angeles county a session of the superior court shall be held at cities in said county containing a population of not less than 50,000 people, etc. In the case to which reference has just been made, the court held that the act in question, being applicable to one county only and not founded upon any natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction, and no reason appearing as to why the act was not made to apply generally to all classes of counties, was special and local and therefore unconstitutional. The same conclusion was reached in the case of Marsh v. Hanly, 111 Cal. 368, 43 Pac. 975, where the court had under consideration an act relating to primary elections, to be confined in its operations to counties of the first and of the second class. The court said:

"There can be no question that the act is local and special, since, by its terms, it is to 'apply to, take effect in, and be in force only in counties of the first and second classes,' that is to say, in San Francisco and Los Angeles. Stats. 1895, § 26, p. 218.

"The Constitution allows the classification of counties according to population for the purpose of regulating the compensation of county officers in proportion to their duties (Const. art. XI, sec. 5), and for that purpose a classification has been established under which San Francisco falls into the first class and Los Angeles falls into the second class. But the fact that these and the other counties of the state have been classified for a purpose which the Constitution recognizes as a proper and necessary one does not relieve a law relating to other and distinct matters from the objection that it is local and special if, by its terms, it is limited in its application or operation to one or more classes of counties less than the whole. Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 620; Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219; Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238; Bloss v. Lewis, 109 Cal. 493; Turner v. Siskiyou County, 109 Cal. 332; Darcy v. Mayor of San Jose, 104 Cal. 642; Denman v. Broderick, ante, p. 96. This act, therefore, not being a regulation of the compensation of county officers, is local and special, notwithstanding ing it embraces two counties, each of which constitutes one of the classes defined by the County Government Act; and the only question to be determined is whether or not the subject of the act is one of those as to which special and local legislation is inhibited by the Constitution."

In the case of Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 219, 33 Pac. 66, the court was considering the constitutionality of certain sections of the County Government Act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 295), which provided that the assistants of district attorneys of counties in the eighth class should be paid by the county, and the court said, in part:

"The Legislature has not the general authority to enact laws for the counties by classes, nor is it authorized to make a classification of counties for any purpose of legislation, except for the purpose of enabling it to regulate the compensation of the county officers for whose election or appointment it shall provide. San Luis Obispo Co. v. Graves, 84 Cal. 71. Whenever it attempts to enact a law for one or more of the counties of the state upon subjects that it is directed to provide for by general laws, or which are to form part of a uniform system for the whole state, whether such counties are designated directly by name, or by reference to a class into which they have been placed for other subjects of legislation, it infringes these provisions of the Constitution. We must take judicial knowledge that there is only one county in the state whose population places it in the eighth class, and if an act is passed by the Legislature that is applicable to only one county in the state, it does not cease to be a local act by reason of the fact that it purports to be applicable to a class of counties which the Legislature is not authorized to create for the purpose of such legislation, and of which that county constitutes the only member."

The legal propriety of legislation of the character here in question is commented upon in the case of Turner v. County of Siskiyou, 109 Cal. 332, 42 Pac. 434, where the court was considering the constitutionality of an act which provided that in counties of the twenty-eighth class alone every person subpoenaed as a witness in a criminal case should be entitled to the same per diem and mileage as jurors in a like case. The court said, in part:

"This provision is clearly unconstitutional and void. It does not apply to counties of any other class. * * * The difficulty is not removed by the fact that the counties are classified, and that the provision applies to all counties of a certain class; because, under section 5 of article 11, counties may be classified only for the purposes of regulating the compensation of certain public officers therein enumerated. * * * The provision in question in the case at bar is local and special, because it is not in force in all parts of the state, and does not affect equally either all the people or all individuals of a class."

And, to the same effect, see Bloss v. Lewis, 109 Cal. 493, 41 Pac. 1081; San Luis Obispo

v. Graves, 84 Cal. 71, 23 Pac. 1032; Payne v. Murphy, 18 Cal. App. 446, 123 Pac. 350.

The act does not conform to the constitutional requirements of a general law, either as affecting the entire state or as applied to a class, for the reason that the class designated by the statute, although not expressly forbidden by the provision of the Constitution, is impliedly excluded for any purpose other than that of regulating the compensation and fees of county officers. Paraphrasing a part of the language used by Chief Justice Beatty in Marsh v. Hanly, supra, there can be no question that the act which we are here considering is local and special, since, by its terms, it applies to, takes effect in, and is expected to be in force only in a county of the first class; that is to say (as is pointed out in Pratt v. Browne, supra), in the county of Los Angeles.

[5, 6] A strictly general law, according to the constitutional provision, must have a uniform operation. It is permitted to depart from that requirement as to every individual or class in the state only when the subject-matter of the act is based upon some constitutional or natural or intrinsic difference as between it and the whole body of individuals or classes within the state. The statute, then, instead of being a general law of universal application, really becomes identical in effect with a special statute. The statute here under consideration is special, and it occupies the same position as any so-called general law which, instead of applying universally, applies only as to some class founded upon some constitutional or natural or intrinsic distinction. Where the act is based upon such a difference for which a substantial reason may be supplied, the Legislature has the undoubted right to enact a law which shall be applicable to only one class. Title, etc., Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199; Darcy v. Mayor of San Jose, 104 Cal. 642, 38 Pac. 500; Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604.

It has been intimated that the reason for the enactment of the statute within the intent of the Legislature may have been, first, that of facilitating the dispatch of business of the courts to the end that justice might be speedily administered; and, secondly, that of conveniencing witnesses, litigants, and lawyers in the locality to be served. No other reasons for the passage of such a law as the one before the court are readily observable. True, there may be other reasons, but none other have been suggested by learned counsel, nor has this court been able to discover them; hence it may be fair to assume that they do not exist. It is feared, however, that the first reason is not altogether sound. The fact that litigants may have only a short distance to travel for the purpose of attending court does not enable the court to handle the business before it more expeditiously.

The court can transact exactly the same amount of business regardless of the inconvenience, if any, suffered by the litigants, witnesses, and lawyers in reaching the courthouse. But it is undoubtedly true that a proximity to the courthouse by those who may have litigation would be a great accommodation and a great saving of time, so far as they may be personally concerned. The evident purpose of the act was to provide for a city having a population of 50,000 or more people whose city hall was so far distant from the site of the county courthouse that, considering transportation facilities and congestion of traffic, the necessity of the inhabitants of such city attending to any business with the courts worked a considerable inconvenience if not absolute hardship upon them. Just why, in effect, such cities in Los Angeles county only should be singled out for such a favor is not apparent. Other counties in the state either now having, or likely in the near future to have, similar conditions presented, very probably would have just cause for complaint because of such partiality shown by the legislative act. Their needs might be just as great and their people just as much inconvenienced by a statute including them therein, with similar rights and privileges, as would the cities provided for by the statute in question. Naturally the inquiry arises why were they not included in the act. Is there any reason why every city in the state having a population of 50,000 or more people and whose city hall is located 15 miles distant from the site of the county courthouse should not receive identical treatment as by this statute would be accorded such cities within the county of Los Angeles? So far as this court is able to determine, no sufficient reason exists therefor.

The final question is whether or not a general law could have been made applicable. It is plain that the attempted classification is not one authorized by the Constitution. The fact that a large number of citizens of the state might be greatly accommodated by reason of having a superior court in their vicinity presents no satisfactory reason for classification denominated either natural or intrinsic. Certainly every other community in the state, whether composed of 50,000 people, or 500 people, would be proportionately inconvenienced by the same arrangement. The attempted classification is not real; it is purely arbitrary, and not based upon any substantial ground. In addition thereto, it would seem that the constitutional provision (section 21, art. 1), which forbids that any citizen or class of citizens shall be granted privileges which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens, is violated. In the case of Mordecai v. Board of Supervisors, 183 Cal. 434, 192 Pac. 40, the court was considering the constitutionality of an act which provided for the formation of irrigation districts in all counties of the state except in counties which had adopted a freeholders' charter prior to June 4, 1915. It appeared that there were but two counties in the state which had adopted such a charter. In ruling that the statute was not uniform in its operation, the court used the following language:

"The many times reiterated statement of our decisions is that, while the requirement that a general law must have a uniform application does not mean that it must have a universal operation, and it is valid if it applies alike to all persons or objects within a class—or, what is the same thing, there is excepted from its operation a class—founded upon some 'natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction,' yet if the statute operates only upon a class, or there is excepted from its operation a class, not founded upon a 'natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction,' its operation is not uniform, and it is discriminatory legislation of the sort which the Constitution purposed to prohibit and is invalid."

Touching upon the point that the act there in question granted to the citizens of some of the counties privileges which were withheld from citizens of other counties, the court said:

"It has been frequently and truly said that the purpose of a constitutional mandate was to prevent special privileges or immunities being granted to a class. * * * In fact, the provision of the Constitution for uniformity of operation is closely connected with its further provision (article I, § 21) expressly prohibiting the granting of special privileges or immunities. * * * Now, if the California Irrigation Act be considered as a privilege, what reason is there why the inhabitants and property owners of Los Angeles and San Bernardino should not enjoy that privilege when those within other counties may do so? On the other hand, if the act be considered a burden, why should those within those two counties be immune from it when the rest of the state is subject to it?"

Paraphrasing the language just quoted, the following question is also pertinent: If the establishment of a superior court in a city of 50,000, located 15 miles or more from the county seat of the county of Los Angeles, be considered as a privilege, what reason is there why cities of the same size and similarly located in other counties of the state should not enjoy that privilege when such cities in Los Angeles county may do so? And, as is said in the Mordecai Case, we can see no sufficient answer to these questions, or to the objection involved in them that the exception from the applicability of the act of other counties in the state destroys the uniform operation of the act. And again, as is said in the Marsh Case, supra, the question remaining is:

"Whether or not the subject of the act is one of those as to which special and local legislation is inhibited by the Constitution."

[7] The presumption is that legislative power has been rightfully exercised, and, while great regard is due to the expressed will of the Legislature, a still greater deference must be accorded by the courts to the constitutional mandate, which all public officers are sworn to support. People v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 43 Cal. 398. In the very nature of things, special laws could not have a uniform operation in the sense that they really would or could apply equally as to every individual in the state. So far as concerns the matter here, the Constitution only requires that special laws shall not be passed where a general law may be made applicable. Although the authorities throughout the several jurisdictions of the United States are not entirely harmonious with reference to the force and the effect to be given to the legislative determination of the question as to whether or not a general law could be enacted in a given situation, the weight of authority, including adjudicated cases in California, is to the effect that the decision rests largely in the discretion of the Legislature and that the courts are not warranted in interfering with the conclusion expressed in the legislative act unless there appears a positive disregard of the fundamental law.

The case of People v. Mullender, 132 Cal. 217, 64 Pac. 299, is illustrative of the point. Under the act of March 18, 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 305), a board of state harbor commissioners was established for the Bay of San Diego and the question of the legality of that act was before the court for its determination. The court said:

"That the act here in question is both local and special is conceded. But that is not conclusive. The language of said paragraph [referring to the constitutional provision] plainly implies that there are or may be cases where a local or special act may be wise, salutary, and appropriate, and in no wise promotive of those evils which result from a general and indiscriminate resort to local and special legislation. The Constitution submits the question, whether a general law can be made applicable in any given case, to the judgment of the Legislature, to be determined in the light of the evils intended to be avoided, and with its determination upon that question we may not interfere, unless the disregard of the constitutional requirement is clear and palpable. * * *

In the case of Bruch v. Colombet, 104 Cal. 352, 38 Pac. 45, it is said:

"No absolute, inflexible rule has ever been formulated, and probably never will be, by which to determine what departure from uniformity is permissible, and what will be fatal. The courts must determine each case as it arises, presuming in favor of the rightful exercise of the legislative power. Yet the inhibition should be enforced unless there is discoverable some reasonable ground for a distinction."

And see, also, to the same effect: People v. Sacramento Drainage District, 155 Cal.

373, 103 Pac. 207; Wheeler v. Herbert, 152 Cal. 224, 92 Pac. 353; Title Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 298, 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199; Ex parte King, 157 Cal. 161, 106 Pac. 578; Matter of Burke, 160 Cal. 300, 116 Pac. 755; People v. Casa Co., 35 Cal. App. 194, 169 Pac. 454.

It will, however, be noted that the courts have not abdicated the power of final determination. The right to investigate and to review the facts is still retained, and, where it is shown that no sufficient reason appears for the implied declaration by the Legislature that in the passage of a special law a general law could not have been made applicable, the courts unhesitatingly exercise their rightful prerogative of pronouncing the statute unconstitutional. The language of the statute affecting the point is "that in counties of the first class at least one session of the superior court shall be held in each city of said county containing a population of * * * fifty thousand," etc. It is obvious that the statute might have provided that "in each of the counties of this state" a session of the superior court shall be held, etc. The possibility of drawing a law which would be general in its nature, instead of a special and local law, as the statute now presents itself, is demonstrated by another clause of the same statute, which provides that "whenever such judge or judges (of the superior court) deem it necessary or advisable" they may "direct that the court be held or continued at any other place in the city and county, county, city, or town not less than one hundred twenty miles distant from the county seat." That particular part of the statute is general in its nature. It operates as to each county and as to the superior court located within each county of the state. There is no reason why the act in question should not have done likewise. As is said in the case of Marsh v. Hanly, 111 Cal. 372, 43 Pac. 975:

"It is not a matter for argument or speculation, therefore, whether this is a case in which a general law could be made applicable. This act, by its terms shows that such is the case. * * *

In the case of Coulter v. Routt County, 9 Colo. 258, 11 Pac. 199, a state of facts arising from circumstances similar to those here, with a constitutional provision identical with ours, was under consideration. The Colorado court held the act unconstitutional, and, in passing upon the question whether or not a general law could have been made applicable, among other things, said:

"That the permanent location for the holding of the district courts in the counties of the state can be fixed by general laws has been demonstrated by the acts of the Legislature itself, during a long term of years, which acts overcome all presumptions that a departure is necessary in the case of a single county."

The same thing is evident here. There was a clear and palpable disregard of the constitutional requirement. The conclusion is therefore reached by this court that that part of the act here under consideration is special and local; that it is not uniform in its operation; that it confers special privileges upon a class of citizens, which, upon the same terms, are not granted to all citizens, and that a general law could have been made applicable.

It follows that the petitioner is entitled to be discharged. It is so ordered.

P. K. WEBSTER CO. v. ROAMER MOTOR CAR CO. (Civ. 4819.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Jan. 28, 1924.)

1. Principal and agent §47—Contract as to commissions on sales of automobiles held inapplicable to sales to prospects secured before execution of contract.

Exclusive automobile agency contract, providing that each party should make up and keep "prospect" cards and that the respective salesmen of the parties who first filed with his employer a "prospect" should be permitted to complete the sale and should be entitled to receive his commission on the sale, held not applicable to sales made to prospects secured prior to execution of contract, where final execution of the contracts alone remained to complete the sale, especially in view of such construction of the contract by the parties themselves.

2. Account stated §8—Plaintiff could not question credit it allowed in account stated.

Where action is upon an open, mutual, and current account and is based upon an account which plaintiff stated to defendant, plaintiff cannot question the correctness of a credit which it allowed in the statement of account.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by the P. K. Webster Company against the Roamer Motor Car Company. From a judgment giving it insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. B. Fernhoff, of Oakland, for appellant.

Edward R. Eliassen, of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued upon four causes of action, issue being joined upon the first, which was based upon a mutual, open, and current account for services rendered and materials furnished in the sum of $2,407.85. The account, dated January 1, 1921, contained nine separate items. The first two, in the sum of $550 each, represented claims for commissions for the sale of two Roamer cars within the territory covered by a written contract between the parties dated July 31, 1919. The original account offered in evidence differs from that recited in the complaint in that it contained a statement of credit in the sum of $1,177.59 in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff. The cause was tried before the court without a jury. The trial court found that plaintiff was not entitled to the two items of commissions, but found that the account of January 1st offered in evidence was otherwise correct and that the defendant was entitled to a credit of $1,177.59 as appeared in that account. This credit was then deducted from the sum allowed in the account and judgment was given in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $130.26. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The appellant urges as grounds for reversal that the evidence does not support the finding that the appellant was not entitled to the commissions claimed and that the trial court erred in allowing respondent a credit of $1,177.59 because of insufficiency of proof.

[1] The contract in evidence gave to the appellant the exclusive right to sell, during the continuance of the contract, Roamer automobiles in Alameda and Contra Costa counties, and provided that the appellant should have a discount of 20 per cent. from the current list price of the automobiles sold to persons who resided in that territory. It was also provided that each party should make up and keep "prospect cards" and that the respective salesmen of the parties to the contract who first filed with his employer a "prospect" should be permitted to complete the sale and should be entitled to receive his commission on the sale. On August 4, 1919, a few days after the execution of the contract, a Roamer car was sold by a salesman in the employ of the respondent to a resident of Alameda county, and on the following day another car was sold to a buyer who was also a resident of Alameda county, by salesmen who were also in the employ of the respondent. No claim was made by the appellant for any commission or discount on these sales until some six months after the transactions, when difficulties arose between the parties to this action. In the meantime work and labor had been performed upon one of these cars by appellant, and, this being under the head of "free service" to the purchaser, it was charged to the respondent. The trial court interpreted the contract as applying only to sales originating after its execution and as not applying to cases where the "prospects" had already been secured and final execution of the contracts alone remained to complete the sale. In this conclusion the court was supported by the acts of the parties, from which it appeared that they placed the same construction on the contract. On the facts before it the trial court was therefore justifified in making the finding that these sales were not made upon the account or to the credit of the appellant, and therefore correctly rejected its claim for commissions or discounts upon these sales.

[2] Upon the second point appellant's argument finds support only in the fact that it has incorrectly presented a true statement of the account upon which the cause of action was based. This account, which is found in the transcript as "Defendant's Exhibit A," expressly allows the respondent a credit of $1,177.59. The balance which the appellant then claimed to be due appears in the account as $1,230.26. Inasmuch as the action is one upon an open, mutual, and current account and is based upon this account which the appellant stated to the respondent, the appellant cannot at this time question the correctness of the credit which it allowed nor criticize the character of evidence which was offered in proof.

Judgment affirmed.

THORNTON v. PHELAN et al. (Civ. 2674.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 1, 1924.)

1. Abandonment ⚡3—Mines and minerals ⚡38(21)—Abandonment question of intent, provable by act or conduct.

Abandonment is a question of intent, and may be proved by acts or conduct of the party alleged to have abandoned the property in controversy.

2. Mines and minerals ⚡38(14)—Burden of proving abandonment on party alleging.

The burden of proving abandonment of a mining claim rests upon the party alleging it.

3. Mines and minerals ⚡38(21)—Evidence held insufficient to establish abandonment.

Evidence held insufficient to establish abandonment of a mining claim.

4. Mines and minerals ⚡38(21)—Evidence held to show assessment work for particular year.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that assessment work on a mining claim for a particular year had been done.

5. Mines and minerals ⚡26—Relocation of claim before lapse or forfeiture of former location of no effect.

Relocation of a mining claim before a former location has lapsed or become forfeited for nonperformance of annual assessment work is of no validity, and results in no title.

6. Mines and minerals ⚡23(1)—Where assessment work done, payment therefor by claim owner immaterial.

Where the doing of annual assessment work on a mining claim has been established, it is immaterial whether or not the cost of such work was paid for by the claim owner.

7. Mines and minerals ⚡38(20)—Exclusion of letters relating to doing of assessment work in action to quiet title to claim held not error.

In an action to quiet title to a mining claim, the exclusion of two letters written by former owner of claim, and apparently offered to support theory of abandonment, stating that the writer did not see why the last two years' assessment work had been done, and that it was unauthorized, held not prejudicial error; the reason for the doing of such work being immaterial as affecting the fact that it was done.

8. New trial ⚡104(1)—Denial of new trial for newly discovered evidence merely cumulative and contradictory, not error.

Denial of a new trial sought on the ground of newly discovered evidence which is simply cumulative and contradictory of testimony already given is not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by W. D. Thornton against J. M. Phelan and others, wherein J. M. Phelan filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Webster, of Sonora, for appellant.

J. T. B. Warne and Rowan Hardin, both of Sonora, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff began an action to quiet title to certain quartz mining property situated in the county of Tuolumne, state of California. The title to these premises was formerly in the Santa Ana Mining Company, a corporation. The appellant bases his claim to the property in question by virtue of the locations made thereof on January 1, 1917. Respondent claims said property by virtue of a subsequent location made thereon by him on April 10, 1920. The plaintiff asserts that prior to January 1, 1917, the Santa Ana Mining Company had abandoned the claims involved in this action. The respondent maintains that the property was not open to location on January 1, 1917, for the reason that the assessment work had been done on the claims in 1916 for the benefit of said Santa Ana Mining Company, and that said mining company had not abandoned its properties. The court found that the assessment work had been done by the Santa Ana Mining Company or for its benefit up to and including the year 1916, and that up to the 1st day of January, 1917, said company had not abandoned any of the mining claims involved herein. The court further found that during the years of 1917, 1918, and 1919 the Santa Ana Mining Company caused no assessment work to be done upon any of said mining claims, and that the assessment work required by law to be done during the said years was not performed by said company or by any one for its benefit, and also that said company did not, during any of said years, file a certificate showing that it claimed the benefit of the acts of Congress of the United States suspending the requirements of the performance of annual labor on mining claims during said years, and consequently that, commencing with the year 1918, the mining properties theretofore belonging to the Santa Ana Mining Company were open to relocation. The court also found that the Santa Ana Mining Company on or about February 27, 1915, forfeited its right to do business in the state of California, and that the directors of said company thereupon became the trustees of said corporation, all of whom were made defendants in this action, but failed to appear or make any defense therein. It is urged by appellant herein that prior to the year 1916 the Santa Ana Mining Company had abandoned its properties, and also that during the year 1916 it did no assessment work thereon, and that no assessment work was done on said properties for its use and benefit, and hence that the property was open for relocation on January 1, 1917. The court found against appellant on both of these contentions, and it is insisted that such findings are not sustained by the evidence.

[1-3] The decisions are uniform in holding that abandonment is a question of intention, and that abandonment may be proved by the acts and conduct of the party alleged to have abandoned the property in controversy. The burden also rests upon the party alleging abandonment to prove the same by satisfactory and competent evidence. Upon this question, our attention has only been called to the fact that in February, 1915, the Santa Ana Mining Company, as a corporation, forfeited its rights to do business in the state of California by reason of failure to pay corporation taxes required to be paid by the laws of this state, and the testimony of the witness J. T. Callahan. The testimony of this witness, as set out in the transcript, is as follows:

"I was a stockholder in the corporation, and had no other interest in the corporation, except as being a stockholder. The company abandoned the property in 1914 and I abandoned the claims in 1915. I went ahead and did the work in 1915 for my own protection, and after the work was completed I abandoned it entirely, and the Santa Ana Mining Company has made no claim to that property since that time."

A reading of this testimony is all that is necessary to show that it is entirely insufficient to establish the fact of abandonment. No act or transaction on the part of the company or of the persons who became trustees of the property belonging to the company showing an intent to abandon the property appears in such testimony. The intent to abandon the property by this witness has no bearing upon the issue involved, and his statements as to abandonment by the company are simply the conclusions of the witness, and are not in any sense of the word evidentiary facts from which the court could draw the conclusion of abandonment by the company. The witness Callahan further testified, first, that he was the agent of the company, but upon cross-examination he testified as follows:

"I was not an authorized agent. I was a member of the company. I came with the understanding that I would be doubly compensated for my work, but I was not an authorized agent. I assumed that."

Upon such testimony the court could only conclude that the witness was acting for himself.

[4] It is next insisted by the appellant that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the assessment work required by law was done upon the premises involved herein for the year 1916. Upon this question the evidence is in direct conflict, Joseph Thomas Callahan testifying that no work was done upon said premises during the year in question. On the other hand, the witnesses Timothy Henry Carlon, George Edward Watson, and Herman Meyertholen all testified to having been upon the premises in the year 1916 and the beginning of the year 1917, and that the assessment work done on all of the mines belonging theretofore and constituting the property belonging to the Santa Ana Mining Company was done and performed by one John James, and also one of these witnesses testified to the fact of having paid the said James for such services.

If believed by the trial court, this testimony was sufficient to show that the said James commenced doing the assessment work upon the mining claims involved in this action, and known as and called the Eureka and Mississippi Quartz Mining Claims, in the month of December, 1916, and continued in said work until it was finally completed, and hence as to these properties no valid location thereof could be made on January 1, 1917. As hereinbefore stated, there is no question raised as to the failure of the Santa Ana Mining Company to do the required assessment work for the years 1917, 1918, and 1919, and also of its failure to file the certificate required by the acts of Congress. It necessarily follows that the premises were open to relocation at any time on and after January 1, 1918.

[5] The law is well settled that a relocation of a mining claim before a former location has lapsed or has become forfeited for nonperformance of the annual assessment work is of no validity, and the person making such relocation acquires no title thereby. Gwillim v. Donnellan, 115 U. S. 45, 5 Sup. Ct. 1110, 29 L. Ed. 348; 18 R. C. L. title Mines, § 47.

[6] The court having found that the annual assessment work for the year 1916 was done for the uses and purposes of the Santa Ana Mining Company, it is immaterial whether the cost of said work was or was not paid by the Santa Ana Mining Company. This court has held in the case of Anderson v. Caughey, 3 Cal. App. 22, 84 Pac. 223, that, if the work is done to the amount required by law, the effect thereof would be the same, even though the labor has been gratuitous.

[7] Appellant also insists that the trial court erred in striking from the testimony two letters written by Frank J. Callahan to one of his brothers, in one of which it is stated that Timothy Carlon was not authorized to act as agent of the mining company, and in the other, in speaking of certain work done in the mining premises, it is said:

"Why he did the last two years' work is beyond me. I did not authorize him to do it. You know that ditch man wired me to get me to acknowledge Tim as my agent, and I paid no attention to his request."

These letters were written in relation to other litigation then pending. They do not bear upon any of the issues tendered in this case, but were probably sought to be introduced to support the theory of abandonment. We do not see anything in them tending to support such theory; hence, if the letters had been allowed to remain in evidence, we cannot see that the result would have been any different from that arrived at by the trial court. The fact that two years' assessment work was done without being authorized by Frank Callahan would not alter the fact of the work having been done.

[8] Appellant also sought a new trial in the lower court on the ground that new evidence had been discovered. The affidavits set out in the transcript show simply that the evidence claimed to be new is simply cumulative, and contradictory only of testimony already having been given. Witnesses for the plaintiff testified that the required assessment work was not done upon the premises during the year 1916. The witnesses mentioned in the affidavits, according to their affidavits, would testify to the same effect.

Again, newly discovered evidence is also simply contradictory, and comes within the rule laid down in the case of Estate of Walden, 166 Cal. 446, where, on page 450 (137 Pac. 35, 37), the court says:

"We cannot say that the court below abused its discretion in denying the motion for a new trial so far as it was based on newly discovered evidence. All of the new evidence presented comes within the well-established rule that the trial court may, in its sound discretion, refuse a new trial upon this ground, where the new evidence is merely cumulative, or where it tends merely to impair the credibility of the evidence of the prevailing party"—citing a number of California cases.

No other reasons being assigned for reversal, we conclude that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

KELLY et al. v. UNIVERSAL OIL SUPPLY CO. et al. (Civ. 2677.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 2, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court March 31, 1924.)

1. Bills and notes $\S$ 167—Note secured by mortgage is nonnegotiable.

A note secured by mortgage is nonnegotiable.

2. Mines and minerals $\S$ 78(5)—Lessors held estopped to assert equities against note and mortgage.

Where oil lessors executed to lessee corporation, for purchase of its stock, notes secured by mortgage payable in three years, such purchase to be rescinded if drilling was not commenced within four months, also delivering a statement that they understood that the note and mortgage were to be assigned and that lessors had no offsets or defenses against the note, held that, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1962, subd. 3, and Civ. Code, $\S$ 1710, subd. 3, they were estopped to set up, as against assignees of the note and mortgage, lessees' failure to commence drilling within the four months, as warranting rescission.

3. Pledges $\S$ 30(1)—Assignee of chose in action, held as security, may recover whole amount due.

Ordinarily the assignee of a chose in action, held as security, may recover the whole amount due thereon.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 880(3)—Cross-complainant could not complain of judgment covering full individual claim where excess would go to defendant not appealing.

In a suit to cancel note and mortgage, a cross-complainant, given judgment for the full amount to which it was individually entitled, could not complain of failure to secure judgment for the whole amount of note of which it was assignee, where the excess would go to its assignor, another defendant who did not appeal from a judgment declaring his claim invalid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Suit by J. J. Kelly and another against the Universal Oil Supply Company and others, in which the Glendale National Bank filed cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiffs and cross-complainant, plaintiffs and cross-complainant appeal. Affirmed.

W. W. Middlecoff and Power & McFadzean, all of Visalia, for appellants Kelly.

Hocker & Austin, of Los Angeles, for appellant bank.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action for the cancellation of an agreement, a lease, and a promissory note and mortgage. The defendant Glendale National Bank filed a cross-complaint to recover the amount of the promissory note and to foreclose the mortgage. The action was dismissed as against defendant Hoggins. The bank held the note and mortgage as security for a loan made by it to defendant Hamil in the sum of $3,500. The court gave the bank judgment against plaintiffs for the sum of $3,500 and unpaid interest and counsel fees in the sum of $350, and entered judgment in favor of plaintiffs against the other defendants for the cancellation of all the aforesaid instruments. The plaintiffs and the bank have appealed on a single record. The question raised by the appeals is whether the facts found by the court support the judgment. The findings of the court are substantially as follows:

October 28, 1920, plaintiff agreed to lease certain lands to Hoggins for a term of 20 years "for the purpose of mining and prospecting for oil and gas." The agreement provided that Hoggins should begin drilling operations within 4 months after the execution of the lease and "pay a royalty of one-sixth of all oil taken from the ground"; that within 30 days Kelly would purchase from Hoggins 5,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant company for the sum of $5,000, "to be paid by the execution of a note by said Kelly and his wife," payable 3 years after date, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, and secured by a mortgage on other lands belonging to Kelly; that "the five thousand dollars above mentioned is to be expended in the development of the lease"; that "if drilling is not commenced within the time mentioned, in the above, the lease herein mentioned shall be canceled and the sale of stock rescinded." The "plaintiffs expected and intended that said R. C. Hoggins should negotiate the sale of said promissory note and mortgage and use the proceeds thereof in developing the lease therein mentioned." November 6, 1920, the lease provided for by the agreement was executed. On the same day Kelly purchased 5,000 shares of the capital stock of the defendant company, and he and his wife, Ione Kelly, in payment therefor, gave Hoggins their promissory note, as provided in the agreement, in the usual form, secured by a mortgage, executed by them, on lands other than those leased. Neither the note nor the mortgage contains any reference to the purchase of the stock or to the aforesaid agreement or lease, but the execution of all of said instruments constituted one transaction as between the parties thereto. December 5, 1920, for the purpose of assisting Hoggins "to negotiate said note and mortgage," Kelly caused the National Bank of Bakersfield to telegraph Hoggins an appraisal of the property mortgaged, and the next day, for the same purpose, Kelly and his wife executed and delivered to Hoggins the following writing:

"Pacific Mortgage Company, Los Angeles, California—Gentlemen: Replying to your request of recent date will say, that I am the maker of the promissory note dated November 6, 1920, in favor of R. C. Hoggins, secured by mortgage recorded in Book 177, page 496, of Mortgages in Tulare county, California, and covering 215 acres of land described in said mortgage; that I am the owner of the premises covered by said mortgage; that the unpaid balance of the mortgage is $5,000.00; that the interest on said note is at the net rate of seven per cent. (7%) per annum; that I have no off-sets, claims nor defenses against said note except as stated above. I understand that it is desired to assign said note and mortgage.

"Very truly yours,

"[Signed] J. J. Kelly.
"Ione Kelly."

"Said writing was not made in response to any inquiry from the Pacific Mortgage Company and was not delivered to said Pacific Mortgage Company, but was delivered to said R. C. Hoggins with the intention and expectation of having said R. C. Hoggins exhibit the same to whomsoever he might wish and to assist the said Hoggins in negotiating said note and mortgage." December 8, 1920, Hoggins exhibited the foregoing telegram and written statement to defendant Hamil, and sold and assigned the note and mortgage to him for the sum of $4,600, which Hamil paid to Hoggins. December 14, 1920, Hamil exhibited the telegram and statement to the Glendale National Bank, and the bank, relying thereon, and, without knowledge or notice of any of the aforesaid terms and conditions upon which the note and mortgage were executed, "or that there was any condition attached to said note," loaned Hamil $3,500 and took an assignment from him of the note and mortgage as security for the loan. Plaintiffs were not notified of the assignment to Hamil prior to May 3, 1921, nor of the assignment to the bank until the commencement of this action, July 29, 1921.

No drilling operations were ever commenced on the leased lands. June 7, 1921, plaintiffs gave notice of rescission of the foregoing agreement and lease to defendants Hoggins, Hamil, and Universal Oil Supply Company, offered to return the 5,000 shares of capital stock, and demanded the return of the note and the release of the mortgage. The note became due and payable before the action was commenced because of plaintiffs' default in payment of interest. Plaintiff was a director of the defendant company.

[1] Since the note was secured by a mortgage, it was nonnegotiable, under the law in force at the time of the assignments thereof. Pitman v. Walker, 187 Cal. 667, 203 Pac. 739. The bank, therefore, took it subject to all existing equities and defenses in favor of the plaintiffs unless they were estopped, by their written declarations, to assert such equities and defenses.

"Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it." Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3.

[2] It is not contended that the declaration would not estop plaintiffs as to any defense existing at the time the declaration was made and acted upon but it is urged that the consideration for which the note was given failed after the declaration was made and that therefore the plaintiffs are not estopped thereby, since they could not have known of such failure of consideration at the time. The plaintiffs did know at that time, however, that the note and mortgage were to be canceled if Hoggins failed to commence drilling within 4 months from the date of the lease. Their declaration was intended to influence any person who might contemplate the purchase of the securities, and their deliberate failure to disclose any secret equities or conditions relative thereto, of which they had full knowledge, was such an omission of duty as to preclude them from asserting such equities or conditions against one who has been misled by their statement. One form of deceit is:

"The suppression of a fact, by one who is bound to disclose it, or who gives information of other facts which are likely to mislead for want of communication of that fact." Civ. Code, § 1710, subd. 3.

It is urged that the bank made no inquiries relative to any equities or conditions attaching to the securities. The answer is that under the written representations made by the plaintiffs, and upon which the bank acted, there was no occasion for inquiry. Porter v. Johnson, 172 Cal. 456, 156 Pac. 1022.

[3, 4] The appellant bank contends that it should have been given judgment for the full amount of the note. Ordinarily the assignee of a chose in action, held as security, may recover the whole amount due thereon. Ginocchio v. Amador, 67 Cal. 493, 8 Pac. 29; Bridge v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 774, 141 Pac. 375. In the latter case it is said, quoting from Gilman v. Curtis, 66 Cal. 116, 4 Pac. 1094, that the assignor's only interest "is in what remains of it after the advances, for the security of which it was assigned, have been satisfied." Had the bank been given judgment for the full amount of the note, it would have been under obligation to pay Hamil, the assignor, whatever it recovered in excess of the amount due upon his note to it. But Hamil was a party to the action, and the court, in effect, found that he was not entitled to such excess by reason of the invalidity of the note as to him. He has not appealed from the judgment. The bank was given judgment for the full amount to which it was individually entitled and therefore has no just cause of complaint. Having all interested parties before it no reason appears why it was not proper for the court to enter judgment determining the rights of all of them. The judgment is affirmed on both appeals.

PEARDON et al. v. WHITE. (Civ. 2656.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Jan. 29, 1924.)

1. Pleading ⇨216(1)—General demurrer calls for consideration of complaint as whole.

A general demurrer to a complaint calls for a consideration of the complaint as a whole only.

2. Partnership ⇨327(1) — Pleading held to show partnership at will dissolvable at any time.

A complaint alleging formation of a partnership, agreement to advance money, purposes for which it was to be organized, and concluding with a prayer for dissolution and accounting, held to show a partnership at will, which could be dissolved at any time, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2449, 2450, subd. 2.

3. Joint adventures ⇨5(1) — Facts held to warrant accounting.

In an action for an accounting between joint adventurers, an accounting was properly granted, where it was necessary for the court to ascertain and determine the amount of money advanced by all the parties engaged in the adventure, and the dates of the advancement.

4. Joint adventures ⇨5(2)—Accounting granted, though partnership alleged.

The fact that the complaint alleged a partnership did not prevent the court from granting an accounting on the theory that a joint adventure existed and not a partnership.

5. Joint adventures ⇨5(1)—Finding of indebtedness held not defective.

In an action for dissolution and accounting between joint adventurers, a contention that the findings were defective, in that they did not show the amount of the indebtedness from the defendant to the plaintiffs, was without merit, where one paragraph of the findings, after setting forth various amounts due plaintiffs by defendant, found that a certain sum for which sum judgment was subsequently entered was due plaintiffs.

6. Joint adventures: ¶4(4)—Interest properly allowed on advancements by joint adventurers.

In an action for an accounting between joint adventurers, court properly allowed plaintiffs' interest on sums advanced, which should have been paid by the defendant, from the dates of such advancements.

7. Joint adventures: ¶5(1)—Objection that accounting not brought down to date held without merit.

In action between joint adventurers for an accounting, an objection that the accounting was not brought down to date of entry of judgment is without merit, where the transcript shows that accounting was brought down to latest possible date, and the taking of testimony ended September 20th, and judgment was entered in October thereafter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Fred Peardon and others against Thomas W. White. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Crofton & Wetmore, of Marysville, for appellant.

W. P. Rich, of Marysville, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Action for an accounting. Plaintiffs had judgment. Defendant appeals. It appears from the pleadings and transcript in this action that in 1920 and up to the date of the entry of judgment herein the plaintiffs were the owners of a certain ranch situated in the county of Sutter upon which they were raising Thompson seedless grapes, the plaintiff Peardon owning a half interest in the ranch, and the other plaintiffs a one-fourth interest each. This ranch was operated by the plaintiffs as partners.

During the same period of time the defendant has been the owner of a ranch located in close proximity to the ranch belonging to the plaintiffs. The defendant was likewise engaged in the raising of Thompson seedless grapes. Prior to the transaction hereinafter referred to neither plaintiffs nor the defendant had a fruit-drying plant of their own. Early in 1920 the plaintiffs and the defendant agreed that they would construct a raisin and fruit-drying plant for the use of the plaintiffs and defendant respectively. The plaintiffs were to pay one-half of the cost thereof and the defendant to pay one-half of the cost of such plant, and that the plaintiffs and defendant should be equal owners in said plant, and when grapes were dried the expense of operating the plant should be prorated between the plaintiffs and defendant, that is, the total expense of operating the plant should be divided between them in proportion as the tons of grapes dried by each bore to the total number of tons dried. The drying plant itself was erected upon the property belonging to the plaintiffs, and was operated during the years 1920 and 1921. The cost of the plant was several thousand dollars. A few bills were paid by the defendant, but the greater portion thereof was paid by the plaintiffs.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs and the defendant were copartners in this enterprise. The trial court found that there was no copartnership, but that the plaintiffs and the defendant were engaged in a joint adventure, and directed that an accounting be had. The first point made for reversal is that the plaintiffs have not complied with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code, in that no certificate of partnership was ever filed or published.

[1, 2] As it does not appear, however, that the plaintiffs entered into any agreement or joint adventure with the defendant as partners, this contention is untenable, and needs no further consideration. It is next contended that the complaint is insufficient in its allegations concerning partnership, in that it sets out no time for its continuance and no cause for dissolution. Only a general demurrer was filed to the complaint and calls for a consideration of the complaint as a whole only. The complaint alleged the formation of the partnership, the agreement to advance the moneys, the purposes for which it is to be organized, and concludes with a prayer for dissolution and accounting. This shows a partnership at will, and under such circumstances a partnership that may be dissolved at any time. Section 2449, Civ. Code; subdivision 2, § 2450, Civ. Code; 30 Cyc. p. 712.

[3, 4] Upon the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony a motion for nonsuit was made on the ground that the evidence failed to establish a partnership. The court denied the motion, holding that the testimony established a joint adventure, and made out a case entitling the plaintiff to an accounting. Several cases are cited by the appellant to the point that a court will not grant an accounting where an accounting is unnecessary. The principal case relied upon is that of Kinley v. Thelen, 158 Cal. 175, 110 Pac. 513. An examination of this case shows, however, that it has no application to the issues presented by the case at bar. In the case of Kinley v. Thelen, supra, it appears that a balance due upon an unsettled account had been fixed by an agreement and a note given therefor, and the court held that, under such circumstances, in the absence of a charge of fraud or mistake an accounting would not be permitted. In the case at bar the plaintiffs and the defendant made advances, and, in order to ascertain the rights of the respective parties, it was necessary for the court to ascertain and determine the amount of money advanced by all the persons engaged in the joint adventure and the date of the advancements. It could only be done by taking an accounting of the various transactions. In the case of Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 Pac. 147, the precise questions here presented were considered and determined. It was there held that the fact that the relation was wrongly averred to be that of partners and not of persons engaged in joint adventure was immaterial.

"If a case is stated which entitles the plaintiff to relief, it matters not that the contract which is correctly set out is wrongly called a contract of partnership. * * * Whether the facts would have given jurisdiction to a court of equity is of no consequence. We have no such courts, but our courts afford the remedies to which the facts may show the parties are entitled, whether legal or equitable."

A reading of this case shows that further citation of authority upon this point is unnecessary. The fact that the plaintiffs were doing business as partners did not prevent them as individuals from entering into an agreement with the defendant herein, as before stated, and hence the defendant's motion in abatement was properly denied.

[5] It is next contended that the findings are defective, and that they do not show the amount of the indebtedness from the defendant to the plaintiffs. Paragraph 7 of the findings, however, is a complete answer to this contention. After setting forth various items, it is found that the amount due the plaintiffs by the defendant is the sum of $3,779.05, for which sum the judgment was subsequently entered in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant.

[6] The court allowed the plaintiffs interest for the sums advanced by them which should have been paid by the defendant from the dates of such advancements at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. This we hold to be proper.

"Interest in such cases should be allowed on advances from the time of payment." 23 Cyc. 457; Crenshaw v. Crenshaw (Ky.) 61 S. W. 366; Hopkins Mfg. Co. v. Ruggles, 51 Mich. 474, 16 N. W. 862.

"Joint adventures and partnerships are governed by the same rules of law." 23 Cyc. 453.

[7] It is next objected that the accounting is not brought down to the date of entry of judgment. It appears, however, from an examination of the transcript that the accounting was brought down to the latest possible date, and the taking of testimony ended on the 20th day of September, 1922. Judgment was entered in October thereafter.

There appearing no valid reasons for disturbing the judgment entered by the court in this case, it is ordered that the same be and it is hereby affirmed.

HAYWARD et ux. v. DOWNER. (Civ. 4771.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California, Jan. 26, 1924.)

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 821(24)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian traveling at night with knowledge of excavations held for jury.

A pedestrian who, with knowledge that a sewer system was being constructed in a street, fell into a trench excavated in the course of the construction of such sewer system, while walking along such street during the nighttime, held not contributorily negligent as a matter of law.

2. Husband and wife $\S$ 235(2)—Contributory negligence of husband in not warning wife of danger of falling into trench held for jury.

Husband of one who fell into trench dug in the course of the construction of a sewer system, while walking in a street during the nighttime, held not contributorily negligent as a matter of law, so as to be precluded from recovering damages for wife's injuries because of his failure to warn her that a sewer was being constructed in such street, though he had knowledge thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by L. P. Hayward and wife against R. H. Downer. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. H. Delap and Hiram E. Jacobs, both of Richmond, and J. E. Rodgers, of Martinez, for appellant.

Hall & Jacobs, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs obtained a verdict of $2,000 for damages suffered by Emilie Hayward, the wife of her coplaintiff, when she fell into a ditch or trench excavated by the defendant in a public street during the course of his construction of a sewer system under contract. Work under this contract covered a large area in the particular neighborhood in which the plaintiff lived, and had been in course of construction for a period of some two and a half months prior to the date of the injury. On the night on which the injury occurred, the plaintiffs had been visiting a neighbor, and on their return home over a path which they had frequently used the wife fell into the trench and suffered the injuries which are the basis of the accident. Plaintiffs had a general verdict in the sum of $2,000, and from the judgment upon the verdict this appeal is taken.

The only grounds urged upon the appeal are: (1) That the respondent Emilie Hayward had knowledge or the means of knowledge of the existence of the danger, that she voluntarily assumed the risk, and was therefore guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. (2) That the respondent

Emilie Hayward's husband had actual knowledge of the danger, and that his negligence in failing to warn his wife of such danger bars recovery by both himself and his wife.

[1] There is much respectable authority in support of appellant's first point, and such, in fact, was the rule in this state until the Supreme Court, in Meindersee v. Meyers, 188 Cal. 498, 503, 205 Pac. 1078, held that, notwithstanding this knowledge and means of knowledge, it was for the jury to determine whether it was a want of ordinary care for the injured not to have the source of danger in mind.

Nothing was said by the Supreme Court regarding the standing of the husband in relation to the award of damages for his wife's injury, and no effort was made to distinguish the rule affirmed in Basler v. Sacramento G. & E. Co., 158 Cal. 514, 518, 111 Pac. 530, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 642, to the effect that the husband's failure to notify his wife of approaching danger while under his care bars recovery by him for injuries suffered by the wife.

[2] However, the Meindersee Case was decided upon a state of facts similar to those before us, and we must assume from the decision that all these questions were taken into consideration, and that, where either husband or wife having knowledge or previous notice of the unsafe condition of a street voluntarily puts himself in a place of danger from which injury results to the wife, it is a question for the jury to determine whether either is guilty of contributory negligence.

Judgment affirmed.

ROULLARD et al. v. ROSENBERG BROS. & CO. (S. F. 10912.)(Supreme Court of California. March 12, 1924.
Rehearing Denied April 10, 1924.)1. Election of remedies ⇐1—Doctrine stated.

A party having two or more coexisting modes of procedure and relief, allowed by law, on the same state of facts, one inconsistent with the other, must choose between them, and having done so, with knowledge of the facts, is estopped from invoking the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Election.]

2. Election of remedies ⇐1, 7(1)—Neither suit to quiet title against purchaser nor for conversion against purchaser's assignee is election.

Where a landowner commenced suit for conversion of his peach crop against assignees of one contracting to buy and subsequently sued the purchaser, defaulting in payments, to quiet title, the first suit was not an "election of remedies" because the second did not exist, and neither having proceeded beyond the pleadings constituted such election against the other; there being no inconsistency.

3. Election of remedies ⇐1—Doctrine is specific application of estoppel.

The doctrine of election of remedies is but a specific application of the equitable doctrine of estoppel.

4. Election of remedies ⇐1—Commencement of suit to quiet title did not bar pending suit for conversion of peach crops against another defendant.

Commencement of a suit to quiet title against one defaulting in payments under his contract to buy did not bar a pending suit against the purchaser's assignee of a peach crop for conversion of the crop, the actions being distinct, since the title suit could not result in injury to the converters.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇐214(3)—Assignment of peach crop not an assignment of assignor's contract to buy land.

An assignment of the peach crop, by one holding land under a contract to buy, did not operate as an assignment of his contract, or any interest therein, and the assignee was not in privity with the parties to the land contract.

6. Action ⇐27(1)—Action for conversion of peach crops against assignees of one contracting to buy sounds wholly in tort.

Landowner's action for conversion of his peach crop, against assignees of the crop from one contracting to buy, sounded wholly in tort, and was entirely independent of the contract relationships.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by Joel Roullard and another against Rosenberg Bros. & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

C. K. Bonestell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Harris, Johnson, Willey & Griffith, of Fresno, for respondent.

MYERS, J. Plaintiffs appeal herein on the judgment roll alone from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action to recover damages for the wrongful conversion of a certain crop of peaches. The only question involved upon the appeal is whether or not the doctrine of election of remedies was applicable to this case, and, if so, whether or not the defendant was entitled to rely upon it as a defense to the cause of action.

Briefly stated, the facts were these: In October, 1919, appellants, who were the owners of a certain vineyard and orchard in Fresno county, entered into an executory contract to sell the same to one Johnson. This was in the usual form, providing for the payment of the contract price in annual installments and that time should be the essence thereof. To secure these annual payments Johnson executed and delivered to the appellants a chattel mortgage upon all of the crops to be produced upon the premises during the years from 1920 to 1925. This mortgage was in due and legal form, duly executed, acknowledged, delivered, and recorded, and contained the affidavits of the parties as required by law. It gave to appellants the right to possession of the crops as soon as they should be in a condition to be harvested and the right to dispose of them and apply the proceeds upon the unpaid balance of the purchase price. In September, 1921, certain persons, who were in possession of the premises as assignees from Johnson, sold and delivered the 1921 crop of peaches from said premises to respondent herein, in disregard of the provisions of the chattel mortgage and of the rules of law applicable thereto. Thereupon appellants brought this action of conversion against the respondent to recover the value of the crop so converted, alleging in their complaint the facts briefly outlined above.

Subsequent to the commencement of this action, and before the trial, Johnson having defaulted in his payment due October 10, 1921, upon the contract of purchase, appellants brought an action against him to quiet title to and recover possession of the land. Thereupon the respondent filed a supplemental answer in the action of conversion, which is the case here upon appeal, alleging the commencement of the other action by plaintiffs against Johnson, and alleging that plaintiffs have elected by said last-mentioned action to recover said land and not the purchase price thereof, and that by reason of such election plaintiffs are barred from recovering any judgment against the respondent herein. The trial court found all of the facts alleged in the complaint to be true and also found the facts alleged in the supplemental answer to be true, and as a conclusion of law therefrom it concluded that the latter facts presented a complete bar to plaintiffs' cause of action herein, and rendered judgment accordingly in favor of defendant.

[1] Respondent's contention is that when appellants commenced the second action above referred to for the recovery of the possession of the premises they thereby made an election of remedies, as a result of which they are estopped and precluded from further pursuing their remedy in the case at bar. To this appellants reply that if they at any time made an election of remedies it was made when the case at bar was commenced, and not by the later suit to quiet title. We are of the opinion that neither of these contentions is precisely correct. An excellent statement of the doctrine of election of remedies is to be found in the following passage in 10 California Jurisprudence, at page 1:

"It is a general rule that a party having two or more coexisting modes of procedure and relief allowed by law on the same state of facts, one of which is inconsistent with the other, may not pursue both but must choose between them, and when, with knowledge of the facts, he has clearly elected to proceed upon one, he is thereby bound and will be estopped from invoking the other. * * *"

[2] It cannot be said that plaintiffs made an election of remedies by the mere commencement of the action in the case at bar, because at that time they had no choice of remedies. No default had then been made in the contract of purchase, and the only remedy then available to plaintiffs was the action of conversion, which they are here prosecuting. Neither do we think they can be said to have made an election by the mere commencement of the action in the suit to quiet title. When that had been done, the situation was that plaintiffs had then commenced two actions, one an action for damages for conversion, being the case at bar, the other a suit to quiet title. Neither of said actions had then proceeded beyond the point of filing complaint and issuance of summons, and it could not be said that plaintiffs had "clearly elected to proceed" upon either of them as distinguished from the other. The conclusion to be deduced from plaintiffs' conduct up to that point would be that they had not elected to pursue either remedy, but had elected rather to pursue both. If plaintiffs had then proceeded to pursue the quiet title action to trial and judgment, leaving the conversion action in statu quo, it might then have been argued with some force that they had thereby elected to pursue that action to the exclusion of this. But they did not do that. Instead thereof, they pressed the conversion action to trial and judgment, leaving the quiet title suit to remain in abeyance, so that if it can be said that plaintiffs have elected to pursue either of these remedies to the exclusion of the other, it would have to be concluded that they have chosen to pursue the remedy of the case at bar.

Appellants further contend that the defense of estoppel by election of remedies is never available to a stranger to the transaction such as is the respondent herein. The rule relied upon is thus stated:

"The doctrine of election cannot be applied between one of the parties to a contract and a third person, a stranger thereto; since it is applicable only to the parties to the contract." 20 Corpus Juris, 18, citing Kuehle v. Springer, 145 Ill. App. 127; Tanner v. Johnson, 119 Ark. 506, 178 S. W. 376.

We shall not undertake to determine whether or not the rule contended for is as broad in its application as this statement of it would imply, or whether it is properly applicable to the present case, because, for the reason above indicated, as well as for other reasons which will be briefly stated, we do not think that the doctrine of election of remedies is available to the defendant herein. It is to be noted: First, that as against this defendant the plaintiffs have never had a choice of remedies; second, that the remedies involved in the two actions here under consideration depend upon totally different states of fact; and, third, that at least up to the present point there is no inconsistency between them. The case at bar is a tort action and rests upon the conversion by defendant of the crop of peaches, of which the plaintiffs were entitled under their mortgage to hold possession as security for the performance by Johnson of his contract of purchase. The quiet title action rests upon the default by Johnson in the performance of said contract, and has nothing whatever to do with the conversion of the peaches. We see no inconsistency in the prosecution of the two actions at the same time, at least up to the point to which each of them has now progressed. It is, of course, true that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover both the land and the unpaid purchase price, but if there had been no conversion of the property secured by the mortgage, it would scarcely be contended that the mere commencement of the action to quiet title after default in the payment of purchase money would have had the effect of discharging or releasing the lien of the mortgage prior to the recovery of judgment in that action.

The instant case is analogous in some respects to the case of Crittenden v. St. Hill, 34 Cal. App. 107, 166 Pac. 1016. In that case a landlord had brought an action at law against his tenant to recover rent due under the lease. While that action was still pending, he commenced a second action of unlawful detainer to recover the possession of the premises, together with the rent due. The defendant contended that the commencement of the first action was an election of remedies by virtue of which the plaintiff should be precluded from pursuing the remedy in unlawful detainer. The following language from the opinion in that case is fairly pertinent to the action at bar:

"By the original action plaintiff was seeking to recover the rent due him, and being resisted in that action, he has resorted to a more expeditious proceeding to accomplish this result. The basis of the doctrine of election of remedies is founded in the proposition that where there is, by law or by contract, a choice between two remedies, which proceed upon opposite and irreconcilable claims of right, the one taken must exclude and bar the prosecution of the other. This doctrine is, therefore, generally regarded as being an application of the law of estoppel. (9 R. C. L. p. 956 et seq.) Here no such element exists. There was no payment or acceptance of the rent or any offer to pay, except the offers made upon the condition that defendant had no right to exact, nor does the record disclose any element of estoppel which makes it inequitable or unjust to allow the plaintiff the fruits of the judgment appealed from; nor are the two actions, in our opinion, inconsistent. One is for the income of the property, the other for the possession of the property itself, which is in part based upon the latter default. In Arnold v. Krigbaum, 169 Cal. 143, 146 (Ann. Cas. 1916D, 370, 146 Pac. 423), it is held that the action for unlawful detainer is one for the recovery of the possession of property primarily, and that the rent found due is a mere incident to the main object. The rights litigated in the two actions are therefore entirely different; and where the law affords distinct but not inconsistent remedies, the election to follow one does not operate as a waiver of the other. (American Process Co. v. Florida White Pressed Brick Co., 56 Fla. 116 [16 Ann. Cas. p. 1056, 47 South. 942].) All inconsistent remedies may in general proceed concurrently, but, of course, the satisfaction of the claim by one remedy puts an end to the enforcement of the other. (Id.) Here there was no satisfaction of the action instituted for the recovery of the rent, because it never went to judgment. * * *

[3, 4] As above noted, the doctrine of election of remedies is but a specific application of the equitable doctrine of estoppel. See, also, Hines v. Ward, 121 Cal. 115, 120, 53 Pac. 427; McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 70, 75, 155 Pac. 460; Herdan v. Hanson, 182 Cal. 538, 543, 189 Pac. 440; Buckmaster v. Bertam, 186 Cal. 673, 678, 200 Pac. 610; Mansfield v. Pickwick Stages (Cal. Sup.) 215 Pac. 389. When this is kept in mind, it is readily apparent that this defendant is in no position to invoke the doctrine. At the time this action was commenced, the plaintiffs had a complete and perfect cause of action against this defendant for the recovery of the value of the property which had been wrongfully taken by the defendant and converted to its own use. The commencement and pendency of the later action to quiet title, against a different defendant and upon a different cause of action, did not operate to any extent to injure or defraud or mislead or in any way prejudice this defendant, and therefore affords no ground upon which the latter can predicate a claim of estoppel. To be sure, this defendant will be "injured," in the layman's sense of the word, if it is compelled to pay the judgment which is here sought. But this does not constitute an "injury," as that term is understood in law or in equity as affording a ground for relief. The defendant rests under a legal obligation to make just compensation to the plaintiffs for the wrong done to them by the conversion committed by it.

[5, 6] This defendant is not in privity with any of the parties to the contract for the sale of the land. The transfer to it of the crop of peaches did not operate as an assignment or conveyance of the land contract or of any interest therein, if, indeed, that transaction may be regarded as having any validity, which may be questioned. See Pen. Code, § 538. The case of Glassell v. Coleman, 94 Cal. 260, 29 Pac. 508, is readily distinguishable from the case at bar. The cause of action in that case rested wholly in contract. The defendants therein had guaranteed the payment by the vendee of a certain portion of the purchase price under a contract for the sale of land. Default having occurred, the vendor elected to and did rescind the contract. Thereafter he brought suit against the guarantors to recover from them the portion of the unpaid purchase price which had been guaranteed by them. The defendants therein, by their contract of guaranty, had become parties to the contract of sale, or at least in privity with the vendor thereunder. It was there held that the vendor could not enforce obligations resting solely upon a contract, after that contract had been effectively rescinded. The cause of action in the instant case sounds wholly in tort. It is not at all dependent upon any contract obligation of the defendant. It depends upon the right of the plaintiffs to the possession of the fruit and the wrongful interference therewith by the defendant; and the cause of action therefor was complete at the time this action was commenced.

The finding herein that plaintiffs have declared at an end the said contract for the sale of the land, and that the same has been terminated, is in no sense binding upon or effective against the vendee under said contract, or his assigns, because they were not parties or privies to parties herein. If that action ever proceeds to trial, it may be decided therein that the contract has not been terminated. It may be that the recovery of judgment herein, if such judgment is satisfied and the proceeds thereof applied upon the amounts due under the land contract, will operate to estop these plaintiffs from the further prosecution of the quiet title action; but we are not here called upon to determine that question. We are of the opinion that the trial court erred herein in concluding that the facts found in response to the allegations of the supplemental answer operate as a bar to the cause of action which is fully supported by the facts found in response to the allegations of the complaint.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the trial court, with instructions to render judgment for the plaintiffs upon the facts found by it, in accordance with the conclusions hereof.

A judgment, sentencing one convicted of a conspiracy to obtain personalty worth more than $100 by false pretenses to a term of from one to ten years in the state penitentiary, held a sufficient sentence for the maximum term of ten years provided by Pen. At the conclusion of the oral argument, the Chief Justice made the following statement:

THE CHIEF JUSTICE. [1] The members of the court are satisfied that the first judgment pronounced by the trial court, which recited the verdict of the jury finding the petitioner guilty of the offense stated in the information, to wit, a conspiracy to obtain personal property to a value of more than $100 by false pretenses, was a sufficient sentence of the defendant for the term provided by law for conspiracy to commit a felony, that is, a sentence for the maximum term of ten years, as we construe section 182 of the Penal Code, and that term not having as yet expired, the prisoner should be remanded. At the conclusion of the oral argument in the above-entitled matter the Chief Justice made the following statement:

THE CHIEF JUSTICE. The Justices are all satisfied that the complaint upon which the petitioner is held, as shown by the return, states a public offense, and that the question of whether or not the petitioner was guilty or innocent of that offense is the question counsel is now presenting to the court in his effort to show that the petitioner was engaged in interstate commerce, and that an attempted prohibition of that interstate commerce was a violation of the interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution (article 1, $\S$ 8, cl. 3). We do not believe the record before us presents that question, and hold that the remedy of the petitioner is to defend the case before the trial court.

In re PARKINSON'S ESTATE. (L. A. 7815.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 12, 1924.
Rehearing Denied April 10, 1924.)

1. Executors and administrators — 188—Widow held entitled to statutory allowance, although nonresident of state at time of decedent's death.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1466, providing that, if the property set apart from decedent's estate is insufficient for the support of the widow and children, the court must make such reasonable allowance out of the estate as shall be necessary for the maintenance of the family according to their circumstances during the settlement of the estate, the widow of a decedent for whom no provision has been made in the will, is entitled to such an allowance, where she was through no fault of her own, but wholly through fault of decedent, separated from him and a nonresident of the state of his domicile at the time of his death; there being nothing in sections 1464, 1465, relating to setting apart the homestead for the use of the widow inconsistent with this conclusion.

2. Executors and administrators — 188—Statutory allowance to widow held not dependent on existence of family status at death of decedent.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1466, relating to the support of a widow during the settlement of decedent's estate, does not limit the allowance for support to cases where the actual family status existed at decedent's death, in absence of showing that the wife had either by her own conduct lost, or by her agreements waived, her statutory rights as widow.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Charles A. Parkinson, deceased. From an order granting Mary E. Parkinson, the widow of Charles A. Parkinson, an allowance for her support out of his estate, Ida J. Parkinson, a residuary legatee, appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 213 Pac. 259.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ernest K. Maine, Albert Sidney Brown, and Robert J. Adcock, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order of the probate court granting the petition of Mary E. Parkinson, the widow of Charles A. Parkinson, deceased, for an allowance for her support out of his estate. The appellant, Ida J. Parkinson, is a sister of the decedent and the residuary legatee under his will, and upon the hearing upon said petition she contended, and she also contends upon this appeal, that said order was improper and erroneous for the reason that the petitioner, though admittedly the widow of the decedent, was not and had never been, at the time of his death, a resident of the state of California; and for the further reason that she was not at the time of the decedent's death a member of the family of decedent, and for each and both of these reasons was not a person entitled to such allowance within the terms of the statutes providing for the same. The facts of the case are undisputed. Prior to the year 1912 the decedent, Charles A. Parkinson, and his wife, Mary E. Parkinson, resided in the state of Michigan, but had not lived together there for several years previous to that date. He had, in fact, in the year 1900 brought an action against her for divorce in the courts of that state, which suit he lost. They did not live together after that time, but the decedent associated with other women and otherwise so conducted himself as to render it impossible for his wife to live with him. This state of things continued until about the year 1912, when he left the state of Michigan and came to reside in California. During all these years his wife was and has ever since been in poor health and dependent upon her friends and relatives for support. In the year 1915 she brought an action against her husband in the courts of Michigan for separate maintenance and obtained a decree therein requiring him to pay the sum of $100 a month toward her support. This sum he never fully paid, although there is evidence that he thereafter sent her the sum of $3 a week. He died in California on April 7, 1921, leaving a will wherein he disposed of his estate to the exclusion of his wife, which will was duly admitted to probate and an inventory and appraisal filed showing the assets of his estate to consist of personal property of the appraised value of $5,175.07. Shortly after his death his widow came to California and has since resided in this state. Not long after her arrival she presented a claim against his said estate for the sum of $7,200 alleged to be the balance due her on account of her said judgment for separate maintenance, which claim being disallowed by the executor, she brought suit to establish the same, which action is still pending. Thereafter and on April 9, 1923, she filed her petition for an allowance as his widow out of said estate, which application the court granted in the sum of $75 per month from the date of the filing of the inventory; and it is the order granting the same which forms the subject of this appeal.

The sections of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the making of provision for the comfort and support of the surviving spouse and minor children of a decedent are sections 1464, 1465, and 1466 of that Code. The first of these sections provides that when a person dies, leaving a widow or minor children, the widow or children, until letters are granted and the inventory is returned, are entitled to remain in possession of the homestead, etc., and are entitled to a reasonable provision for their support, to be allowed by the court or a judge thereof. The next section provides that upon the return of the inventory, or at any subsequent time during the administration, the court may, upon petition therefor, set apart, to the use of the surviving husband or wife, or in the case of his or her death, to the minor children of the decedent, all property exempt from execution, including the homestead; and makes provision for the selection of a homestead for the use of the surviving husband and wife and minor children, in case none had been selected and set apart by the survivor in his or her lifetime. Section 1466 provides that if the property thus set apart is insufficient for the support of the widow and children, or either, the court or a judge thereof must make such reasonable allowance out of the estate as shall be necessary for the maintenance of the family, according to their circumstances during the progress of the settlement of the estate. The application of the respondent herein for an allowance out of said estate was made under section 1466 of the Code of Civil Procedure; there having been no real property in said estate, and no provision therefor having been made or possible for the setting apart of a homestead.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that section 1466 of the Code of Civil Procedure must be read in connection with the sections of said Code which immediately precede it, and that so read it must be construed as permitting an allowance to such person or persons only as would have been entitled to have a homestead set apart; and that, since the respondent herein was not, at the date of the death of the decedent, a resident of the state of California, and had never prior thereto been such resident of the state, she could not have been entitled to have a homestead set apart to her, and hence was not, by virtue of her status as a nonresident, entitled to an allowance for her support out of said estate during the period of administration. In making this contention the appellant in the first instance relies upon certain language used by this court in the Matter of Estate of Whitney, 171 Cal. 754, 154 Pac. 855, wherein the court stated that the right of a widow to an allowance "stands upon the same footing as her right to a homestead." A reading of the entire opinion in that case, however, shows that the court had no such question before it as is presented in this case, and that it had no intention, in the use of the language above quoted, to limit the right of widows to an allowance to those persons only who would have been entitled to have homesteads set apart to them; or, in other words, that the widow's right to an allowance was dependent upon whether she was a resident of California at the date of the decedent's death. The language of section 1466, Code of Civil Procedure, does not itself make or import any such limitation unless the same is to be implied from the use of the word "family" in said section, which will be considered later in connection with the appellant's second point upon this appeal. The cases from other states upon which the appellant further relies in support of her first point upon this appeal do not support her claim that the widow, in order to be entitled to this allowance, must have been a resident of California at the date of the decedent's death. These cases (Spiers' Appeal, 26 Pa. 233; Barber, Adm'r, v. Ellis, 68 Miss. 172, 8 South. 390; Platt's Appeal, 80 Pa. 504; Krumenacker v. Andis Executor, 38 N. D. 500, 165 N. W. 524) turn upon the particular facts in each case, which are either that the widow seeking an allowance had voluntarily chosen, without fault on the part of her husband, to reside permanently in another state or country, or was living separate and apart from the husband and in another state voluntarily and under an agreement of separation which destroyed the family relation. Some of these very cases which the appellant cites point out the distinction which should be given emphasis in this case; as, in the case of Grieves' Estate, 165 Pa. 126, 30 Atl. 727, cited in Krumenacker v. Andis, supra, it was said respecting the widow seeking the allowance:

"It was no fault of hers that she was not a member of his household at his death. It was his illegal acts and bad faith that excluded her from it. In contemplation of law the family relation still existed and his domicile was hers. Why, then, should she be denied the exemption which the law allows to his widow?"

In the case of Platt's Appeal, supra, the decision of the court was put upon the ground that the separation of the wife from her husband and her residence in another state was voluntary, and that there was no evidence that she had ever done anything to maintain the family relation. The distinction between the cases relied upon by the appellant and the case at bar is clear. In this case the original separation between this husband and wife in the state of Michigan was brought about by his institution of an action for divorce against her, which he lost, and, we must assume, rightly lost. His conduct thereafter in consorting with other women and in other ways made it impossible for his wife to live with him. Finally he left her, ill and unsupported, in the state of Michigan, and came to California, and after awhile she was obliged to bring suit against him there for separate maintenance without divorce, which the court awarded her, but with the judgment in which he in the main failed to comply, and finally died in California, leaving that judgment almost wholly unsatisfied. Then it was that his wife, herself in no fault for the severance of the family relations, came to California in an effort to enforce her rights as his widow in and to such portions of his estate as the law would accord her. In the case of Estate of Whitney, supra, this court said: "The widow's claim to a family allowance is strongly favored in our law," citing In re Lux, 100 Cal. 593, 35 Pac. 341; Estate of Welch, 106 Cal. 427, 39 Pac. 805; and Estate of Cowell, 164 Cal. 636, 130 Pac. 209. We see no reason in either the language of the statute or in the policy of the law for holding that this widow is not entitled to the allowance permitted under the terms of section 1466 Code of Civil Procedure, merely because she was, through no fault on her part, but wholly through fault on his part, separated from her husband and a nonresident of California at the time of his death.

[2] The appellant's second contention is that the use of the word "family" in section 1466, Code of Civil Procedure, gives rise to the implication that the allowances under that section are to be confined to cases where an actual family status existed at the date of the decedent's death. We can see no reason for giving any such restricted significance to the use of that phrase in that section, nor, in fact, in making any distinction between the application of section 1464 and section 1466 of said Code in that regard. Both of these sections are dealing with the support of the widow and minor children, if any, of the decedent, the one before and the other after the return of the inventory. In the case of an application made under section 1464, Code of Civil Procedure, this court held, in the Matter of Estate of Gould, 181 Cal. 11, 183 Pac. 146, that the right of a widow to a reasonable provision for her support under section 1464 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was not conditioned upon her having lived in a family relation with the deceased at the time of his death. In so holding this court reviewed the earlier cases in this state involving this very question, and wherein it was held that, in the absence of a showing that the wife, had either by her conduct lost, or by her agreements waived, her statutory rights as a widow, she was entitled to a family allowance upon her husband's death, even though she was not living in the family relation with him at the time of his death. We can perceive no reason why this principle should not be given a like application to the provisions of section 1466 of the Code of Civil Procedure and to applications for family allowances made thereunder. It follows that the trial court was not in error in making its order for a widow's allowance from which this appeal has been taken.

Order affirmed.

HOTALING et al. v. HOTALING et al.
(S. F. 10217.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 13, 1924.
Rehearing Denied April 10, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error §930(1)—All intentions from evidence are in support of judgment.

In reviewing evidence on appeal, all intentions therefrom are in support of the judgment.

2. Corporations §298(5)—Deed to director authorized by board of directors in absence of quorum invalid.

Where board of directors consisted of five members, and under the by-laws and Civ. Code, § 308, a majority of the board was necessary to form a quorum, a deed authorized by the board at a meeting of three directors was invalid in view of section 305 where one of the directors present was the grantee, since he could not be counted to make a quorum for that purpose.

3. Appeal and error §1010(1)—Finding supported by evidence conclusive.

Finding of the trial court that there was no fourth director present at a meeting of the board, which was alleged to have authorized a deed by the corporation, is binding on appeal, being supported by evidence.

4. Corporations §426(1)—Deed not properly authorized not ratified by stockholders.

Alleged deed of a corporation, authorized by less than a quorum at joint meeting of directors and stockholders, was not ratified by an annual meeting of stockholders whose minutes recited that the minutes of the last stockholders' meeting were read and adopted, such recital not purporting to approve anything which had been done by the directors.

5. Corporations §426(2)—Stockholders could not ratify execution of deed by corporation.

Stockholders as such had no authority to authorize execution of a deed by the corporation, in view of Civ. Code, § 306, and were incompetent to ratify it.

6. Corporations §316(4)—Omnibus resolution held not ratification of deed to director on condition.

Where directors of a corporation executed deed of corporate property to a director, which was to be recorded only on a named condition, and thereafter another corporation with the same stockholders was organized and deed made for the same and other property to the second corporation, and a resolution adopted by the directors specifically ratifying such deed, an omnibus resolution ratifying all acts and transactions of the officers since the first directors' meeting held not intended to ratify the deed to the director, since, under Civ. Code, § 1113, the second deed carried with it the covenant that grantor had not previously conveyed the estate therein.

7. Appeal and error ⚭996—Inference from evidence supporting judgment accepted on appeal.

Where two conflicting inferences are fairly deducible from evidence, the one which supports the judgment must be accepted on appeal.

8. Corporations ⚭298(5)—Rule that legal quorum of directors is such as is approved by stockholders' meeting inapplicable.

Where two stockholders owning more than one-fourth of the capital stock were absent from a joint meeting of directors and stockholders at which there was no quorum of directors, the rule that a legal quorum of directors is such as is approved at a stockholders' meeting by stockholders holding all or substantially all of the capital stock was inapplicable, and did not empower the directors at such meeting to authorize a deed of corporate property.

9. Deeds ⚭60—Escrows ⚭3—Grant not held in escrow by grantee, no conditional delivery to grantee.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1056, a grant cannot be held in escrow by the grantee, and there can be no delivery to grantee conditionally.

10. Deeds ⚭56(2)—Delivery question of intention.

The question whether a delivery has taken place is a question of fact involving intent of the parties.

11. Deeds ⚭56(2)—Handing deed to grantee without intention to transfer title held not a delivery.

Where grantors handing deed to grantee and permitting him to retain possession did not intend to transfer title thereby, they believing the deed would be of no effect until recorded, and understanding that it was not to be recorded except on a contingency, there was no delivery.

12. Deeds ⚭69—Deed to trustee voidable where he knew grantors did not understand it would be effective.

Where grantors were of the belief that deed, though delivered, would not be effective until recordation, if grantee, who occupied a position of great trust and confidence, though knowing of their belief, did not share such belief and understanding, the deed was voidable, as he would not be permitted to procure a benefit for himself.

13. Corporations ⚭316(4)—Deed to director held not ratified, and stockholders not estopped.

Where corporate director to whom a deed was authorized at joint meeting of stockholders and directors, without sufficient quorum of directors, agreed to record it only on a contingency, and knew the other directors present understood that without recording it would not be effective, they were not estopped by reason of their presence at such meeting from suing as stockholders to set aside the deed, and execution of the deed by officers was not ratified by resolution thereafter adopted by the directors ratifying all acts and transactions of the officers.

14. Appeal and error ⚭931(8)—Findings liberally construed to uphold judgment.

It is the appellate court's duty in reviewing findings to give them a liberal construction to uphold rather than defeat the judgment, and all findings are to be read together and reconciled to prevent conflict on material points if such reconciliation is possible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Lavinia J. Hotaling and others, as directors of the Hotaling Estate Company, against Richard M. Hotaling and another, individually and as directors of the Hotaling Estate Company, and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John W. Preston, Robert Duncan, Peter F. Dunne, E. J. McCutchen, and W. H. Metson, all of San Francisco, and Thos. P. Boyd, of San Rafael, for appellants.

Gavin McNab, Nat Schmulowitz, and R. P. Henshall, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

MYERS, J. [1] Plaintiffs, as stockholders and as directors, respectively, of the defendant corporation, the Hotaling Estate Company, brought this action in behalf of said corporation to establish the title of said corporation to certain premises in Marin county, known as the Sleepy Hollow Ranch. Findings and judgment in the court below were in favor of the plaintiffs and the defendants have appealed. An adequate discussion of the respective contentions of the parties requires a somewhat extended statement of facts. In the preparation of the following statement and in reviewing the evidence for that purpose we have followed the rule which governs reviewing courts in considering the evidence on appeal, that all intendments are in support of the judgment. In cases of conflicting evidence we have accepted as true that which tends to support the judgment in so far as it is not inconsistent with the findings, and where conflicting inferences are fairly deducible from facts proved we have adopted those which tend to support and harmonize with the judgment herein.

In 1897 A. P. Hotaling, a man of large means, who was engaged in the wholesale liquor business in San Francisco, caused to be organized a corporation, A. P. Hotaling & Co., to which he transferred all of his property and assets. Of its capital stock one share was issued to Julius Friedland as a qualifying director's share, and the remainder was divided in four equal parts, which were issued, respectively, to Lavinia J. Hotaling, his wife, plaintiff herein, and to their three sons, A. P. Hotaling, Jr., now deceased. Richard M. Hotaling, defendant herein, and Frederick C. Hotaling, plaintiff herein. In the interest of brevity the parties hereto will be hereinafter referred to by their respective first names. In 1898, by reason of the failing condition of health of both A. P., Sr., and A. P., Jr., Richard became the general manager of the corporation. A. P., Junior, died in 1899, and his widow, Ella K. Hotaling, defendant herein, succeeded to his stock ownership and interest in the corporation. A. P., Sr., died in 1900. The relation between Richard and his mother and younger brother Frederick in the year 1898 and for many years subsequent thereto was one of great trust and confidence, resting not alone upon the filial and fraternal relationship, but, also upon the circumstance that he was in fact and in effect the manager of the corporation in which was vested substantially all of the property and assets of the several members of the family.

The minute book of the corporation discloses that on July 10, 1899—

"at the regular annual meeting of the stockholders and directors of A. P. Hotaling & Co. (all having been previously notified), * * * the meeting being a joint one of directors and stockholders by reason of all of the stock in the company being represented or controlled by the directors, there were present R. M. Hotaling, vice president and treasurer, F. C. Hotaling, secretary, and Mrs. L. J. Hotaling. After the reading and adoption of the minutes of the previous meeting, the vice president and treasurer read his report for the past year's business, which report was adopted as read and ordered filed for reference. The election of directors and officers to serve for the coming year, 1899 to 1900, resulted as follows: Directors, L. J. Hotaling, R. M. Hotaling, F. C. Hotaling, Julius Friedland and A. P. Hotaling. Officers, L. J. Hotaling, president, R. M. Hotaling, vice president, treasurer and general manager, F. C. Hotaling, secretary. By resolution, duly seconded, the president and secretary were authorized to execute a deed conveying to R. M. Hotaling all that land hitherto known as the Austin-Dutton Ranch in Marin county, Calif., [the Sleepy Hollow Ranch] for $10—ten dollars—and other good and valuable consideration in recognition of his services to the company, and furthermore to equalize his patrimony in comparison with certain gifts made to his brother, the late A. P. Hotaling, Jr., by their father, A. P. Hotaling, Sr. * * *

Thereafter, on September 7 following, Lavinia and Frederick, as president and secretary, respectively, signed and acknowledged a deed purporting to convey said Sleepy Hollow Ranch to Richard. There was a manual tradition of the deed to Richard at that time, and it has ever since remained in his possession, but was not recorded until October 18, 1916. The questions of the validity and effect of this deed form the subject-matter of this controversy.

The evidence indicates, and the court so found, that at all the times here in question Lavinia and Frederick believed and understood that a deed to real property had no validity or effect unless and until it was recorded. It is equally indicated by the evidence, though not expressly so found, that Richard and Ella entertained the same belief and understanding. It is expressly found that Richard was at all times aware of this belief and understanding in the minds of Lavinia and Frederick. The motive and purpose of this transaction are not entirely clear, but the evidence indicates that the members of the Hotaling family were apprehensive that Ella would remarry and thus bring into the family a stranger who might not be acceptable to the Hotalings, and with this possibility in view it was proposed by Richard to provide a means by which, in the event of such remarriage, the Sleepy Hollow Ranch could be taken out from the assets of the corporation and reserved for the exclusive use and enjoyment of the Hotalings. Richard promised and agreed to hold said deed for the use and benefit of Lavinia, Frederick, Ella, and himself, and not to record same except in the event of Ella's remarriage.

Thereafter all of the parties continued to treat the Sleepy Hollow Ranch in all respects as if it still belonged to the corporation. It continued to be carried upon the corporate books as a portion of the corporate assets. It appeared upon each of the annual financial statements of the corporation as one of its assets. It continued to be assessed in the name of the corporation for purposes of taxation, and the fire insurance thereon was carried in the name of the corporation. During the ensuing five years the corporation expended in taxes, insurance, maintenance, and improvements upon this property about $98,000. These expenditures were not charged to Richard, but were entered upon the corporate books as corporate expenditures upon its own property. During all of this time the corporation continued in possession and control of this property, and Richard continued in the actual management and active control of the affairs of the corporation. Lavinia was nominally president and Frederick nominally the secretary thereof, but they were such in name only, and exercised the functions of their offices only when called upon to do so by Richard, and then in accordance with his suggestions and advice. They were inexperienced in business affairs, and at all times trusted and confided implicitly in him, and continued to so trust and confide until shortly before the commencement of this suit.

In December, 1904, it was decided to separate the liquor business from the other properties and business of the family, and to that end the Hotaling Estate Company, defendant herein, was incorporated. To the latter corporation were transferred all of the properties and assets of A. P. Hotaling & Co. other than those which pertained directly to the liquor business. In return therefor the estate company assumed certain indebtedness and issued its capital stock in the same proportions and to the same persons who held the shares of A. P. Hotaling & Co. Instruments of conveyance were prepared, executed, acknowledged, delivered, and recorded under the direction and supervision of Richard, conveying the various properties from A. P. Hotaling & Co. to the Hotaling Estate Company. Among these was a grant, bargain, and sale deed purporting to convey the Sleepy Hollow Ranch—the property here in question. That deed was executed, acknowledged, and delivered by Richard as vice president of A. P. Hotaling & Co., and was promptly recorded. Richard alleged in his answer and contended at the trial that it was not the intention of any of the parties that a conveyance should be made of the Sleepy Hollow Ranch from A. P. Hotaling & Co. to the Hotaling Estate Company. He claimed that the preparation and execution of that deed was wholly due to mistake and inadvertence. The trial court found against him upon this contention, however, and found that the preparation and execution of this deed was not inadvertent, but was in accordance with the intention of all of the parties. The officers and directors of the Hotaling Estate Company were the same individuals, occupying the same relationships, as in A. P. Hotaling & Co. Thereafter, and until 1916, all of the parties continued to treat the Sleepy Hollow Ranch as the property of the estate company. It was entered upon the corporate books of the latter as one of its assets, shown as such in each annual financial statement, was so listed for purposes of taxation and for purposes of insurance, and the estate company continued in possession of said property and expended thereon in taxes, insurance, maintenance, and improvements about $8,000. These expenditures were not charged to Richard, but were entered upon the corporate books as corporate expenditures as upon property of the corporation. With respect to the expenditures of these large sums of money by the two corporations upon this property after the purported conveyance thereof to Richard, he presented two inconsistent explanations at the trial. He contended, first, that the corporation A. P. Hotaling & Co. had agreed to expend this money upon the property for his benefit in consideration of past services by him rendered. He contended, second, that the expenditures were made for his personal account, and that the omission to charge the same against him upon the corporate books was an oversight. Both of these contentions were resolved against him by the trial court, and the evidence amply supports its conclusions thereon.

In 1916 Richard recorded his deed, but plaintiffs had no knowledge of that fact until their attention was directed thereto by the omission of the Sleepy Hollow Ranch from the list of corporate assets in the financial statement of 1917. They then made an investigation which resulted, after some unsuccessful negotiations with Richard directed to the relinquishment of the property, in the commencement of this action. The action was brought by plaintiffs in behalf of and for the benefit of the corporation by reason of the fact that there are but four directors, who are divided two and two upon this question, and therefore no corporate action could be taken in the premises. The complaint is in three counts. The first contains the conventional allegations of the ordinary suit to quiet title. The second alleges at length and in considerable detail the facts above outlined, and aims at the cancellation of the deed. The third realleges the same facts, together with additional facts whereby it is claimed that, as against the defendant corporation, Richard is estopped to assert any claim to this property. The defendants Richard, Ella, and the Hotaling Estate Company filed separate answers, and are prosecuting separate appeals from the judgment.

[2, 3] Regarding the corporation as a separate legal entity and the deed under which Richard claims as an attempted corporate act, it must, we think, be conceded to have been invalid, at least in its inception, for the reason that its execution was never effectively authorized by the board of directors of the corporation, in whom was vested the sole power to give such authorization. Civ. Code, § 305; Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11, 91 Am. Dec. 607. The board of directors, as provided for in the by-laws, consisted of five members. Under the by-laws and under the state law a majority of the board of directors, or three or more, was necessary to form a quorum or to perform a valid corporate act (Civ. Code, § 308), even though there was a vacancy in the board (Porter v. Lassen County, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 261, 269, 59 Pac. 563; Pennington v. Pennington Sons, 27 Cal. App. 57, 148 Pac. 947; 3 Cook on Corp. [7th Ed.] § 713a, p. 2462). At the meeting at which the resolution was adopted which purported to authorize the execution of this deed there were but three directors present, including Richard, who was named therein as grantee. Being personally interested in this transaction adversely to the corporation he was disqualified thereby to vote the authorization, and his presence could not be counted to make a quorum for that purpose. Smith v. Immigration Assn., 78 Cal. 289, 20 Pac. 677, 12 Am. St. Rep. 53; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93

Cal. 17, 32, 28 Pac. 788; Curtin v. Salmon, etc., Co., 130 Cal. 345, 349, 62 Pac. 552, 80 Am. St. Rep. 132; Bassett v. Fairchild, 132 Cal. 637, 647, 64 Pac. 1082, 52 L. R. A. 611; Goodell v. Verdugo, etc., Co., 138 Cal. 308, 71 Pac. 354; De Moulin v. Magnesite, etc., Co., 186 Cal. 128, 132, 199 Pac. 42; Lowe v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 24 Cal. App. 367, 374, 141 Pac. 399. Appellants contend that it should be presumed that there was a fourth director present at this meeting. The trial court found to the contrary, and there was evidence to support this finding, both in the minute book of the corporation (Lowe v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., supra) and in the testimony of witnesses. The finding is therefore conclusive upon this point. We conclude that if the meeting of July 10, 1899, be regarded as a meeting of the board of directors there was not present a quorum of said board capable of authorizing the execution of this deed. If, upon the other hand, it be regarded as a meeting of stockholders, it was wholly incompetent to authorize a corporate act of this character. Gashwiler v. Willis, supra; Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 226, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252; Salfeld v. Sutter County L. I. & R. Co., 94 Cal. 546, 29 Pac. 1105; In re Solidarite M. B. Assn., 68 Cal. 392, 9 Pac. 453.

[4, 5] It is suggested that the transaction, though invalid in its inception, was validated by a ratification thereof at the annual meeting of the stockholders of the corporation on July 9, 1900, at which time the minutes recited that—

“The minutes of the last stockholders’ meeting were read, and on motion, duly seconded, adopted.” (Italics added.)

The answer to this is twofold: First, the recital does not purport to approve anything which had been done by the directors, the only body competent to act in the premises; and, second, the stockholders as such were incompetent to ratify that which they could not authorize. Curtin v. Salmon, etc., Co., supra, at page 351; Bassett v. Fairchild, supra.

[6, 7] It is next suggested on the part of appellants that the execution of the deed in question was ratified by a resolution adopted at a meeting of the directors on January 6, 1905, at which all of the directors were present. On December 6, 1904, at a meeting of the board of directors, a resolution had been adopted authorizing the transfer and conveyance to the Hotaling Estate Company of “all the real estate now held or owned by this A. P. Hotaling & Company, * * *” and authorizing the president and secretary thereof to execute the necessary instruments of conveyance of said real estate. Subsequently, and on January 6, 1905, another meeting of the board of directors of A. P. Hotaling & Co. was held and a detailed report was made to the meeting, describing the various conveyances which had been executed by the vice president and secretary of A. P. Hotaling & Co. under and pursuant to the resolution last referred to. In this report was a specific reference to the deed purporting to convey the Sleepy Hollow Ranch from A. P. Hotaling & Co. to the Hotaling Estate Company. Based upon this report a resolution was adopted reciting in its preamble the execution of the various deeds, specifically mentioning the deed of the Sleepy Hollow Ranch, and resolving:

“That this corporation do and it does hereby ratify, confirm and approve all and singular the acts of its vice president and secretary in executing the deeds, written assignments and bill of sale which they have executed as herein recited.”

At the same meeting, and immediately following the adoption of the resolution last referred to, the board of directors adopted a resolution in the following terms:

“Resolved, that all and singular the acts and transactions of the president, vice president, and secretary of this corporation since the first directors’ meeting of this corporation, which was held on the 13th day of August, 1897, to the date hereof, all of which transactions are known to us, be, and they are hereby ratified, approved, and confirmed as the acts of this corporation.”

It is appellants’ contention that this “omnibus resolution” must be construed as ratifying and therefore validating the purported deed to Richard which had been made in 1899. There are various reasons why we cannot adopt this view. There is nothing, either in the minutes or in the evidence, to indicate that the directors present at this meeting had in mind the purported deed to Richard or the resolution purporting to authorize it. It must be conceded that the “omnibus resolution” is sufficiently broad in its terms to be construed as referring thereto. But so construed it would apply equally to the deed which had just been executed from A. P. Hotaling & Co., to the Hotaling Estate Company. The two deeds are, of course, inconsistent. The latter was a grant, bargain, and sale deed, executed upon a valuable consideration, and therefore carried with it a covenant that the grantor had not previously conveyed the same estate or any interest therein to any person other than the grantee. Civ. Code, § 1113. If it be assumed that by the “omnibus resolution” it was intended to ratify the deed to Richard, the result would be that the covenants of the deed to the estate company were breached as soon as it was executed. The grantor would then be liable in damages amounting to the full value of the property. It is true that the stock ownership was at that time the same in both corporations, but that situation might change at any time thereafter. It seems unthinkable that the directors present at that meeting had the intention of ratifying at the same time two different conveyances of the same land to different grantees. It is clear that they did intend to ratify the later deed because they had just done so by a specific resolution which referred thereto in express terms. The ultimate question in this connection is the question of the intent of the directors in adopting these two resolutions. Giving the construction contended for by appellants to the "omnibus resolution" and reading that together with the specific resolution, the most that can be said is that an ambiguity resulted as to which of the two deeds they intended to ratify, which was resolved by the trial court against the appellants. Where two conflicting inferences are fairly deducible from the evidence, we must accept upon appeal that one which supports the judgment. Mah See v. North American Acc. Ins. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 42, 26 A. L. R. 123. We conclude, therefore, that the purported deed to Richard was never ratified by the directors of A. P. Hotaling & Co. acting as such.

[8] It is suggested that the doctrine of ultra vires, as applied to a private corporation, and particularly as applied to a close corporation, as in the present case, should be confined within narrow bounds. This is not a question of ultra vires, but of agents assuming to act in behalf of a corporate principal in a matter in which they lacked authority to bind the principal. It is also suggested that a legal quorum of directors is such as is approved at a stockholders' meeting by stockholders holding all or substantially all of the capital stock, and that therefore the minutes of the joint meeting of July 10, 1899, must be taken as showing the unanimous consent of the stockholders to a modification of the by-laws, so as to make a majority of the directors present a legal quorum for the purposes of that meeting. Assuming the soundness of the rule thus invoked, it is not applicable herein, for the reason that stockholders holding all or substantially all of the capital stock were not present at this meeting. Julius Friedland, holding one share, and Ella Hotaling, holding one-fourth of the capital stock, were both absent therefrom. Appellants also contend that the plaintiffs cannot be heard to complain as stockholders of their own action as directors, and that they, having approved, both as directors and as stockholders, the execution of the deed to Richard, will not be permitted to maintain this action to cancel the same, even though they assume to do so in behalf of the corporation. This contention invokes the doctrine of estoppel, and will be considered in a later portion of this opinion.

Appellants urge that the fiction of separate corporate entity should be disregarded where, as in the instant case, the Hotaling Corporation is the mere double of the Hotaling family. They assert that the members of the Hotaling family constituted virtually a partnership, owning the entire property and assets, using the corporation merely as a convenient instrument for the administration thereof. They argue that in such case, whether the members of the family assumed to act in behalf of the corporation either as directors or as stockholders, they were in fact acting as principals in their own behalf, and that in such case irregularities or defects in the pursuit of the corporate authority should be disregarded, citing Relley v. Campbell, 134 Cal. 175, 66 Pac. 220; Llewellyn Iron Works v. Abbott Kinney Co., 172 Cal. 210, 155 Pac. 986; Rutz v. Obeare, 15 Cal. App. 435, 115 Pac. 67; Du Bois v. Padgham, 18 Cal. App. 298, 123 Pac. 207; Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 446; Commercial, etc., Co. v. Modesto Drug Co., 43 Cal. App. 162, 184 Pac. 964; Hyman v. Karl Stern Co., 47 Cal. App. 605, 191 Pac. 47. Respondents reply that the rule contended for is applicable only to "one-man corporations," where one individual owns all of the stock. No good reason is apparent why the rule should not apply with equal force to a case wherein the corporate officers participating in the transaction own all of the stock between them. The rule is but a particular application of the general rule that a court of equity will in a proper case, in order to prevent fraud and do justice, disregard the fiction of separate corporate entity, and have regard for the real substance of the transaction. It is unnecessary to here decide this point. We shall assume that this is a proper case for the application of the rule and regard the plaintiffs Lavinia and Frederick as having acted in the transaction relating to the deed here in question, not as corporate agents, but as principals, acting in their own behalf.

[9] The trial court found that there was no delivery of the deed to Richard. Appellants challenge this finding as inconsistent with the admitted fact, also found by the court, that there was a "manual tradition" of the deed, and that the same has ever since remained in Richard's possession. They invoke the rule that a grant cannot be held in escrow by the grantee, and that there can be no such thing as a delivery of a grant to the grantee conditionally.

"Delivery to him * * * is necessarily absolute, and the instrument takes effect thereupon, discharged of any condition on which the delivery was made." Section 1056, Civ. Code; Mowry v. Heney, 86 Cal. 471, 475, 25 Pac. 17; Bias v. Reed, 169 Cal. 33, 145 Pac. 516; Treat v. Treat, 170 Cal. 329, 150 Pac. 53, 57; Avery v. Avery, 183 Pac. 453; McCarthy v. Security Bank, 188 Cal. 229, 204 Pac. 818; Stewart v. Silvia, 221 Pac. 191; Lewis v. Brown, 22 Cal. App. 38, 133 Pac. 331; Burkett v. Doty, 32 Cal. App. 337, 345, 162 Pac. 1042.

[10] The validity of this rule is not open to question, but it comes into application only when there has been a delivery. The question whether or not such delivery has taken place is a question of fact involving the intent of the parties.

"It is essential to the validity of a transfer of real property that there be a delivery of the conveyance with intent to transfer the title, and the true test under which delivery is to be determined is in ascertaining whether in parting with the possession of the conveyance the grantor intended * * * to divest himself of title. If he did, there was an effective delivery of the deed. If not, there was no delivery. The solution of this question is grounded entirely on the intention of the grantor, and this essential matter of intention is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court from a consideration of all the evidence in a given case bearing upon the question." Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 638, 151 Pac. 1, 3 (Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703); citing Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 451, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 73 Pac. 803; Estate of Cornelius, 151 Cal. 552, 91 Pac. 329; Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 757, 112 Pac. 544.

See, also, Hefner v. Sealey, 175 Cal. 18, 164 Pac. 898; McCully v. McArthur, 187 Cal. 194, 198, 201 Pac. 323; Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 381, 156 Pac. 509.

[11] The evidence in the case at bar supports the conclusion that Lavinia and Frederick in handing the deed to Richard, or in permitting him to retain possession thereof after its signature and acknowledgment by them, did not do so with any intent to transfer the title thereby. They both believed that the deed would be of no effect whatever until recorded. Under that belief the manual tradition of the deed would be but one step, and not the final step, in the process of the execution thereof. Under that belief tradition without recordation would be no more effective than would signature without delivery. The case is substantially on all fours with Kenney v. Parks, 137 Cal. 527, 70 Pac. 556. In that case Mrs. Kenney, being the owner of certain real properties, signed without consideration two deeds purporting to convey them to her husband, and at his request and upon his representation that under the law the deed would be of no validity until recorded (which both parties believed to be true), and on his promise that he would not have them recorded unless he should survive her, the deeds were placed by her in his possession. It was at the same time understood that the instruments should never have any effect as a conveyance unless Kenney should survive his wife. This court held that under the facts stated there had never been a delivery of the deeds, saying:

"To constitute delivery of a deed, it is not sufficient that there be a mere delivery of its possession, but this act must be accompanied with the intent that the deed shall become operative as such. 2 Boone on Real Property, § 295a; Black v. Sharkey, 104 Cal. 281; Denis v. Velati, 96 Cal. 227; Harris v. Harris, 59 Cal.

622. Here both parties understood that the deed could have no effect until recorded; and there was therefore no intent that it should become immediately operative, or that it should ever become operative during the life of the grantor, or afterwards, unless the grantee should survive her. * * *

"We do not deem it necessary to discuss here the decisions in which it has been held that the delivery of a deed to the grantee, to take effect upon the death of the grantor, is an effective delivery, or the construction of the much-misunderstood rule laid down in section 1056 of the Civil Code. To justify the application of the rule there must at least be a delivery of the deed, which implies the intent that it shall become at once operative, either absolutely or conditionally. Wheelwright v. Wheelwright, 2 Mass. 447; Black v. Sharkey, 104 Cal. 279; Denis v. Velati, 96 Cal. 223. But such is not the case here, where the understanding, and therefore the intent, that it should or could take effect presently, was lacking. Nor do we deem it necessary to refer to the doctrine of escrow and to the ancient rule that delivery of a deed to the grantee as an escrow is to be taken as an absolute delivery, further than to say that these doctrines, and especially the latter, have often been misunderstood and misapplied. 2 Blackstone's Commentaries, 307; Shepherd's Touchstone, 58; Coke on Littleton, 36a, 9 Coke Rep. 137a. All that need be said is they can have no application here. Kenney v. Parks, 125 Cal. 149."

We find no difference between the essential facts of that case and those of the case at bar, and know of no reason why the rule of that case should not be applied herein. Appellants suggest that that case is to be distinguished from the instant case by the fact that actual fraud was present in that case and not in this. It is true that fraud was present in that case, but the decision was not placed upon that ground. The court in that case expressly repudiated the suggestion that its decision was in any respect predicated upon the element of fraud therein, saying:

"Mistake and fraud are indeed alleged and found, but the plaintiff's cause of action is complete without regard to either of these facts. For, eliminating these elements from the case entirely, there still remains the fact that the deeds were placed in the possession of her husband upon the understanding that they were to have effect only upon the contingency of her death before that of her husband. It follows that there was no delivery, or that the deed took effect subject to a trust in favor of the plaintiff for a reconveyance on the failure of the condition."

Kenney v. Parks was cited with approval in the recent case of Stone v. Daily, 181 Cal. at page 577, 185 Pac. 665; and we think it affords ample justification for the conclusion of the trial court herein that there had been no delivery to Richard.

[12] We have thus far discussed the case upon the assumption that Richards shared in the belief and understanding of his mother and brother that a deed was ineffective for any purpose until recorded. The trial court did not so find, although the evidence would lead to this conclusion. The trial court did find, however, that at all the times here in question Lavinia and Frederick believed and understood that a deed to real property had no validity or effect unless and until it was recorded, and that Richard was at all times aware of this belief and understanding in the minds of Lavinia and Frederick. Therefore, if we should assume that he did not share this belief and understanding, we would be forced to regard him as a trustee dealing with his cestuis que trust, who would not be permitted to take advantage of their ignorance and mistake to procure a benefit for himself. If such an advantage were taken under such circumstances the conveyance would be voidable at their option.

[13] When we consider the fact of this mistaken belief in the minds of Lavinia and Frederick it becomes apparent that Richard is in no position to invoke the rule of estoppel as against them whether we assume that he was aware of their mistake or that he shared in it. This fact also furnishes another answer, complete in itself, to appellants' contentions to the effect that the deed to Richard, regarded as a corporate act, was ratified by the resolutions above referred to. If we assume that by the adoption of those resolutions, or either of them, the directors intended to ratify what had been done by Lavinia and Frederick in signing, acknowledging, and making tradition of the deed, still it is plain that they did not intend thereby to ratify a conveyance of the property from the corporation to Richard. They did not regard those acts as effecting a conveyance, but rather as mere preliminaries to a possible conveyance which might be effected at some future time by the recordation of the deed. As to that, they had Richard's promise that he would not record the deed except in the contingency of Ella's remarriage. Our conclusion that the deed in question was never effectively delivered renders it unnecessary to consider the various arguments of respondents in support of their contention that by reason of various facts alleged and proved, some of which have not been mentioned herein, Richard is estopped to assert any claim to this property as against the defendant corporation.

[14] Appellants contend that the findings of fact are inconsistent and conflicting, and they specify a large number of instances of alleged inconsistencies therein. The great majority of the claimed inconsistencies inhere solely in appellants' theory as to the legal effect which should be given to particular facts found. The findings are detailed and voluminous and in many respects are susceptible to a construction which would give rise to inconsistencies therein. It is the duty of an appellate court in reviewing the findings to give them a liberal construction so as to uphold rather than defeat the judgment. All the findings are to be read together and must be reconciled to prevent any conflict upon material points, if such reconciliation is possible. 2 Cal. Juris. pp. 871, 872, and cases cited. Reviewing the findings in the light of this rule we find no material conflicts or inconsistencies therein, except possibly as to the findings in response to plaintiffs' third cause of action, which pleaded an estoppel as against the defendant Richard, and which we have not discussed herein. The findings in response to the first and second causes of action afford ample support to the judgment.

BALDWIN v. BROWN et al. (L. A. 7123.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 12, 1924.
Rehearing Denied April 10, 1924.)

1. Divorce $\S$ 321½—Wife's status as to debt not changed by divorce.

Where, in action to set aside sale of land under deed of trust, plaintiff alleged that she signed the note as an accommodation maker for her husband, but the evidence showed that she and her husband signed the note as joint and several makers thereof and not otherwise, and thereafter a divorce against the husband was granted and the community property assigned in severalty, her contention that when the property involved in the deed of trust was subsequently assigned to her husband she became a surety cannot avail, since her relation to the creditor could not be changed, without his consent, by the divorce proceeding.

2. Newspapers $\S$ 3(2)—Effect of adjudication as newspaper of general circulation stated.

That the newspaper had been judicially declared to be one of general circulation, while perhaps not conclusive of that fact as against those who had not been parties to such judicial proceeding, would be evidence that it was a newspaper of general circulation.

3. Newspapers $\S$ 3(5)—Small circulation held not to show publication was not newspaper.

That a newspaper which had been adjudged one of general circulation, had a small circulation, only about 180 copies daily in a city of approximately 16,000 population, and that it was devoted chiefly and especially to the publication of court proceedings, legal notices, etc., did not deprive it of the character of a newspaper within the legal requirements both of statutes and of the provisions of trust deeds relative to giving notice by publication.

4. Mortgages $\S$ 369(3)—Inadequacy of price paid by mortgagee purchaser held not ground for setting aside sale under trust deed.

Where loan of $2,000 was secured by trust deed and at sale under the trust deed the mortgagee bid in the property for $480, although it was worth $4,800, such hard advantage over the makers of the trust deed was not one to which he was not entitled under its strict terms.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Margaret L. Baldwin against D. L. Brown and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kaye & Siemon, W. W. Kaye, and Alfred Siemon, all of Bakersfield, and L. E. Nathan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. W. Wiley, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action commenced by the plaintiff to set aside a sale of real estate made under the power granted to the trustee in a trust deed. The facts out of which this litigation arose are practically undisputed and may be briefly summarized as follows:

On and prior to the 25th day of March, 1916, F. H. Baldwin and Margaret L. Baldwin were husband and wife, residing at Bakersfield, Kern county, California. On said last-named date F. H. Baldwin borrowed the sum of $2,000 from D. L. Brown, the defendant herein, and thereupon executed and delivered to said Brown his promissory note for said sum of money, signed by himself and his wife as comakers thereof. The plaintiff herein alleged in her complaint that she signed said note only as an accommodation maker thereof, but this the defendant Brown in his verified answer denies, and alleges that the said plaintiff and her said husband signed said note as joint and several makers thereof, and not otherwise. The trial court found in favor of the defendant Brown upon this issue. At the time of the execution of said note, and to secure the payment of the same, F. H. Baldwin and his wife signed and executed their joint deed of trust upon the premises involved in this litigation, which constituted at the time a portion of the community property of the makers of said trust deed, and in which deed of trust the defendant Security Trust Company, a corporation doing business in the city of Bakersfield, was named as trustee. On August 2, 1917, an action for divorce was instituted by the plaintiff herein against her husband F. H. Baldwin in the city and county of San Francisco, which action was thereafter transferred to the county of Kern for trial, and was there tried, with the result that on or about September 22, 1919, findings were filed and a judgment given, made, and entered, awarding the plaintiff an interlocutory decree of divorce and undertaking to divide and assign to the respective parties in severalty the property which had theretofore been their community property. In the course of this division the trial court set apart to the defendant F. H. Baldwin the foregoing property covered by said trust deed as his sole and separate estate, subject to said trust deed and the indebtedness secured thereby, the court, however, making no other direction as to which of said parties should pay or should be relieved from payment of said indebtedness. The court, in making said interlocutory decree, also assigned certain other property, situate in the city of Bakersfield and which had theretofore been community property, to the plaintiff in said divorce action as to her sole and separate estate. F. H. Baldwin defaulted in the payment of said promissory note, and thereafter and on or about October 1, 1919, the defendant Brown required and directed the Security Trust Company, as the trustee named in said deed of trust, to sell the said real estate in order to satisfy said indebtedness secured thereby. By the terms of said deed of trust it was provided that in the event of default in the payment of the promissory note secured thereby and of a direction to the said trustee to sell the premises described therein the said trustee "shall first advertise the time and place of such sale with a description of the property to be sold, at least once a week for three successive weeks in some newspaper published in the county in which any portion of the lands to be sold are situated." Pursuant to this direction the trustee proceeded to advertise the sale of said property, and selected as the medium for such advertisement a small newspaper published daily in the city of Bakersfield and called "The Daily Report." This newspaper had been in existence for a number of years prior thereto in the city of Bakersfield, and some years prior to the particular publication about to be made therein had caused itself to be adjudged to be a newspaper of general circulation in accordance with the terms of the statute permitting the status of newspapers to be thus established. Its circulation was, however, very small, amounting to only about 180 copies daily in a city of approximately 16,000 population. It was, however, devoted chiefly and especially to the publication of court proceedings, legal notices, notices of sale of real estate under probate, foreclosure and trust deed proceedings, and its subscribers were chiefly among attorneys, real estate dealers and others who would be more particularly interested in such proceedings and in such sales. The publication of this particular sale was made in said newspaper in strict accordance with the provisions of said trust deed as to the length and frequency of said publication and as to the time and place of said sale. No other attempt was made, either by the creditor or the trustee, to notify the parties to said trust deed or to the obligation secured thereby or to inform the general public as to the fact, time, and place of said sale. At the time and place appointed by said publication the sale of the property occurred. D. L. Brown, the creditor and the defendant herein, was the only bidder at said sale. He bid the sum of $480 for the whole of said property, and it was sold to him by the trustee for said sum, although according to the findings of the trial court the property at the time of said sale was of the value of $4,800. Thereafter, and on November 6, 1919, the trustee conducting said sale and in pursuance thereof made, executed, and delivered to the said D. L. Brown, as the successful bidder thereat, a deed of conveyance of the whole of said property sufficient in form to convey title to the same. The plaintiff alleged that she had no knowledge whatever of said sale until on or about January 16, 1920, at which time she learned of the same through the service upon her of a writ of attachment in an action which the defendant herein, D. L. Brown, had commenced against her to recover the amount of the deficiency still due upon said promissory note, approximately $2,400; whereupon and shortly thereafter she had an interview with said Brown in which she requested that he convey the premises to her upon payment by her of the entire amount of said note with interest and counsel fees, together with the costs and expenses of said sale. This Brown refused to do; whereupon the plaintiff commenced the present action to set aside said sale. The trial court found substantially the foregoing facts, and as a conclusion of law therefrom found and decided that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief prayed for in her complaint, and accordingly gave its judgment in favor of the defendant and for his costs. This is an appeal from such judgment.

The only contention which the appellant urges upon this appeal is her claim that the sale of the premises in question by the trustee to the defendant herein was for a price which was grossly inadequate and that such gross inadequacy of price was accompanied by certain inequitable circumstances which would have warranted the interference of a court of equity, and which the trial court should have considered of sufficient weight to have justified it in setting aside said sale, and that its failure so to do was reversible error. In making this contention the appellant concedes that mere inadequacy of price, however gross, would not be sufficient, standing alone, to furnish a ground for setting aside said sale and in so conceding concurs in the like conclusion expressed by this court in the cases to be hereinafter commented upon.

[1] The appellant, however, urges six sets of circumstances alleged to be disclosed by the record before us which, taken in connection with the circumstances of gross inadequacy of price, would have sufficed to compel a setting aside of said sale. These are, first, "that the plaintiff was merely an accommodation maker of the promissory note." As to this contention the findings of the trial court are against the appellant and are sustained by the evidence in the case. Second, that "when the property involved was subsequently assigned to her husband she became merely a surety for the payment of the debt." This contention, however, falls with the former one, since her relation to the creditor as a joint and several maker of the note could not be changed without his consent by the result of a divorce proceeding and division of properties between herself and her husband to which the creditor was not a party. Third, "if the sale is not disturbed the plaintiff will be made to pay the deficiency and thus discharge a debt which she does not owe." This is a non sequitur. She always owed the debt, and the fact that she was obliged to pay the deficiency and thus discharge her obligation would not of itself be an inequitable circumstance. Fourth, "the property was purchased for only one-fifth of the indebtedness, and being purchased by the defendant Brown this alone was a badge of fraud, he having loaned $2,000 on the credit of this property alone." This is only another way of stating that the purchase price was grossly inadequate, which, as she concedes, is not of itself sufficient to justify setting aside said sale, the only added circumstances in this connection being that the creditor was the purchaser at said sale and had cause to know the actual value of said property and hence the gross inadequacy of his bid thereon. But unless the appellant could show by either reason or authority that the creditor must be held to a different rule of duty than that applicable to other bidders for property offered at public sale, this circumstance can be of no avail to the appellant since it adds no modicum of weight to the fact of inadequacy of price bid for the property at such sale. No sound reasons and no authority whatever are cited to sustain the appellant's conclusion in this regard. Fifth, "the notice of sale was insufficient, not being published in a newspaper but only in an obscure publication." Sixth, "the plaintiff had no actual knowledge of the sale and her lack of knowledge was excusable." These last two contentions are in a sense the complement of each other, since, if the publication was inadequate, the plaintiff's lack of knowledge, either actual or presumptive, would have been sufficient to justify her assault upon said sale. But if, on the other hand, the notice of sale was sufficiently published it would impart to the plaintiff constructive notice of such proposed sale by which she would be bound by virtue of her covenants in the trust deed, and, if so, her actual knowledge, or the want of it, would be an immaterial factor in the case.

We are therefore driven to the sole and only point in the appellant's several contentions: Was the notice of sale insufficient? Upon this point the trial court found:

"That the notice of said sale was printed and published for the time required in said deed of trust, in the Daily Report, a newspaper printed and published in the said county of Kern, state of California, for the time prescribed in said deed of trust.

"That said Daily Report was a newspaper printed and published in the county of Kern, state of California, and had been such newspaper so printed and published, for more than one year prior thereto.

"That said Daily Report was, on the 18th day of August, 1913, by the superior court of the county of Kern, state of California, adjudged to be a newspaper of general circulation by a judgment of said court."

[2, 3] As to the first two of the foregoing findings it must be conceded that they hold that the notice in question conforms fully as to the place of its publication with the requirements of the deed of trust, that the notice of sale thereunder shall be published "in some newspaper published in the county in which any portion of the lands to be sold are situated." The last of said findings to the effect that the publication referred to had been theretofore judicially declared to be a newspaper of general circulation, while it would not perhaps be binding upon the plaintiff or conclusive of the fact as against those who had not been parties to such judicial proceeding, would still be a circumstance supporting the other findings of the court to the effect that the publication in question was a newspaper and was such a newspaper within the intent of the deed of trust as might furnish a sufficient medium for the publication of the notice required by its terms. The publication had, it is true, a very small circulation, but it appears from the record, and particularly from the exhibit of the files of said publication, that it met the requirements of a newspaper and that it was such a daily publication as is not infrequently maintained in cities of considerable population for the chief purpose of giving notice by publication to those classes of persons most immediately interested therein of court proceedings, of real estate transactions and of probate and execution sales. Interspersed with these notices were to be found certain other matters of general interest usually found in newspapers; such as "want ads" and a limited amount of current news items. The publication, as appears upon its face, was in its thirty-sixth volume, and hence must have been existent in the place of its publication for a goodly number of years. The mere fact that its circulation was small, amounting to only about 180 issues daily in a city of 16,000 inhabitants, would not of itself, in our opinion, suffice to exclude it from the designation of a "newspaper," nor of such a newspaper as might properly be the medium for such publicity of the notice of sale as the trust deed required. The cases are not a few holding similar publications specially devoted to the giving of legal notices to be "newspapers" within the legal requirements of statutes relative to the giving of notices by publication and of the provisions of trust deeds to argue convincingly against any holding to the contrary, since to so hold would be to work havoc with legal proceedings and land titles which have long been dependent upon the sufficiency of publications of the identical character of that involved in the instant case. Kerr v. Hitt, 75 Ill. 51; Kellogg v. Carrico, 47 Mo. 157; Benkendorf v. Vincenz, 52 Mo. 441; Turney v. Blomstrom, 62 Neb. 616, 87 N. W. 339; Lynch v. Durfee, 101 Mich. 171, 59 N. W. 409, 24 L. R. A. 793, 45 Am. St. Rep. 404; Hanscom v. Meyer, 60 Neb. 68, 82 N. W. 114, 48 L. R. A. 409, 83 Am. St. Rep. 507. This being so, we are constrained to hold that the publication of the notice of sale in question was sufficiently made to satisfy the requirements of the deed of trust under the terms of which the sale of the premises in question to the defendant Brown was conducted.

This brings us finally to a consideration of the decisions of this court upon which the respective parties hereto rely. They are chiefly Odell v. Cox, 151 Cal. 70, 90 Pac. 194, Winbigler v. Sherman, 175 Cal. 270, 165 Pac. 943, Rauer v. Hertweck, 175 Cal. 278, 165 Pac. 946, and Bock v. Losekamp, 179 Cal. 674, 179 Pac. 516. It will not be necessary, however, to review these cases in detail since they are all considered, compared, and the proper rule to be deduced therefrom stated, in the case of Sargent v. Shumaker, 223 Pac. 464, just decided by this court, and wherein it is declared that, as the foregoing cases hold, the mere inadequacy in price, however gross in the sum bid for property at a public sale, will not in itself be sufficient ground for setting aside such sale if otherwise legally made, but that in addition to proof of such gross inadequacy in the price bid at such sale there must be proof of some element of fraud, unfairness, or oppression on the part of the creditor bidding in the property thereat before the court will be justified in depriving the purchaser of his legal advantage. The court further holds that, where the price thus bid for the property is greatly disproportionate to its actual value, very slight evidence of unfairness or irregularity will suffice to authorize the relief sought. In that case this court considered some of the very alleged irregularities which the appellant urges as existent in the instant case and also certain others not here present, and presenting an even stronger case than the present one, for relief, but holds that none of these are sufficient to constitute such a legal showing of fraud, unfairness, or oppression on the part of the purchasing creditor as would suffice to justify this court in avoiding the sale.

[4] In the instant case the evidence wholly fails to show any action or inaction on the part of the defendant which would bring his conduct with respect to his trust deed and the sale thereunder within the limits of the rule above stated. He simply stood upon his rights and duties as a creditor of the parties to his promissory note and the trust deed securing the same, and, while it is true he gained a hard advantage over the plaintiff herein in so doing, it has not been shown that it was not an advantage to which he was entitled under the strict terms of the plaintiff's obligation. This being so, under the authority of the cases above cited, and especially of the case of Sargent v. Shumaker, supra, we are constrained to uphold the findings and judgment of the trial court.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HEINRICH. (Cr. 1049.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 6, 1924. Rehearing Denied March 6, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 3, 1924.)

1. False pretenses §49(1)—Attempt to commit grand larceny by fraudulent statements held shown.

Evidence held sufficient to show an attempt to commit grand larceny by false and fraudulent statements made to induce prosecuting witness to give defendant cash security for faithful performance of duties as superintendent of ranches which defendant neither owned nor controlled.

2. Criminal law §44—Proof necessary to establish attempt to commit crime stated.

To bring a case within a statute concerning an attempt to commit a crime it is sufficient that preparations therefor were followed by some overt act offering a prospect of successful accomplishment of the crime if not interrupted.

3. False pretenses §21—That check given fictitious held no defense to prosecution for attempt to commit larceny by fraudulent statements.

That a check given by prosecuting witness to defendant as cash security for faithful performance of duties as superintendent of property, which defendant neither owned nor controlled, was fictitious, held no defense to a prosecution for attempt to commit grand larceny by fraudulent statements.

4. Criminal law §370, 371(3), 372(9)—Evidence of similar false representations to others held admissible in prosecution for attempt to commit larceny by fraudulent statements.

In a prosecution for attempt to commit grand larceny by making false representations to induce prosecuting witness to give cash security for performance of duties as superintendent of property, which defendant neither owned nor controlled, evidence of similar representations by defendant to others held admissible to prove guilty knowledge, intent, and system.

5. Criminal law §1173(2)—Refusal to instruct that certain issue did not arise, there being no contention that it did, held not prejudicial error.

In an action for attempt to commit grand larceny by fraudulent representations made to induce prosecuting witness to give cash security for performance of duties as superintendent of property, which defendant neither owned nor controlled, refusal to instruct that defendant was not charged with attempted larceny of a check which prosecuting witness gave him held not prejudicial error, where it was not contended that larceny of the check rather than attempted larceny of the amount thereof was the gravamen of the offense.

6. Criminal law §829(1)—Refusal of instruction substantially covered by instructions given held harmless.

Refusal to instruct, in the language of Pen. Code, § 20, that "in every crime or public offense there must exist a union, or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence" held harmless, where the substance thereof was adequately covered by other instructions.

7. Criminal law §770(2)—Instructions on immaterial matter properly refused.

Instructions on an immaterial matter are properly refused.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

C. A. Heinrich was convicted of attempt to commit grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

George Appell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was charged by indictment with an attempt to commit grand larceny. From a judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for new trial, defendant has appealed to this court.

In brief the evidence shows that defendant advertised in a newspaper for a superintendent to take charge of a large ranch at a salary of $350 per month and a percentage of the income from the ranch, and requiring that such superintendent deposit with defendant a cash bond. A Mr. Crandell, who was a detective in the office of the district attorney, answered the advertisement. Later Mr. Crandell met defendant, and had a conversation with him regarding the proposed employment, in which conversation defendant informed Mr. Crandell that he had a large estate in Mexico, consisting of several small ranches, on each of which a foreman was employed; that the position offered was that of a superintendent who would have charge of all the foremen and handle the wages of the employees, and that it would be necessary that Crandell put up a cash bond in the sum of $5,000, or that in lieu of cash he might take a Mexican surety bond. Defendant also told Crandell that the land was owned by a London syndicate, of which a Mr. Totten was president. At a later date Crandell again met defendant and delivered to him a check in the sum of $5,000, which check was fictitious as to the drawer thereof as well as the bank upon which it purported to be drawn. At the same time an agreement relative to the employment and covering the receipt and disposition of the $5,000 was executed and delivered as between the parties. The evidence further showed that defendant was possessed of an apparently, genuine agreement giving him the right to purchase approximately 70,000 hectares of land in Mexico, together with "the machinery and the utensils for agriculture, the cattle, the personal and movable property, buildings, wells, improvements of all kinds, and so forth, for the price of one million pesos."

After defendant had been arrested, he made a statement, in the nature of an admission, to a deputy district attorney to the effect that the property had been purchased by the British Land & Packing Company, and that defendant was a general manager of the property; that no deed had been actually received, but that $350,000 had been paid in escrow on account of the purchase. The secretary of the abstract company with which the alleged escrow was made testified regarding same and the deposit made therein by A. R. Totten of one check for $250,000 drawn on a bank in Chicago, which check, when cashed under certain conditions in the escrow specified, was to be used as a loan, and was to be secured by a second mortgage on certain properties in Mexico identified as including at least a part of the property which defendant had agreed to purchase. He also testified to the receipt by the abstract company of another check for the sum of $100,000, which, according to the instructions accompanying same, was required to complete the $350,000 escrow, which sum was to be held subject to the order of C. A. Heinrich, and to apply on the purchase of the ranches La Labor, Majarros, and San Leonel, containing 180,000 acres of land, more or less, and situated near the city of Tepic in the state of Nayarit, republic of Mexico. The abstract company was further instructed to forward said $350,000 to such bank or company in Mexico as was thereafter designated by said C. A. Heinrich.

It was shown by the vice president of the bank upon which these checks were drawn that the drawer of the checks never had any funds or deposit in such bank. Evidence was also introduced to show that defendant had negotiated with three other men regarding their proposed employment as superintendent, and that defendant had made statements to them similar to those which he made to Crandell.

[1] It is contended by appellant that the evidence does not prove that any crime was attempted to be committed. In that connection it will be observed that a so-called trust agreement and a set of "by-laws," each of which was signed by Totten, defendant, and another person named P. R. Heinrich, and a power of attorney from Totten to defendant, were also introduced in evidence, all of which tended to show the association and the relationship existing between Totten and defendant with reference to the Mexican properties. A reading of these several instruments, together with the other documents introduced in evidence, demonstrates that the "British syndicate," which defendant stated was the owner of the Mexican property, was composed wholly of Totten, defendant, and the other Heinrich, and that not a single dollar had ever been paid by either defendant or the "syndicate" on account of the purchase price of the Mexican ranchos. The foundation for the employment of Crandell by defendant as the pretended manager of the properties was entirely wanting. The statements made by defendant to Crandell with reference thereto were false and fraudulent, and were held out to Crandell for the purpose of inducing him to give to defendant the sum of $5,000 as security for the faithful performance of his duties as superintendent of the property which defendant neither owned nor controlled.

[2, 3] Defendant raises the point that, because the check given by Crandell to defendant was fictitious, no crime was committed nor attempted to be committed, for the reason that the check itself was of no value; but the offense did not consist in the mere taking of the check. The offense was that defendant attempted to feloniously take $5,000 from Crandell, and the fact that the check which was supposed to represent and to be good for that amount was of no value is of no materiality in that connection. The attempt to commit the crime had been made before the fictitious check had been delivered to defendant; all the preliminary preparations for consummating the act had taken place long before that time had arrived. The option on the land had been secured, the trust agreement, by-laws, power of attorney, escrow instructions, and the two bogus checks deposited with the abstract company had all been executed in advance of any overt act toward the perpetration of the fraud. Then came the newspaper advertisement, followed by the several conversations containing the misrepresentations by defendant to Crandell, and, as a finality, the execution and delivery of the contract of employment and the delivery of the fictitious check of $5,000 to defendant. In the case of People v. Stites, 75 Cal. 570, 17 Pac. 693, acts of the defendant with reference to an attempt to commit a criminal offense were far from being as complete comparatively as were the acts of the defendant here, and yet they were held sufficient. The ruling in the case of People v. Mann, 113 Cal. 76, 45 Pac. 182, wherein the facts as to the overt act were slight as compared to the evidence thereof in the instant case, is that, where an unsuccessful effort is made by a defendant in pursuance of a preconceived plan to wrongfully deprive another person of money, the objection that the scheme failed of accomplishment constitutes no defense. In the case of People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 256, 205 Pac. 435, 24 A. L. R. 1383, preparation, followed by an attempt to get possession of money, was held sufficient. To the same effect are People v. Paluma, 18 Cal. App. 131, 122 Pac. 431, and People v. Vaughn, 25 Cal. App. 738, 147 Pac. 116, 117. All that is necessary to bring a given case within the meaning and intent of the statute concerning an attempt to commit a criminal offense is that preparations therefor shall be followed by some overt act which, if not interrupted, offers a prospect of successful accomplishment of the crime. As is said in People v. Vaughn, 25 Cal. App. 738, 147 Pac. 116:

"The fact that she was prevented from the commission of the crime by any circumstances whatever does not alter the situation; and if upon the completion of the transaction she would have been guilty of the crime of grand larceny by trick and device, then we are of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury implied from their verdict that she was guilty of an attempt to commit grand larceny by the same means."

And again, in People v. Stites, 75 Cal. 576, 17 Pac. 696, quoting the language of Blackburn, J., in an English case:

"If the actual transaction has commenced which would have ended the crime if not interrupted, there is clearly an attempt to commit the crime."

The fact that it was an impossibility to commit the intended crime by reason of the fact that the check was valueless is no defense to the charge of attempt to commit grand larceny. It has been held that—

"An attempt to pick one's pocket or to steal from his person, when he has nothing in his pocket or on his person, completes the offense to the same degree as if he had money or other personal property which could be the subject of larceny." People v. Lee Kong, 95 Cal. 668, 30 Pac. 801, 17 L. R. A. 626, 29 Am. St. Rep. 165, citing State v. Wilson, 30 Conn. 500; Commonwealth v. McDonald, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 365; People v. Jones, 46 Mich. 441, 9 N. W. 486; People v. Moran, 123 N. Y. 254, 25 N. E. 412, 10 L. R. A. 109, 20 Am. St. Rep. 732.

In the case of People v. Arberry, 13 Cal. App. 749, 114 Pac. 411, it is held that one who attempted to obtain money by false pretenses was guilty of an attempt, although his intended victim had no money; and the case entitled In re Magidson, 32 Cal. App. 566, 163 Pac. 689, is authority to the effect that a defendant was guilty of an attempt to receive stolen goods, although the property was discovered by the police, removed from its place of secretion, and returned to the owner of the property before the defendant reached it.

[4] Over the objection of defendant evidence was admitted to the effect that to other persons defendant had made representations similar in many respects to those made by defendant to Crandell. The rule in this state is well established that in analogous cases such evidence is admissible for the purpose of proving guilty knowledge, intent, and system. People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 476, 98 Pac. 194; People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 275, 5 Pac. 240; People v. Cory, 26 Cal. App. 735, 148 Pac. 532; People v. Eddards, 25 Cal. App. 660, 145 Pac. 173.

[5] Defendant offered an instruction beginning with the following statement: "You are instructed that the defendant is not herein charged with the attempted larceny of a check, but charged with the attempted larceny of $5,000," and defendant here complains of the action of the trial court in refusing to give that part of the instruction which referred to the fact that defendant was "not herein charged with the attempted larceny of a check". As heretofore stated, the larceny of the check itself was not the gravamen of the offense. Apparently no one connected with the case made any contention otherwise. We are unable to perceive just how a failure to state that particular fact to the jury could have harmed defendant any more than a failure to state to the jury many other facts not pertinent to the cause could in any wise have prejudiced defendant's case. It was defendant's proposed instruction, and he here admits that as given it correctly stated the law.

Complaint is also made that certain instructions are conflicting; but upon examination of them this court is unable to agree with counsel for defendant in that regard.

[6] It is also contended that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury an instruction in the language of section 20 of the Penal Code, requested by defendant, that "in every crime or public offense there must exist a union, or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence." While the giving of such instruction would not have been error, the substance of the proposed instruction was adequately covered by other instructions given to the jury; hence defendant was in no wise harmed by the action of the court in that connection.

[7] Appellant further predicates error upon the refusal of the court to give, at defendant's request, several other instructions. Each of them has to do with what this court has heretofore indicated in its opinion is an immaterial matter; that is, the bearing that the fictitious check for $5,000 has upon the ultimate question of defendant's intent to steal that sum of money. The attempt was not to steal the check itself, but was to steal $5,000. Whether the check was good or bad is of no consequence; hence the instructions offered in connection with that feature of the case were properly refused.

So far as this court is able to determine, every feature of the case was fully and fairly covered by instructions given to the jury. No prejudicial error appearing, it is ordered that the judgment and the order denying the motion for new trial be and the same are affirmed.

STRADLEY v. TOUT et al. (Civ. 3947.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 8, 1924.)

1. Pledges ⇐58(1)—Pledgee of promissory note cannot sue pledgor as guarantor.

Civ. Code, § 3108, providing that a holder having a lien on a negotiable instrument is deemed a holder for value to the extent of his lien, limits such holder's right to the extent of his lien, and does not create a new right, and is not inconsistent with and does not repeal section 2888, providing that no title to property subject to a lien is transferred by the lien, notwithstanding an agreement to the contrary, and the rule that a pledgee of a note cannot sue pledgor as guarantor is therefore unchanged, notwithstanding section 3138.

2. Bills and notes ⇐357—Pledgee of note held entitled to enforce payment against indorser prior to pledgor.

Under Civ. Code, § 3138, providing that a holder in due course may enforce payment on the instrument against all parties liable thereon, a pledgee of a note is the holder for value and in due course as respects indorsers prior to pledgor, and, in the absence of knowledge that such a prior indorser was owner of one-half the note, pledgee was entitled to enforce payment against him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by L. J. Stradley, doing business as the Stradley Grocery Company, against Hugh B. Tout, Charles C. Albert, and Y. C. Valencia. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant first named, and in favor of defendants last named, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Wesley Grijalva, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Plaintiff instituted this action against the defendants to recover the amount due on a promissory note, executed by defendant Tout, and indorsed and payment thereof guaranteed by defendants Albert and Valencia. The defendant Tout failed to appear in the action, and judgment by default was rendered against him for the full amount of the note. The court refused to give judgment against either of the defendants Albert or Valencia, but rendered judgment in their favor; that is, a judgment that plaintiff take nothing against either of said defendants. The appeal is taken by plaintiff on the judgment roll only, and from only that part of said judgment in favor of the defendants Albert and Valencia. The findings show that the note was executed by Tout in favor of Albert, who, prior to its maturity, indorsed the note to Valencia without consideration, and for the purpose of collection. Valencia, before its maturity, indorsed the note and delivered it to plaintiff as security for the payment by said Valencia of groceries purchased and to be purchased by Valencia from the plaintiff. The amount due plaintiff on this grocery account the court found was $1,851.75. The court further found that the amount due on the note was $2,000 principal, $151.20 interest, and $200 attorney's fees, for which amounts the court gave judgment in plaintiff's favor against defendant Tout, and further provided that plaintiff, after paying himself the amount found due him, should pay the balance, if any remaining in his hands, to Valencia and Albert. The court found that, although the note was executed in favor of Albert, at all times Albert and Valencia each owned one-half of said note, but that plaintiff had no knowledge of the ownership of the one-half of said note by the defendant Albert.

[1] It is the contention of plaintiff that the findings show that he was the bona fide holder of the note sued on in due course under the so-called Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law, that he held the note as pledgee, and that he had the right to enforce payment thereof from all parties liable thereon, including Albert and Valencia, and to apply the proceeds upon the indebtedness owing to him by Valencia, and that the court therefore erred in granting judgment in favor of the defendants Albert and Valencia.

Reliance is placed by plaintiff, in support of his contention, upon two sections of the Civil Code which were adopted in 1917, at the time of the enactment of the so-called Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law. Said sections are a part of said law and are as follows:

"Sec. 3108. Where the holder has a lien on the instrument, arising either from contract or by implication of law, he is deemed a holder for value to the extent of his lien."

"Sec. 3138. A holder in due course holds the instrument free from any defect of title of prior parties, and free from defenses available to prior parties among themselves, and may enforce payment of the instrument for the full amount thereof against all parties liable thereon."

Plaintiff concedes that prior to the enactment of the above sections of the Code the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state were adverse to his contention, at least in so far as the defendant Valencia is concerned. In the case of Sparks v. Caldwell, 157 Cal. 401, 108 Pac. 276, the Supreme Court stated that:

"The one question presented is whether or not a pledgee can sue a pledgor as guarantor of a collateral security in the nature of a negotiable instrument."

It was held that no such action could be maintained, for the reason that the title to the pledged security was still in the pledgor, and that by his indorsement thereof to the pledgee, even when such indorsement contained (as it does in the present case) an express guaranty for the payment of this pledged security, he only gave to the pledgee authority to collect the amount due from the maker of the pledged security, and to apply such sum to the payment of his own debt. The court held that this was so by virtue of section 2888 of the Civil Code, which provides that—

"Notwithstanding an agreement to the contrary, a lien, or a contract for a lien, transfers no title to the property subject to the lien."

Plaintiff contends that section 2888 is inconsistent with the provisions of 3108 of the Civil Code, and that, as the latter section was enacted long subsequent to the adoption of section 2888, it repealed the latter section by implication. We are unable to agree with plaintiff in his contention that the terms of these two sections are inconsistent with each other. Section 2888 provides simply that no title to property, subject to a lien, is transferred by a lien or by a contract for a lien, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary. Section 3108 provides that where the holder has a lien on a negotiable instrument he is deemed a holder for value to the extent of his lien. Nothing is said in said section 3108 about any transfer of any title to the instrument from the owner thereof to the owner of the lien. By the very terms of this section, the owner of the lien is limited in his right over the pledged instrument, to the extent of his lien. This clearly implies that he is not the owner of such instrument, but that he holds the same simply as security for the payment of his debt. No new right was created in favor of a holder for value of a negotiable instrument, pledged to him as security, by the enactment of section 3108. Prior to the adoption of this section, an indorsee of a negotiable instrument merely as collateral security for a debt (even though it be a pre-existing debt) owing to him by his indorsee, took the instrument free from all equities that might exist against the indorser of which the indorsee had no notice (Ponce v. McElvy, 47 Cal. 154; Griswold v. Morrison, 53 Cal. App. 93, 200 Pac. 62), and he could proceed to collect the same and apply the proceeds thereof on his own debt. He could not, however, as we have already seen, recover against his immediate indorser. Sparks v. Caldwell, supra.

Nor is appellant supported in his claim for a judgment against defendant Valencia by the provisions of section 3138 of the Civil Code. It is true that by the terms of this section "a holder in due course" (and plaintiff is such a party) "may enforce payment of the instrument * * * against all parties liable thereon," but we have already seen that Valencia is not one of the parties liable for the payment of the instrument. Therefore no right is given plaintiff by this section to recover against him. The judgment, therefore, in favor of defendant Valencia, the pledgor of said note, was correct and should be affirmed.

[2] The defendant Albert occupies a different position, however. At the time plaintiff acquired the note from Valencia the name of defendant Albert appeared thereon as an indorser and guarantor. While the court found that he was the owner of one-half of said note, it further found that plaintiff had no knowledge of such ownership at the time he acquired the note. The plaintiff was therefore, as far as the defendant Albert was concerned, a holder for value and in due course of business. He held it free from any defects of title of any prior party thereto, and free from any and all defenses available to any prior party, and was entitled to enforce payment against all parties liable thereon, which included the defendant Albert. Section 3138, Civ. Code. The trial court therefore erred in granting judgment in favor of defendant Albert in so far as plaintiff's right to collect said note is concerned. The defendant Albert is liable for the payment of said promissory note, and judgment should be entered against him for the amount due thereon.

That part of said judgment in favor of defendant Valencia is affirmed, but that part of said judgment in favor of defendant Albert is reversed, with directions to the trial court to modify said judgment by causing judgment to be entered against said defendant Albert for the amount found to be due on said promissory note.

PEOPLE v. FROEHLICH. (Cr. 1036.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 4, 1924.)

1. Larceny $\S$ 65—Conviction of grand larceny held sustained by evidence.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of grand larceny by theft of an automobile.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1159(5)—Defendant's testimony in explanation of possession of stolen property held insufficient to authorize reversal.

That defendant, in a prosecution for grand larceny, testified to such circumstances attending his possession of the stolen property as would have removed the inference of guilt, held insufficient to authorize reversal, in view of his prior contradictory statements and the unreasonableness of his story, the truth or falsity of which was for the jury.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 823(9)—Instruction as to effect of defendant's failure to satisfactorily account for possession of stolen property held not reversible error.

In a grand larceny prosecution, an instruction that defendant's failure to "satisfactorily" account for his possession of the stolen property was a circumstance tending to show his guilt held not misleading, or ground for new trial under Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½, as resulting in a miscarriage of justice, in view of an instruction that defendant could not be convicted, unless the jury were convinced beyond all reasonable doubt that he was guilty of the crime charged.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 945(1)—Denial of new trial because of newly discovered evidence not of character to change result not disturbed.

Unless newly discovered evidence is such as to make it manifest that the case would or should result differently on new trial, the trial court's order denying the motion therefor based on such ground will not be disturbed.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 958(6)—Affidavit in support of motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence held insufficient.

An affidavit in support of a motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence that certain witnesses would testify as to giving defendant a ride in an automobile to a certain city on the day he was accused of having stolen a car therein, and that he was in and about a certain poolroom at and after the time the car was stolen, held insufficient, in view of the conceded facts of his arrival there on such day and his presence in the poolroom before the car was stolen, and the sheriff's testimony as to his inability to locate and subpoena the only witness who could testify as to defendant's presence at the poolroom at or after the time the car was stolen.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. J. Norton, Judge.

J. F. Froehlich was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

John R. Stowe, of San Luis Obispo, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. The appellant, with two others, Clyde T. Phillips and Charles E. King, were charged with the crime of grand larceny in the theft of an automobile. The defendant Froehlich was separately tried. He was convicted by a jury, and from a judgment sentencing him to imprisonment in the state's prison and an order denying a motion for a new trial, an appeal has been taken. The automobile, which the appellant was charged with stealing, was owned by W. F. Wickham and was left by him standing in front of the Hot Springs Hotel at Paso Robles, San Luis Obispo county, at about half past 9 o'clock of the evening of February 2, 1923. In about 15 minutes thereafter the owner returned to the place where he had left his machine and it was gone. It was found at about half past 7 o'clock on the night of February 4, 1923, in the city of Los Angeles, at which time it was being driven by the defendant Phillips, who, with the appellant and defendant King, was riding in the front seat of the machine. The three defendants were taken in custody by the police of the city of Los Angeles, and thereafter turned over to the authorities of San Luis Obispo county.

The car was a new one and bore no number plates, there being simply an application for a license on the windshield. It was equipped with a bumper in front, a set of side wings, a sun visor, and motometer. When it was recovered by the authorities in Los Angeles, the application for license was gone from the windshield and two 1922 license plates had been put on the car. The side wings, sun visor, and bumper had been removed from the car. The bumper was afterwards recovered at Norwalk, about 18 miles southeast of Los Angeles.

The defendants, Phillips and King, did not testify at the trial. The appellant took the stand in his own behalf and testified that he, with King and Phillips, was in Paso Robles on the night of the theft of the automobile, and that a man by the name of Wilkins employed Phillips to drive the stolen machine from Paso Robles to San Diego, and that Phillips had asked appellant and King to ride with him on the trip; that the three then got into the machine, which was standing in front of the Alexander Hotel, a short distance from the Hot Springs Hotel, and they drove from Paso Robles to Bakersfield and then down to Los Angeles, where they arrived on the morning of the 3d of February. From Los Angeles they drove to Norwalk, where Phillips put the 1922 number plates on the car and left the bumper. They drove around Norwalk and Santa Fé Springs and into Los Angeles once, and possibly twice, before they were arrested on the evening of February 4th.

While the defendants were in the custody of the officers, a number of conversations were held between them and the officers. James H. Shafer, one of the officers who made the arrest, testified as follows:

"I went out of the room again and brought the defendant and King into the room where Officer Boycott and Phillips were. Phillips says, in the presence of the defendant and King, 'You mean to say that you wasn't with me when we got this automobile?' and Froehlich didn't say nothing, just kind of stood there, this man there, Froehlich, I guess it is. 'Didn't you and King and myself go out of the poolroom in Paso Robles and walk around the block looking for a car, and you said, "Here is a car, let's take this one," and we got into that car and drove it south.' When he didn't deny that statement, then I immediately said, 'Let's all of us go to the jail.' I hadn't intended that day to put these two fellows in jail because I had nothing against them, and when he said that, 'Isn't that the truth, that you went with me, you two boys went with me and you picked this car out and you said, "There is a car that looks all right, we can drive that one," and we drove it together,' then I took them over to the station and locked them up. Q. Did the defendant here at any time deny the statement made by Phillips? A. No, sir. Q. Did he, himself, make any further statement? A. No, sir; he did not. I might correct that. Later at the sheriff's office, whether it was Froehlich or King I don't know. They were practically together within a radius of five feet. One of them made the statement: 'Well, I guess you got it on us.' That is all that was said."

Officer Boycott, who was also present at this conversation, testified that it was Froehlich who made the remark, "Well, I guess you got it on us." This officer also testified that while all three of the defendants were present they told him that they met in a poolroom at Paso Robles; that they wanted to go south, but did not know how to get there and did not want to walk; that they went out to find a car to ride down in, and they came upon the Wickham car in front of the big hotel in Paso Robles; that they took this car and started out, and they told him they were going to Mexico; and that Phillips and Froehlich took turns in driving the car, as King was not able to drive. According to the testimony of this officer, Froehlich first told him that "Phillips came along in the car between Paso Robles and here (Los Angeles), and they never saw him before, and he asked them if they did not want to ride."

The testimony further shows that neither the appellant nor any of the defendants had ever seen the man Wilkins before the night the machine was stolen, nor had any of them ever heard of him since that time; that a subpoena for Wilkins to attend the trial had been issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff for service. The sheriff testified at the trial that he not only searched for Wilkins in San Luis Obispo county, but that he also had officers search for him in the cities of San Francisco, Oakland, Los Angeles, and San Diego, and that he published a notice in the San Francisco Examiner asking for information in regard to Wilkins, but that he had never been able to find Wilkins, nor had he received any information whatever regarding him.

[1, 2] In view of the foregoing statement of facts, it is difficult to understand how the contention can seriously be made that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment, yet this appears to be the main ground advanced by appellant for a reversal of the judgment. The evidence unquestionably shows that the automobile was stolen. The testimony of the owner upon this point was clear and complete and uncontradicted. The evidence is equally satisfactory that the defendant was found riding in the machine with the two other defendants two days after the theft, many miles away from the place where the machine was stolen. In addition to these facts, we have the testimony of the officer Boycott that when all three defendants were present they told him that they met in a poolroom at Paso Robles; that they wanted to go south, and that they did not want to walk; that they went out and found this car, got in it, and drove away. And furthermore, after the appellant and King had made the statement to the officers in Los Angeles that they were picked up on the highway between Paso Robles and Los Angeles and given a ride by Phillips, the latter accused them, in the presence of the officers, of going with him and picking out the car which was stolen and that the three got into the car and drove away with it, and neither appellant nor King made any denial of this accusation, nor said anything in reply thereto, except that the appellant did say, "Well, I guess you got it on us." This evidence unquestionably justified the jury in rendering the verdict of guilty, and was sufficient to support the judgment of conviction. This evidence was all before the court at the time appellant made his motion to advise the jury to acquit, and justified the court in denying said motion. It is true the appellant took the stand and told a story, which, if believed by the jury, would have entitled him to a verdict in his favor; but it was for the jury to pass upon the truth or falsity of his statement, and by rendering a verdict adverse to him it is plain that they considered his story a fabrication. It was contradicted by statements that he had previously made to the officers and was so unreal and unreasonable that we would have been surprised had any intelligent jury placed any reliance in it. We think the following language used by the Supreme Court in the case of People v. Luchetti, 119 Cal.

501, 51 Pac. 707, is applicable to the case before us:

"Appellant contends that having given a reasonable account of the circumstances attending his possession of the cow, that it removes the inference of guilt, and that therefore the verdict should have been in his favor. But whether the account he gave was either true or reasonable was for the jury to determine, and in such case we cannot disturb the verdict, unless we can say that his explanation of his possession was so clearly and evidently true that the opposite conclusion could only be reached by a jury under the influence of passion or prejudice. We think the jury rightly concluded that his story was fabricated and, therefore, that he was guilty of the larceny."

[3] The appellant further complains of the giving of the following instruction:

"If the jury believe from the evidence the property was stolen and was seen in the possession of the defendant shortly after being stolen, the failure of the defendant to satisfactorily account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained is a circumstance tending to show his guilt of the alleged larceny, and the accused are bound to explain the possession in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered with other facts tending to establish guilt if the evidence discloses any such."

This instruction in all material respects is the same as that approved in the case of People v. Alba, 52 Cal. App. 603-608, 199 Pac. 894, and the authorities therein cited, with the exception that instead of the words "the failure of the defendant to satisfactorily account for such possession," the instruction approved in People v. Alba, supra, contained the words "the failure of the defendant to account for such possession." Appellant contends that by the use of the word "satisfactorily," in this instruction, the court committed an error prejudicial to his rights.

In People v. Roberts, 122 Cal. 377, 378, 55 Pac. 137, 138, the court said:

"When a jury is told that any particular fact must be established to their satisfaction, such statement can only mean that such fact must be established at least by a preponderance of evidence; yet there is no such burden cast upon a defendant charged with a crime, except in certain particular instances which are in no sense presented here."

The Supreme Court reversed this case on account of the erroneous statement of law by the court in such instruction. In view, however, of the fact that in the present action the court further instructed the jury that the burden of proof was upon the prosecution and that the defendant was entitled to the benefit of any reasonable doubt and could not be convicted unless the jury were convinced by the evidence in the case beyond all reasonable doubt that he was guilty of the crime charged, we are of the opinion that the jury were not misled by the instruction complained of. Besides, the case of People v. Roberts, supra, was decided before the adoption of section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution, by the well-known provisions of which courts are directed not to set aside any judgment or grant any new trial on the ground of the misdirection of the jury unless, after an examination of the entire cause, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. We are satisfied that the evidence in this case was amply sufficient to establish the guilt of the defendant beyond all reasonable doubt, and that if the court erred in giving the instruction complained of, that the jury was not misled thereby, nor did any miscarriage of justice result therefrom.

[4, 5] Among the grounds upon which appellant based his motion for a new trial was that of newly discovered evidence. Appellant filed an affidavit, sworn to by himself, in support of this ground of his motion. The affidavit in brief states that the appellant was in the county jail of San Luis Obispo county from the time of his arrest up to the time of his trial; that he was a stranger in said county and was without the financial means necessary for him to make a search for certain witnesses, who, if produced, would have testified in his favor, and that said witnesses were not present at the trial for that reason; that since his conviction he had procured funds sufficient to enable him to make a search for said witnesses, and if granted a new trial he would be able to procure said witnesses and have the benefit of their testimony upon a second trial. One of these witnesses, the affidavit sets forth, would testify that he gave appellant a ride from San Ardo to Paso Robles, in an automobile, on the day that appellant was accused of stealing the machine in question; and that the other of said witnesses would testify that appellant, was on the same night, in and about the poolroom at, and after, the time the automobile was stolen.

We question very seriously whether this evidence, if it should be produced at a subsequent trial, would materially assist appellant in his defense. Unless such evidence is of a character as to make it manifest that the case would, or should, result differently on a new trial, the order of the trial court denying the motion will not be disturbed. People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1-4, 78 Pac. 235. The testimony of the witness that he gave appellant a ride into Paso Robles on the day the automobile was stolen would not have had any material bearing on the case. All the parties conceded that appellant arrived there on that day, and the particular means employed by him in traveling would not, we believe, have had any great weight with the jury in determining whether he was guilty or innocent of the offense with which he was charged. Nor is there any dispute as to the presence of appellant in the poolroom, before the automobile was stolen, so witnesses testifying to this fact could not perceptibly aid defendant. Evidence that he was in the poolroom at and after the machine was stolen might be of material assistance to the defendant. Appellant testified fully as to his presence in the poolroom on the various occasions of the night the car was stolen, and from his testimony the only person that could possibly testify to the fact that the defendant was there at, or after, the time the machine was stolen, was the mysterious and elusive individual, known to the appellant and his codefendants as "Wilkins," but defendant's affidavit failed to show any fact upon which the court could reasonably base a belief that the appellant could secure the attendance of Wilkins at the trial, no matter how long a continuance might be granted. The testimony of the sheriff of San Luis Obispo county showed that he had been exceedingly diligent in his efforts to locate Wilkins and to subpoena him as a witness at the trial; but, as we have heretofore seen, he was unsuccessful in these efforts. From the showing made by the appellant in his affidavit, there is no reasonable probability that the appellant could succeed where the sheriff had failed. Therefore we are unable to see how the appellant, if granted a new trial, can expect any material assistance from any of the witnesses referred to in his affidavit. Neither do we believe from the showing made by appellant that the result of a new trial would be any different from that already held.

For this reason we are of the opinion that the trial court properly denied the motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence as well as upon all other grounds upon which it is based.

The judgment and order denying appellant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

HAIGH et al. v. HILL et al. (Civ. 4181.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 6, 1924.)

1. Evidence $\S$ 265(5)—Evidence held to show driver of automobile acted as agent of father.

As under Motor Vehicle Act, $\S$ 8, as amended by St. 1917, p. 391, $\S$ 7, a transfer of ownership of an automobile was not complete until transferee had received the certificate of registration and written her name thereon, where, in action for injuries from negligent operation of automobile driven by the daughter of defendant, who was passenger therein, the daughter stated that her father had given her the car but that it was registered in his name, admission by defendant that they were not going to make any point of technical ownership justified the inference that the driver was acting as defendant's agent.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1056(1)—Error, if any, in sustaining objection to question not prejudicial.

In action for injuries from negligent operation of an automobile driven by the daughter of the owner, who was a passenger therein, any error in excluding a question to defendant as to whether he exercised any control or operation over the automobile as a conclusion was not prejudicial, since the question could have been restated in such manner as to draw from witness the desired testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by George H. Haigh and another against C. F. Hill and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Paul Blackwood, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In this action plaintiffs recovered judgment against the defendants in a sum awarded as damages for personal injuries received by Mrs. Haigh, resulting from alleged negligence in the operation of an automobile. The appeal is by defendant C. F. Hill alone. He raises no question challenging the amount of the judgment. The only claim presented by appellant is that as to him the judgment should be reversed because the proved facts did not establish any liability on his part for the negligence of his codefendant, and because the court erred in a ruling upon evidence relating to facts upon which his liability depends.

The complaint contained no direct statement concerning the ownership of the automobile. It merely alleged that "the defendants and each of them, their servants, agents, and employees," operated and ran the automobile in such a careless and negligent manner that it caused the same to collide with Mrs. Haigh, whereby the stated injuries were inflicted upon her. The defendant Ruth Hill is the daughter of appellant, and at the time of the accident July 14, 1921, her age was 21 years. In his answer, appellant denied that at the time and place of the collision "this defendant or his servants or agents or employees operated or ran an automobile in such a or any careless or negligent manner as to cause same to collide with plaintiff or throw her violently or otherwise or at all to the pavement," etc. He further pleaded contributory negligence of Mrs. Haigh, and in that connection alleged that the defendant Ruth Hill "was at said time operating her said automobile in a careful and prudent manner," etc. He further alleged that at said time he was exercising ordinary care, caution, and prudence in the premises, and was then and there a guest of defendant Ruth Hill.

[1] Counsel for appellant concedes that, if ownership of the automobile by appellant C. F. Hill had been alleged in the complaint and not denied, then it would appear prima facie that Ruth Hill was his agent, but contends that the obverse of this condition is here presented.

At the time of the accident Ruth Hill was driving the car. The only other persons in the car were Mrs. Hill, who was sitting at the right of Ruth Hill on the front seat of the car, and appellant, who was occupying a place in the rear seat.

Plaintiffs proceeding under the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure examined defendant Ruth Hill as an adverse witness. In response to a question she stated that she owned the car. Responding to further questions she stated that her father had bought the car and in March, 1920, had given it to her; that on renewing the license for this car in 1921 she had caused it to be registered again in his name, as it had been during all of 1920. At this point in the examination the attorney for defendants interfered, with the statement that "we are not going to make any point of the technical ownership of the car," although he further stated that, if plaintiffs insisted on going into that matter, he could and would prove that Mr. Hill had given to Ruth Hill a bill of sale of this car. Plaintiffs' attorney later stated that he would like to again offer evidence in proof of ownership of the automobile; but he was not permitted so to do. The offer was very informal and amounts to nothing.

The "Vehicle Act" in force at the time of this accident, in section 8 thereof (St. 1917, p. 391), referring to transfer of ownership of automobiles, provided for notice to the motor vehicle department of the state, of the fact of any such transfer, and for the issuance of new registration certificates.

"Until said transferee has received said certificate of registration and has written his name upon the face thereof in the blank space provided for said purpose by the department, delivery of said motor vehicle shall be deemed not to have been made and title thereto shall be deemed not to have passed and said intended transfer shall be deemed to be incomplete and not to be valid or effective for any purpose."

It is manifest that at the time when the attorney for the defendants interrupted the examination of the witness Ruth Hill by making the statement that "we are not going to make any point of the technical ownership of the car," it was understood by the court that this was intended as an admission that (notwithstanding the existence of the said bill of sale) he was admitting that the legal ownership of the car remained vested in the defendant C. F. Hill. We think that the facts last above stated are a sufficient reply to appellant's claim wherein he contends that there is no evidence to justify the court's finding "that this defendant, C. F. Hill, either drove, operated, or ran said automobile at said time and place, either personally or by any duly authorized agent." The fact being established that appellant was the owner of the car and was actually riding therein, the additional fact that another person was operating the machine, under the circumstances shown by the evidence, fully justified the inference that the driver was acting as the agent of the owner. A finding that he was in the car as her guest at that time would have been contrary to the evidence.

[2] While appellant was testifying in his own behalf, a ruling was made as follows:

"Q. Now, did you have or exercise any control or operation over this Dodge car on this particular evening before and immediately preceding the accident? A. No, sir.

"Mr. Blackwood: Objected to, and I think it calls for a conclusion.

"The Court: I think it does. Objection sustained. The answer is stricken out."

Appellant contends that this was a substantial error, and cites authorities in support of his proposition that the court would not have erred in overruling the objection. Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 145 Cal. 596, 79 Pac. 272; Nathan v. Dierssen, 146 Cal. 63, 79 Pac. 739; Perkins v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 155 Cal. 712, 103 Pac. 190; Majors v. Connor, 162 Cal. 131, 121 Pac. 371.

Assuming, without deciding, that under these authorities the court erred in sustaining the objection, we do not rank it as a prejudicial error. Under the ruling as made the question easily could have been restated in a manner that would have conformed to the ruling and yet would have drawn from the witness the desired testimony. Rulings of this class should not be accepted as a basis for the reversal of a judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

In a burglary prosecution, evidence of defendant's exercise of proprietary control of a stolen dress worn by a woman he was living with, and her testimony as to what he told her to say if asked where she obtained it, held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

2. Criminal law ☞407(1)—Evidence of accused's silence when incriminatory statements were read to him held admissible.

Accused's silence when statements implicating him directly or indirectly were read to him was admissible with the statements as justifying an inference of guilt, especially where later he made inculpatory statements in the presence of his accuser relating to the same subject-matter.

3. Criminal law ☞1169(2)—Admission of incriminatory statements by one testifying to practically same matters held not prejudicial error.

In a burglary prosecution, admission of a statement by a woman living with defendant as to how she acquired possession of the stolen dress held not prejudicial error in view of her testimony as to practically the same matters and her cross-examination at length.

4. Criminal law ☞721(6)—District attorney's remark that no testimony adduced against that of people held not forbidden comment on defendant's failure to testify.

In a burglary prosecution, where defendant offered no explanation of his possession of the stolen property, the district attorney's remark that "not a single piece of testimony has been brought forward here against the testimony produced on behalf of the people" did not infringe on defendant's rights or violate the statute prohibiting adverse comment on or reference to defendant's failure to testify.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Joseph McNamara was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

William F. Herron, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. T. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant was charged by information with the crime of burglary. Upon arraignment he pleaded not guilty. He was tried and convicted of the offense in the second degree. Thereafter he presented motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. These motions were denied, and he was sentenced to imprisonment for the term prescribed by law. This is an appeal from the judgment and from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

The main point relied upon for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. It appears therefrom that Mrs. Agnes Murray, the complaining witness, on the evening of March 3, 1923, at about 7 o'clock p. m., left the flat where she was living at 892 Eddy street in the city of San Francisco, and returned shortly after midnight. She then discovered that a ladder had been placed against the house, and upon investigation ascertained that her personal effects had been disturbed, and some of her clothing was missing, among which was a certain black dress. It was found in the possession of and being worn by one Grace Ford, who was living with the defendant in a room on Ellis street. Upon being questioned concerning her possession of the stolen garment the Ford woman made a written statement, which she signed. The material portions thereof are as follows:

"Statement of Grace Ford, April 2, 1923:

"My true name is Grace Ford; 23 years of age; live in Coronado Hotel, 373 Ellis street, room 411. Have lived there three or four months with Joseph H. McNamara, now charged with burglary in the city prison. I have lived off and on with McNamara for about a year and a half.

"About March 3, 1923, McNamara brought a dress to our room; it was a little after 9 o'clock in the evening. This dress was the one which Mrs. Murray identified in the Coronado Hotel lobby as hers, the one I was wearing. When McNamara brought the dress to the room he said, 'What do you think of the dress?' I said 'Swell. Give it to me.' He said, 'Give you hell.' He hung it up in the clothes closet. One morning some time later he said 'Try it on.' I did. He said, 'It looks swell on you.' He said 'Take it off.' I did. He told me if any one ever asked me when I was wearing it on the street or if it was in the room to tell them that I had bought it.

"About March 24, 1923, I visited him in the city prison. He said to me, 'I see you have the dress on.' I told him I had been down stairs with the detectives and was going to make a statement. He shrugged his shoulders and said nothing."

Subsequently this statement was read to the defendant in the presence of the Ford woman and certain police officers, at which time he refused to state whether it was true or not. Later, however, in conversing with Grace Ford in the hearing of the officers, defendant made certain statements with reference thereto, the substance of which was related by one of the officers at the trial as follows:

"McNamara said, 'Did you write them statements, Grace?' Grace said, 'No; but I had a talk with my dad, and he told me to tell the truth, which I did, and the officers wrote them down and read them, and I signed them, and you know they are true.' McNamara said, 'I just beat two raps worse than this one. So can you. Stand pat; they have nothing on us, and we will get out of this one.' Grace said 'I will not lie. I told the truth to them. It was you who got me into this jam by bringing those things to the room and giving them to me. Now you tell the truth and get me out. You know you told me to tell anybody that I bought them.'"

The Ford woman was a witness at the trial, and she testified that she had made the statement and that it was true. On cross-examination she admitted that she had declared to defendant's counsel that the statement was false, and that she had bought the dress from another woman, but on her redirect examination she again reasserted that her admission to defendant's counsel was false, and that her signed statement was true.

[1] The evidence as above narrated is all that was had at the trial; and appellant contends that it is insufficient to convict. Our attention is drawn to the fact that there is no direct evidence tending to show that defendant committed the crime charged, or that he ever had possession of the stolen article. Upon the question of possession it is argued that the authorities are uniform to the effect that the possession of recently stolen property, in order to be evidence against the accused, must be a personal and exclusive one, for the reason that such character of possession alone indicates that the goods have come to the possessor by his own act or with his consent. Accordingly it is claimed that, as the evidence does not show exclusive possession in the defendants, it is insufficient to convict.

We do not so view the evidence. The statement of the Ford woman shows that defendant brought the garment in question to the apartment where she and the defendant were living. It further shows that notwithstanding the fact that they occupied the apartment together the defendant exercised a proprietary control of the stolen garment. Moreover, under these circumstances, the jury was entitled to conclude that whatever possession the Ford woman may have had of the garment was the possession of defendant. People v. Porter and Young (Cal. App.) 220 Pac. 20. In this connection it is further contended that, even assuming the possession to have been in defendant, the mere possession of recently stolen articles is insufficient to justify a conviction.

[2] Assuming this to be true, the testimony of the Ford woman supplies additional evidence tending to establish defendant's guilt. She was told by him to say that if any one asked her where she obtained the dress to tell him that she had bought it. In addition thereto the defendant's silence when his consort's statement was read to him is a circumstance that the jury had a right to consider in determining guilt or innocence. The silence of an accused as regards statements in his hearing which implicate him directly or indirectly may be proved with the statements, and from his acquiescence the jury may infer that the statements are true and that they tend to prove his guilt. Silence is assent as well as consent, and may, where a direct and specific accusation of crime is made, be regarded as a quasi confession (Underhill on Evidence, § 122). An innocent person will ordinarily emphatically repel or deny an accusation of crime, and his silence under such circumstances will justify an inference that he is not innocent. People v. Ayhens, 16 Cal. App. 618, 117 Pac. 789; People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 482, 76 Pac. 232.

Not only did the defendant remain silent when the statement was read to him, but later, and in the presence of his accuser and the officers, he made the inculpatory statements above referred to. These were circumstances which the jury had a right to consider.

[3] We are cited to the recent case of People v. Patterson (Cal. App.) 221 Pac. 394, in support of the contention that the trial judge committed prejudicial error in allowing the statement of the Ford woman to be read to the jury. We do not deem a discussion of that case necessary. There the defendant was not confronted with the party making the accusatory statement; but, even if we assume that the admission in evidence of the statement in the instant case was error, the defendant was in no manner prejudiced thereby. The Ford woman was a witness at the trial, and she testified to practically the same matters contained in her statement, and, as heretofore shown, she was cross-examined at length, and it is not contended that her evidence was not competent or material.

[4] And, finally, it is claimed that the district attorney violated a right of defendant when he gave utterance to the remark that "not a single piece of testimony has been brought forward here against the testimony produced on behalf of the people." While a violation of the statute forbidding adverse comment upon or reference to the failure of a defendant in a criminal case to testify is inexcusable, we do not think the remark in question infringed upon the rights of the defendant or violated the rule. As no explanation was offered on behalf of defendant as to the possession of the stolen goods it was competent for the district attorney to refer to such want of explanation, since such possession unexplained was a circumstance affecting his guilt. People v. Waugh, 30 Cal. App. 402, 158 Pac. 336; People v. Miller, 45 Cal. App. 494, 188 Pac. 52.

No other questions are presented.

From what we have said it follows that the judgment and order should be, and they are hereby, affirmed.

We concur: ST. SURE, J.; SHORT, Justice pro tem.

DAVIS v. DAVIS. (Civ. 3953.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 4, 1924.)

1. Judgment ¶112—Default admits facts alleged in complaint.

By default, defendant admits the facts alleged in the complaint.

2. Husband and wife ¶296—Complaint in action for separate maintenance held sufficient.

A complaint alleging, in a wife's action for separate maintenance, that defendant was working as a plumber and asking that plaintiff be awarded "a permanent support of sufficient amount to support herself" and that the community property be assigned to the parties in such proportion as the court found just, held sufficient, though the facts known to plaintiff concerning defendant's income or earning capacity and facts showing the extent of plaintiff's need of support were not stated.

3. Husband and wife ¶4—Wife entitled to support, though not dependent on husband.

A wife is entitled to support from her husband in accordance with his station in life, though she is not dependent on him and has ample means of her own.

4. Appeal and error ¶1039(4) — Omission of allegations as to husband's income and extent of wife's need of support held not ground for reversal of decree awarding separate maintenance.

Failure of the complaint, in a wife's action for separate maintenance, to state facts known to her concerning defendant's income or earning capacity and facts showing the extent of her need of support, held not ground for reversal of a decree for her, in view of the moderate amount allowed and the court's power to modify it from time to time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thos. O. Toland, Judge.

Action by Mary L. Davis against George E. Davis. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gertrude M. Caldwell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Georgia P. Bullock, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the plaintiff obtained a decree against her husband, the defendant, whereby the defendant is ordered to pay to the plaintiff as separate maintenance for her support the sum of $50 per month. By the same decree, the court awarded to the plaintiff certain community property consisting of a house and lot described in the complaint and in the decree.

The complaint stated facts showing that the defendant had been guilty of extreme cruelty toward the plaintiff, and that at a date about two months prior to the commencement of this action, and at all times thereafter, defendant willfully and without cause deserted and abandoned the plaintiff. The complaint did not make any definite statement concerning the income or earning capacity of the defendant, other than that during the immediately preceding two years "defendant has been working as a plumber." And the complaint contained no allegation concerning the necessities of the plaintiff or the amount necessary for her support; although it was stated that the alleged acts of the defendant inflicted upon the plaintiff grievous bodily injury and grievous mental suffering, and that her health had been greatly impaired thereby. Basing her claim upon the facts above stated, plaintiff in her complaint asked "that she be awarded a permanent support of sufficient amount to support herself," and that the community property be assigned to the respective parties in such proportion as the court should find to be just. Summons and complaint were duly served upon the defendant personally. As he did not appear to defend, his default was entered, and the court proceeded to hear and determine the matter. Thereupon judgment awarding separate maintenance was entered as hereinabove stated. The defendant now appeals from the judgment.

The points presented in support of the appeal are that the complaint is fatally defective in that it contained no allegation showing the necessity for plaintiff to receive from defendant any sum whatsoever for her maintenance; that the defendant by his default admitted nothing more than the facts alleged in the complaint; that the judgment is erroneous in that it makes an allowance for attorneys' fees. As to the last point, it does not appear that such allowance was made by the judgment.

Section 137 of the Civil Code provides that when the wife has any cause of action for divorce, she may, without applying for divorce, maintain an action against him for permanent support and maintenance; and that the court, in granting the wife permanent support and maintenance of herself or of herself and children in any such action, shall make the same disposition of the community property and of the homestead, if any, as would have been made if the marriage had been dissolved by the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction. It has been held that in an action for divorce where the decree was entered by default, and the complaint contained no allegations of defendant's ability to pay alimony, it could not successfully be maintained that the portion of the judgment requiring the payment of a sum for the support of the plaintiff was void, merely because no statement of the husband's ability to pay was contained in the complaint.

"The provision for support in such cases is ordinarily an incident of the judgment of divorce; the jurisdiction of the court (which is the extent of our concern at present) to make such provision is not dependent upon averments in the complaint of the husband's resources—any more than its power to dispose of the children depends upon an allegation of the relative fitness of the parents for their custody." Gaston v. Gaston, 114 Cal. 542, 46 Pac. 609, 55 Am. St. Rep. 86; Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 99, 88 Pac. 267, 11 Ann. Cas. 520.

[1-3] While it would have been better pleading if the plaintiff in her complaint had stated the facts so far as known to her concerning the income or earning capacity of the defendant, and also facts showing the extent of the plaintiff's need of support, yet we are of the opinion that neither of these omissions furnishes a sufficient ground for reversal of the decree from which this appeal has been taken. The contents of the complaint were sufficient to inform the defendant that the plaintiff would ask the court to award her a suitable allowance, together with a separate interest in the community property. The complaint alleged that the defendant was actively engaged in the employment of his trade. By his default the defendant admitted the facts alleged. Those facts were sufficient to raise an inference that he was able to pay some amount toward the support of his wife. It is the law that every wife is entitled to demand of her husband a support in accordance with his station in life, even if she be not dependent upon him at all and although she has ample means of her own. See opinion by Supreme Court following opinion of court of appeal in Shebley v. Peters, 53 Cal. App. 288, at page 293, 200 Pac. 364, 366. The facts alleged were sufficient to state a cause of action.

[4] Considering that the amount of the allowance is apparently very moderate, and considering further that the court by law has authority to modify the amount of such allowance, from time to time as may appear to be just, it becomes very clear, notwithstanding some indefiniteness in plaintiff's pleading, that no miscarriage of justice has occurred.

The judgment is affirmed.

LARSON et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (four cases).
(S. F. 10835-10838.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 19, 1924.
Rehearing Denied and Opinion Modified April 18, 1924.)

1. Master and servant §375(1)—Compensable injury dependent on causal connection between employment and injury.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, to secure compensation, there must be a causal connection between the employment and injury, and the injury must originate in a risk connected with the employment, and flow from that source as a rational and natural consequence.

2. Master and servant §375(1) — Injuries from explosion in bunkhouse held compensable.

Where workmen on a ranch were required to accept the employer's accommodations for board and lodging, such accommodation being part of their pay, and the bunkhouse was the only place provided for that purpose or for passing time while momentarily unemployed, injuries to plaintiff employees from an explosion caused by another employer in the bunkhouse were compensable under Compensation Act.

3. Master and servant §373—Injuries from explosion caused by choreman pouring oil on bunkhouse fire held compensable.

Where plaintiff employee had finished his day's work and was waiting for supper in a bunkhouse in which the workmen were required to board and lodge, an explosion caused by a choreman throwing coal oil on bunkhouse fire, which he was hired to build, was an industrial hazard incidental to plaintiff's employment within Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6a.

4. Master and servant §375(1)—Death of ranch foreman, from explosion in bunkhouse, held compensable; "arising out of employment."

Where a ranch foreman, who lived with his family in a cottage on the ranch, sometimes ate at the bunkhouse furnished for the men, and had gone there after work to give orders to men constituting a night shift, his death from explosion caused by a choreman pouring oil on the fire "arose out of his employment" within the Compensation Act.

5. Master and servant §375(1)—Injuries to dredge operators quitting work early while waiting for supper in bunkhouse held compensable.

Where dredge operators were supposed to work until 6 o'clock and sometimes did repair work thereafter, for extra pay, but not being furnished with lights quit work on short days when it got dark, injuries to them from an explosion caused by pouring oil on a bunkhouse fire to revive it while they were waiting for supper, having quit work at 5:30, happened within their employment and were compensable under the act.

In Bank.

Four proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Walter J. Bohn for injuries, and by Mrs. Anna Stevens for herself and as guardian ad litem for Leonard Stevens, a minor, for the death of August Stevens, her husband, and by Clyde English and by Cecil Miracle, respectively, for injuries, claimants, opposed by Eric Larson, employer. From an order of the Industrial Commission granting an award in each case, the employer brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Four proceedings in certiorari were initiated in this court by the above petitioners—an employer and his insurance carrier—to annul awards made by the Industrial Accident Commission. The employer, Eric Larson, owns and operates a large grain ranch, some 8 or 10 miles from the town of Stratford in Kings county, on which he maintained bunkhouses for the comfort and accommodation of his workmen. On the evening of February 4, 1923, at about 5:30 o'clock, a number of the employees were in one of these bunkhouses, in which a fire was burning in a wood stove used for heating the place. For the purpose of reviving the fire, the camp choreman, Joe Smith, poured coal oil into the stove from a five-gallon can. An explosion resulted which set fire to the bunkhouse. Smith and the foreman of the ranch, August Stevens, were burned to death. Cecil Miracle, Walter J. Bohn, and Clyde English, employees of the ranch, were more or less severely burned. Application was filed with the respondent Industrial Accident Commission by the widow of Stevens for a death benefit, which was granted. Claims of Miracle, English, and Bohn were also filed, and resulted in an award in favor of each of the three employees. The applications were considered together by the Commission, and the four proceedings now before this court will be considered as one.

[1] Petitioners' principal contention is that the accident resulting in the death of Stevens, and the injuries to the other applicants for compensation, was not due to an industrial hazard, and therefore does not fall within the provisions of section 6a of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 834). It is, of course, a fundamental doctrine that it was not intended by the compensation act that an employer who comes within its provisions shall be the insurer of his employee at all times during the period of the employment, but is liable for compensation only when the injury occurs to the employee while performing some act for the employer in the course of his employment, or is doing something that is incidental thereto. There must be some connection between the injury and the employment other than the mere fact that the employment brought the injured party to the place of injury. There must be a causal connection between the employment and the injury which had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and flowed from that source as a rational and natural consequence. Cal. Casualty Indemnity Exch. v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 257. But whether a given accident is so related or incident to the business in which the employee is engaged must depend upon its own particular circumstances. No exact formula can be laid down which will automatically solve every case. Cudahy Packing Co. v. Parramore, 44 Sup. Ct. 153, 68 L. Ed. —; Assurance Corp. v. I. A. C., 186 Cal. 653, 656, 200 Pac. 419.

[2] Petitioners' first premise is that the injured men were not required to be in the bunkhouse at the time of the explosion and their consequent injury. The proposition falls before the evidence in the case. The Larson ranch was situated 10 miles from Stratford, and there was no nearer place where they could obtain lodging. The bunkhouse was the only place provided for that purpose, and was the only place where the men could pass the time while momentarily unemployed. The consideration for their services was not alone the wages paid by Larson, but board and the lodging furnished at the bunkhouse were reckoned as a part of their pay. Larson testified that the men could not live in town and work for him. The employees, therefore (other than the foreman Stevens, who was furnished a separate house by the employer), were compelled to lodge in the bunkhouse. There was no alternative. The men were required to accept the accommodations provided by their employer, or not work for him. This clearly established fact differentiates the proceedings here under review from the many cases cited and relied on by petitioners, and affords the correct basis for the decision in this case. The question thus presented for our consideration is not a new one, and may be regarded as definitely settled in this state.

Almost the same contentions that are now made by these petitioners were presented for our consideration in a case only recently decided. Associated Oil Co. v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 217 Pac. 744. The question there submitted for decision was whether injuries occurring about and in an employer's bunkhouse, situated on the employer's premises, sustained by employees during their leisure hours, while reasonably using the bunkhouse in a proper manner during intermissions from work, are within the purview of the Workmen's Compensation Act. We held that employees are in the course of their employment while properly spending their time, when off duty, in the bunkhouse furnished by the employer for such purpose, and at which the men are compelled to live. We said:

"The general rule appears to be that when the contract of employment contemplates that the employees shall sleep upon the premises of the employer, the employee, under such circumstances, is considered to be performing services growing out of and incidental to such employment during the time he is on the premises of the employer. (1 Schneider Workmen's Compensation Law, p. 608, par. 279.) The test is whether or not the workman is given a choice in the matter and is as free as possible to come or go as he pleases."

Compensation was denied the employee because he had the choice of going elsewhere for lodging, but preferred the quarters provided by the employer. The facts of the case we are now considering present a situation in which "the employer places the employee in such circumstances that his time is never his own, where he has no discretion as to where he shall sleep and where he shall eat. Under such circumstances the workman must be considered in the employ of the employer all of the time, or at least performing a service which is incidental to the employment he is engaged in." Holt Lumber Co. v. Industrial Comm., 168 Wis. 381, 170 N. W. 366; Honold on Workmen's Compensation, § 109, p. 373.

[3] The petitioners further contend that the act of the choreman Smith in pouring coal oil from a five-gallon can into the slumbering fire did not constitute an industrial hazard. The right to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act is by no means restricted to those cases where the injury occurs while the employee is actually presently manipulating the tools of his calling. Judson Mfg. Co. v. I. A. C., 181 Cal. 300, 302, 184 Pac. 1. "Workmen's Compensation legislation rests upon the idea of status, not upon that of implied contract; that is, upon the conception that the injured workman is entitled to compensation for an injury sustained in the service of an industry to whose operations he contributes his work as the owner contributes his capital—the one for the sake of the wages and the other for the sake of the profits. The liability is based, not upon any act or omission of the employer, but upon the existence of the relationship which the employee bears to the employment because of and in the course of which he has been injured. And this is not to impose liability upon one person for an injury sustained by another with which the former has no connection; but it is to say that it is enough if there be a causal connection between the injury and the business in which he employs the latter." Cudahy Packing Co. v. Parramore, supra. And such injury is proximately caused by the employment. Work. Comp. Act, § 6. In the present case there is a direct causal connection between the injuries received by the men in the explosion at the bunkhouse and their employment by Larson. The presence of the men in the bunkhouse was in the course of and incidental to their employment, as already shown. Larson testified that part of the duty of the choreman Smith was "making fires at the bunkhouse." His act in attempting to revive the fire in the stove was therefore an act done in connection with the employer's business. He so carelessly and negligently performed that duty that the explosion resulted, and the men were injured. His negligence has not been shown to have been either willful or sportive, and must be considered a risk incidental to the employment of himself and the other employees on the ranch. Laurino v. Donovan, 186 App. Div. 387, 173 N. Y. Supp. 619. This case was cited approvingly by this court in Storm v. I. A. C. (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 874. The fact that the injuries to the employees were not of a kind to be anticipated, nor peculiar to the employment in which they were engaged, does not defeat the claims to compensation in this case. Assurance Corp. v. I. A. C., supra.

The petitioners contend that the injured employee Bohn had no work to do in the bunkhouse; that he was there only for his own convenience, and was merely "loafing" at a time when he should have been at work in the fields. There is nothing in the record to support this contention. Bohn was employed in irrigating on the ranch, and was paid so much an hour for his services. He commenced his day's work immediately after breakfast at 6 o'clock in the morning, and generally quit about 6 o'clock in the evening. As an irrigator, he was on duty practically all of the time to watch the water. He testified he "was supposed to go whenever the water called" him. On occasions he had "to turn the water off or something" after 6 o'clock. On the day of the accident his work was over for the day, and he quit at 5 o'clock and went to the bunkhouse to pass away the time until supper was ready.

[4] The ranch foreman Stevens lived with his family in a cottage on the ranch. Sometimes he ate at home and sometimes with the men. On the day of the accident he had been working in the fields. Before going home for dinner, he went to the bunkhouse for the purpose of giving orders to the men constituting the night shift operating the caterpillars on the place. The explosion occurred almost immediately after he got there. He was therefore actually engaged in the discharge of a duty, and was doing something for his employer, at the time he received the injury which resulted in his death.

[5] The contention of the petitioners that English and Miracle were "stealing from their employer's time" is not well founded. These claimants were employed together on a dredger operated by petitioner Larson on the ranch some four or five miles from the bunkhouse. They began work at 7 o'clock in the morning, and were supposed to work until 6 o'clock at night. Occasionally they repaired the dredger after that time, and did other work for which they were paid overtime. They were not furnished with lights, and, during the short days, stopped work when it got dark. On such occasions they were usually in camp before 6 o'clock. On the evening in question they were through with their work for the day. They arrived at the bunkhouse at about 5:30, and were waiting for supper when the explosion and fire occurred.

The award in each case is affirmed.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil, Sayre Macneil, and Paul E. Schwab, all of Los Angeles, for defendant.

RICHARDS, J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate wherein the Montecito county water district, a public corporation, seeks to compel the respondent, H. J. Doulton, as president of said district, to sign certain bonds of said district which he has thus far refused to do. The facts out of which this proceeding arose, as set forth in said petition and conceded by the respondent to be truly stated thereunder, are briefly as follows: The Montecito county water district was duly organized and exists under the provisions of an act of the Legislature entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation and organization and management of county water districts," etc., approved on June 10, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1049), as amended in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 26), and in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 225), and in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 816). The location of said district is in the county of Santa Barbara, state of California. On the 20th day of January, 1923, the board of directors of the said Montecito county water district duly passed and adopted a resolution declaring it to be necessary for said district to incur a bonded indebtedness for the purposes and in an amount set forth in said resolution, which also fixed the maximum term the bonds representing such indebtedness were to run before maturity and the maximum rate of interest to be paid thereon, and further fixing the date at which a special election should be held for the purpose of authorizing said bonded indebtedness. The said resolution in all respects conformed to the requirements of the statute as the same stood at the date of the adoption of said resolution and also at the date fixed for the holding of said election. The said board of directors of said district also adopted on said date and in due form a resolution providing for the giving of notice of such election. Thereafter, and on March 1, 1923, the said special election was duly and regularly held throughout said district, pursuant to the resolution calling the same and providing for the notices thereof, which were duly and regularly given, at which said election the said proposition to incur said bonded indebtedness and issue said bonds was carried, and so declared to be by the said board of directors thereof upon a proper canvass of the votes cast thereat. The amount of said bonds thus authorized to be issued was $850,000, each of said bonds being issued in the sum of $1,000, and bearing interest at 4 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually. Thereafter and on the 20th day of July, 1923, the said board of directors of said water district, pursuant to the authority by which they were thus invested, duly and regularly sold at public auction 100 of said bonds to the Pacific Southwest Trust & Savings Bank of Santa Barbara for the full par value thereof, plus interest to the date of issuance, plus a premium of $50, and thereafter duly received said sums as the purchase price thereof, and delivered said bonds to the said purchasers; all of said bonds so sold are still outstanding, and no part of the principal thereof has as yet been paid thereon.

Thereafter, and on the 14th day of February, 1924, the board of directors of said water district duly passed and adopted a resolution providing for the sale by said district of an additional amount of said bonds, amounting in the aggregate of their face value to the sum of $200,000; that thereafter there was presented to the said H. J. Doulton, as president of the board of directors of said water district, the said bonds in the said sum of $200,000 in value for his signature as such official, pursuant to the terms of the resolution providing for the issuance of the same, but the said H. J. Doulton, as such president of said water district, refused and still refuses to sign all or any of the said bonds; that the sole reason assigned and existing for the said failure and refusal of the said H. J. Doulton, as president of said water district, to sign said bonds or any of said issue thereof is this: That while said bonded indebtedness and entire bond issue of said water district was resolved upon, authorized, valid, and directed to be issued under and in strict conformity with the said statute of 1913, and the amendments thereto adopted prior to May 11, 1923, the said statute of 1913 was further amended by an act of the Legislature approved upon said last-named date (Stats. 1923, p. 312), and, while the first issue of $100,000 in their aggregate value of said bonds above referred to were ordered sold, and were in fact sold and issued prior to said date, the said amendment of said statute so passed and approved on May 11, 1923, purported to work a change in the language and effect of said statute as it read prior to said amendment in the following respect, viz.: That whereas, under the terms of section 15 of said statute as it stood prior to said amendment thereof, it was contemplated that the lands within the entire district were to be benefited by the purposes to be subserved through the authorization and creation of a bonded indebtedness by said water district, and through the issuance and sale of the bonds thus authorized to be issued and sold, and through the expenditure of the moneys derived from the issuance and sale of said bonds for the purposes to be thus subserved, the amendment to said section of said statute contemplated that only certain lands within the boundaries of said water district were to be or might be benefited by the creation of said bonded indebtedness and the issuance and sale of said bonds for the declared purposes to be subserved thereby, and hence said amendment to said statute required that in the resolution of the board of directors of a water district, providing for a bonded indebtedness and declaring the purpose for which said proposed indebtedness was to be incurred, the lands within the district to be benefited thereby should be stated, and said amendments to said section 15 of said statute further provided that the board of directors of such water district, in their notice of the election to be held for the purpose of determining whether such bonded indebtedness should be created, should include within the boundaries of the voting precincts within which such election was to be held only those lands which were to be benefited as stated and declared in the resolution of said board proposing the creation of such indebtedness, and that said election should only be held within such boundaries, and that only the qualified electors residing within such boundaries should be entitled to vote at said election. Said amendment adopted on May 11, 1923, further provided, by amendments to section 21 of said statute, that in the event that the revenues of the district should be inadequate to pay the principal or interest of any bonded debt, the board of directors should cause a tax to be levied upon the lands within said district described in the resolution of the said board of directors, declaring the necessity for incurring such bonded indebtedness and that such lands only should be liable for such tax. Said amendment also changed the provisions of section 22 of said statute so as to provide that the lien of such taxes as were so levied for the payment of the principal or interest due upon such bonded indebtedness should be laid only upon the lands within said district which were stated and described in the resolution of the board of directors of said district providing for the creation of such bonded debt. The foregoing changes in the statute of 1913 as it read prior to the enactment of the amendment thereto approved on May 11, 1923, having been made therein after the passage and adoption of the resolution of the board of directors of the Montecito county water district authorizing the creation of the bonded indebtedness of said water district above referred to and after the election held in said water district determining that such bonded indebtedness should be created in accordance with the terms of said resolution, and after the issuance and sale of the first issue of said bonds in the amount in their aggregate value of $100,000, but before the resolution of said board of directors directing the further issuance and sale of an additional $200,000 in the amount of their aggregate value of said bonds, were held by the said H. J. Doulton, president of said water district, to be operative to the extent of invalidating the attempted issuance and sale of said additional amounts of said bonds as were thus directed to be issued and sold after the adoption of said amendment to said statute, for the reason that said bonds as to the liability which their issuance and sale created was not limited to the particular lands within said district to be benefited by the expenditure of the moneys to be derived therefrom in accordance with the requirements of said amendment to said statute adopted on May 11, 1923.

[1, 2] The precise question thus presented by the application for this writ is as to whether the said amendment to the statute of 1913 is to be given such retroactive effect as to render void the further issuance and sale of the bonds of said water district duly authorized, voted for, and directed to be issued and sold prior to the adoption of said amendment and in full conformity with the terms and provisions of said statute as it read at the time such bonded indebtedness was authorized by the resolution of said board of directors and at the time of the holding of the election within said district approving the creation of said bonded indebtedness and the issuance and sale of said bonds in accordance with the terms of said resolution. We are entirely satisfied that the amendment to the statute of 1913, approved on May 11, 1923, is to be given no such retroactive effect, and is not to be held as in any manner vitiating or injuriously affecting the further issuance and sale of the bonds of said water district in accordance with the action of the board of directors of said district and of the electors thereof taken prior to the adoption of said amendment and affecting the entire issue and sale of the bonds thereof, duly authorized prior to the passage of said amendment, nor does it alter the method of levying or collecting the taxes for the payment of principal and interest of said bonds. The reasons which impel us to this conclusion are the following: The said amendment to the statute of 1913, adopted on May 11, 1923, does not purport, either by its express terms or by any reasonable implication, to be retroactive in its operation or effect, and it is a well-established principle of statutory construction that, while the Legislature has power to pass retroactive laws which do not impair the obligations of contracts or affect injuriously vested rights, it is equally true that statutes are not to be construed as intended to have a retroactive effect so as to affect pending proceedings, unless such intent is expressly declared or necessarily implied from the language of the enactment. It was so held by this court in the case of Vanderbilt v. All Persons, 163 Cal. 507, 126 Pac. 158, and in the very recent case of East Bay Municipal Utility District v. Garrison (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 43. See, also, State Commission, etc., v. Welch, 20 Cal. App. 624, 129 Pac. 974; Smith v. Lyon, 44 Conn. 175; Estate of Richmond, 9 Cal. App. 402, 99 Pac. 554; State ex rel. Ruesswig v. McDonald, 101 Minn. 349, 112 N. W. 278; Village of Champlain v. McCrear, 165 N. Y. 264, 59 N. E. 83; City of Newport v. Newport Nat. Bank, 146 Ky. 736, 143 S. W. 377; Eddy v. Morgan, 216 Ill. 437, 75 N. E. 174; Mayne v. Board of Com'rs, 123 Ind. 132, 24 N. E. 80.

Counsel for the respondent chiefly relies upon two decisions of this court to sustain his position that the effect of the amendment to the statute made in 1923 was to render it impossible to legally issue the bonds in question under the terms of the statute as it stood prior to said amendment.

The first of these cases is Fritz v. San Francisco, 132 Cal. 373, 64 Pac. 566, in which this court held that the bond issue which had been voted and duly authorized under the terms of a statute permitting such bonds to be issued, in effect prior to the adoption of the San Francisco charter, which took effect on January 8, 1900, could not be legally issued after the date when said charter went into effect. An examination of that case, however, shows that the conclusion arrived at by this court in that regard was predicated upon the provisions of section 8, article 11, of the Constitution, which in its then form provided that upon the ratification by the Legislature of such charter of the city it "shall become the organic law thereof, and supersede any existing charter * * * and all amendments thereof, and all laws inconsistent with such charter." It will thus be seen that the act under which the bond issue in that case was authorized was expressly superseded by the charter, and that the intent to render the charter retroactive to that extent was thus made to clearly appear. The amendment to the county water district act here in question is not predicated upon any such constitutional provision, but, on the contrary, appears in all its terms and intendments to be prospective, and hence not applicable to the issuance of bonds which had theretofore been fully provided for and duly authorized under the provisions of the valid act. The other case upon which the respondent relies is that of Wichmann v. City of Placerville, 147 Cal. 162, 81 Pac. 537, in which case a bond issue of the city of Placerville had been duly voted for and authorized, while said city was operating under a charter created by a special act of the Legislature in the year 1859. Thereafter and prior to the actual issuance of said bonds the city of Placerville was reincorporated under a new charter by a special act of the Legislature adopted in 1863. This court held that the bonds which had theretofore been authorized could not be issued after the adoption of said new charter, for the reason that the reincorporated city was a new and different corporation from that in existence under said former charter, and hence that said bond issue could not become effective as against the new municipal corporation. The differentiation between that case and the case at bar would seem to be obvious. We do not deem it necessary to review in detail the cases from other jurisdictions cited by respondent, since those cases are based upon the provisions of the special statutes of those states under which they arose, nor do we deem it necessary to deal with the other questions presented and argued by the respective parties to this proceeding, for the reason that their discussion is rendered unnecessary by the views already expressed herein.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

PEOPLE ex rel. GILLESPIE v. LA BARRE et al. (S. F. 10918.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 18, 1924.)

1. Physicians and surgeons ⇐2—Act conferring power to appoint board of chiropractic examiners held in pari materia with earlier act.

The Initiative Act, conferring the power on the Governor to appoint a board of chiropractic examiners (St. 1923, p. lxxxviii) is not sui generis, and must be considered in pari materia with the Medical Practice Act (Codes and Gen. Laws 1917-1921, Act 2164), since the act is intended to accomplish what all general health laws are designed to accomplish, and since section 18 provides that the act shall not be considered as repealing the Medical Practice Act of June 2, 1913, and section 13, that chiropractic licentiates shall observe and be subject to all state and municipal regulations relating to all matters pertaining to public health.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⇐3—Only persons lawfully engaged in "practice" eligible as chiropractic examiners.

The Initiative Act, conferring the power on the Governor to appoint a board of chiropractic examiners (St. 1923, p. lxxxviii), and providing that each member shall have practiced chiropractic in the state for three years next preceding the date upon which the act takes effect, contemplates the appointment of persons who have been lawfully engaged in such practice under licenses issued under the Medical Practice Act (Codes and Gen. Laws 1917-1921, Act 2164), since "practice" means the engagement in the treatment or healing of the sick in accordance with the rules which the state has prescribed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Quo warranto by the People, on the relation of George D. Gillespie, against Ray S. La Barre and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Rose, Raymond Benjamin, and Frank B. Austin, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Frank V. Kington, of Galt, Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine, of San Francisco, and U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Leon French, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

Norman E. Malcolm, of Palo Alto, amicus curiæ.

SEAWELL, J. This is a proceeding in quo warranto, instituted by the people of the state of California, upon the relation of George D. Gillespie, to remove from office, on the ground of ineligibility, the five members of the state board of chiropractic examiners appointed by the governor of the state, acting, it is claimed, within the power conferred upon him by the initiative measure approved at the general election held November 7, 1922, effective December 21, 1922 (Stats. and Amends. 1923, p. lxxxviii).

The trial court found said appointees to be wanting in the legal qualifications necessary to entitle them to occupy the respective offices to which they had been appointed, and this appeal is taken from the judgment and order entered by said court, declaring said appointees ineligible for membership in said state board of chiropractic examiners, and removing them from office.

Section 1 of said act provides:

"The board is hereby created to be known as the 'state board of chiropractic examiners,' hereinafter referred to as the board, which shall consist of five members, citizens of the state of California, appointed by the Governor. Each member must have pursued a resident course in a regularly incorporated chiropractic school or college, and must be a graduate thereof and hold a diploma therefrom.

"Each member of the board first appointed hereunder shall have practiced chiropractic in the state of California for a period of three years next preceding the date upon which this act takes effect, thereafter appointees shall be licentiates hereunder. * * *

It is a fact admitted in the case that none of the five members of the board of chiropractic examiners appointed under the initiative or Chiropractic Act was ever the holder of a license or certificate issued by the state medical board to practice, either as a physician and surgeon, or as a drugless practitioner. In fact, it is admitted that all treatments administered by them or either of them to the sick or to those who applied for any sort of treatment for a period of three years next preceding the date upon which the Initiative Act went into effect was done without authority of law and in violation of law. It is also stipulated that at the time said Initiative Act went into effect there were 91 persons lawfully qualified to practice within the state as chiropractors, and who had been actually engaged in such practice for the full term required by the act. Such authority is conferred by the Medical Practice Act (Codes and General Laws, 1917-1921, p. 1607), which provides that any person holding a drugless practitioner's certificate or a physician and surgeon's license is entitled to practice the chiropractic form of treatment. To assume to practice without such a certificate or license was an offense against the state.

The question of the eligibility of said appointees to membership in the "board first appointed" turns largely upon the meaning of the language of the act, which provides that each member—

"shall have practiced chiropractic in the state of California for a period of three years next preceding the date upon which this act takes effect, thereafter appointees shall be licentiates hereunder." (Italics ours.)

It is appellants' position that the act recognizes persons as eligible to appointment to said office who had practiced chiropractic for a period of three years next preceding December 21, 1922, without having obtained a license or a certificate so to do from any board or legally constituted authority whatsoever, and whose right to exercise administrative authority must therefore rest upon the doing of a series of acts which, during the period covered by their commission, were denounced as public offenses, and which acts, by the express provisions of the initiative measure under which the present right is asserted, are also declared to be offenses against the law.

[1, 2] Respondents, on the other hand, take the position that the act contemplates the appointment to office of persons who had lawfully engaged in the practice of chiropractic methods under a certificate or a license issued by competent authority only. It is not disputed that neither the state Medical Act nor the Initiative Act permits any person to engage in the practice of medicine or surgery or the treatment of the sick in any form without a certificate or license so to do. The position of appellants is that the Initiative Act is sui generis and stands unrelated to any other law regulating the treatment of the sick, and no reference or recourse may be made to general laws as aids to the interpretation of the act. This claim is untenable. The act was intended to accomplish the same object that all general health laws are designed to accomplish. It is undoubtedly in pari materia with all other acts regulating the same general subject.

"It is a well-settled rule that different statutes relating to the same subject are to be construed together. State v. Young, 17 Kan. 414. 'Statutes are to be regarded as forming parts of one great and uniform body of law, and are not to be deemed isolated and detached systems complete in themselves.' Robertson v. The State, ex rel. Smith, 109 Ind. 79, 87, 10 N. E. 582, 643." Green et al. v. Hodges, Governor, 91 Kan. 658, 138 Pac. 605.

"When two or more statutes, whenever passed, relate to the same thing or the same class of things or to the same general subject-matter, they are in pari materia and are to be construed as forming an unitary system and as one statute." People ex rel. Doscher v. Sisson, 222 N. Y. 387, 118 N. E. 787.

See, also, Town of Highgate v. State, 59 Vt. 39, 7 Atl. 898; see, also, Gleason v. Spray, 81 Cal. 217, 22 Pac. 551, 15 Am. St. Rep. 47; In re Madalina, 174 Cal. 693, 164 Pac. 348,

1 A. L. R. 1629; Alexander v. Lowrance, 182 N. C. 642, 109 S. E. 639.

The language of the act itself furnishes convincing proof that it and the Medical Practice Act are to be construed, so far as consistent, in pari materia. Section 18 thereof provides that nothing therein shall be considered as repealing the "Medical Practice Act" of June 2, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 722), or any subsequent amendment thereto, except in so far as said act or its amendments may conflict with the provisions of the Initiative Act as applied to persons licensed under the latter act, to which extent any and all acts in conflict with the Initiative Act are repealed. Section 13 seems to dispose of the question in these words:

"Chiropractic licentiates shall observe and be subject to all state and municipal regulations relating to all matters pertaining to the public health, * * * and make reports as required by law to the proper authorities, and such reports shall be accepted by the officers of the departments to which the same are made." (Italics ours.)

The act provides for a high standard of ethics and very closely follows in this respect and in procedural regulations the Medical Practice Act. We think it cannot be affirmatively shown by an examination of the act that it was the intention of the framers, or, indeed, the supporters of the act, to induct into the practice of medicine or the art of healing and treatment of the sick such a radical change in existing laws as to requite with reward the things which were condemned as offenses against the state. The fact that the statute by its own words denounces the acts upon which it is sought to establish a legal right furnishes a forceful argument against the claim that the measure intended to qualify persons for appointment to places on the board who had practiced chiropractic without having obtained a license so to do, notwithstanding the fact that there were persons whose eligibility could not be questioned. Appellants place special significance upon the italicized words of the following sentence:

"Each member of the board first appointed hereunder shall have practiced chiropractic in the state of California for a period of three years next preceding the date upon which this act takes effect, thereafter appointees shall be licentiates hereunder." (Italics ours.)

The implication which arises from the above-quoted language more strongly favors the interpretation that the practice therein referred to is meant such as was recognized by existing laws, but that thereafter only such persons as were licensed under the Initiative Act would be deemed to possess the required qualifications, than the interpretation contended for by appellants.

The word "practice" means, of course, engagement in the treatment or healing of the sick in accordance with the rules which the state in the exercise of the police power has prescribed. It is not necessary to read into the act, as appellants so vigorously insist, the word "lawful" or "legal" before the word "practice," in order to justify the conclusion that the act contemplates the holding of a license under the Medical Practice Act as a prerequisite for eligibility on the part of an appointee to membership in said board. Lawfulness is a fixed element which inheres in every statute. It is a fundamental principle of law that a right cannot be founded upon a wrong. Curative or palliative statutes, enacted under peculiar or pressing circumstances, to enable a wrongdoer to adjust himself to the law's requirements, are not altogether unknown to legislative history. But, generally, if not universally, such statutes have exacted of such person that he submit himself to an examination or otherwise prove his qualifications. In all such cases, however, the intent of the statute to condone the offense must clearly appear.

But, without resorting to rules of statutory construction, it seems clear to us that the first meaning that the average person would give to the word "practice," as used in an act applying to a practitioner of medicine and surgery, or to others employing any of the methods of treatment recognized by the state, is that such practitioner should possess all of the qualifications required by law, and shall have complied with all rules governing such practice.

The above italicized clause means just what its simple language imports, to wit, three years' practice in conformity with the standard fixed by law. How is the state to know whether applicants for appointment possess the standard qualifications except by applying its legal test? The act is silent as to any method or procedure by which qualification is to be otherwise determined. This being so, indicates that the standard fixed by law must be the only true criterion of qualification.

Appellants argue that section 8 of the act cannot be rationally construed on any other theory than that it means to recognize unlawful or unlicensed practice in creating its standard of qualification for membership in said board. It is suggested that if "practice" means "lawful practice," there would be no occasion to license those who hold certificates under the Medical Practice Act. Our conclusion is neither at variance with nor inconsistent with the language of said section.

Sections 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 deal with the schedule of minimum educational requirements established by the act, and also with the examination of applicants for license thereunder. These sections are confined solely to the issuance of licenses to practice chiropractic under the provisions of the Initiative Act. Section 1 deals with the qualifications for membership in the first and succeeding boards.

Section 8 provides as follows:

"Any person who shall have practiced chiropractic for two years after graduation from a chiropractic school or college, one year of which shall have been in this state preceding the date upon which this act takes effect or any person who graduated from a chiropractic school or college prior to January 1, 1922, and who shall present to the board satisfactory proof of good moral character and having pursued a resident course of not less than two thousand hours in a legally incorporated chiropractic school or college, shall be given a practical and clinical examination in chiropractic philosophy and practice, and if he, or she, make a grade of seventy-five per cent. in such examination, the board shall grant a license to said applicant to practice chiropractic in this state under the provisions of this act. * * *

It will be observed that a license issued under the Initiative or Chiropractic Act confers a higher mark of learning and efficiency upon its holder than does a drugless practitioner's certificate issued under the Medical Practice Act. The minimum educational requirements of the Chiropractic or Initiative Act call for a course of study embracing the same subjects as the Medical Act, but it extends over a period of 2,400 hours as against 2,000 hours for the drugless practitioner. This of itself, from a professional or business standpoint, would give an advantage in public favor to the licentiates under the Chiropractic Act over the drugless practitioners. But the more substantial advantage of holding a license under the Chiropractic Act consists in the preferments and prestige which eligibility to membership in the state board of chiropractic examiners carries with it. This badge of honor and distinction is withheld from the holders of certificates issued to drugless practitioners. Certificate holders under the Medical Practice Act, who are practicing the chiropractic methods, will naturally, for competitive and other reasons, desire to be placed upon an equal plane in public favor with licentiates under the Chiropractic Act, and will naturally present themselves for examination. The sections above referred to prescribe the terms, recognizing years of practice, by which they as well as others may become licensed under said act. The credits to which applicants are entitled for each year of "actual practice," as provided by the Chiropractic Act, are based upon lawful or legal practice as prescribed by the Medical Practice Act, which formerly was the only act governing the subject.

The phrase "actual practice" is open to but one construction. It is the opposite of casual or occasional or clandestine practice, and carries with it the thought of active, open, and notorious engagement in a business, vocation, or profession. It is not to be presumed that a person would boldly engage in active and open violations of the law for a period of three years, or that he would be permitted to do so if he so willed. To follow appellants' view it is necessary to presume the continuous existence of unlawful acts, which is contrary to every rule of interpretation or construction.

Appellants claim that section 9, subd. (a), which provides that the board shall, upon receipt of the fee of $25, issue a license to each member of the board, gives support to their interpretation of the act. It is as easily reconcilable to respondents' theory. Drugless practitioners held no license, but certificates merely, and it was no doubt deemed expedient to raise each member of the board to which he was appointed as an examiner of applicants, to the standard prescribed for licentiates under the act of which he was an administrative officer.

Laws regulatory of the practice of the law, medicine, and the treatment of the sick by various methods, are not new subjects. The meaning of the word "practice" in its relation to the practice of the law, which is analogous to the practice of medicine, was determined in State v. Marks, 30 La. Ann. 97. Marks, the defendant, had pursued a course in the law department at the University of Louisiana. He had served four years as district attorney of a judicial district, and while occupying said office was elected judge of his judicial district. He had never been admitted to practice law by the Supreme Court of Louisiana. The Constitution of that state provided that a district judge "shall have practiced law in this state for two years next preceding his election." Const. 1868, art. 84. The Constitution did not require that a person should be a lawyer to be eligible to the office of district attorney. Defendant's right to occupy the judicial office was attacked by a writ of quo warranto. In holding the defendant ineligible to the office, the Supreme Court said:

"It cannot be presumed that the organic law, in using the words, 'shall have practiced law in this state,' can intend anything but a practice under legal permission. Those who frame a fundamental law, or any law, cannot be supposed to have in contemplation the conferring a benefit in express terms upon a violator of the law. If therefore a person shall practice law, without first obtaining legal permission and in defiance of prerequisites ordained as of essential compliance, he cannot base upon the fact of having thus practiced a legal right to do something else, of which a lawful practice is the condition precedent. The certificates of clerks, and the testimony of litigants, that the defendant had practiced law for two years is of little consequence, unless they are accompanied by a satisfactory exhibition of the authority from which he derives his legal right to practice."

For a list of authorities which construe the meaning of the word "practice" in its relation to the practice of dentistry, medicine, and chiropractic methods, in harmony with the general view we have taken of the subject, see State v. Board of Dental Examiners, 31 Wash. 492, 72 Pac. 110; State v. Wilson, 61 Kan. 791, 60 Pac. 1054; Green v. Hodges, 91 Kan. 658, 138 Pac. 605; State v. Board of Dental Examiners, 96 Or. 529, 188 Pac. 960, 190 Pac. 338; Driscoll v. Commonwealth, 93 Ky. 393, 20 S. W. 431.

Appellants very greatly rely upon Bohannon v. Board of Medical Examiners, 24 Cal. App. 215, 140 Pac. 1089, as "determinative of the interpretation of the words 'practiced' and 'actual practice' as found in the Chiropractic Act," and as meaning unlawful practice. That case, like a few others that might be referred to, deals with expedient or emergency acts. The force of the Bohannon Case as authority here is broken by the weight of its own language. It was clearly the intent of the act there discussed to admit to practice persons who had practiced without a license a special branch of medicine and surgery for a period of not less than 35 years. It is there said:

"It is not seriously contended, nor can it be, that such is not the express intent of the Legislature." (Italics ours.)

These appellants, however, were required to submit to an examination, receiving a credit of 5 per cent. for each 10 years of practice. The fact that no examination is required as a prerequisite for membership in the board of examiners by the Initiative Act would indicate as a matter of course that the certificate of qualification issued by the state after examination conducted by its agents was a sufficient test of competency.

No impartial person, we think, who thoughtfully peruses the act before us, in the light of the well-recognized rules of statutory construction and the evident policy of the law itself, can be of the mind that it was clearly intended by said act, as said in the Bohannon Case, to make eligible for office those who had not qualified themselves to practice in accordance with the rules governing the subject. No overdrawn inferences of law or presumptions of fact can be indulged to bring about the results sought to be accomplished.

Nothing appears in the title or upon the face of the act to indicate that the electors who made it the law understood that the commission of a series of acts forbidden by law was to be made the legal basis for promotion to high administrative places. Surely the act does not disclose any such intent. If this had been the intention it would have been a simple matter to have stated it.

We are of the opinion that the appellants' interpretation of the act cannot be sustained. Judgment affirmed.

WESTERN PAC. R. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 10919.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 25, 1924. Rehearing Denied April 24, 1924.)

1. Master and servant §417(7)—Findings of fact on evidence in compensation case conclusive.

The findings of the Industrial Accident Commission upon questions of fact are conclusive and are not subject to review where there is any substantial evidence to support them; and it is also a rule that where, from the evidence, two opposing inferences may be drawn, that inference which is accepted by the Industrial Commission must be sustained, if there is evidence in the record to support it and if it is a reasonable inference to be drawn from that evidence.

2. Master and servant §405(4)—Finding as to principal purpose of employee in going home sustained.

In a proceeding to recover compensation for death of one employed as collector and messenger, who, instead of returning directly to employer's office, went out of his way four blocks to his home, and was struck by an automobile after leaving home, evidence held to sustain a finding that the primary purpose of deceased in stopping at his home was to procure his raincoat, and not to bring meat home to his wife.

3. Master and servant §375(1)—Injury to messenger after securing raincoat at home held compensable as "arising out of employment."

Where one employed as a collector and messenger was struck by an automobile after leaving his home, where he had gone in the course of an errand for his employers to secure his raincoat before returning to the office, held, that the injury "arose out of his employment" within the Workmen's Compensation Act.

4. Master and servant §356—Compensation recoverable under Workmen's Compensation Act regardless of negligence.

Where one employed as a collector and messenger was struck by an automobile while riding upon an unlighted bicycle in violation of the Motor Vehicle Act, § 13, such fact did not deprive his dependents of compensation, in view of Const. art. 20, § 21, providing that the liability of an employer for workmen's compensation shall be "without regard to the fault of either party," and it being the whole theory of the Workmen's Compensation Act to provide compensation, regardless of negligence.

5. Master and servant §375(1)—Riding unlighted bicycle held not to take employee out of "course of employment" within Compensation Act.

Where one employed as a collector and messenger was struck by an automobile while riding an unlighted bicycle in violation of the law, such fact did not take him out of the "course of his employment" within the Workmen's Compensation Act, though it constituted negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

6. Master and servant §375(1)—Negligence will not take employee out of "course of employment" within Compensation Act.

It is not the law that the performance of an authorized duty in a negligent manner will by itself take an employee out of the course of his employment, since such a defense would be tantamount to a defense of contributory negligence, expressly abolished in workmen's compensation cases.

7. Master and servant §380—Willful misconduct of employee no defense to claim for compensation for death.

Where one employed as a collector and messenger was struck by an automobile while riding an unlighted bicycle in violation of law, if such act was willful misconduct in the course of his employment, it was not a defense to a claim for compensation in view of St. 1919, p. 910, § 2, subd. 4, if the injury occurring by reason of the misconduct of employee resulted in his death.

In Bank.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act for the death of Howard Johnson, by Mrs. Lucy Johnson, in her own right, and by Francis Johnson and Howard Johnson, minors, by their guardian ad litem, claimants, opposed by the Western Pacific Railroad Company, employer. From an award in favor of claimants by the Industrial Accident Commission, the employer brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

Stephen F. Otis and C. W. Dooling, both of San Francisco (F. M. Angellotti, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Acc. Commission. Tye & Edwards, of Stockton (A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, and A. P. Hayne, of Stockton, of counsel), for respondent Johnson.

LENNON, J. Certiorari to review and annul an award of $5,000 to the wife and two minor children of Howard Johnson, deceased, an employee of the Western Pacific Railroad Company. The facts of the case upon which the award is rested succinctly stated are these:

Howard Johnson, employed as collector and messenger by the Western Pacific Railroad Company, petitioner herein, was, on the 21st day of December, 1921, while riding on an unlighted bicycle from his home to the place of his employment, struck by an automobile and fatally injured. Two days later he died. About 5 o'clock on the day of the accident the deceased left the office of the petitioner on a bicycle to take a bill of lading for signing to the firm of Morgan & Miller located on the waterfront of the city of Stockton. When the deceased left the office, the weather was threatening, and one-half hour later, before he could return to the office, a heavy rainstorm broke. Instead of returning directly to the office, which was six blocks away, the deceased went out of his way four blocks to his home, where he procured his raincoat. On his way to his home he purchased some meat which he took home to his wife, and as he was leaving the house he told her that he would be detained that evening at his work. He was returning to the office when he was struck by the automobile and sustained the injuries which resulted in his death.

[1-3] The award of the Commission is predicated upon the finding that the controlling purpose of Johnson in making the detour to his home was to procure his raincoat or "slicker" in order to protect himself from the inclemency of the weather in the discharge of his duties. The petitioner contends that there is no substantial evidence in the record supporting this finding of the Commission, but that, on the contrary, the evidence shows that his controlling purpose was to bring meat home to his wife and tell her that he would be detained.

It is a well-recognized rule that the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission upon questions of fact are conclusive and are not subject to review where there is any substantial evidence to support them. Massachusetts, etc., Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 176 Cal. 488, 168 Pac. 1050; Southern Pacific v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 378, 170 Pac. 822; Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 182 Cal. 709, 720, 190 Pac. 27. That is to say, the Commission is the final arbiter where there is a conflict in the evidence or where opposing inferences may reasonably be drawn. Tartar v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 218 Pac. 39; Clapp's Parking Station v. Industrial Accident Commission, 51 Cal. App. 624, 627, 197 Pac. 369. It is the rule that where from the evidence two opposing inferences may be drawn, that inference which is accepted by the Commission must be sustained if there is evidence in the record to support it and if it is a reasonable inference to be drawn from that evidence. East- man v. Industrial Accident Commission, 186 Cal. 587, 598, 200 Pac. 17; Polar Ice, etc., Co. v. Mulray, 67 Ind. App. 270, 119 N. E. 149. While there is evidence in the instant case from which the inference might be drawn that the primary purpose of the deceased in stopping at his home on his way back to the office was to take the meat home to his wife, or to notify her that he would be delayed, there is ample evidence from which the inference may be reasonably deduced that his primary and impelling purpose was to procure his "slicker."

It may be conceded that there is no direct evidence in the record as to what decedent's purpose was in going home. That purpose, however, can be inferred from the surrounding circumstances and from the conduct and conversation of the decedent on the evening in question. It cannot be denied that there is in the record sufficient evidence to show or tending to show that the deceased did obtain his raincoat at home. Thus it appears in the evidence that he was not wearing either his raincoat or his overcoat when he left the office and was wearing his raincoat when he was picked up at the time of the accident. It is not disputed that at the time the decedent left the office of the railroad company to go to the waterfront to have the bill of lading signed that there was a slight drizzle and that about a half an hour later, or about the time he was returning to the office, a heavy rainstorm broke suddenly. The raincoat of the decedent was not the ordinary cravenette raincoat, but was the kind commonly known as a "slicker." It had been purchased by the decedent a couple of weeks before, and ordinarily he kept it hanging on the back porch of his home. When he was leaving his home that evening with the raincoat on, he remarked with reference to the weather that it was "a hell of a night to be out in." It is not unreasonable to infer that being suddenly caught in a rainstorm, the first thought of the decedent was to proceed to his home, only four blocks distant, and procure his slicker to protect him from the weather. This, we think, is fairly inferable despite the fact that the office was only six blocks away. Although his normal quitting time was supposed to be 5 o'clock, he worked overtime so frequently that it was the rule rather than the exception for him to be detained at the office. Mr. Harkins, the superior officer of the decedent, testified that for some time prior to the time of the accident the decedent was working overtime nearly every day. There is also evidence that the decedent would not know until he returned to the office whether or not there was more work for him to do.

This is sufficient evidence, we think, to support the finding of the Commission that his main purpose in going home was to procure his raincoat. The contrary inference, contended for by the petitioner, that he went home to bring the meat and tell his wife that he would be detained at his work, finds support only in the fact that he did bring the meat home and that he did tell his wife that he would be detained. Even so, his main purpose on the occasion in question might well have been to get his raincoat. There is no evidence that the deceased habitually and regularly purchased supplies for his family and returned to his work after taking them home. To the contrary, there is evidence in the record that it was not the habit of the deceased to bring the meat directly home after purchasing it and that oftentimes he would take it back to the office. The incident of the meat getting is, therefore, not opposed to the inference that the primary purpose of the decedent was to get his raincoat and that the purchasing and taking of the meat home was on this particular occasion but a mere incidental purpose.

The testimony of the wife is to the effect that the decedent had come into the house, had left the meat on the table in the kitchen, and was outside of the house and leaving without saying anything to her, when she called to him and asked him in effect what the rush was. He said something about "Sperry's" which she did not distinctly understand because of the noise of the rain, but she did understand him to say that he was in a hurry and not to get supper until after 6 o'clock as he would be late. This testimony necessarily negatives the inference that his primary purpose in going home was to tell his wife that he would be detained. Otherwise he would have located his wife before leaving the house or at least have left word with his daughter, who was practicing upon the piano in the front room.

Certainly the injury in the instant case "arose out of" the employment. The nature of the accident was one to which the decedent was particularly susceptible by reason of the nature of his employment which required his presence on the public highways. That is to say, the employment being one in which the employee was required to travel from place to place at the will of the employer, the risks of such travel were distinctly incident to the employment itself. Globe Ind. Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 36 Cal. App. 280, 283, 171 Pac. 1088; London, etc., Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 35 Cal. App. 681, 682, 170 Pac. 1074.

He was at the time of the accident "in the course of" his employment. His duties as a collector and messenger were such as to require him to be out of doors most of his time regardless of the condition of the weather. In order to do his work efficiently and well, it was necessary for him to be properly protected from inclement weather. It was, therefore, we think, a reasonable act for the deceased, a heavy downpour having commenced after he left the office, to proceed to his home, which was two blocks nearer than the office, in order to procure his "slicker," which was particularly adapted for use in wet weather. This is particularly true in view of the fact that he would not know until he had returned to the office whether there would be other errands for him to perform for his employer.

Furthermore, it is to be reasonably anticipated that a person whose duties require him to be out of doors will seek protection from rain. In so seeking protection an employee is not to be held as a matter of law as deviating from the course of his employment. If, in the instant case, the decedent had sought shelter in a nearby store or under a friendly porch, the Commission would not be compelled to find, we think, that, while waiting for the rain to abate, the employee was outside of the course of his employment. Chiulla De Luca v. Board of Park Commissioners, 94 Conn. 7, 107 Atl. 611; State Road Commissioner v. Industrial Accident Commission of Utah, 56 Utah, 252, 190 Pac. 544; Moore v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 169 App. Div. 177, 154 N. Y. Supp. 620. The procuring of his raincoat was but another means of seeking shelter. In going home for his raincoat in order that he might continue his duties, instead of seeking shelter under a roof, he was facilitating his work, and it cannot be said contrary to the finding of the Commission, that by so doing he had departed from the course of his employment.

[4] The fact that the decedent at the time of the injury was riding upon an unlighted bicycle in violation of section 13 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397) of the state of California does not operate to deprive his dependents of the compensation to which they are entitled by reason of his death. The Workmen's Compensation Act now contains no provisions forfeiting the right of a dependent to compensation because of the violation of law on the part of the decedent contributing to his injury. The violation of an ordinance is ordinarily negligence per se which operates as a defense to an action for damages based upon negligence, but in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act the element of negligence has by law been wholly eliminated. Section 21 of article 20 of the state Constitution provides that the liability of the employer for workmen's compensation shall be "without regard to the fault of either party." The whole theory of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831) is to provide compensation for an injured employee during his incapacity and for his dependents in case of his death regardless of whether such employee had or had not been negligent. As was said in Union Iron Works v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 410:

"The proceeding before the Commission * * * is founded upon the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, from which the theory of fault is wholly eliminated."

[5, 6] The fact that the employee was riding upon an unlighted bicycle did not, as counsel for the petitioner contend, operate to take the employee "out of the course of" his employment upon the theory that the employee had incurred an added risk not contemplated by the nature of his employment. The fact that he was riding upon an unlighted bicycle constitutes negligence in the course of his employment rather than a circumstance which takes him outside of the course of his employment. It is a matter of common knowledge born of human experience that employees are sometimes negligent, and the negligence of an employee must therefore be included as one of the risks of any employment. The fact that an employee is guilty of ordinary negligence in any given case cannot be said, therefore, to impose a risk and responsibility upon an employer not incidental to the employment. It is not the law of this state that the performance of an authorized duty in a negligent manner will by itself take an employee outside of the course of his employment. Such a defense would be tantamount to a defense of contributory negligence expressly abolished in workmen's compensation cases. The conduct of an employee, of course, may be such as to remove him from the sphere of his employment. Particularly is this so when an employee undertakes to do an act not authorized by the duties of his employment, or places himself in a locality to which his duties do not require him to go. In such cases the "added peril" doctrine adds nothing to the general meaning of the term "in the course of the employment." The act of the deceased, however, in riding without a light on his bicycle, even if it were shown in the instant case to have been the result of negligence, was negligence of a character which might be anticipated from the nature of the employment which necessitated the use of a bicycle—oftentimes after dark. The very nature of the employment and the method of executing the duties of the employment in the instant case compel the conclusion that there would be times when the employee would be negligent in the operation of the instrumentality used to execute the duties of the employment.

[7] Assuming that the decedent willfully and deliberately started on his journey to the office without lighting the lamp on his bicycle, this at the most was not more than willful misconduct in the course of his employment. Willful misconduct is not a defense to a claim for compensation if the injury occurring by reason of the misconduct of the employee resulted in his death. Stats. 1919, p. 910, § 2, subd. 4.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is affirmed.

SILVA v. GORDO et al. (Civ. 2717.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 2, 1924.)

Evidence — 420 (7)—Striking defense of delivery of note as security for performance of agreement held error.

Parol evidence being admissible to show the consideration or want of consideration for a note sued on, the court erred in striking out special defense that the note was given and received only as security for faithful performance of an agreement, which defendants were ready, willing, and able to carry out, irrespective of Civ. Code, § 3097, authorizing proof that delivery was conditional or for a special purpose only.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by John S. Silva against J. W. Gordo and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

L. T. Milburn, of Mariposa, and Edward Bickmore, of Merced, for appellants.

C. W. Croop, of Merced, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff to recover the sum of $1,000 for and on account of a promissory note made, executed and delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff herein. After admitting the execution and delivery of the note to plaintiff, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, the defendants set up certain special defenses. The court, upon motion of the plaintiff, struck out the special defenses set up in the answer of the defendants. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal, seeking reversal of the judgment on account of the order of the trial court striking out the special defenses contained in their answer.

The plaintiff alleges that on or about the 20th day of October, 1921, at Mariposa, county of Mariposa, State of California, the defendants made, executed, and delivered their promissory note to the plaintiff in words and figures following, to wit:

"Mariposa, Cal., October 20, 1921.

"One year after date, without grace, we jointly and severally promise to pay John S. Silva, at Mariposa, California, the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000.00), without interest.

"J. W. Gordo.
"Charles Holden."

This is followed by the formal allegations, as to the plaintiff still being the owner and holder of said note and also that no part thereof had been paid.

The defendants' answer, admitting the execution and delivery of the note, denied that the plaintiff was the lawful owner or holder thereof, and also denied that no part of said promissory note had been paid.

A demurrer was sustained to the answer filed by the defendants and a second answer was filed containing in substance the same matters as hereinabove stated, and then for a further and separate defense the defendants allege that on or about the 20th day of October, 1921, the plaintiff was the owner of 31 head of cattle then in his possession; and that at said time and place plaintiff and defendants entered into a verbal agreement whereby plaintiff was to deliver said cattle to the defendants and the defendants agreed that they would feed and care for said cattle during the winter of 1921 and 1922; and that in the spring of 1922 plaintiff should have 10 head of said cattle to be selected by him, and that the defendants should retain the balance as compensation for feed and services furnished by them; and that in order to secure the faithful performance of said agreement of said defendants and the return to plaintiff of the said 10 head of cattle in the spring of 1922, plaintiff and defendants agreed that defendants should give to plaintiff their promissory note in the sum of $1,000, payable one year after date. Defendants made, executed, and delivered to plaintiff their certain promissory note as set forth in plaintiff's complaint; that said note was given by defendants and received by plaintiff as security only for the faithful performance of said agreement; that plaintiff agreed that upon the return of said 10 head of cattle in the spring of 1922, he would return said promissory note to defendants; that defendants performed all of said agreement by them to be kept and performed, did care for and feed all of said stock during the said winter, and did on or about the said 28th day of April, 1922, notify plaintiff to select the 10 head of cattle theretofore delivered to defendants and did demand of plaintiff that he return to them the said promissory note; that plaintiff has refused and neglected to select the said 10 head of cattle and refused and neglected to return to defendants their certain promissory note; that defendants have at all times been ready, willing, and able to carry out the terms of said agreement, but the plaintiff has refused to accept, select, and choose 10 head of cattle and to surrender said promissory note. This portion of the defendants' answer was stricken out upon motion as hereinbefore stated. Upon the trial plaintiff made proof of the execution and delivery of the note and nonpayment, etc., and the defendants introducing no evidence, the court, findings being waived, entered judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000.

As authority for reversal the appellants cite a number of cases holding in substance as follows:

"As between the original parties to an instrument nothing is better settled than that the maker may show an original lack of consideration, or subsequent failure of consideration. * * * And it is equally well settled that such lack or failure of consideration may be shown by parol." Muir v. Hamilton, 152 Cal. 634, 93 Pac. 857; Griswold v. Frame, 48 Cal. App. 178, 191 Pac. 962.

This latter case goes a trifle further and holds that—

"It is always permissible, however, to show the want of consideration for the making of a contract, or that the contract has been discharged by direct payment, accord and satisfaction. * * *"

Cases are also cited by the appellants to the effect that parol evidence is admissible to show that a promissory note was delivered merely as security for the performance of the collateral oral agreement and that it has been discharged by the performance of such agreement. Oakland Cemetery Ass'n v. Lakins, 126 Iowa, 121, 101 N. W. 778, 3 Ann. Cas. 559.

In the case of Howard v. Stratton, 64 Cal. 487, 2 Pac. 263, in an action upon a promissory note where it was sought by parol evidence to show that it was given to secure the performance of an agreement whereby the payee conveyed certain lands to the maker in consideration that the latter should support him during the residue of his life, and that the defendant had performed the conditions of the agreement, the court held the exclusion of such evidence to be error and in so doing used the following language:

"The admission of such evidence would not violate the rule which forbids the introduction of parol evidence to contradict or vary a written contract. If the notes were given to secure the execution by Stratton of a promise to support and take care of Tyson, and that promise was fulfilled, the notes were discharged, and parol evidence is admissible to prove that a written agreement has been totally discharged. There is nothing in this which tends to contradict or vary a written contract."

In Treadwell v. Himmelmann, 50 Cal. 9, where the defendant executed a promissory note in favor of the plaintiff with the understanding that he should procure certain parties to assign to himself liens on land claimed by the plaintiff, which liens the defendant should hold for the benefit of the plaintiff in satisfaction of the note, it was held that the securing of said liens by the defendant and the holding of himself ready to turn them over to the plaintiff amounted to an accord and satisfaction and that his so doing should be regarded as payment. The court excluded evidence of such parol agreement. This was held error.

"The evidence offered by the defendant in support of the special defense set up in the answer was improperly excluded. It did not contradict or vary the written instrument declared upon; on the contrary, the offer was to prove an executed parol agreement, in the nature of an accord and satisfaction. There is no difference in principle between this case and Hapgood v. Swords (2 Bailey S. C. 305), which was an action on a promissory note; and the defense was that at the time of the execution of the note it was agreed by parol that if the defendant would procure a purchaser for certain land of the plaintiff at a specified price, the plaintiff would surrender the note; and the defendant procured the purchaser at the stipulated sum. The court, while admitting that a written contract can not be contradicted or varied by parol, says: 'The legal effect of this verbal agreement is, that when the defendant has performed his part of it, it shall be regarded as a payment. The note is the value put by the plaintiff upon the defendant's services in procuring a purchaser of the land at a given sum.' This reasoning applies fully to the present case; and other authorities to the same effect are not wanting. (Cowen & Hill's Notes to Phil. Ev., note 945; Bradley v. Bentley, 8 Vt. 243; 5 Vt. 514; 17 Pick. 171-4; 3 Fairf. 444.)"

These cases are affirmed in the case of Schultz v. Noble, 77 Cal. 81, 19 Pac. 182.

Subdivision b of section 3097 of the Civil Code, relating to negotiable instruments, reads as follows:

"As between immediate parties, and as regards a remote party other than a holder in due course, the delivery, in order to be effectual, must be made either by or under the authority of the party making, drawing, accepting or indorsing, as the case may be; and in such case the delivery may be shown to have been conditional, or for a special purpose only, and not for the purpose of transferring the property in the instrument."

Under this provision in the negotiable instruments law it is held by a long list of authorities that parol is admissible to show " * * * that a bill or note, regular in form, was manually delivered to the payee upon the condition that it was to become an enforceable obligation only upon the happening of a certain event." Note No. 4, part 2, appended to the case of Vincent v. Russell, 20 A. L. R. 443.

Under similar circumstances it is held that—

"Evidence that the instrument was delivered conditionally does not contradict the writing within the meaning of the parol evidence rule; that rule presupposes the existence of a valid contract. The evidence in question is for the purpose of showing that there is no valid contract between the parties, because there is no finality of utterance."

See note to Vincent v. Russell, supra, page 430.

Under a negotiable instruments law reading precisely as the subdivision which we have quoted from section 3097 of the Civil Code, the Supreme Court of Colorado, in Sayre v. Leonard, 57 Colo. 116, 140 Pac. 196, has held that such conditional delivery may be shown and also that the purposes for which the instrument is executed may be shown by parol testimony, citing also a number of cases following the same rule. See, also, Divine v. Western Slope Fruit Growers' Ass'n, 27 Colo. App. 368, 149 Pac. 841, where the subject of the delivery of a negotiable instrument for a special purpose is considered and the authorities cited that parol evidence is admissible to prove such special purpose.

The facts held sufficient to establish conditional delivery in the cases heretofore cited dealing with that subject are no stronger than the allegations contained in the defendants' amended answer. No California case has been called to our attention where the subdivision of section 3097 of the Civil Code above quoted has been construed or passing upon the question of how the condition may be established; however, there are some California cases bearing upon the subject decided before the enactment of the present negotiable instruments law. In the case of Jefferson v. Hewitt, 103 Cal. 625, 37 Pac. 638, in an action to collect the amount of a note given in payment for a stock subscription where there was an oral agreement as to paying for the stock, etc., the court held:

"It is not necessary that a condition as to the payment of a note, in order to be valid, should be incorporated in the note, but if there is an oral agreement that the note is not to be paid unless a railroad is constructed before its maturity, in consideration of the note, upon failure of the construction of the road as agreed, there is a failure of consideration for the note."

Such agreement may be established by parol testimony. To the same effect is the case of Billings v. Everett, 52 Cal. 661.

There is also a distinction between a conditional delivery or a delivery for a particular purpose and a conditional promise. In the case of Leonard v. Miner, 120 Cal. 403, the court on page 406 (52 Pac. 655, 656) says:

"Evidence of a contemporary oral agreement between the parties to a bill or note, whereby the order or promise contained in the instrument is rendered null or conditional, or whereby the fact of payment is made to depend upon some contingent future event, comes within the same principle. [The rule excluding parol testimony to vary the terms of a written instrument.]"

It is then said:

"These remarks have no application to cases where the consideration of a promissory note is the subject of inquiry, or to cases of fraud or mistake."

The consideration for the note in this action is one of the matters sought to be presented by that portion of the defendants' amended answer stricken out by the trial court and it is held by an almost unbroken line of authorities that parol testimony is always admissible to show the consideration or want of consideration and that such testimony does not vary or alter the terms of the written contract.

The delivery of the note in question is admitted by the defendants' answer, but the special defense immediately set up therein is sufficient to present to the trial court for consideration, whether such delivery was merely a manual tradition of the instrument and not an absolute and unconditional transfer of the title and property. We know of no way in which this subject can be presented to the court, unless it be by testimony outside of the written words of the instrument itself.

We do not need to hold, however, in this case for the purpose of the decision herein that the negotiable instruments law has made any change as to the admission of testimony showing conditional delivery or delivery for a particular purpose because the California cases which we have heretofore cited satisfactorily show that the facts and circumstances sought to be presented to the trial court, under the allegations contained in the defendants' amended answer, were proper to be presented and taken under consideration by the trial court on the question of whether the note had not been fully discharged and paid by reason of the defendants' having complied with their part of the oral agreement therein set forth.

In this case we are passing simply upon the pleadings and expressing no opinion upon the facts.

For the reasons herein stated the judgment of the trial court will be and the same is hereby ordered reversed, with directions to deny the plaintiff's motion to strike out the portion of the defendants' amended answer setting up the special defenses which we have hereinabove considered.

ALTSCHUL et al. v. ALEXANDER.
(Civ. 4180.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 8, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error — 397(5) — No duty on appellate court to search record for possible error in failing to find on all issues.

Where attention of the appellate court is not directed to any issue on which it is claimed there was a failure to find, nor is reference made to any evidence to support contention that trial court failed to find on all issues, no duty devolves on the appellate court to search the record to discover possible error in that regard.

2. Trial — 397(5) — Failure to find on immaterial issue not error.

In action for failure and refusal to deliver grapes in accordance with contract, and failure to repay a named sum paid on account of purchase price, the failure to find as to truth of an averment that defendant was disappointed in not being able to buy the grapes from third persons to comply with the contract was not error; the issue being immaterial.

3. New trial — 90 — Denial of motion for alleged surprise held without error.

In action for failure and refusal to deliver grapes in accordance with contract, and failure to repay a named sum paid defendant on the purchase price, where plaintiffs' evidence to which defendant objected as hearsay and false and which he contended had taken him by surprise, was brought out by him on cross-examination, and was merely cumulative as to the value of the grapes, there was no error in denying motion.

4. New trial — 108(3) — Denial of motion for newly discovered evidence held without error.

Where newly discovered evidence on which defendant relied on motion for new trial, according to his personal affidavit, would be to the effect that witness who had testified as to the value of the grapes in question had been misinformed and mistaken as to the basis of a settlement of a similar transaction between plaintiffs and defendant, and on which witness had relied as basis for his testimony fixing value in the instant case, but where, in reaching its conclusion, trial court placed no reliance on his testimony and there was no likelihood that the newly discovered evidence would change the result, denial of new trial was not error.

5. Evidence — 543(4) — Foundation held properly laid for testimony by one as expert on values.

Evidence that witness for 22 years had engaged in the fruit and produce business, and had been in the city where grapes in question were marketed for a week almost immediately before the time fixed for their sale, and thereafter had bought grapes from another city over the telephone and by telegraph, laid a foundation for his testimony as an expert on values.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Harry S. Altschul and another, copartners, doing business under the firm name of the Altschul & Ehrlich Company, against San Felici Alexander. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Turnbull, Heffron & Kelley, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment against him in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $2,350.

The substance of the complaint was that defendant agreed to sell to plaintiffs, and plaintiffs agreed to buy from defendant, five cars of grapes, to be delivered at a specified time, for the sum of $72.50 per ton, on account of which contract plaintiffs had paid to defendant the sum of $1,000 cash in advance; that to plaintiffs' damage defendant failed and refused to deliver the grapes in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and also failed to repay to plaintiffs the $1,000 paid by them to defendant on account of the purchase price.

[1, 2] Appellant's first point on his appeal is that the court failed to find on all the issues. However, the attention of this court is not directed to any issue upon which it is claimed that there was such failure by the trial court; nor is reference made to any evidence to support such contention. In such circumstances no duty devolves upon this court to search the record for the purpose of discovering possible error in that regard. Inferentially, however, it appears that the alleged error of which appellant complains in this connection consists in a failure on the part of the trial court to find upon a question whether or not defendant was disappointed in not being able to buy the grapes from third persons, in order that he might comply with the terms of his contract with plaintiffs. Such an averment in the answer constituted no defense and raised no issue. If facts of that nature were to be deemed a valid reason for excusing nonperformance of the provisions of a contract, no reliance could be placed upon any covenant whatsoever being kept, no matter with what assurances or solemnity it may have been agreed upon, nor what consequences may have ensued upon its breach. The rule is well settled that no error may be predicated upon a failure by the trial court to find upon immaterial issues. Souter v. Maguire, 78 Cal. 543, 21 Pac. 183; Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195; Evans v. De Lay, 81 Cal. 104, 22 Pac. 408.

[3, 4] Appellant next contends that the trial court erred in refusing to grant defendant a new trial upon a showing that material evidence offered by plaintiffs was not only hearsay, but that such evidence was false in fact, and that defendant had been taken by surprise thereby; also, that there was newly discovered evidence which defendant wished to introduce should a new trial be granted. The evidence to which appellant objects was brought out by himself on cross-examination of a witness who had testified as to the value of the grapes. Such evidence, however, was merely cumulative. An examination of the record herein discloses the fact that, whereas the testimony of the witness in question showed that the grapes had a certain value, the finding of the trial court in that regard is that the grapes had a lesser value than that testified to by such witness and were of the value as testified to by two other witnesses. The "newly discovered evidence" which defendant proposed to introduce, had a new trial been granted, according to statements contained in an affidavit by defendant personally (and not by the proposed witness), would be to the effect that the witness who had testified to the value of the grapes had been misinformed and was entirely mistaken with reference to the basis of a settlement of a transaction similar to the one between plaintiffs and defendant, and upon which settlement, determining the value of the grapes involved in that matter, the witness had relied in fixing the value of the grapes in the instant case. In reaching its conclusion, it is apparent that the trial court placed no reliance upon the testimony of the witness. Even admitting the incorrectness of the testimony given by the witness on the former trial, and assuming that on a new trial he would either not testify at all, or that, if he were to testify, the evidence would not be favorable to plaintiffs' case, there is no likelihood that a different result would be reached. In such circumstances it would seem clear that no error was committed by the trial court in denying the motion for a new trial. Oberlander v. Fixen & Co., 129 Cal. 690, 62 Pac. 254; People v. Demasters, 109 Cal. 607, 42 Pac. 236; People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 77 Pac. 169; People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 78 Pac. 235.

[5] The last point made by appellant is to the effect that no sufficient foundation was laid for the introduction of testimony given by a certain witness as an expert on values. The evidence, however, shows that the witness, for a period of over 22 years, had been engaged in the fruit and produce business, and that he had been in the city of Fresno, where the grapes in question were to be marketed, for a period of one week almost immediately before the time fixed for their sale, and that thereafter he did his buying from Los Angeles "over the long distance phone and by telegraph." The foundation was clearly sufficient.

The judgment is affirmed.

CREASE et al. v. JARRELL et ux.
(Civ. 4460.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 9, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Sufficiency of evidence to establish fact is primarily for trial court.

The sufficiency of evidence to establish a given fact, even where the law requires proof of that fact to be clear and convincing, is primarily a question for the trial court, and, if there is substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached by trial court, his finding is not reviewable.

2. Easements ⇨17(2)—Sale of lots as bordering on alley held to create alley easement in favor of purchasers.

Where owners laid out a passageway or alley and sold lots as bordering thereon, they created easement in favor of abutting property owners and their successors in interest.

3. Easements ⇨52, 53—Duty of owners of easement to keep it in repair; minority owners may not by private agreement among themselves deprive others of interests.

It is the duty of owners of an easement to keep it in repair, and hence a minority of several property owners in whose favor an easement in an alley existed would not be authorized to speak for all and by the execution of a private agreement deprive them of vested rights by attempting to make their interests dependent upon the performance of a legal duty, as by an agreement that the use of the alley might be refused to any adjoining property owner declining to pay the proportional share of any tax, assessment, or upkeep expense.

4. Easements ⇨27—Alley right held not destroyed by merger.

While under Civ. Code, § 811, an alley easement might have been extinguished by merger had a landowner acquired title to all property enjoying an abutting owner's rights in the use of the alley, together with the way itself, yet ownership of title to a single lot and to the ground upon which the way existed did not destroy the easement of other adjoining lots of abutting owners.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Suit by H. George Crease and others against Edwin A. Jarrell and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, and L. E. Nathan, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Emmons, Aldrich & Heck and R. B. Lambert, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The subject-matter of this action is a strip of real property situate in block 24½ of the Southern addition in the city of Bakersfield, approximately 25 feet wide, running northerly from Blanche street about 150 feet, and thence westerly at right angles the same distance, which it is alleged was dedicated to the use of abutting property owners as an alley more than six years prior to the commencement of these proceedings in April, 1920. On or about March 17th of that year the appellants closed the passageway with fences and prepared the ground for crops, preventing respondents from using the same, whereupon the latter instituted this suit and prayed a decree that it be adjudged an alley by dedication, and an injunction against interference with its use as a passageway by owners of abutting lots. Appellants denied the dedication or existence of an easement and alleged that respondents had had a mere permissive use of the property, conditioned upon the payment by each of a proportionate share of taxes, assessments, and upkeep expenses incident to the maintenance of the alley as a driveway; and that it had previously been expressly agreed that such use might be refused upon failure to comply with these requirements; that appellants were legally justified in closing the driveway to respondents, because the latter had not paid any portion of said expenses, and that a predecessor in interest, the respondent Union Lumber Company, on or about the 23d day of July, 1918, had terminated the privileges of ingress and egress in the property described.

The trial court gave judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal therefrom on the grounds of insufficient evidence of original ownership of Union Lumber Company, of the existence of an easement or right of way, or that a trust was created by the deed hereinafter mentioned, and errors are assigned as to rulings upon the evidence.

It appears from said complaint, and the court found, that all the parties are owners of interests in property situate in blocks 24 and 24½, and that all except the lumber company are in possession and use thereof, which said properties abut on the strip of land in controversy; that the lumber company was the original owner of the land in suit, from whom all the parties hereto derived title, and that on January 23, 1918, said company executed a deed in trust to Josiah A. Engle and wife, for appellants and respondents, of said property, providing that it should be used as an alley, and should be kept open, but that such use might be refused to any adjoining property owner declining to pay the proportional share of any tax, assessment or expense levied against the property. October 11, 1918, the Engles executed to all owners of property in block 24½ a written "Declaration," purporting to convey to them the right to use said strip of land for driveway purposes, and embodying similar requirements.

Subsequent to the execution of said declaration, and on December 1, 1919, the Engles executed and delivered to Edwin A. Jarrell and wife, appellants herein, an agreement for the sale of a 37½-foot frontage in said block 24½, 125 feet deep, which included a portion of the property involved in this suit. Appellants entered into possession, and now contend that they are owners of all the property in controversy, and that as successors in interest Josiah A. Engle and wife they have the right to erect the barricades heretofore mentioned, "after the plaintiffs had failed, refused and neglected and had declared their unwillingness to pay the taxes, assessments, charges and expenses in connection with the maintenance of said alley." Respondents allege in their first cause of action that for more than five years prior to the commencement of this action all the parties (except the lumber company) and their predecessors in interest had been using said driveway without let or hindrance, and that the same is necessary to the free use and occupation of their respective premises. It is further alleged, and the court found, that block 24½ was delineated upon a map recorded in the office of the county recorder November 25, 1898, and that one C. D. Brown, the then owner, laid out said property, and the alley, and that abutting lots of these parties were sold with the agreement that said driveway should be maintained as an incident to the appurtenant properties. Appellants deny these allegations, and assert that they have since 1919 laid out large sums of money in improving and fencing this property, relying upon representations of respondents Persel and the lumber company that none of the respondents had any right to its use on account of the aforesaid defaults, and that respondents Crease and the predecessor in interest of respondents Hershey had for valuable considerations released all their right, title, and interest therein.

[1] It is settled that the sufficiency of evidence to establish a given fact, even where the law requires proof of that fact to be clear and convincing, is primarily a question for the trial court, and, if there is substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached below, the finding is not open to review on appeal. Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 Pac. 432; Spreckels v. State, 30 Cal. App. 363, 158 Pac. 549; Tucker v. P. E. Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 42, 161 Pac. 1147; Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 191 Pac. 913.

[2] Brown testified that in 1908 he and one Howard bought a portion of this block, which they subdivided and built up after they had purchased a portion of block 24; that they platted block 24½ into six pieces, and cut an alley in a northerly direction from Blanche street to the back end of their lot and then westerly to the westerly end of their property; that they sold all the lots to various persons, whom he named, and thereafter by a blank deed sold the alley property to the Union Lumber Company, who later bought two of the lots; that at the westerly line of the alley there was a fence along the line of a walk, leaving space to get into the garage. He stated that Crease's fence was probably built in 1912, and that other lot owners had maintained fences on their back lines for a long time; the fence at the rear of the Engle lot (appellants' property) marked the boundary to the alley. Stone testified that when he went there the alley was in use by delivery boys, garbage men, and others, and that he used it until obstructed by appellants; that it was in daily use as a driveway. Brown when recalled testified that when he subdivided he used a pencil sketch showing the lots and the alley, and that he told purchasers that this alley gave them a back entrance to their property; that he gave them to understand that an alley had been dedicated to the people who bought lots; that subsequently he went to the Union Lumber Company, to Crease and to Engle, and told them that this property was being assessed to him, but that he had been sold out for some time, and did not intend to continue paying the taxes; that he would arrange so that they could take title if they would keep the alley open, and that on August 23, 1916, an agreement was entered into by the lumber company, Crease, and Engle, reciting that the lumber company had foreclosed a mortgage on the alley property, and that in consideration of Crease and Engle paying the taxes and assessments then existing as liens thereon, the company would, upon obtaining a deed, convey the premises to them, provided that such deed should contain a covenant that the property be used as an alley, and that it should be kept open. It was further testified that Brown insisted previously to the execution of such agreement that "all the property owners should share alike as to the expenses, and we put this clause in this agreement so that a particular person who would not pay his portion would be refused the use of the alley, but it should not be closed to the public or to the people who would pay it;" that he intended that if two or more people held it for the adjoining property owners, they should have the right to refuse any particular one the right to use it if he would not pay his share of the expenses. Witness Sherzer of the lumber company testified that when he became acquainted with the property he knew there was an alley to the adjoining lots; that he had told appellants that while he had given Engle a deed to the alley, he believed it was not a deed, because he had considered that the company was nothing more than a trustee for all the people in the alley, and merely desired that the matter be settled so that some one else would attend to the taxes; that he was interested in seeing that Stone always had an easement. He testified that Engle at one time asked him to accept the property back, and to re deed it to Engle without the alley provision, but that he replied that the company then would have no access to its property, whereupon Engle agreed to file a declaration that it would be used for alley purposes, which was done. Legal title to the ground still is in the Engles.

From the foregoing details of the evidence it will be noted that this passageway was laid out, lots bordering thereon were sold, and rights therein accrued long prior to the suggestion of any contingency such as appellants here assert. Sherzer states that he never considered he had any greater right to the alley than anyone else, that the property owners were to be served by the alley when it was first laid out, and that he told Engle that he would get into a lawsuit if he insisted on closing it. We are of opinion that an easement was created by Brown in favor of abutting property owners and their successors in interest which could not be divested by subsequently asserted conditions in a writing between a few of the parties interested. Anderson v. Citizens' etc. Co., 185 Cal. 386, 197 Pac. 113.

[3] It is the duty of the owners of an easement to keep it in repair (Bean v. Stoneman, 104 Cal. 49, 37 Pac. 777, 38 Pac. 39; Durfee v. Garvey, 78 Cal. 546, 21 Pac. 302; Ware v. Walker, 70 Cal. 591, 12 Pac. 475), so that a minority of several property owners would not be authorized to speak for all and by the execution of a private agreement deprive them of vested rights by attempting to make their interest dependent upon the performance of a legal duty (Knoch v. Haizlip, 163 Cal. 146, 124 Pac. 998). In Petitpierre v. Maguire, 155 Cal. 242, 100 Pac. 690, it was held that when the owner of a small tract of land subdivides the same into lots, leaving a street, avenue, way, court, or cul-de-sac between them, opening on a public street, and sells such lots as bounding on the same, he covenants to his grantees or their successors that it is such, and they are entitled to the use thereof as an easement or right of way for purposes of travel, light, and air, and as a means of ingress and egress to their respective lots, and the grantor will not thereafter be heard to deny the same against a grantee or his successors. The court there said:

"Upon the facts stated, the case appears further to fall within the well-settled rule that where one lays out a tract of land owned by him into lots and makes a plan thereof showing streets, and sells according to such plan, lots as bounding on such streets without any limitation, he irrevocably devotes such portions marked as streets, so far as the grantees and their successors are concerned, to use as streets. It can make no difference that the tract so subdivided is small, consisting as here of only one lot two hundred and seventy-five by one hundred feet (see Stone v. Brooks, 35 Cal. 489), or that the street shown is a mere cul-de-sac."

San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 Pac. 405, is to the same effect.

[4] Appellants pronounce the acquisition by the lumber company of the alley property and one lot in block 24½ a merger of dominant and servient estates, and thus seek to establish extinguishment of the servient tenement under the provisions of section 811 of the Civil Code. Had the lumber company acquired title to all the property, enjoying an abutting owner's rights in the use of the alley, together with the way itself, a merger could not successfully have been denied; but the ownership of title to a single lot and to the ground upon which a right of way exists cannot be said to destroy the easement created in favor of all other adjoining lots of respondents which were originally laid out and sold with this benefit attached as a part, at least, of the consideration. However, had the lumber company at one time owned the alley property and all abutting lots, devoting the former to driveway purposes, and subsequently conveying the adjoining lots to the present owners, the case would be the same, since, "where the owner of two tenements sells one of them, or the owner of the entire estate sells a portion of it, the purchaser takes the tenement or portion sold with all the benefits and with all the burdens that appear at the time of the sale to belong to it as between it and the property which the vendor retains." Jersey Farm Co. v. Atlanta Realty Co., 164 Cal. 415, 129 Pac. 594.

It will be unnecessary to consider other points presented by appellants, since the theory upon which this opinion is written renders their decision immaterial. This is particularly true of the objections to the court's rulings upon the introduction of evidence, since all of the evidence to which objections were made would necessarily be admissible upon the theory of the case outlined in this opinion. We find no material inconsistency in the findings which, being sustained by the evidence, as we have indicated, authorize the judgment rendered.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re ROBINSON'S ESTATE.

MATLOCK v. CLARK.

(Civ. 4514.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 14, 1924.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨758(3)—Specifications must point out error; court under no duty to seek error.

A general statement in argument that the pleadings raised several material issues on which there was no finding, without pointing out the errors, held insufficient as a specification of error; the Appellate Court being under no duty to seek the errors.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨32(2)—Evidence held sufficient to show petitioner had some interest in estate.

In proceedings to revoke letters of administration with will annexed issued to one having no interest in the estate, evidence held sufficient to show that petitioner had some interest in the estate.

3. Executors and administrators ⇨19—No waiver of preferential right except as to nominee; failure to contest after nominee's resignation held not to forfeit right.

Where decedent's daughter declined the administration and waived her right in favor of a designated person, she did not thereby waive her right except as to such person, and on his resignation her failure to contest the appointment of another as administrator did not under Code Civ. Proc. § 1383 et seq. forfeit her preferential right to be appointed administratrix.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Mary J. Robinson, deceased. Proceeding by Mattie A. Clark to revoke letters of administration of Paul A. Matlock. From an order revoking letters of administration, the administrator appeals. Affirmed.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, and Thomas K. Case, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ralph C. McComish, H. A. Gabriel, and W. R. Biaggi, all of San Jose, and Hamilton & Lindley, of San Diego, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Paul Matlock, formerly administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Mary J. Robinson, deceased, appeals from an order of the superior court revoking his letters of administration and directing that letters of administration with the will annexed be issued to Mattie A. Clark.

By order of date October 27, 1922, the will of the decedent was admitted to probate, and one L. O. Thomason was appointed administrator with the will annexed, and letters of administration to him were that day issued. Thomason filed an account and report, together with his resignation, on the 20th day of November, 1922. On the 1st day of December, 1922, the account and report of Thomason were approved, his resignation was accepted, and Paul Matlock appointed administrator with the will annexed of said estate. Matlock duly qualified and letters of administration were issued to him on the said 1st day of December, 1922. He entered upon the performance of his duties, and among other things caused notice to creditors to be published. The decree showing due notice to creditors was entered on the 20th day of March, 1923. Thomason and Matlock were not related to the decedent, and Matlock was not interested in the estate at the time when his letters of administration were revoked. On the 2d day of March, 1923, Mattie A. Clark, daughter of the decedent, filed a petition praying that the letters of administration issued to Matlock be revoked and that letters of administration with the will annexed upon said estate be issued to petitioner Mattie A. Clark. This matter was heard after due notice of time and place of hearing. The case was tried upon issues raised by the petition, and by the answer filed by Matlock. Thereupon the court made the order from which this appeal has been taken.

The petition for probate of the will and for appointment of Thomason as administrator with the will annexed was filed on the 11th day of October, 1922. Together with that petition he filed a document signed by Mattie A. Clark wherein she stated that she declined to undertake the administration, waived her right to be appointed administratrix, and requested the court to appoint Thomason. When Matlock filed his petition for letters of administration after the resignation of Thomason, due notice of the application of Matlock and of the time and place of hearing the same was given to Mrs. Clark. Mrs. Clark did not appear in response to that notice. It was only after Matlock had qualified as administrator and had performed a substantial part of his duties as such administrator, that Mrs. Clark sought to revoke Matlock's letters of administration in order that she might be appointed in his place. The sole ground of her petition is that she has a better right to act as administrator with the will annexed of said estate because she is a daughter of the decedent and because Matlock is not related to the decedent and was not nominated by petitioner or any person entitled under the law to administer.

The points urged in support of the appeal are that the trial court failed to find upon material issues; that respondent is no longer interested in the estate of decedent; that respondent having long neglected to apply for letters of administration and having expressly declined to undertake administration of the estate and having waived her right to be appointed administratrix, and having received notice of the hearing of appellant's application for letters, the court erred in revoking the letters of administration granted appellant and appointing respondent.

[1] The argument of counsel for appellant fails to point out any particular in which the findings are defective. They content themselves with a general statement that by reference to the pleadings it will be seen that there were a number of material issues made, and upon which evidence was introduced, upon which there is no finding. This is not a sufficient specification upon which this court should be expected to make a decision. If counsel do not bring to the attention of the court the alleged errors, the court is under no duty to seek for them.

[2] In support of his proposition that respondent is no longer interested in the estate, appellant contends that the evidence shows that the personal property left by deceased consisted of some trivial personal effects (gold bracelets, pins, etc.), and that the only real estate belonging to decedent at the time of her death consisted of a certain lot at Santa Fé Springs, "and that respondent had conveyed that lot to Lena M. Grohs, and had released Mrs. Grohs and her husband from all claims in law and in equity of every kind and character, unless she still had some claim against them or one of them for some royalty on account of production of oil on this lot." But appellant further claims that this royalty right was released by a deed executed by respondent to Mrs. Grohs, which deed is in evidence. It further appears from the testimony of one witness, although rather indefinitely, that there was another lot or parcel of real estate belonging to decedent located "in Santa Fé Springs or vicinity," and being other than the lot described in the deed of Mrs. Clark to Mrs. Grohs. After reading the evidence we are of the opinion that the evidence without any conflict therein proves that Mrs. Clark retained some interest, slight though it may be, in the estate of her mother.

[3] The principal question in the case relates to the right of respondent to withdraw her renunciation and her declination to undertake the administration of this estate, and to have the administrator removed after proceedings in administration had progressed to the point shown in the foregoing statement of facts. Respondent's waiver of her right to be appointed administratrix was included in and was a part of her request for the appointment of Thomason. After it had been acted upon, it might well be considered as an estoppel as between respondent and Thomason. It does not necessarily follow that she would have declined to undertake the administration or would have waived her right to be appointed administratrix except for the purpose of procuring the appointment of Thomason. So far as Matlock is concerned, the question here presented should be considered without regard to the former waiver. As between respondent and Matlock, the only facts properly subject to consideration here are that respondent was served with notice of his application, and did not contest the same. His appointment under these circumstances did not operate as a forfeiture of her preferential right over appellant. The right here asserted by respondent is provided for by sections 1383 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1385 declares that, if the right of the applicant is established, and he is competent, letters of administration must be granted to him, and the letters of the former administrator revoked. It was the opinion of Judge Coffey, of the superior court of San Francisco, that the nomination of another as administrator simply estops the party making the nomination from afterward asserting his right to the prejudice of his own nominee. Estate of King, 4 Coffey, 10. It does not appear that there are any decisions to the contrary in this state. In Estate of Lowe, 178 Cal. 111, 172 Pac. 583, the most recent decision bearing upon the subject of attempted retraction of a waiver of a prior right to letters of administration, the controversy arose between a widow and certain children of the decedent in favor of whom the widow had filed a request for their appointment. It was held under the circumstances stated in the opinion that she had no enforceable right to withdraw that request.

The order is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 14, 1924.)

1. Election of remedies §7(1)—Acts constituting election stated.

Whenever a party entitled to enforce two remedies either institutes an action upon one of such remedies, or performs any act in the pursuit of such remedy whereby he has gained any advantage over the other party or has occasioned the other party any damage, he will be held to have made an election of such remedy and will not be entitled to pursue any other remedy for the enforcement of his right.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Election.]

2. Sales §340—Demand for return of goods to seller held not election not to sue for price.

Where a gasoline purifier was sold on installments, title being retained by the seller, a demand, on default in payments of installments, for the return of the purifier, was not an election not to sue for the purchase price, where buyer sent part of the purifier, retaining the bowl, and seller refused to accept it, and it was immaterial that seller had in its possession, at the time buyer shipped, a bowl of another purifier belonging to the buyer on hand for repairs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ruben S. Schmidt, Judge pro tem.

Action by the De Laval Pacific Company against the United Cleaners' & Dyers' Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Byron Coleman, of San Francisco, and Milton K. Young, Lyndol L. Young, William K. Young, and Forrest F. Murray, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clark, Law & Clay, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant a gasoline purifier, the purchase price being $1,080. Two hundred and fifty dollars of this amount was payable in cash and the balance in monthly payments of $100. The contract of sale provided that the title to the purifier was to remain in the vendor until the purchase price was fully paid, and that in case of the default of the defendant to make any payment as provided by the contract, the plaintiff might take immediate possession of the purifier. Defendant failed to make any payments whatever on the contract except the initial payment of $250. Some months after the date of the delivery of the purifier to defendant, and while defendant was in default in its payments, plaintiff endeavored to collect from defendant the amounts due. The defendant being unable to make the payments, plaintiff demanded of defendant the return of the purifier. In compliance with this demand the defendant shipped from Los Angeles, to plaintiff in San Francisco, all parts of the purifier with the exception of the bowl, which was a substantial part of the machine. The plaintiff, on ascertaining that the bowl was not shipped with the other parts of the purifier, refused to accept the shipment and returned it to the defendant. Thereupon plaintiff instituted this action to recover the amount due on the contract. The court found the facts substantially as above recited and gave judgment in favor of the defendant.

The theory, apparently, upon which the court rendered judgment in defendant's favor, was that plaintiff, by demanding the return of the purifier, had elected to take possession of the property under the contract, and therefore that it could not, after electing to retake the property, abandon such proceeding and sue for the recovery of the amount due on the purchase price thereof.

The only question, therefore, involved in this appeal is whether the plaintiff, by demanding a return of the purifier, placed itself in such a position that it could not thereafter maintain this action. It is the respondent's contention that under the contract of sale the plaintiff had open to it two remedies, one whereby it might recover possession of the property conditionally sold, and the other whereby it might recover the balance due on the purchase price thereof; that by demanding the return of the property, it elected to pursue the first-mentioned remedy; and that having made its election, it could not thereafter abandon this remedy and invoke the other. In other words, respondent contends that the demand of the plaintiff for the return of the property amounted to an election of this remedy, and that it must confine itself to the remedy so elected for the enforcement of its claim against defendant.

[1, 2] Just what acts, on the part of one having two inconsistent remedies for the enforcement of a right, amount to an election of a remedy, is not always clear. The commencement of an action to enforce one of such remedies is generally considered sufficient to estop a party from thereafter pursuing the other remedy. 9 R. C. L. 960. Although it has also been held that "the more reasonable rule is that the mere bringing of an action which has been dismissed before judgment, and in which no element of estoppel in pais has arisen, that is, where no advantage has been gained or no detriment has been occasioned, is not an election." Id. 961; Brice v. Walker, 50 Cal. App. 49, 194 Pac. 721. "The doctrine of election of remedies is generally regarded as being an application of the law of estoppel." 9 R. C. L. 957. The rule might therefore be stated as follows: Whenever a party entitled to enforce two remedies either institutes an action upon one of such remedies or performs any act in the pursuit of such remedy, whereby he has gained any advantage over the other party, or he has occasioned the other party any damage, he will be held to have made an election of such remedy, and will not be entitled to pursue any other remedy for the enforcement of his right. Applying this rule to the present action, we might well ask the question: Did the plaintiff, by demanding the return of the gasoline purifier, and by the acts of the parties following such demand, gain any advantage over the defendant, or occasion the defendant any damage? We think this question must be answered in the negative. Upon the demand being made, the defendant shipped to plaintiff certain parts of the purifier, which plaintiff rightfully returned to defendant for the reason that the bowl of the machine was not among the parts shipped. Upon the return of this property to the defendant, it had in its possession everything it possessed at the time the demand was made. No advantage was gained over the defendant, nor was the defendant occasioned any damage by these transactions. The plaintiff was therefore well within its rights, in our opinion, when, upon defendant's refusal to comply with the demand, it returned the property shipped and brought suit for the recovery of the amount due upon the contract.

The court further found that defendant failed to return the bowl to the plaintiff for the reason that "plaintiff was holding in San Francisco a bowl belonging to another purifier of the defendant." It appears from the evidence that this second bowl had been sent to plaintiff for the purpose of having the same repaired. There is nothing in the findings of the court, nor in the evidence, that would tend to show that the plaintiff was holding this second bowl unlawfully, or for any other purpose than that for which it had been sent to the plaintiff by the defendant. The fact that the plaintiff had in its possession the second bowl, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, could not possibly afford the defendant any legal excuse for its failure to return to plaintiff the whole of the property demanded. For these reasons we are of the opinion that judgment should be reversed and that plaintiff should be awarded judgment in its favor for the balance due on the purchase price of the purifier as found by the court in its findings.

Judgment is therefore reversed, with directions to the lower court, upon the findings, to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $830, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from December 15, 1920, for a reasonable attorney's fee as provided in the agreement, and for costs of suit.

SUTTER-BUTTE CANAL CO. v. GREAT WESTERN POWER CO. OF CAL-IFORNIA et al. (Civ. 2692.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 16, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 10, 1924.)

1. Waters and water courses — 254—Right to flow of water into ditch "real property."

The right to have water flow from a river into a ditch is real property.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Real Property.]

2. Venue — 16—Action to restrain interference with flow of water into ditch may be brought in either county where water distributed.

Under Const. art. 6, § 5, an action to restrain an interference with the flow of water from a river into a ditch through which it is carried and distributed in two counties may be brought in either county.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by the Sutter-Butte Canal Company against the Great Western Power Company of California and another. From an order denying motion for change of venue, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Guy C. Earl and W. H. Spaulding, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Isaac Frohman, of San Francisco, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Henry Ingram, of Gridley, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from an order denying defendants' motion for a change of venue.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is a public utility engaged in the sale and distribution of water to the inhabitants of Butte and Sutter counties for irrigation and domestic uses; that it is the owner of a canal heading at a point on Feather river in Butte county and running thence through that county and Sutter county; that it is the owner of the right to appropriate, divert through said canal, and use 2,500 second feet of the water naturally flowing in Feather river; that an appropriation of 2,000 second feet of said water was made at the head of said canal in the year 1902 and that an additional appropriation of 500 second feet thereof was made in 1918 at a point in Sutter county where plaintiff pumps water from the river into its aforesaid canal; and that the defendants claim said water adversely to plaintiff and "threaten to impound and store and take and divert large quantities of the waters of said Feather river above the said diverting works of plaintiff at times when there will remain less water flowing in the said river than the said quantity so appropriated and used by plaintiff, and so as to prevent plaintiff from diverting and using the same." The prayer is for a decree quieting plaintiff's title to the 2,500 second feet of water and enjoining defendants from interfering with plaintiff's use thereof.

The defendants demanded that the trial of the action be had in Butte county on the ground "that the cause of said action is for the determination of an estate or interest in real property and that the subject of said action, to wit, such real property and interest therein is situated, particularly the alleged property right in and to the alleged right of appropriation of 2,000 cubic feet per second of the waters of the Feather river, as alleged in said complaint, in the county of Butte, state of California, and that said real property so alleged in said complaint to be the property of said plaintiff is a separate and distinct property and property right entirely situated in said county of Butte, state of California, and no part of said property or property right is situated outside of the said county of Butte."

[1, 2] Article 6, § 5, of the Constitution, provides:

"That all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, affected by such action or actions, is situated."

The parties are agreed that the property right asserted by plaintiff is real property. In Lower Kings River Water Ditch Co. v. Kings River & Fresno Canal Co., 60 Cal. 408, where the facts alleged were similar to those of the instant case, the court said:

"Water courses are either natural or artificial. Plaintiff's ditch was an artificial water course. * * * The right of plaintiff, as stated in its complaint, to have the water flow in the river to the head of its ditch, is an incorporeal hereditament, appertaining to its water course. Granting that plaintiff does not own the corpus of the water until it shall enter its ditch, yet the right to have it flow into the ditch appertains to the ditch. Real property consists of land, that which is affixed to land, and that which is incidental or appurtenant to land. Civil Code, 658. If the water course, consisting of the bed and banks of the trench, and of the water therein, be real property, the right to have water flow to it is incidental and appurtenant thereto. The acts complained of are preventing water from flowing in plaintiff's ditch; the ditch is located in both counties; therefore the subject of the action is in both counties, and the action might have been brought in either."

To the same effect are the cases of Last Chance, etc., Co. v. Emigrant Co., 129 Cal. 277, 61 Pac. 960; and Yolo County Consol. Water Co. v. Adamson, 22 Cal. App. 493, 135 Pac. 48. In Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 716, 726, 93 Pac. 858, 863 (15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 359) it is said:

"The right to have water flow from a river into a ditch is real property; and so also is the water while flowing in the ditch. * * * A ditch for carrying water is real estate."

See, also, E. C. Horst Co. v. New Blue Pt. Min. Co., 177 Cal. 631, 640, 171 Pac. 417.

Since the property involved is real estate, the plaintiff, under the constitutional provision quoted, had the right to bring the action in any county in which any part of such real estate is situated.

Appellant contends that since plaintiff's alleged right to 2,500 second feet of water was initiated by two separate appropriations one in each county, the complaint states two separate causes of action. The merits of this contention need not be considered, because, if the appropriation made in Sutter county be eliminated, it appears from the other allegations of the complaint that plaintiff is diverting 2,000 second feet of water into its canal, through which the water is carried and distributed in both counties. Under the authorities cited, an action to quiet title to this 2,000 second feet of water alone could have been brought in either county.

The order is affirmed.

CORDS v. GOODWIN et al. (Civ. 4441.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 19, 1924.)

Mortgages $\Leftrightarrow$ 415(1)—Holder held entitled to foreclose mortgage as to land claimed by third party.

In action to cancel an agreement for satisfaction of purchase-money mortgage on payment of less than the amount of the mortgage because of shortage in acreage, to reform a release of the mortgage executed pursuant to agreement, and to foreclose the mortgage, in which no deficiency judgment was asked against mortgagor and parties who claimed under him, and relief sought was limited to a foreclosure of the mortgage against an overlap of which third persons had adverse possession, the mortgagor and parties who claimed under him held not entitled to a nonsuit on the ground that plaintiff failed to prove right of possession of the disputed strip, since plaintiff was entitled to enforce the mortgage against such strip, and to acquire whatever title he could obtain through a foreclosure of the mortgage, and thus place himself in a position to contest the title with third party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by R. Cords, Jr., against J. W. Goodwin, the Wickenden Land Company, and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed as to defendant Wickenden Land Company, and reversed as to other defendants.

C. M. Fickert, of San Francisco, for appellant.

CONREY, P. J. The object of this action was to cancel a certain agreement relating to the satisfaction of a mortgage, to reform a release of the mortgage executed in pursuance of said agreement, and thereupon to foreclose said mortgage. The ground on which the relief was asked was that the agreement and release were given in consequence of a mutual mistake of the parties. The present appeal is from a judgment of nonsuit. The respondents have not appeared herein.

The principal facts of the case are stated in the decision of the Supreme Court on a former appeal. Cords v. Goodwin, 173 Cal. 61, 159 Pac. 138. The mortgage was given by defendant Goodwin, to plaintiff's assignor Tillmann, to secure one-third of the purchase price of the mortgaged property, which was sold to the mortgagor at the price of $150 per acre, it being stated in the contract that the tract contained 797 acres of land. The mortgagor and the mortgagee afterwards agreed that there was a shortage of 92.99 acres in the quantity of land of which the mortgagor had obtained possession. Thereupon they entered into an agreement under which the mortgagor paid that proportion of the debt which corresponded to the proportion of acreage which he had received, leaving the remainder to be paid only to the extent that possession of the disputed acreage (92.99 acres) should be obtained by the mortgagor. In prosecuting this action to reform the release of mortgage and to foreclose the mortgage, the plaintiff alleged that in fact there had never been any adverse claim to any of the mortgaged premises as described in the mortgage and agreements of the parties, and that therefore the mortgage indebtedness and the mortgage lien were in full force and effect according to their original terms, save only to the extent of the payments actually made.

In its decision of the former appeal the Supreme Court determined that upon the facts shown by the evidence there was a shortage of area in section 28 sufficient to account for 13.71 of the total claimed shortage of 92.99 acres, and that by reason thereof the mortgagor is entitled to a rebate of a stated amount on the purchase price and a corresponding reduction on the mortgage debt by reason of this deficiency in the area of that section. This left an alleged shortage of 79.28 acres in the several tracts lying in section 27, described in the deed and mortgage. This shortage was caused by the encroachment of the owner of Tinaquaic Rancho, adjoining upon the easterly side of section 27. Many years ago, in establishing the boundaries which he claimed, the owner of that rancho set fences upon the westerly boundary thereof adjoining section 27. These fences overlap the boundaries of the subdivisions of section 27 far enough to include said 79.28 acres. This land is properly within the boundaries of the description contained in the mortgage, but the purchaser, Goodwin, has never obtained possession thereof. The Supreme Court recognized the difficulty in final determination of the case as then before the court for decision, which difficulty arose from the fact that the owners of said adjoining rancho, who were in possession of the overlap included within the mortgage description, were not parties to the action.

"The defendants have acquired the record title to the land included in the overlap, but have not received possession. If the judgment stands in its present condition we cannot say that the defendants may not hereafter be able to obtain possession of this overlap. The mortgage debt is not fully paid. If the defendants should succeed in obtaining possession of the overlap, or if the plaintiff should succeed in procuring it for them, he would be entitled to enforce his mortgage for the balance thereof unpaid and chargeable to this overlap, against the land included in the overlap."

The case was sent back for a new trial solely with respect to the land described in the mortgage lying easterly of the fence referred to in the Flournoy survey as the westerly line of the Tinaquaic Rancho. The Supreme Court ordered:

"Upon such new trial the court below is directed to allow the pleadings to be amended, to bring in as new parties the persons claiming the said overlap and thereupon to determine whether or not the present defendants, in virtue of their title derived from Tillmann, are entitled to possession of said overlap and if it concludes that they are so entitled, to enforce said mortgage against the land by foreclosing the same for the amount of land included in the overlap at the agreed price of $150 per acre."

Thereafter in the superior court the complaint was amended, and "the Wickenden Land Company" was brought in as an additional party to the action, it being alleged that said company claimed some interest in said land, but that such claim or interest, if any, was subject and subordinate and subsequent to the lien of said mortgage. "The Wickenden Land Company" (answering as Wickenden Company) by its answer alleged that at the time of the execution of the mortgage and for a long time prior thereto and ever since it has been and now is the owner of all of said tract of 92.99 acres, and that its claim to said land is prior and superior to the lien of said mortgage. The other defendants denied that they have or claim any interest in or to said parcel of 92.99 acres. At the conclusion of the presentation of evidence on behalf of the plaintiff at the second trial, the Wickenden Company moved for a judgment of dismissal and nonsuit as to it, which motion was granted. Appellant concedes that this was a correct order because the court was not authorized to determine adverse possession issues in an action to foreclose a mortgage.

But the defendant Goodwin and the defendants Holton and Santa Maria Petroleum & Pipe Line Company, claiming under Goodwin certain interests in the land conveyed by Tillmann to Goodwin, also moved for non-suit "on the ground, that the evidence introduced has not at all established the complaint, or tends to substantiate the issues pointed out by the Supreme Court as to what we should consider here." The court also granted the motion for nonsuit as made by these last-named defendants. In this we think that the court erred. It is stated by counsel for appellant that no deficiency judgment is asked against Goodwin, the maker of the mortgage, and that the plaintiff's relief, both by his complaint and by admissions and stipulations at the trial, is confined to a foreclosure of the mortgage against the mortgage security. It may be that the holders of the record title obtained under the conveyance made by plaintiff's assignor to Goodwin will be able to recover all of this land in an action against the Wickenden Company or its successor, if any, claiming to be the owner of said disputed parcel of land. If said holders of the record title are entitled to so recover, then, under the terms of the mortgage and supplementary agreement, the mortgage is enforceable against said land for that portion of the unpaid portion of the mortgage debt as to which the matter was left open by the Supreme Court's decision. If respondent Goodwin and those claiming under him do not intend to assert any claim of ownership in said land, they cannot be injured by a decree which will permit the plaintiff to acquire whatever title he can obtain through a foreclosure of the mortgage, and thus place himself in a position to contest the title with the adverse claimants.

The judgment of nonsuit in favor of defendant Wickenden Company is affirmed. The judgment against the plaintiff and in favor of the other defendants named therein is reversed.

In re STOVER. (Civ. 4843.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 20, 1924.)

Attorney and client —Conclusion of want of showing as to moral character held justified.

Where applicant for admission to practice law spent a great deal of time practicing with dice in a cigar stand, was known to police detectives as a "dice shark," had been twice arrested for cheating in dice games but discharged because evidence was deemed insufficient, and had engaged as a partner in a brokerage business without accounting to his copartner for copartner's share of certain profits, conclusion of board of bar examiners that he had not satisfied board as to his moral character held warranted.

Application by Ferdinand F. Stover for admission to practice law after refusal of Board of Bar Examiners to issue certificate. Denied.

Theo. L. Breslauer, of San Francisco, for applicant.

Eugene D. Bennett and John J. Goldberg, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This matter was referred to Willard W. Shea, Esq., to take testimony and report the facts to this court. His report is adopted as part of this opinion and is as follows:

"Pursuant to the order of your honorable court, the undersigned commissioner, appointed by the court to take testimony in the above-entitled matter has the honor to submit the following as his report:

"The petitioner, Ferdinand F. Stover, was a candidate for admission to the bar of the state of California in the examination conducted by the state board of bar examiners in June, 1923. Although he showed in that examination that he possessed the necessary qualifications of learning, the board reported that 'after a full consideration we are unable to certify that the applicant has satisfied us as to his moral character, and for that reason alone we are unable to issue the usual complete certificate.' Subsequent to the above report Mr. Stover filed a new application to practice as an attorney and counselor at law, by this court. This application was opposed by the bar association of San Francisco, and, under date of December 17, 1923, the parties appeared in court, and the undersigned was appointed to take testimony and report facts.

"Hearings were held on December 27, 1923, and January 2 and 23, 1924.

"The following witnesses were sworn and testified for the petitioner: John Goss, O. J. Boden, Charles J. O'Connor, Theodore L. Breslauer, Harold P. Nelson and Ferdinand F. Stover.

"For the objector the following witnesses were called and examined: Albert L. Shepston, C. Meinberg, Frederick W. Kant, Carroll Single, Thomas J. Curtis, Edward J. Wis-cotchill and Hon. Walter Perry Johnson.

"From the testimony adduced and documentary evidence presented, your commissioner finds the facts as follows:

"That during the month of August, 1921, petitioner was twice arrested for alleged cheating in dice games in the stores of the United Cigar Company but was discharged because the evidence was deemed insufficient to convict.

"That during the same month he was arrested for attempting to 'short change' the cashier in a restaurant but that charge was also dismissed.

"That about that time the petitioner spent a great deal of time 'practicing' with dice in a cigar stand in which the witness Meinberg was employed.

"That the petitioner was then known to the two police department detectives who testified as a 'dice shark.'

"That subsequently petitioner operated a small brokerage business in which he was engaged chiefly in buying and selling cigar stands. That in the month of November, 1921, he sold to W. G. Peterson, a seafaring man, one half interest in this business for $750.00 and in July, 1922, petitioner filed suit against the said Peterson for a dissolution of the then unprofitable partnership. Peterson filed a cross-complaint alleging that the petitioner had carried on certain independent transactions and had not accounted to the partnership for the profits thereof, and he was awarded a judgment on the cross-complaint for $247. In making this award Hon. Walter Perry Johnson, who tried the case, in a letter to the parties under date of June 7, 1923, stated:

"I am clearly of the view that plaintiff's conduct towards his partner is condemned by the law no less than by good morals; and that he must be held to account for the partner's share of the secret profits made in the two transactions mentioned."

"Judge Johnson subsequently explained that by the term 'secret profits' he did not mean that the transactions were entirely unknown to Peterson but that they were such transactions that the profits thereof should have been turned in as profits of the partnership."

While the facts, as above set forth, are quite different, we are of the opinion that the language used by the Supreme Court in Re Wells, 174 Cal. 467, at 476, 163 Pac. 657, 661, is also applicable here:

"While this conduct may not show great depravity of character, we think it must be admitted that it indicates in the respondent a want of that sincerity and integrity which the law demands of those who are to be allowed the privilege of practicing law."

The findings of the commissioner are sufficient to support the conclusion of the board of bar examiners, and the application is therefore denied.

In re HANLON.

BERG v. LUDINGHOUSE.

(Civ. 4728.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 15, 1924.)

1. Wills ⚡163(1)—Evidence held insufficient to show incapacity.

In will contest, evidence as to testamentary incapacity held not to fill the requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 1835, defining satisfactory evidence.

2. Wills ⚡166(7)—Mere position to exercise undue influence does not warrant finding thereof.

Mere proof that daughter was in a position to exercise undue influence over the mind of testatrix does not alone warrant a jury or court in making a finding that a will perfectly valid on its face is invalid because obtained by undue influence.

3. Wills ⚡163(2)—Any presumption of undue influence lasts only until direct evidence given on the subject.

If the fact that a daughter of testatrix stood in the position of a fiduciary agent raised a presumption that a gift to her by will was obtained under undue influence, such presumption would last only until direct evidence was given on the subject.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ellen Hanlon, deceased. Contest of will by Agnes Berg as against Mamie Ludinghouse, proponent. From a judgment setting aside the will, the proponent appeals. Reversed.

Wm. T. Eickhoff, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Clayton H. Garvey, of San Francisco, John D. Whitton, of Paris, France, and Leo H. Shapiro and Alex. Sheriffs, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. After the death of Ellen Hanlon, when her purported will was offered for probate, one of her daughters, Agnes Berg, filed an objection and protest against the will being admitted to probate. Thereafter a trial of the contest was had, and a judgment went for the contestant, and the proponent has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In her attack the contestant specified two grounds: One that at the time of the execution of the will the decedent was mentally incompetent to make, execute, or subscribe a will; and, second, that at the time of the execution of the will the decedent was acting under the undue influence of various persons, and, in particular, Mamie Ludinghouse, another married daughter.

In her opening brief the appellant made the point that there was no conflict in the testimony, and that the testimony adduced at the trial was such that it fails to support the judgment on either theory. In her reply to this point the respondent sets forth by question and answer the testimony which she claims supports the judgment on the basis of undue influence. We shall take up these two theories separately in the order stated in the respondent's brief.

As to the first theory the respondent claims that the evidence showed "that Ellen Hanlon was feeble in health, suffering under disease, aged and infirm, and that for the past year of her life at least that she was sinking rapidly both physically and mentally; that for some years prior to her death she was suffering from a fatal malady, namely, a tumor; that she was being constantly doped with opiates to relieve her terrible pain and suffering, and that the doses were given stronger and oftener as she got worse; and that at no time was she free from the effect of these opiates." It was further testified that the decedent was of unsound mind, and that she did not understand the act she was doing; that her answers were not responsive to the questions asked of her; that at times she had no mind at all, and did not know anything, and that her mind rambled and wandered; that her memory was gone; that she was mentally incompetent; and that the morphine was removed from her reach for fear she would commit suicide; and that Mamie Ludinghouse had herself admitted that "her mother was off and was not responsible for anything she did." And the respondent claims that evidence was introduced showing that the statements of the testatrix proved that her feelings toward her children, particularly to her son Mark, were far different from the feeling represented by the will.

Looking back over the summary just stated there was no evidence that during the last year of her life the decedent was sinking rapidly mentally nor that she was being constantly doped with opiates, nor that the doses were given stronger and oftener as she got worse, nor that the increased doses were given prior to the date that the will was made. Neither was there testimony that the decedent was at no time free from the effects of opiates, but, on the other hand, the opiates referred to consisted of morphine sulphate in one-quarter grain tablets, which were administered one tablet at a time three times daily, except when the patient was in a spasm of pain, which event occurred comparatively seldom. A prescription for one hundred tablets was filled September 13, 1920, and the will was made three days later; the next prescription was filled October 26, 1920. When the patient was under the influence of the opiate there were times when she had no mind at all and did not know anything, and her mind rambled and wandered, and her memory was gone, and she was mentally incompetent. When she was not under the influence of the opiate there is no testimony of any witness that such condition existed. The statement that the morphine was removed from the decedent's reach for fear she would commit suicide did not enlighten the jury as to whose fear was considered, nor what the fear was based on. The admission of Mamie Ludinghouse that her mother was off and not responsible for anything she did was possibly competent cross-examination of Mrs. Ludinghouse, but the statement was not testified to in any manner showing that Mrs. Ludinghouse had made such a remark as meaning otherwise than that such was her mother's condition when under the influence of the opiate.

During the several years she was afflicted the record makes it clear that the decedent did at times suffer severely; furthermore, that at some of those times opiates were given in large doses; and that, while the patient was under the influence of the large doses of the opiates, her mind was greatly disturbed, but in this connection there is not a particle of evidence in the record that on the date the decedent made her will, or on any date immediately prior thereto, she had suffered a spasm of pain or had taken any extra or excessive doses of the opiates.

Each side called several witnesses as intimate acquaintances, and propounded to the witnesses a question asking the opinion of the witness as to the mental sanity of the decedent. No one of the witnesses called by the respondent gave a frank, free, full, direct answer to the question; but each one sought to limit, modify, or vary his answer. After each one had so answered, no one of the witnesses proceeded to state any fact or facts showing his or her answer to have any support as being based on any occurrence which would tend in the least to justify such an opinion. Neither in connection with the foregoing opinion evidence, nor in the other evidence introduced, was there a single trace of evidence to the effect that the decedent was ever at any time a fool, or that she showed any traces of any kind of insanity. Her doctor testified that she showed traces of senility. As the decedent was at the time 77 years of age, the doctor's testimony went no further than to state in medical language that the decedent was getting old.

In connection with this part of the case the respondent iterates and reiterates that the will of the decedent was unnatural. To what extent it was unnatural the respondent does not enlighten us. The decedent left an estate consisting of $7,000, and she left eight children. For a period of four years immediately preceding her death she was an inmate of the home of Mrs. Ludinghouse, we may say, the sole devisee. During that time she had a small income, and during the same period she was incurring the expenses of doctors, medicines, nurses, etc. There is evidence in the record that by reason of the long sickness the patient had become afflicted with malodorous sores. No other child appears to have asked for or sought the privilege of caring for the deceased. To what extent, during her lifetime, she paid Mrs. Ludinghouse for her care and treatment does not appear in the record in any accurate set of figures. Had the whole estate been left and devised to Mrs. Ludinghouse, not by way of gift, but merely by way of payment, it would then appear that Mrs. Ludinghouse would be receiving a compensation less than the charge of ordinary hospitals. However, the will left to Mark Hanlon the sum of $40 per month during the period of, and until the settlement of, the estate of the decedent, not exceeding two years. This bequest, together with the costs of administration, reduced the estate to a figure of $5,000 or thereabouts, and it is further made to appear that it was not unnatural that the decedent should have left to Mrs. Ludinghouse the bulk of her estate. Mark Hanlon, a son, had for some years received gratuities from his mother. Some witnesses said he was a drunk, other witnesses said that he was suffering from tuberculosis. His mother, by her will, left him $40 per month for a limited period, and stated as she did so that when he learned that the remittance was to continue for only a short time that he would then make arrangements to care for himself. Considering all of the facts, we are unable to say that the will was in the least unnatural.

[1] Dr. Dannebaum declined to testify that he visited the patient on September 16, 1920, the date the will was made. No witness testified that on that date the decedent suffered from any paroxysm of pain; no witness gave any evidence to the effect that on that particular date the decedent was mentally incompetent. All of the testimony tendered by the respondent was in the nature of indirect evidence. It requires only a most cursory reading of the same to impress one to the effect that the evidence does not fill the requirements of section 1835 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides:

"That evidence is deemed satisfactory which ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind. Such evidence alone will justify a verdict. Evidence less than this is denominated slight evidence."

[2, 3] Passing to the second ground of the contest it will suffice to remark that the evidence does not purport to disclose a single word or a single act on the part of Mamie Ludinghouse showing the exercise of, or an attempt to exercise, any undue influence over the mind of her mother. The utmost that can be said in that connection is that the evidence shows that she was in a position to exercise undue influence. But that circumstance standing alone does not warrant a jury or a court in making a finding that a will, perfectly valid on its face, is invalid because the same was obtained by the exercise of undue influence. We note that counsel call attention to the fact that Mrs. Ludinghouse did, on the date that the will was executed and for some time prior thereto, stand in the position of a fiduciary agent of her mother, and that by the terms of the will she received a gift from her mother during the term of that relationship, and that counsel thereupon predicate the claim that it will be presumed that the gift was obtained under undue influence. Not conceding that such is the rule of law in this state, nevertheless such presumption would last only until direct evidence was given on the subject. That direct evidence was given by Mrs. Ludinghouse. She tendered herself as a witness, and was subjected to a direct examination and cross-examination. After she had been fully examined, not a trace of undue influence was elicited.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Injunction ☞137(4)—Preliminary injunction will not issue in doubtful case.

A preliminary injunction will not issue in a doubtful case.

2. Injunction ☞137(4)—Refusal of preliminary injunction on ground that outcome of final hearing doubtful held warranted.

In railroad's action to enjoin the state from constructing a highway across a strip of land which the railroad claimed to have purchased for right of way purposes, in which the defendants denied that the railroad owned the land, and on the hearing on plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction, produced evidence that the general public had continuously and uninterruptedly used the land as a road for more than 20 years, and that for more than 6 years thereof the road had constituted a county road, that railroad had made no protest until 8 weeks after the work of construction had commenced, refusal of preliminary injunction held proper.

3. Injunction ☞135—Granting or refusing of preliminary injunction discretionary with court.

A preliminary injunction may not be had as a matter of right, but the granting or refusing of such an injunction rests in the sound discretion of the court.

Action by the Hueneme, Malibu & Port Los Angeles Railway against A. B. Fletcher, as Director of the Public Works of the State of California and Chief of the Division of Highways thereof, and others. From order refusing preliminary injunction, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

WORKS, J. On November 24, 1906, one Joseph H. Call and his wife conveyed to plaintiff a strip of land 60 feet wide across their rancho as a right of way for a railroad. No construction work was ever done upon this right of way. Ten years later Call and his wife deeded to the county of Los Angeles a strip across the rancho, also 60 feet wide, as a right of way for a highway. Nearly 15 years after the deed to plaintiff, the Calls conveyed to the state of California a strip across the rancho 80 feet wide as a right of way for a state highway. The parcels conveyed by these three deeds, except for the greater width of the parcel last conveyed, are practically coterminous and coincident with each other, although each departs from each of the others occasionally along the side lines. The deed to the state recites that it is "subject to any right of way heretofore conveyed by the grantors to" plaintiff. After the conveyance to the state the strip described in its deed was entered upon by defendants, under authority of the state, for the purpose of constructing a state highway along it. Entry was at the same time made upon the parcels formerly conveyed by the Calls to plaintiff and to the county, this being so necessarily because of the practical identity of the three pieces. Defendants then commenced, and thereafter for some time prosecuted, the work of constructing a state highway along and over the ground covered by the three rights of way, in so far as they are identical. The entry upon the property was made and the construction work was prosecuted without the commencement of any proceeding in eminent domain for the purpose of condemning any interest which plaintiff may yet retain under the deed of 1906. This action was commenced for the purpose of enjoining defendants from taking plaintiff's property in the right of way described in the deed last mentioned without authority of law and, particularly, without the commencement of a suit in eminent domain for the purpose of condemning it. Upon the filing of the complaint the trial court issued its restraining order against defendants, accompanied by an order to show cause why a preliminary injunction should not issue. Upon the hearing pursuant to this order to show cause the court made its order refusing a preliminary injunction. From this order plaintiff appeals.

The Supreme Court, in the recent case of Jacobsen v. Superior Court, 219 Pac. 986, has enunciated the rule that real property cannot be taken from its owner for a public use without condemnation proceedings. Appellant argues the present appeal as if the question passed upon in the opinion cited were the question presented here, but such is not the case. It is true that a right of way was conveyed to appellant in 1906. It is true that the later deed to the state was subject to the deed of 1906. It is not true, however, that the record shows any present title in appellant under the deed of the year named, or otherwise. The alleged title of appellant is put in issue directly under the pleadings. To the averment in the complaint that appellant is the owner of the right of way conveyed by the deed of 1906, respondents interpose direct denial. The question of title in the appellant is therefore in dispute in the case. Not only so, but all the other equities of the complaint are also denied. Except for the allegation as to appellant's title, the only equities set forth in that pleading are contained in a paragraph which reads:

"Before the commencement of this action, defendants, without plaintiff's consent and against its will, entered in and upon the property of plaintiff herein described and commenced the construction thereon and thereover of a road for public highway purposes, and defendants are now engaged in constructing over and across this property a public road for state highway purposes, and in the construction of such road will take and appropriate the larger portion thereof, the exact quantity of which defendants propose to and will take is unknown to plaintiff; that such portions as are not taken will be segregated from the portion taken and will be damaged to such extent that it will be of no value."

Responsive to this allegation is the following paragraph of the answer:

"Deny that prior to the commencement of this action said defendants or either of them, without plaintiff's consent and against its will, or without plaintiff's consent or against its will, entered in and upon said property alleged therein as belonging to said plaintiff, or that any construction whatsoever was or is without said plaintiff's consent and against its will or without plaintiff's consent or against its will; deny that said defendants or either of them are engaged in constructing over and across said property, a public road for highway purposes with exception of a portion thereof, and deny that in the construction of such road said defendants or either of them will take and appropriate or take or appropriate any portion thereof belonging to said plaintiff; deny that any portions of said property so described will in any manner whatsoever damage said plaintiffs or that any damage will result therefrom at all."

The answer also contains various affirmative allegations which form a basis for the showing made by respondents, by affidavits, at the hearing under the order to show cause.

At the hearing various affidavits were presented in support of the contentions of the respective parties to the action. When added to the state of the pleadings, some of the matters set forth in the affidavits are distinctly worthy of note. It appears from the affidavits offered upon the part of respondents that the entry of the latter upon the right of way was made by means of a large body of men, equipped with heavy road-building machinery, including a steam shovel; that the entry was made 8 weeks before any notice or protest to respondents from appellant, and that during that time respondents openly and notoriously proceeded with construction work on the proposed state highway, with the expenditure thereon of considerable sums of money; that since 1916, or for a period of more than 5 years, the county of Los Angeles had, without protest from appellant, maintained a highway across the Call rancho upon a strip of land practically coincident with the rights of way granted by Call and his wife to appellant, to the county and to respondents, and that the highway had been constantly and extensively used during that time by the general public by means of hundreds of vehicles; that during that period the highway maintained by the county had been used by no person or corporation other than the county of Los Angeles and the general public; and that from 1905 to 1916 the general public had continuously and uninterruptedly used, for purposes of travel, a road across the Call rancho over the ground occupied by the highway maintained by the county since 1916. The affidavits presented by appellant show that it was the ultimate intention of appellant to build a railroad along the railroad right of way across the Call rancho, thence across the rancho Malibu into Ventura county; that appellant had expended a sum in excess of $300,000 in the acquisition of rights of way, surveys, construction of roadbeds, laying of ties and rails, in the prosecution of its railroad enterprise; that the right of way occupied by respondents was necessary in order to enable appellant to construct its railroad; that appellant has been unable to complete its railroad because of the late war, but that it intends to do so at the earliest possible time; that the roadway traveled by the general public from 1905 forward and maintained by the county of Los Angeles from 1916 forward was originally constructed by the individual who afterward organized appellant and who owned practically all the shares of its stock, and that the maintenance of the road by the county was permissive on the part of plaintiff.

Upon the facts thus averred in the pleadings and sworn to in the affidavits, respondents make the following points, omitting two later to be mentioned:

(1) "A temporary injunction will never be granted to disturb and interfere with a public road which has already been completed before the injunction was asked."

This point is based upon the fact that a highway has been maintained practically along the three rights of way since 1905, and has been used uninterruptedly by the general public since that year.

(2) "An injunction will never be granted against the continuance of a public road, where there is proof that for more than five years there has been user over the entire property sought to be enjoined."

(3) "A temporary injunction will never be granted where the plaintiff has stood idly by and allowed defendant to expend labor and money which would all be lost if the injunction is granted, especially when the defendant has a speedy and adequate remedy at law."

(4) "An injunction will not be granted to oust a party from possession under a claim of right where the plaintiff can sue in ejectment."

(5) "An injunction will never be granted where the plaintiff has lost right of way in the premises by reason of nonuser or abandonment, and the plaintiff is estopped from claiming any such right by lack of equity or its laches."

(6) "An injunction will never be granted where irreparable injury will be done to the defendants if the work attempted to be enjoined be stopped."

We shall make no attempt to pass upon any of these six points. We state them for the purpose of showing the nature of the controversy present in the litigation and as a preface to the brief consideration of the two remaining questions presented by respondents and upon which we shall make disposition of the appeal.

[1, 2] It is well settled that a preliminary injunction will not issue in a doubtful case.

"The rule has been frequently laid down broadly that a preliminary injunction will not issue where the right which the complainant seeks to have protected is in doubt, where the right to the relief asked is doubtful, or except in a clear case of right." 32 C. J. 36.

This rule is well recognized in this state. See San Antonio Water Co. v. Bodenhamer, 133 Cal. 248, 65 Pac. 471; Willis v. Lauridson, 161 Cal. 106, 118 Pac. 530. Upon a consideration of all the matters of fact and of law which we have stated above it appears to us that the trial court was amply justified in refusing the preliminary injunction on the ground that it is doubtful what the outcome may be upon a final hearing of the cause.

[3] It is also a settled proposition of law that a preliminary injunction may not be had as a matter of right, but that the question whether such an injunction shall be granted or refused rests in the sound discretion of the court. Flood v. Goldstein Co., 158 Cal. 247, 110 Pac. 916; Lagunitas Water Co. v. Marin County Water Co., 163 Cal. 332, 125 Pac. 351. In the present instance we are far from being able to say that there was an abuse of discretion by the trial court in making the order which is the subject of the appeal.

Order affirmed.

BOICELLI v. GIANNINI. (Civ. 4724.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 18, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 15, 1924.)

1. Deeds ⚡211(4)—Evidence held to support finding that a conveyance to son was not procured by undue influence.

Evidence held to support finding that aged parent's conveyance to son, to exclusion of other children, was not procured by undue influence.

2. Deeds ⚡72(7)—Conveyance from aged parent to child to exclusion of other children closely scrutinized.

A court of equity will closely scan and scrutinize a conveyance from an aged parent to one child to the exclusion of others to ascertain whether any undue influence has been exerted over the parent to acquire his confidence, and whether the confidence so acquired has been abused or betrayed.

3. Deeds ⚡68(1)—Father's absolute gift of land to son free from fraud cannot be set aside.

An absolute gift of land made by a father to his son, freely and voluntarily, in the execution of a purpose conceived by him so to dispose of the property, without the exercise of any fraud on the part of the son, and with full understanding on his part of all the facts and the effect of such a transfer, cannot afterward be set aside.

4. Deeds ⚡61—Parent's conveyance to son not set aside, though he subsequently made attempt to recall deed.

Aged father's gift of land to son to the exclusion of other children by deed delivered to third party for delivery on father's death will not be set aside in absence of fraud or undue influence, though the father subsequently attempted to recall the deed.

5. Deeds ⚡61—Grantor's delivery of deed to third party for delivery to grantee on grantor's death effectual to pass present title if such was grantor's intention.

Where grantor places deed in the hands of a third party for delivery to grantee on grantor's death, the delivery is effectual to pass a present title to the grantee, if the grantor's intention is to make such delivery absolute and place it beyond his power thereafter to revoke or control the deed, and in such case the grantor retains merely a life estate, and the third party holds the deed as a trustee for the grantee.

6. Evidence ⚡314(4)—Statements of interpreter selected by two persons speaking different languages as to their statements not hearsay.

An interpreter, who is selected by two persons speaking different languages as a medium of communication with each other, is regarded as a joint agent for that purpose, and the statements of the interpreter as to what they say in the presence of each other are regarded as the statements of the persons themselves, and are admissible as original evidence, and are not hearsay.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⚡228(2)—Purchaser with knowledge that grantor had previously executed deed not a bona fide purchaser.

Purchaser, who bought land with complete knowledge that vendor had previously executed a deed to his son and placed deed in the hands of a third party for delivery to son on vendor's death, held not a bona fide purchaser.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by Antonio Boicelli against Mary Giannini. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Owen D. Richardson and John P. Fitzgerald, both of San Jose, for appellant.

Heller, Ehrman, White & McAuliffe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This action was one brought to quiet title to certain real property situated in Santa Clara county, consisting of a ranch of some six acres. Both parties claim through a common ancestor, their father, Augustino Boicelli.

In support of his title plaintiff relied upon a deed of gift executed and delivered in escrow. Defendant claimed that this deed was procured by undue influence and fraud, and she charged in her pleadings that her father was of unsound mind at the date of its execution, and that it was therefore void. In her cross-complaint she asserted title through a grant, bargain, and sale deed executed by her parent to her two months before his death and some four years after the conveyance of the property to plaintiff. The consideration of this last alleged transfer consisted of her promissory notes.

Two trials were had. The first resulted in a judgment in favor of defendant. A motion for a new trial was made and granted, and judgment thereafter went in favor of plaintiff, and this is an appeal therefrom.

The principal ground relied upon for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to overcome the presumption of undue influence that attaches to a conveyance by a parent of advanced age when made to one of his children to the exclusion of others. This contention necessitates a review of the evidence, which is substantially as follows:

Augustino Boicelli had three children, Antonio Boicelli and Mary Giannini, the parties to this action, and another daughter, Virginia Pedemonte. On October 6, 1915, in the absence of and without the knowledge of his children Boicelli consulted one De Mattei, a business man of San Jose, with reference to the disposition of his property. De Mattei had been his friend and adviser for some 35 years. Boicelli at this time was of advanced age, being 82 years old. He informed De Mattei that he "wanted to make out some papers, and that he desired to give certain real property to his son Antonio, and also certain other property to Mrs. Pedemonte, reserving to himself, however, the income thereof during his lifetime. De Mattei and Augustino proceeded to the offices of one Cavallaro, a lawyer familiar with the Italian language, who was advised by Augustino as to his intention. Cavallaro suggested a transfer of the property by means of deeds placed in escrow. The legal effect of such a transfer was fully explained to Augustino.

He was informed that property so conveyed would pass beyond his control, and that he would thereafter have no title in the same. This mode of transfer was satisfactory to him, so he stated; his desire being to simply retain the income in the property during his lifetime. He further stated that he wished to prevent expenses of administration. Deeds were accordingly prepared by Cavallaro, and they were signed and acknowledged by Boicelli. Escrow instructions were also prepared. The documents were left in the office of the attorney, but no delivery with intent to pass title was made at that time; Boicelli expressing the desire that he wanted his boy to see them.

Subsequently, on November 17, 1915, the son—who had no previous knowledge of his father's act—was informed concerning the same. He examined the prepared instruments, but not knowing Cavallaro he took them to James L. Atteridge, an attorney in San Jose, with whom he was acquainted, to see if they were properly executed. The father and De Mattei were present at this meeting. The older Boicelli was unable to speak or understand the English language, and De Mattei acted as interpreter for him and the attorney. Boicelli was asked by Mr. Atteridge what he wanted to do with his property, and he stated that he desired to deed certain portions thereof to his two children, Virginia Pedemonte and Antonio Boicelli, in such a way that he would be permitted to live on the property, but that title thereto would be in the children mentioned. They were not to go into enjoyment of the same until his death. Mr. Atteridge thereupon examined the instruments prepared by Mr. Cavallaro, and he advised Boicelli that they were imperfectly drawn and invalid, and would not operate to accomplish the intended purpose, as title would not pass thereunder. It was then explained to the grantor that the effect of delivering a deed in escrow was to part with all dominion and control over the same and that he would have no power thereafter to withdraw or recall it; that title would pass by virtue of delivery, and he would thereby be divested of ownership, and his only remaining interest thereafter would be his right to the reserved possession and enjoyment of the rents and profits until his death. The grantor stated that such was his desire. Mr. Atteridge thereupon prepared escrow instructions and other documents relating to the transaction.

The grantor had expressed an apprehension that the reserved income might prove insufficient for his support. It was thereupon agreed that in this event the grantees, upon demand, should advance and pay to the grantor a sum not to exceed $300 per annum from the date of the agreement. It may be stated, in passing, that this contingency never happened, and no demand for the fulfillment of this condition was ever made.

Boicelli was informed that accumulations might possibly accrue, and he was advised to make a will. He was asked whether or not he desired to make any provision for his daughter Mary Giannini, defendant herein, and he replied that, if she was to receive anything Antonio, the son, would have to give it to her. It was then agreed that the son should execute a note in her favor for the sum of $500, payable upon the death of the grantor, and that like notes should be executed to each of her children for the sum of $100. The notes were accordingly executed, and the grantor at the same time made a will, under the terms of which he left the residue of his estate in equal shares to his three children, naming them. He then executed and delivered to De Mattei a deed in escrow in favor of plaintiff to the property in question, with instructions to hold the same until his death, and then to deliver the same to his son. A like conveyance was made in favor of Virginia Pedemonte to a distinct parcel of land, now the subject of a second and independent action; there having been a severance of the two actions since the first trial.

About a year and a half after the delivery of the deeds in escrow, the grantor sought to regain possession of the same from De Mattei, but without success. Later, and on November 14, 1919, the grantor, by grant, bargain, and sale deed, conveyed to his daughter Mary Giannini, defendant herein, the property in question, and she gave her promissory notes for the entire purchase price. The property was valued in the sum of $8,000, and one of the notes was for $7,000, interest and principal being payable 6 years after date, a period when the father, had he lived, would have been 92 years old. Shortly thereafter Boicelli died; his death occurring in January, 1920.

From this evidence it is manifest that, if no undue influence was practiced upon the grantor in the original conveyances, the second attempted transfer is of no validity or effect, unless it can be said that defendant acquired the property as an innocent purchaser and without notice of the previous transfer.

Upon the subject of undue influence we are of the opinion that the evidence clearly shows that there is an entire absence or suggestion of this element in the case. The plaintiff never knew of any intention on the part of his father to make the conveyance to him at the time the deeds were originally prepared and acknowledged, and he did not learn of his action until some time thereafter, when the original plan was carried out in its modified form, under which defendant, at plaintiff's suggestion, was benefited.

[1] We do not deem a further review of the evidence necessary, as it speaks for itself. It is clear therefrom that the grantor took independent advice, and that his act was free and voluntary, uninfluenced in any manner by the plaintiff or any one else. The evidence repels any presumption that undue influence was used by any person whatever, and fully supports the finding of the trial court that the execution of the deed to plaintiff was not accomplished by influence and fraud.

[2] We are not unmindful of the principles of equity jurisprudence with relation to such transactions. The principles are plain and well settled in this state. A court of equity will closely scan and scrutinize transactions of this character in order to ascertain whether any undue influence has been exerted over an aged parent to acquire his confidence, and whether the confidence so acquired has been abused or betrayed.

[3] In Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 910, it is held that, although transactions between aged and enfeebled parents and one of several children whereby a parent conveys his entire estate to such child to the exclusion of other children dependent upon his bounty, will be watched and scrutinized with jealousy, and will generally be held presumptively void upon a showing of confidential relations, without a showing by the donor of any actual imposition upon him, and will be set aside upon the discovery of the least fraud, yet, where it is shown by the donee that the gift was freely and voluntarily made, and no imposition practiced, the conveyance will not be set aside. It is there declared that a person in possession of all his faculties has a right to dispose of his property as he sees fit, and to hold otherwise would be to establish a rule that no man could make a voluntary disposition of his estate except by will. An absolute gift of land made by a father to his son freely and voluntarily in the execution of a purpose conceived by him so to dispose of the property, without the exercise of any fraud on the part of the son, and with full understanding on his part of all the facts and the effect of such a transfer, cannot afterward be set aside. De Arellanes v. Arellanes, 151 Cal. 443, 90 Pac. 1059; Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. 701, 198 Pac. 407; Bretthauer v. Foley, 15 Cal. App. 19, 113 Pac. 356.

[4, 5] Nor does the fact that deceased attempted to recall the deed in any manner affect the question. Where one makes a conveyance of property and places it in the hands of a third party, to be delivered to the grantee named in it on the death of the grantor, such delivery is effectual to pass a present title to the property to the grantee, if the intention of the grantor is to make such delivery absolute and place it beyond his power thereafter to revoke or control the deed. Where a delivery is made under these circumstances, it is fully operative and effective to visit a present title in the grantee, the grantor retaining only a life estate in the property, and the third party or depository holds the deed as a trustee for the grantee named therein. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703.

Here there is no question that an absolute delivery had been made; and, this being so, it was beyond the power of the grantor to recall his act, and his attempt to do so availed him nothing. Smith v. Smith, 173 Cal. 730, 161 Pac. 495.

Appellant insists that the trial court erred in admitting the testimony of the witness Atteridge as to what he told the grantor and what the grantor said in reply, it being hearsay. This claim is based upon the fact that the information was imparted and received through an interpreter.

[6] There is no merit in this contention. The grantor did not understand and was unable to converse in the English language. An interpreter who is selected by two persons speaking different languages as a medium of their communication with each other is regarded as their joint agent for that purpose, and the statements of what they say in the presence of each other are regarded as the statements of the persons themselves (Kelly v. Ning Yung Ben Ass'n, 2 Cal. App. 461, 467, 84 Pac. 321; 10 R. C. L., p. 930), and such statements of the interpreter are admissible as original evidence and are in no sense hearsay (2 Jones, Com. on Ev. § 267; Commonwealth v. Vose, 157 Mass. 393, 32 N. E. 355, 17 L. R. A. 813).

We are cited to People v. Jan John, 137 Cal. 220, 69 Pac. 1063; People v. Petruzo, 13 Cal. App. 569, 110 Pac. 324; and People v. Ong Git, 23 Cal. App. 155, 137 Pac. 283, as opposing this rule. It will be noted that these are criminal cases. Different considerations control in criminal trials. There the interpreter is not the agent of the parties but the officer of the court. The cases have no analogy. 2 Jones, Com. on Ev. p. 481.

Moreover, the testimony of Atteridge concerning the details and surrounding circumstances of the execution and delivery of the deeds was cumulative and in full accord with other testimony upon the subject which in itself is sufficient to support the judgment.

[7] The suggestion that defendant was a bona fide purchaser is without merit. The evidence shows that she had complete knowledge of the acts of the grantor and his disposition of the property as early as the year 1918, which was prior to the alleged conveyance to her.

In conclusion, it may be stated that the evidence is amply sufficient to support the conclusion of the court below that the conveyance here involved was the voluntary act of the grantor free from any undue influence. This being so, it follows from what has been said that the judgment should be and it is hereby affirmed.

(Civ. 4682.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 13, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 10, 1924.)

1. Municipal corporations — 514(7)—Additional assessment to pay interest on bonds held unauthorized.

Where a local improvement district of a city issued bonds under the Local Improvement Act of 1901, for a term of 10 years instead of one of 9 years as should have been done, the taxpayers being given 9 years to make their payments, a second assessment to make up the deficiency in interest was unauthorized; the written agreements of the taxpayers made at the inception of the improvement proceeding providing a special fund for the payment of such improvement which could not be exceeded.

2. Municipal corporations — 514(7)—Neither municipality nor bondholders can create additional burden by failing to call in or present bonds.

Where local improvement bonds have been issued under the Local Improvement Act of 1901, the municipal officers cannot by failing to call in the bonds, and the bondholders cannot by failing to present their bonds, create an additional burden on the taxpayers not assumed by them by contract and not created by the statute.

3. Judgment — 702—Judgment in mandamus held not to bar suit to enjoin levy of special improvement assessment.

A judgment in a mandamus proceeding, by bondholders against the board of trustees of a municipal corporation, requiring defendants to levy a second assessment to pay interest on local improvement bonds, held not to bar a subsequent suit to enjoin such second assessment on the ground that it had no basis to support it; the parties in the two proceedings not being the same, a different thing being litigated in a different capacity, and it not appearing that plaintiffs in the suit for injunction had notice of the pendency of the mandamus proceeding, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1908.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

Suit by the Redwood Highlands Company and others against the Town of Redwood City and others, to restrain levying of assessment for street work. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

H. W. B. Taylor, of San Anselmo, and Thos. P. Boyd, of San Rafael, for appellants.

Albert Mansfield, of Redwood City, and Theodore J. Savage, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants from proceeding to cloud the title of the plaintiff landowners by a purported assessment for local improvements. Judgment went for the defendants, and the plaintiffs have appealed, bringing up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The record presents no question regarding the sufficiency of the pleadings. No witness was examined on the trial, but all matters were stipulated to in a written stipulation executed by the parties and filed of record. The stipulation was so drawn that many facts alleged in the pleadings are referred to as paragraphs of the complaint or answer, as the case may be, and then in addition to such stipulations many probative facts were also stipulated to. It will not be necessary for us to recite the facts admitted in the pleadings and separate them from facts otherwise admitted in the record. As the case was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, counsel stipulated that the trial court need not make any findings, and none were made.

Except as hereinafter stated, the record discloses facts showing that early in April, 1909, the board of trustees of the town of Redwood City commenced proceedings looking toward the creation of two local assessment districts, thereafter numbered 13 and 14. The proceedings were had under "The Local Improvement Act of 1901." Stats. 1901, p. 34. A resolution was passed on the 19th day of April, 1909, referring the contemplated work to a civil engineer; on the 7th day of September, 1909, the engineer filed his report, and on the same date the board of trustees, with the exception of changing the names of certain streets in the district, adopted the report of the engineer and set the 18th day of October, 1909, as the time for parties interested to show cause, if any they had, why the improvements should not be carried out; that a hearing was had on the date last mentioned, and on the 20th of October the clerk transmitted to the tax collector the map, etc. The tax collector thereupon set the 12th day of January, 1910, as the date of sale. That, as provided in section 13 of the statute above mentioned, before January 12, 1910, the owners filed written agreements waiving objections and promising to pay in ten payments, the first one on date of agreement and one each year for 9 years. Each of said agreements contained a paragraph as follows:

"This agreement is made with the understanding and upon the condition that the entire unpaid balance of said installments of principal may be paid at any time before maturity, together with interest on all deferred payments until the date of maturity of the installment next falling due."

After the notice of sale above mentioned and after having received the installment agreements, the tax collector reported to the board of trustees, and the board of trustees ordered issued, bonds worded as provided in section 18 of the statute above referred to. The bonds were dated January 2, 1910, and a sample copy was as follows:

"United States of America, State of California.

"No. 2. Town of Redwood City. $1,000.

"Local Improvement Bond, District No. 14.

"Under and by virtue of an act of the Legislature of the state of California entitled 'An act to provide for local improvements upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places and sidewalks, and for the construction of sewers within municipalities, such act to be known as the local Improvement Act of 1901' (which became law under constitutional provision without Governor's approval February 26th, 1901, Statutes of 1901, page 34), the town of Redwood City, out of the fund hereinafter referred to, will pay to the bearer the sum of one thousand dollars, United States gold coin of the same weight and fineness as that now issued from the mints of the United States of America, with interest thereon in like gold coin, at the rate of seven (7) per cent. per annum, all as hereinafter specified, and at the office of the treasurer of said municipality.

"This bond is payable exclusively from street improvement fund number 14, and neither the municipality, nor any officer thereof, shall be holden for payment otherwise of its principal or interest; and installments of principal and interest accruing hereon shall be payable out of any moneys in said fund at the date of their maturity, in order of presentation, and shall be secured by all agreements and liens provided for by this act and arising out of the improvement to which said fund relates. The term of this bond is ten (10) years from its date, and at the expiration of said time, the whole sum then unpaid shall be due and payable; but on the second day of January of each year after its date, an even annual proportion of its whole amount is due and payable, upon the presentation of the coupon therefor, until the whole is paid, with all accrued interest, at the rate of seven (7) per cent. per annum.

"The interest is payable semiannually, to wit: On the second days of January and July in each year hereafter, upon the presentation of the coupons therefor, the first of which is for the interest from date to the next second day of July, and thereafter the interest coupons are for semiannual interest, except the last, which is for interest from the semiannual payment next preceding and to the date of the final maturity of this bond. Should default be made in the annual payment upon the principal, or in any payment of interest, the holder of this bond is entitled to declare the whole unpaid amount to be due and payable, and to have all liens and agreements which are security for said fund and are enforceable, immediately enforced in payment thereof. The principal hereof may be paid, at the option of said municipality, at any time before maturity. Notice of such redemption must be published by the treasurer of said municipality once in some newspaper of general circulation, published in said municipality, or at the county seat of the county in which the same is located, and at the expiration of one month from said publication, interest on all principal sums covered by such notice shall cease.

"At said town of Redwood City, county of San Mateo, state of California, the 2d day of January, in the year one thousand nine hundred and ten. George A. Merrill, President of the Board of Trustees of the town of Redwood City. [Seal] F. K. Towne, Treasurer of the Town of Redwood City."

As to both districts it is stipulated:

"That the said tax collector proceeded to and did collect all of said assessments and all the installments which have fallen due under the said installment agreements."

As to both districts it appears that many of said agreements were paid, both principal and interest, before maturity. It is stipulated that the first assessment included the cost of doing the work by the contractor and all the incidental expenses incurred in connection with the work, such as clerical, engineering, inspecting, printing, and advertising. This leaves the item of interest as the sole debatable matter.

Commencing on December 15, 1919, the board of trustees of the town of Redwood City commenced, and since then have proceeded to, and unless restrained by a judgment in this action will proceed to levy a second assessment to collect a deficit of $4,590.66 and incidental expenses in collecting the same in the further sum of $225, as and for district No. 13; and to collect $2,008.94 and like incidental expenses in the further sum of $205, as and for district No. 14. In so doing the municipal officers are acting under the assumption that it is their duty so to do by virtue of the provisions of section 20 of the Local Improvement Act of 1901. Stats. 1901, p. 42. That section provides as follows:

"In case the first assessment for any local improvement prove insufficient, a second may be made in the same manner as nearly as may be, except that no protest shall be entertained upon subject matter already decided in the first hearing, and so on until sufficient money shall have been realized to pay for such local improvement."

As just stated above, the record discloses that in neither district was any item of the cost of the improvements omitted; but that the assessment covered every single item unless it may be said that an item of interest was omitted. We confine our consideration therefore to the subject of interest. No interest item mentioned in the statute was omitted. It is not claimed that any item of interest was omitted from the written agreements of the taxpayers or that the taxpayers have not fully paid all interest in accordance with their written agreements. If any item of interest arises, it arises therefore as on the face of the bonds as distinguished from the statute and all of the other proceedings had under the statute.

It requires but a reading of the statute to see that it provides two sets of written instruments: First, the taxpayer's written agreement, which is an obligation between him and the municipality; and, second, certain bonds which are an obligation between the bondholders and the municipality and the forms of which are prescribed by the statute. Moreover, it is clear, from the provisions of the statute and the provisions of the instruments just mentioned, that the municipality and its officers are acting merely as agents and are assuming no liability. Furthermore it is patent that the statute provides a liability as to the taxpayers which is stated in their written agreements just mentioned, and certain rights as to the bondholders which are stated in each bond. Although it is not expressly so provided, it is clear beyond the peradventure of a doubt that the right of the bondholder to receive interest is coextensive with the liability of the taxpayer to pay interest—no more and no less. Otherwise we would be holding that the taxpayer can be compelled to pay interest for the use of moneys covering a period of time that the district had no such use. If such power was to be conferred, the same must needs be expressed clearly and not left to implication. On this point the respondents contend that the statute gives authority to the board of trustees to fix the number of deferred payments in which the taxpayer must pay his assessment and that it likewise gives the board of trustees the power to fix the term of the bonds not exceeding ten (10) years and that the acts of the board of trustees done within such granted powers cannot be said to be in excess of its jurisdiction. The vice in the argument rests in the quantum of power assumed to be granted. The statute is one dealing with the power to construct local improvements and to pay therefor. Although the statute does not expressly state that the power to tax the property owner must be so exercised as to conform to and be limited by the amount of the costs and interest, nevertheless such was the clear meaning of the statute.

[1] For the payment, and to secure the payment, of principal and interest to the bondholders, the statute provides for the execution, acceptance, and preservation of the written agreements of the taxpayers. Those papers provide a special fund. The statute and the face of the bonds in the form prescribed by the statute, makes the bonds, both principal and interest, payable out of said special fund. The maximum amount of the special fund cannot exceed the amount of the principal and interest thereon for the lawful term of the bonds. It may be less, because the taxpayer is expressly authorized to anticipate the payment of the principal of his obligation and thus terminate his future liability as to interest. There is no recital in the bonds that precludes a consideration of any of the above matters. The bonds on their face recite that they were issued under the statute mentioned. All of the proceedings and the statute were of record. A slight examination of the records would have disclosed that the bonds were issued for a term of 10 years, whereas, under the facts, the term should have been 9 years. As the taxpayers were given 9 years in which to make their payments, there was no authority for issuing bonds under terms that would create a greater burden on the taxpayers. The exercise of an unauthorized power imposes no obligation. And, under the facts presented by this record, it is clear that, to the extent that the bonds purported to bear interest for the tenth year, the bonds created no obligation. But the purported interest on the face of the bonds for the unauthorized year is a part, at least, of the ground asserted by the respondents as supporting their right to levy the alleged supplemental assessment. To the amount of the tenth year's interest there was no basis for the second assessment.

[2] The appellants contended that, when the property owners in paying their assessments exercised the right of making the deferred payments in advance, the moneys so paid in were allowed to lie idle and bonds were not presented nor called in for payment as the statute contemplated, and call attention to the last sentence contained in the statutory form of bond. The respondents in their briefs seem to admit the fact, but claim that the fact is immaterial. We do not agree with this claim. The municipal officers could not by failing to call in the bonds, and the bondholders could not by failing to present their bonds, create an additional burden on the taxpayers which the taxpayers did not by contract assume and which was not created by the provisions of the statute. The bondholders were presumed to know the statute and to know the provisions of the bonds. Village of Wilmette v. People, 214 Ill. 107, 73 N. E. 327, 329.

[3] The respondents interposed a plea claiming that a certain judgment was a bar. That judgment was rendered by the First Division of the District Court of Appeal in a mandamus proceeding commenced on the 18th day of October, 1919, by L. N. Jesson and E. R. Jesson, as bondholders, against Clark K. Mabie et al., as the board of trustees of the town of Redwood City, a municipal corporation. In the judgment rendered the court held that the defendants should under the facts pleaded in the mandamus proceeding proceed to levy the second assessment which is involved in this case. It is not alleged that the appellants were parties to, or successors in interest by title subsequent to the commencement of the mandamus proceeding, or that the appellants are litigating for the same thing in the same capacity, or that they had notice, actual or constructive, of the pendency of the mandamus proceeding. The appellants were not bound thereby. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908. In the mandamus proceeding the town of Redwood City and its officers were proceeded against, not as the representatives of all of the taxpayers of said town, or of any taxpayers, but as the agents of district No. 13 and district No. 14, which districts, as entities, at all times stood as opposed to, and not as parties with, or the predecessors of, these appellants. The plea had no merit.

The purported second assessment had no basis to support it. The judgment is reversed, and on the agreed statement of facts the trial court is directed to enter judgment for the appellants for their costs.

MARTIN v. MILLER, Superior Court Judge.
(Civ. 2800.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 13, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 10, 1924.)

Appeal and error § 82(3)—Certiorari § 5
(1)—Order held appealable, and review could not be had by certiorari; "special order made after final judgment."

An ex parte order, setting aside a judgment on the ground that it had been entered through inadvertence upon representation that a stipulation was on file authorizing its entry, when in truth and in fact there was no such stipulation on file, but instead an offer of compromise which had not been accepted as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 997, was appealable as a "special order made after final judgment," under section 963, and review could not be had by certiorari, in view of section 1068.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Special Order.]

Application by Alfred Martin for certiorari to review an order of the Superior Court of San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge. Application dismissed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court.

Myers, C. J., disqualified, and not participating.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for petitioner.
Lawrence C. Kelley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an application for a writ of review.

In an action pending in the superior court, wherein petitioner was plaintiff and Union Oil Company of California and others were defendants, judgment was entered on the 15th day of January, 1924, in favor of plaintiff and against said defendant company for the sum of $428.44 and costs of suit. The judgment recited that—

"On the 14th day of March, 1923, the said defendant Union Oil Company of California, by and through its said attorneys, Cooney and Kelley, filed with the clerk of this court its written stipulation, wherein and whereby the above-entitled court was authorized and directed to render judgment herein in favor of the plaintiff, and against it, the said Union Oil Company of California, in the sum of $428.44, and costs of suit."

On the 22d day of January, 1924, on the ex parte motion of the defendant company, the court made the following order:

"The motion of defendant Union Oil Company of California, for an order vacating and setting aside the judgment made and entered herein on January 15, 1924, came on regularly for hearing this day, and, it appearing to the satisfaction of this court that through inadvertence and ex parte a judgment was entered herein upon the representation of A. H. Carpenter, Esq., counsel for plaintiff, that a stipulation was on file herein authorizing the entry of said judgment, when in truth and in fact there was no such stipulation on file, but instead an offer of compromise, which had not been accepted as provided by section 997 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, and the matter being submitted to this court for consideration and decision—it is hereby ordered that the judgment heretofore made and entered herein on January 15, 1924, be and the same is hereby vacated and set aside."

Petitioner contends that the court was without jurisdiction to make the aforesaid order on an ex parte application. It need not be determined whether or not the court had such jurisdiction. The order is appealable as a "special order made after final judgment." Code Civ. Proc. § 963; Livermore v. Campbell, 52 Cal. 75; Kaufman v. Superior Court, 108 Cal. 446, 41 Pac. 476; Southern Cal. Ry. Co. v. Superior Court, 127 Cal. 417, 59 Pac. 789; Vosburg v. Vosburg, 137 Cal. 493, 70 Pac. 473. Section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a writ of review may be granted when an inferior tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction, "and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy." In Hildebrand v. Superior Court, 173 Cal. 86, 89, 159 Pac. 147, 149, it is said:

"It has uniformly been held by this court, in accord with the provisions of section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that if a party has the right of appeal from an order in excess of jurisdiction, he cannot have such order reviewed in certiorari proceedings."

The proceeding is dismissed.

Ex parte GILLE. (Cr. 1072.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 19, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 15, 1924.)

1. Bastards ⇨15—Mother entitled to custody of illegitimate unmarried minor, unless her character and surroundings make her unfit.

Under Civ. Code, § 200, the mother of an illegitimate, unmarried minor is entitled to the custody of her child, unless her character or her surroundings are such as to unfit her therefor, and the mere fact that respondents, who have possession of the child, possess more wealth than she, and for that reason are able to give the child better educational advantages, is not ground for depriving the mother of the right to the custody of the child.

2. Habeas corpus ⇨117(1)—To what extent final adjudication as to custody of child is res adjudicata.

The final adjudication on a writ of habeas corpus, brought to determine the right of a parent or guardian to the care and custody of a minor child, conclusively determines all questions necessarily involved as between the same parties and upon the same state of facts.

3. Habeas corpus ⇨99(3)—Parents' right to child must yield to child's best interest.

While the parent has the superior right to a child, that right must yield to the child's best interest, so that in all proceedings on a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the custody of a child the cardinal consideration is the welfare of the child.

4. Habeas corpus ⇨117(1)—Adjudication involving right to custody of minor child is binding only so long as facts remain same.

An adjudication in a habeas corpus proceeding, involving the right to the custody of a minor, is res adjudicata and binding upon the parties only so long as the facts are the same and the conditions affecting the child's welfare or the parents' rights exist as they were when the hearing was had and the order made.

5. Habeas corpus ⇨120—Former adjudication held not res adjudicata in subsequent proceeding because of changed facts.

Former adjudication in habeas corpus proceeding to obtain custody of petitioner's illegitimate minor child, in which the writ was dismissed, held not conclusive in subsequent similar proceedings for the same purpose, where, since the order dismissing first writ, respondents sought to keep petitioner, the mother, in ignorance of their present place of abode so as to deny her the privilege of visiting and seeing the child, and formed a settled purpose to teach the child to shun her mother.

6. Bastards ⇨15—Mother of illegitimate unmarried minor held entitled to custody of child.

Mother of an illegitimate minor child, which was placed with respondents under an agreement to care for and board it, for a stated consideration per month, held entitled to custody of child under Civ. Code, § 200, on evidence that the mother's character, aside from fact of giving birth to child out of wedlock, was unimpeachable, and that she and her husband were able to give child a suitable home with fit and proper surroundings.

Original application for writ of habeas corpus by Theresa Marie Louise Gille against William S. Jenkins and wife. Writ granted.

Paul Blackwood, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Newby & Palmer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a proceeding in habeas corpus to obtain the custody of a 10 year old girl, the daughter of petitioner, who applied for the writ on behalf of the child. Certain unusual features set forth in the mother's petition, but which are not necessary to narrate, induced this court to exercise its original jurisdiction in this instance.

The child was born out of wedlock. Her mother, née Claudia Gille, is now married to Rudolph Hagberg, an artist, whose earnings are sufficient to support himself, his wife, and the child. In October of 1915 the mother placed the child in the care and custody of the respondents to the writ, William S. Jenkins and Edna A. Jenkins, husband and wife, who reside in the city of Los Angeles and who assumed the obligation to care for the child and to board it under an agreement whereby the mother agreed to pay respondents the monthly sum of $13. The parties lived up to the terms of this agreement for a number of years following the arrangement. During this time petitioner, who was working in a laundry, frequently called at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins to see her little girl. Until about a year or a year and a half ago Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins permitted these visits without let or hindrance. At no time has petitioner evinced any intention to abandon her infant daughter or to part permanently with the right to her custody and control.

On July 10, 1922, petitioner made application to the superior court of Los Angeles county for a writ of habeas corpus, praying for the custody of her child. The writ was issued, Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins made return thereto, and the matter was heard, with the result that an order was made on the 21st day of July, 1922, dismissing the writ.

Respondents, who possess more of this world's goods than does the mother or her husband, are deeply attached to the little girl. They have taken care of her for more than eight years, and earnestly desire to continue so to do. The child is happy and contented, and desires to remain with her foster parents.

Petitioner seems to have atoned for the one slip which resulted in the birth of this child of illicit intercourse, and her life since then appears exemplary in every particular. She is happily married to her husband, and the couple are living in a comfortable and well-regulated home. The mother's desire to have her child with her meets with the husband's approval. Though respondents would have us believe otherwise, we feel confident that the mother's wish to regain the care and custody of her offspring is prompted by no motive other than a genuine parental affection and the desire to discharge a duty imposed upon her by the laws of God and man.

[1] The mother of an illegitimate unmarried minor, unless her character or her surroundings are such as to unfit her therefor, is entitled to the custody of her child. Civ. Code, § 200. In the present instance the mother's character, aside from the one lapse which resulted in the birth of this child out of wedlock, seems to be unimpeachable. She is able to give her daughter a suitable home with fit and proper surroundings. The mere fact that respondents possess more wealth than she, and are for that reason able to give the child better educational advantages, affords no reason why the mother should be deprived of the right to the custody of her child—the bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh.

"A parent who is of good character and a proper person to have the custody of the child and reasonably able to provide for it is entitled to the custody as against other persons, although such others are much attached to the child, and the child is attached to them, and prefers to remain with them, and they are in all respects suitable to have the custody of the child and able to support and care for it, and even though they are of larger fortune or able to provide for the child more comfortably than the parent, or to care for it better, or to give it a better education than the parent can afford." 29 Cyc. p. 1590.

See, also, Matter of Schwartz, 171 Cal. 633, 154 Pac. 304.

It follows from what we have said that petitioner is entitled to have the custody of her child awarded to her in this proceeding, unless, as claimed by respondents, the order made by the superior court in the habeas corpus proceeding which was before that court in 1922 is res adjudicata and conclusive upon petitioner's parental rights.

[2-4] A final adjudication on a writ of habeas corpus brought to determine the right of a parent or guardian to the care and custody of a minor child conclusively determines all questions necessarily involved, as between the same parties and upon the same state of facts. Ex parte Holt, 34 Cal. App. 290, 167 Pac. 184; In re Frazier, 50 Cal. App. 45, 194 Pac. 510. From its very nature the adjudication in such a proceeding can operate only upon those existing facts and conditions which affect the well-being of the child and the rights of the parent or guardian. In all such proceedings the welfare of the child is the cardinal consideration, and it not infrequently is controlling. The parent has the superior right to the child, but that right must yield to the child's best interests. In re Jones, 153 N. C. 312, 69 S. E. 217, 138 Am. St. Rep. 670; note to Clark v. White, Ann. Cas. 1914A, p. 750. The conditions which determine the welfare of a child are not necessarily permanent. They often change. For this reason it has been said that a judgment or decree awarding the custody of an infant child is in its nature temporary, and applies only to existing facts and conditions. Note to Miller v. Gordon, Ann. Cas. 1916D, p. 511; Willis v. Bell, 86 Ark. 473, 111 S. W. 808. Hence it is that an adjudication in a habeas corpus proceeding involving the right to the custody of a minor is res adjudicata and binding upon the parties only so long as the facts are the same and the conditions affecting the child's welfare or the parents' rights exist as they were when the hearing was had and the former order was made. So the authorities hold with practical unanimity. See Watts v. Smylie, 116 Miss. 12, 76 South. 684; Martin v. Benzie Circuit Judge, 200 Mich. 549, 167 N. W. 13; People v. Mercein, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 399, 38 Am. Dec. 644; Cormack v. Marshall, 211 Ill. 519, 71 N. E. 1077, 67 L. R. A. 787, 1 Ann. Cas. 256; note to Miller v. Gordon, supra, Ann. Cas. 1916D, p. 511.

[5] There is evidence before us to indicate that subsequently to the order of the superior court in 1922 dismissing the habeas corpus writ then before that court Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins sought to keep petitioner in ignorance of their present place of abode, that thus the mother might be denied the privilege of visiting and seeing her infant daughter. There also is evidence that respondents, since the adjudication in the former proceeding, have formed a settled purpose to teach the child to shun her mother's presence and to shrink from her in affright. Such conduct on the part of respondents ignores the mother's natural rights. Though denied the right to the custody of her child by the former order, the mother still had rights which the respondents to this writ were bound to respect while the child was in their custody and subject to their control and guidance. Respondents' conduct wronged the child as well as its mother. The child's present unfilial attitude is not natural. We can account for it only upon the theory that it was engendered by words and acts on the part of respondents designed to poison the child's mind and to teach her to fear, if not to hate and despise, her own mother, who, though she may have sinned when a young woman, had gone down into the valley of the shadow of death that her child might be born.

The change which has occurred in the child's attitude toward her mother since the adjudication in the former habeas corpus proceeding—a change for which respondents unquestionably are responsible—and respondents' evident purpose to conceal the child, and to keep the mother in ignorance of its whereabouts, so far affect the mother's rights, to say nothing of the child's well-being, that respondents no longer should be permitted to occupy a status which enables them to mold the little girl's thoughts and feelings and to shape her future. For this reason we think that new facts have arisen, and that a change of circumstances has occurred materially altering the state of the case and the relative claims of the parties, and that, therefore, the judgment of the superior court in the former habeas corpus proceeding is not conclusive in the present proceeding. See Martin v. Benzie Circuit Judge, supra.

[6] It is ordered that the minor, Theresa Marie Louise Gille, be released from the care, custody, and control of William S. Jenkins and Edna A. Jenkins, and that Claudia Hagberg, the petitioner herein, have the care, custody, and control of said minor.

Facts found by lower court on conflicting evidence must be assumed to be true on appeal.

2. Mines and minerals ⇨70(2)—Rights of owner and operator as fixed by agreement remained unchanged on operator's continued operation after termination of agreement.

Where operator of mine, on expiration of term of contract with owner of land, providing for payment to the owner of a royalty depending upon the grade of ore removed, continued, with owner's consent, to occupy the mine without a new agreement as to the royalty, their respective rights as fixed by the agreement remained unchanged, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, regardless of whether the agreement was a lease or a mere license to work the mining property on a royalty basis.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1051(1)—Error in admission of evidence held harmless, in view of inference justified by other evidence.

In action by owner of land against operator of mine thereon to recover gold extracted subsequent to expiration of agreement between the parties fixing the royalty to which owner was entitled, in which the evidence showed that the operator continued to operate the mine after expiration of such agreement with the owner's consent, without a new agreement as to royalty, admission of testimony that the owner stated that the operator might continue to mine under the terms of the lease, if error, was harmless, since, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it was to be inferred that the parties understood that the gold produced thereafter was to be divided on the basis specified in the agreement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; Walter E. Herzinger, Judge.

Suit by James G. Conner against Charles Garrett. Judgment giving plaintiff insufficient relief, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for appellant.

Orr M. Chenoweth and Chenoweth & Leininger, all of Redding, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff sued to recover the value of one-half of the gold extracted by defendant from certain mining property belonging to plaintiff. He was given judgment for 15 per cent. of the gold so extracted, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

[1] In the year 1911 the defendant went into possession of the property under an oral agreement to prospect and mine the same and to pay to plaintiff a royalty of from 10 to 25 per cent., depending upon the grade of ore removed. Defendant conducted mining operations upon the property under this oral agreement until March 10, 1917, when he was given a written lease thereof for a term ending September 10, 1918. The lease provided that "the lessor, in consideration of the rents, royalties, covenants and agreements hereinafter reserved, let unto the lessee" the said mining property "together with the appurtenances to have and to hold," etc.; that the lessee should work the mine continuously and pay the lessor "15 per cent. royalty on all ores extracted from said mine; to timber the mine and repair old timbering when necessary; to not assign this lease, or any interest thereunder; * * * to deliver up to the lessor the premises with the appurtenances and all improvements in good order and condition * * * without demand or further notice, on said 10th day of September, 1918, at noon or any time previous, upon demand for forfeiture;" that "upon the violation by the lessee, of any covenant reserved the term of lease may, at the option of the lessor, expire and the lease and premises with the appurtenances shall become forfeited to the lessor." The defendant mined the property under the lease until the end of the term thereof. Plaintiff testified that he then informed defendant that the lease "was unsatisfactory and it would not be continued," that plaintiff "would not tie up the property any further." The defendant denied this testimony and testified: "He told me when the lease expired just to continue in my work the same as always." There is no dispute as to defendant's occupancy and operation of the property after the termination of the written lease in the same manner as before, except as to the last four weeks thereof. The parties made no agreement as to the terms upon which the defendant was to operate the mine after the expiration of the written lease, but the plaintiff had full knowledge of the defendant's operation thereof, and it is clear that he acquiesced therein. There is no contention here to the contrary. Pursuant to an understanding between the parties, the plaintiff, from time to time, shipped the gold taken from the mine, and after deducting from the proceeds the royalty to which he was entitled, he deposited the remainder to the credit of defendant in a local bank. From September 10, 1918, to August, 1920, the defendant and another person working with him obtained gold to the total value of but $78.80, although, according to defendant's testimony, he was engaged in prospecting and mining the property during all but about three months of that time. Plaintiff shipped this gold as usual, but gave all the proceeds to defendant and his associates. Plaintiff testified that he did not take out his percentage in this instance because he "thought they needed it." During the month of August, 1920, gold to the value of nearly $1,600 was extracted, and the present controversy is over the division thereof. The whole of the month of August seems to have been consumed in taking out this gold. Plaintiff testified that he called defendant's attention to the pocket from which this gold was taken about the 1st of August, 1920, and that they mined it together. The defendant testified that he had discovered the pocket two or three weeks before the 1st of August, and that he had taken practically all of the gold therefrom before the plaintiff had knowledge thereof. Defendant admitted that plaintiff did four or five days' work in connection with the extraction of the gold found in this pocket and in timbering the tunnel, but testified that he did not request plaintiff to do the work, and that it was in part such as plaintiff had been accustomed to do at other times of clean-up. Since the court found in accordance with defendant's testimony, it must be assumed to be true on appeal.

[2] Appellant contends that the instrument referred to herein as a lease was not such in fact but was "a mere license to work the mining property on a royalty basis." The character of the instrument, for the purposes of this case, seems to be unimportant. If it be called a lease, as in Northern Light Min. Co. v. Blue Goose Min. Co., 25 Cal. App. 282, 292, 143 Pac. 540, a license, as in Wheeler v. West, 71 Cal. 126, 11 Pac. 871; or a contract of employment, as in Hudepohl v. Mining & Water Co., 80 Cal. 553, 558, 22 Pac. 339, the result is the same. The agreement created a relation between the parties for a given time, out of which there arose reciprocal rights. When the parties, after the expiration of the time so limited, continued the relation by mutual consent, whether express or implied, it is to be inferred, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that their respective rights growing out of that relation remained unchanged. This principle finds illustration in case of leases and contracts of employment. The question is not that of a renewal of the relation for a definite time, as in case of holding over and payment and acceptance of rent after the expiration of the term of a lease, but of the rights of the parties during the time they voluntarily maintain the relation after the expiration of the term agreed upon.

"As a general rule the tendency arising from the tenant's holding over with the consent of the landlord is presumed to be upon the same terms as the original lease, so far as they are applicable to the new tenancy. Thus it is generally held that the terms of the original lease as regards the amount and time of payment of the rent apply." 16 R. C. L. 1161; Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, § 143; Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, § 210.

"If persons have contracted for the performance of certain services for a definite period at a fixed rate, and the employment continues beyond the period agreed upon, in the absence of any new contract it will be presumed that the employment continued under the same contract and upon the terms originally fixed." 18 R. C. L. 533.

"The rule of law applicable in such cases is, that where the person hired continues in employment without any new contract, the fair presumption is that both parties understood that the same salary is to be paid." Nicholson v. Patchin, 5 Cal. 475.

After the decision last cited was rendered, the Legislature embodied the rule therein stated in section 2012 of the Civil Code. If the contract here involved be treated as a mere license to conduct mining operations upon the terms therein provided, no reason appears why the foregoing rule should not be applicable to a voluntary continuation of the relation after the period originally agreed upon.

[3] It is urged that the court erred in permitting witnesses for defendant to testify that, at the time the written lease was executed, the plaintiff stated that defendant might continue to mine the property under the terms of the lease after the expiration thereof. If it be conceded that the admission of such testimony was error, the plaintiff suffered no possible prejudice therefrom, because, as stated, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is to be inferred that the parties understood that the gold produced by defendant's operation of the mine after the time provided in the written agreement was to be divided in accordance with the terms of that instrument.

The judgment is affirmed.

declaring the forfeiture, was argued at some length in vendor's suit to eject vendee, the appellate court made such assumptions in defendant's behalf, on his appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, as would allow application of his statement of such questions to all questions toward which he conceivably intended to direct it, though it was not directed at any finding as without evidentiary support or any error of law and appellant did not so direct any of it in his argument.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇨299(3)—Findings as to agreements to extend time for payments and as to demands for payment held supported by evidence.

In ejectment by vendor against vendee, evidence held to support findings that the parties never agreed on extensions of time to pay installments of the purchase price; that vendee did not plant and care for any crop pursuant to any such agreement; and that vendor demanded payment of amounts due at various times before declaring a forfeiture.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨95(2)—Vendor's acceptance of less than amount of installment due held not waiver of right to declare forfeiture.

Vendor's acceptance of less than the sum due on an installment of the purchase price held not a waiver of his right to declare a forfeiture for nonpayment of the balance and a subsequent installment.

SHOEMAKER v. COOKE et al. (Civ. 4458.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 13, 1924.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨299(2)—Issue whether vendor should have sued to foreclose crop mortgage before suing vendee in ejectment held not in case.

In ejectment by vendor against vendee, where existence of a crop mortgage which defendant agreed to execute to plaintiff was not alleged, evidence thereof was objected to, and no finding was made on the subject, plaintiff was entitled to judgment without having sued to foreclose the mortgage whether or not Code Civ. Proc. § 726, permitting but one action for recovery of a debt or enforcement of rights secured by mortgage, applied.

2. Appeal and error ⇨761—Assumptions indulged by appellate court to permit application of appellant's statement to certain questions argued at length.

Where the question whether vendor waived his right to declare a forfeiture by accepting less than the sum due on a certain payment, permitting defendant to continue farming the premises, consenting to wait for a payment due, and failing to demand performance before de-

WORKS, J. Plaintiff and defendant Cooke, on January 10, 1919, entered into a written contract whereby the former agreed to sell and the latter agreed to buy a parcel of land. The purchase price was $15,000, and the sum of $500 was paid at the execution of the agreement. The balance was to be paid in installments of $1,500 on or before July 1, 1919, $1,000 on or before December 1, 1919, and certain later installments not necessary to be mentioned. The agreement provided that the vendee should be let into the immediate possession of the property; that time was of the essence of the contract; that the vendee's failure to pay any installment where due should work a forfeiture of his right to the property and a forfeiture of all payments theretofore made; and that the vendee would immediately upon the execution of the agreement, make to the vendor a chattel mortgage upon all crops to be grown upon the property in 1919 and 1920 to secure the installments due during those years. The vendee entered into the possession of the property on the day of the execution of the agreement for purchase and sale.

The present action, commenced for the purpose of ejecting defendant Cooke from the land described in the agreement of sale, was instituted by means of an ordinary complaint in ejectment; no reference being made therein to the agreement. The answer of defendant Cook denied the material allegations of the complaint. It also pleaded the agreement for sale and purchase and contained, among others, the following averments: That defendant was unable to pay in time the installment of $1,500 due on the property on July 1, 1919; that on or about August 1, 1919, he paid $800 on account of that installment, and that it was then and there orally agreed between him and plaintiff that it would be inadvisable to put a summer crop on the land in controversy during 1919, and that defendant Cooke might have such an extension of time as would enable him thereafter to grow a crop of barley on the land and to harvest and sell the same in order to enable him to pay the balance of the installment of $1,500 and the installment of $1,000 due December 1, 1919; that on or about October 1, 1919, and in good season, defendant Cooke sowed barley on the land, and thereafter caused to be grown a first-class crop of barley thereon; that at no time up to April 22, 1920, did plaintiff attempt to interfere with defendant Cooke's possession of the land, or attempt to collect any moneys under the contract of sale and purchase, or attempt to claim any forfeiture under the contract, but that up to that date he so conducted negotiations with defendant Cooke as to lead the latter to believe, and he did believe, that plaintiff intended to and would carry out the oral agreement for an extension of time, made on or about August 1, 1919; that on April 22, 1920, when the crop of barley on the land was ready to be harvested, plaintiff served on defendant Cooke a notice declaring a forfeiture of the contract because of his failure to pay the balance due of the installment of July 1, 1919, and the installment of December 1, 1919; and that the notice was the first intimation defendant Cooke ever had that plaintiff was dissatisfied with the arrangement made on or about August 1, 1919. Thereafter defendant Cooke filed a supplemental answer, and plaintiff filed an amended complaint. It is not necessary to state the nature of these pleadings. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendant Cooke appeals.

[1] Appellant, having in mind the provision of the agreement between the parties binding appellant to execute to respondent a crop mortgage, contends that respondent was not entitled to judgment, for the reason that an action like the present could not properly have been maintained until after respondent had proceeded by action to foreclose the mortgage. In support of this contention, appellant cites section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which opens with the provision, "There can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real or personal property, which action must be in accordance with the provisions of this chapter," the chapter being one relating to actions for the foreclosure of mortgages. We need express no opinion upon the question whether section 726 has a bearing upon such a state of facts as is shown here. It is enough to say in disposing of appellant's point that there is no crop mortgage in the case. It is not alleged in any of the pleadings that the mortgage was ever given, nor did the court find either that it was given or that it was not given. There was, it is true, some oral evidence in the record to the effect that the mortgage was executed, but, when a witness was asked whether he had the mortgage in his possession, respondent objected "to any evidence along this line, that if this is a defense, it should have been pleaded." Later, he made the objection to a preliminary question concerning the mortgage that it was "irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, not covering any issues in this case." When the mortgage was offered, the objection was made that "it is absolutely irrelevant and pertains to no issue in this case." The trial court, however, admitted the mortgage in evidence. A situation kindred to the one now before us was considered by the Supreme Court in Crescent Lumber Co. v. Larson, 166 Cal. 168, 135 Pac. 502. That action was brought to secure judgment on a promissory note, and the trial court found that a conveyance had been executed as security for the payment of the note. After referring to the effect of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure in such cases, the Supreme Court said:

"But here the pleadings raised no issue regarding security for the debt, and the finding, being entirely outside of the issues, must be disregarded. * * * The rule just stated is subject to the qualification that a finding may be considered where the issue, though not formally raised by the pleadings, was tried in the court below without objection."

In the present case the pleadings were barren of allegation concerning the existence of the mortgage, the question was not tried without objection, and there was no finding upon the subject. It is plain that appellant's point is without merit.

[2] The next question presented by appellant is thus stated:

"The plaintiff, by accepting less than the sum due upon the July payment, and by his agreement to permit the defendant to continue farming the premises and to put in a crop, and by his further consenting to wait for the defendant to attempt to raise the December payment for 10 to 30 days after the same was due, and his failure to make demand of performance before declaring forfeiture, waived his right to declare any forfeiture."

It will be observed that this statement, combining both matter of fact and of law, is not directed at any finding of the trial court as being without support in the evidence, nor at any error of law which it is claimed that the court committed. Further, nowhere in his argument upon the many-sided question presented by his statement does appellant so direct any part of it. As, however, the question is argued at some length, we shall make in appellant's behalf such assumptions as will allow an application of his statement to all questions toward which we are able to conceive that he intended to direct it.

[3, 4] We shall assume that appellant intends the contention that findings to the following effect are not supported by the evidence: (1) That the parties never entered into any agreement whereby appellant might have such an extension of time in which to make payment of the balance of the installment due July 1, 1919, after payment thereon of $800, as would enable appellant to raise a barley crop; (2) that the parties made no agreement to extend the time of payment of the installment due December 1, 1919; (3) that appellant did not plant and care for any barley crop pursuant to any agreement with respondent for an extension of time in which to make any payments under the contract; (4) that respondent, at various times before April 22, 1920, demanded payment of the balance remaining due of the installment which became payable July 1, 1919, and of the installment which fell due December 1, 1919. Is there evidence in the record to support these four findings? This question must be answered in the affirmative as to each finding. On the score of the first, respondent testified positively that there was never any agreement such as that mentioned in the finding, and that he and appellant never conversed upon the subject of such an agreement. As to the second, respondent on the stand denied the existence of the agreement mentioned therein, and denied any conversation concerning such an agreement. All question as to the third is disposed of by the testimony mentioned in the two sentences immediately preceding the present one. The fourth is supported by testimony of respondent showing that from December, 1919, to April, 1920, he made frequent and persistent demand for the payment of the installments due under the contract. This condition of the evidence as to the four findings assumed by us to be attacked by appellant effectually disposes of his point. The question presented by him culminates in the contention that respondent waived his right to declare a forfeiture of appellant's rights under the contract between them, this for the various reasons set forth in appellant's statement of his point. The state of the evidence leaves but one of those reasons, the acceptance of less than the amount due upon the installment payable July 1, 1919, as a support for the contention made. It can hardly be said that the right to declare a forfeiture was waived because of that circumstance alone. Much more is necessary to produce such a result under the law. See Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126.

HUNCEKER v. LUTZ et al. (Civ. 2584, 2585.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 21, 1924. Rehearing Denied March 22, 1924.)

1. Pleading $\S$ 418(2)—Error in overruling demurrer to petition held immaterial.

Where it could not be ascertained from complaint to quiet title to waters what quantity plaintiff used, error in overruling demurrer thereto became immaterial where defendants, after such ruling filed answers denying plaintiff's allegations and setting up affirmative defenses, thereby tendering issues.

2. Trial $\S$ 374(2)—In action to quiet title, court could disregard special findings of jury.

Where, in trial of action to quiet title to waters, special issues were submitted to jury, the court could adopt their findings or disregard them and make its own findings.

3. Judgment $\S$ 743(1)—Judgment establishing defendant's rights to waters of creek held res judicata.

Judgment in action in 1908 confirming rights of defendant's predecessors and grantors in the waters of a creek, and further adjudging that plaintiff did not own any of the waters and had no rights therein, held res judicata in plaintiff's action to quiet title to waste waters therefrom.

4. Waters and water courses $\S$ 138—No prescriptive right based on permissive use of waters.

No prescriptive right can be based on a permissive use or on what is generally known and called waste waters.

5. Waters and water courses $\S$ 137—Riparian rights divested by five years' adverse user.

Riparian rights cannot be divested by an adverse user unless such use has continued for full period of five years under such circumstances as the law requires to establish title in that manner.

6. Waters and water courses $\S$ 152(8)—Adverse user not shown.

In action to quiet title to 120 inches of the waters of a creek, evidence held insufficient to support trial court's finding of five years' adverse use by plaintiff, and applying the doctrine of relation and counting a period of time anterior to actual diversion to make up the five years was error.

McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The two actions, numbered as stated above, were consolidated for the purposes of trial and were presented to this court upon one transcript, heard as one cause and will be so considered in this opinion. The action involves the validity, priority, and extent of water rights claimed by the respective parties in the waters of Rock creek, a natural stream situated in the county of Shasta.

The action was brought by the plaintiff to quiet title to 120 inches measured under a 4-inch pressure of the waters running and being in said Rock creek. His claim or title thereto is based upon prescription or adverse use. The respondent's land consists of 40 acres situated in the vicinity of said Rock creek and susceptible of irrigation therefrom.

Prior to the commencement of this action and on or about the 19th day of June, 1908, a judgment was made and entered in the superior court of Shasta county adjudging and decreeing that the grantors and predecessors in interest of the appellants herein were the owners of and entitled to take and receive from said Rock creek, through a certain ditch known as and called the Stone ditch, 500 miner's inches of water prior to any right, title, or interest of the plaintiff in this action to any of the waters of said Rock creek and also enjoining and restraining the plaintiff from taking any waters from the said Rock creek until after the grantors and predecessors in interest of the appellants herein had first had and received such 500 miner's inches of water from said stream. It further appears that after the entry of this judgment the plaintiff in this action caught up and used upon his premises certain waste waters from a sawmill on Rock creek situated thereon above the take-out of any of the ditches involved in this action and continued to reclaim and use such waste waters with the permission of the owners and operators of said mill until it was closed down in the fall of 1913; that the water so caught up and reclaimed by the plaintiff was taken up at a point called the sawdust pile and conducted through a certain ravine called Swamp ravine down to the 40 acres of land owned by him and there used for irrigation and domestic purposes. It also appears that the water used in the operation of said mill was obtained by an arrangement with the plaintiffs in the action referred to in which judgment was entered on or about June 19, 1908, said plaintiffs being the predecessors and grantors in interest of the appellants herein.

The supply of water thus caught up by the plaintiff being shut off in the fall of 1913, a ditch of about 30 rods in length was constructed by him in the month of January, 1914, and on or about the 11th day of March, 1914, the plaintiff herein filed a notice appropriating 120 inches of the waters flowing in Rock creek at a point on said stream below the mill herein referred to and in that year began the diversion of water directly from the stream. On or about the 5th day of October, 1918, upon proceedings instituted therefor and based upon the judgment hereinbefore referred to, the plaintiff was cited to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for violation of said judgment during the seasons of 1917 and 1918, and after various hearings upon said order to show cause, the plaintiff in this action was on the 19th day of February, 1919, adjudged to be in contempt of the superior court of Shasta county by reason of his violations of the judgment and decree entered against him and in favor of the grantors and predecessors in interest in 1908, as hereinbefore stated. After the institution of the proceedings herein referred to and before judgment was entered therein, the plaintiff on the 13th day of February, 1919, began the actions now before this court.

The trial court awarded the plaintiff the relief prayed for, to wit, a prior claim of 120 miner's inches of the waters of said Rock creek.

[1] The appellants now assign ten separate reasons why the judgment of the lower court should be reversed, the first, second, third, and fourth of which are in substance to the effect that the decision of the trial court that the plaintiff is the owner of and entitled to the use of 120 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure prior to any of the rights of the appellants herein, and that said title was acquired by prescription and adverse use, is not supported by the evidence. Objections are also urged to the ruling of the court in relation to the admission of testimony; also that there is no evidence to justify the award of the continuous flow of the waters awarded to the plaintiff. One of the grounds assigned as the reason for an appeal herein is that the court erred in overruling appellants' demurrer to the plaintiff's amended complaint. This objection, at the time it was passed upon, would seem well taken. The seventh paragraph of the plaintiff's complaint, in which he attempts to set forth his title to the waters of Rock creek, is in the following language:

"That the water heretofore diverted by plaintiff from said Rock creek by and through said ditch on to the lands and premises of plaintiff, as aforesaid, would not exceed 120 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure, and that said plaintiff is the owner of and entitled to the possession, and claims the right to divert through said ditch and to use upon said land for stock and domestic purposes and for the purposes of irrigation, as aforesaid, 120 inches of water measured under a 4-inch pressure."

The defendants demurred specifically to the plaintiff's complaint and urged that the paragraph herein referred to does not state a cause of action, in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom what quantity of water the plaintiff used. It is apparent from a reading of the paragraph that this contention is well founded. This defect in the complaint is not cured by any allegations elsewhere contained therein. The defendants, however, after the overruling of their demurrers, proceeded to file answers, not simply denying the allegation of the plaintiff's complaint, but, proceeding to set up affirmative defenses, to wit, their right and title to the water of Rock creek, the land owned by them, the uses of the waters of Rock creek made by them and the manner in which they severally obtained title to the waters of said stream, and then prayed judgment of the trial court confirming their title as set forth in their affirmative defenses as against the plaintiff in this action, thus tendering issues for the trial court to hear and determine. Under such circumstances and in this state of the pleadings, the error of the court in overruling the appellants' demurrers became immaterial.

[2] If the plaintiff in this action has any prior right to the waters of Rock creek, it must be based upon some title acquired after the entry of judgment on June 19, 1908, in which it was adjudged and decreed that the grantors and predecessors in interest of the defendants in this action were the owners of 500 inches of the waters of said stream and were entitled to take therefrom that quantity of water prior to the taking of any water from said stream by the plaintiff herein. The cause was tried before the court sitting with a jury. Special issues were submitted to the jury, the court adopted the same, but subsequently made its own findings in which it disregarded, in some particulars, the answers given by the jury to the special issues submitted for their consideration. Under the law the court had a right to adopt the findings of the jury or to disregard them and make its own findings. No point is made for reversal by reason of the action of the trial court in disregarding the answers given by the jury to some of the special issues submitted to them, but they are called to the attention of this court for the purpose of showing some contradictory matters which we deem, however, unimportant and not necessary to be considered. Disregarding the minor objections urged by appellants, the crucial question on this appeal is whether the following findings made by the trial court are supported by the evidence, to wit:

"That for more than five years last prior to the commencement of this action, said plaintiff has diverted from said stream of Rock creek in and through said Hunceker ditch, mentioned in plaintiff's first amended complaint, 120 inches of water of the natural flow of said stream, measured under a 4-inch pressure, at the head of said Hunceker ditch and has conveyed the same through said Hunceker ditch, to, over, and upon the lands of plaintiff hereinabove described, and there used the same for beneficial uses and purposes, to wit, irrigation of crops growing upon said land, the watering of stock and domestic purposes, and that during all of said time said diversion and use was and has been continuous, and open, and notorious and uninterrupted, and under claim of right and in every way adverse to defendants, and each of them, and to their grantors and predecessors in interest."

And the further finding:

"That the above-named defendants, and each of them, claim an interest in the waters of said stream of Rock creek flowing at the head of said ditch, adverse to said plaintiff herein, as hereinabove found, and that said claim of said defendants, and each of them, is wrongful, unlawful, and without right."

[3] It is not questioned, and it cannot be seriously questioned, that the judgment of the trial court entered in June, 1908, is final and conclusive and at that particular time established the prior rights in interest of the appellants herein to the waters of said Rock creek as against the claims of the plaintiff, Charles F. Hunceker, in this action. That judgment not only confirms the rights in and to the waters of said Rock creek to the predecessors and grantors of the appellants herein, but further adjudges that the defendant in said action, Charles F. Hunceker, does not own any of the waters of Rock creek and has no rights therein. It is unnecessary to cite authorities showing that this judgment, at the date of its entry, was res judicata as to the rights of the parties to the waters of said Rock creek. Has the plaintiff acquired any title thereto as against the defendants in this action by adverse use of the waters of said stream for the statutory period of five years since 1908 and prior to February 13, 1919, the date of the commencement of this action? The testimony is practically undisputed that the use of the water by the plaintiff after June 19, 1908, down to the date of the closing of the mill, herein referred to, was simply permissive and that no adverse use was made of said waters by the plaintiff until on or about March 11, 1914. The mill referred to appears to have been under the management of one C. R. Forward and is known as the Forward mill. His testimony as to the manner in which he obtained the right to use said waters, as set out in the transcript, is as follows:

"Q. Prior to using this water for the purpose of carrying off sawdust and other waste materials at your mill, did you make any arrangements with any person for the use of that water? A. Yes, sir. Q. And with whom? A. With Ed Head. Q. And when you say Ed Head, do you refer to A. W. Head? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you recall of an action brought in the superior court of this county by the following named plaintiffs: A. E. Head, V. B. Taylor, and Mrs. E. R. Stone, as plaintiffs, against Charles Hunceker as defendant, and who is plaintiff in this action? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were you a witness in that suit? A. No, sir. Q. But you know about the suit? A. Yes, I have heard of it. Q. And I will ask you whether or not the A. E. Head with whom you made the arrangements for the use of water out of Rock creek for carrying sawdust and other waste materials from your mill, is the same A. E. Head who was plaintiff in the action which I have just referred to? A. Yes, sir; he was. Q. Now, will you please state, Mr. Forward, what arrangement you made with Mr. Head for the use of water from Rock creek for carrying off sawdust and other materials from your mill? A. Well, I spoke to Mr. Head about the water, and he said yes, I might have the water, but that he wanted me to pay him something to protect his rights in the creek in case somebody else would claim it after it had gone to waste, knowing it would run away from the slope of Rock creek. Q. When you were not using the water to conduct sawdust and other refuse from the mill, what was done with the water? A. Well, as a general rule, it was turned back into the creek. Q. And state whether or not you had any arrangements with Mr. Head in reference to that feature of the use of the water? A. Yes, he asked me when I was not using it to turn it back into the creek, at nights and Sundays, and so forth. Q. And was that agreed and arranged with Mr. Head at the time you went to him about using water from Rock creek? A. Yes, sir. Q. And at night time what did you do with the water? A. Well, I turned it back into the creek as a general rule. Q. And what did you do on Sundays? A. We turned it into the creek. Q. And by what means did you turn the water into the creek? A. Well, we had a slip gate in the side of the flume above the mill, and we just pulled it out and it was long enough so the water couldn't none pass by, all dropped out through the opening when we lifted the board out. Q. Did you in any way compensate Mr. Head for the use of the water? A. Yes, sir. Q. And in what manner? A. Why, I gave him lumber for the use of it. Q. And over what period of time did you give him lumber? A. Through the entire time that I operated. Q. When did you cease the use of this water from Rock creek for carrying off refuse from the mill? A. Well, I think some time during the month of September in 1913. Q. And when you ceased operating your mill, what did you do with the water? A. Turned it into the creek."

This witness further testified that the mill was closed in September, 1913, but that he allowed the water theretofore used by him in connection with the operation of said mill to continue running for a period of about two weeks longer at the request of the plaintiff in this action; the testimony being as follows:

"Q. When did you cease the use of this water from Rock creek for carrying off refuse from the mill? A. Well, I think some time during the month of September in 1913. Q. And when you ceased operating your mill, what did you do with the water? A. Turned it into the creek. Q. And did you immediately turn the water into the creek after you had ceased operating your sawmill? A. No, I let it run for a while. Q. How long did you let it run? A. Perhaps for a week or two. Q. Why did you do that? A. Well, I did it for Mr. Hunceker. Q. And just state what the circumstances were that caused you to do this for Mr. Hunceker, the plaintiff in this action? A. Well, he needed the water for his garden and stuff, and I wanted him to have it, and I thought perhaps the other people could get along without it, and he had asked me to turn it down to him, and I did so. Q. When did he ask you to permit the water to run down to him? A. Well, that was probably a couple of weeks before I— well, very often, as far as that was concerned on Sundays and such times, he would say he was going home, he would work for me, he would like for me to leave the water run on the Sunday, and I did that a great many times. Q. And at whose request? A. His. Q. When you say his, you mean the plaintiff in this action, Mr. Hunceker? A. Yes, sir. Q. And when was it that he requested you to permit the water to run after you had ceased the operation of your sawmill in 1913? A. Well, it was just about a couple of weeks, I suppose, before I finally did shut it off."

Upon this same question the plaintiff testified as follows:

"Q. While you were up taking water from the sawdust pile after Ross Forward used it in his mill at that time, in those years from 1908 to 1914, you weren't claiming the right to take that water adversely to the people down the creek, who had previously sued you, were you? A. When she dumped over the hill, I had a right to it because it was considered waste water. Q. It was considered waste water? A. Waste water. Q. And you claimed you were taking waste water? A. That is what I was taking that water there—that way. Q. You also claimed in those years that the taking of that water through the mill didn't invade the rights of the parties who had sued for that injunction against you? A. Well, they didn't object. Q. You claimed that you didn't invade their rights, didn't you? A. No, Mr. Kennedy. Q. Now, Mr. Hunceker, it was after that injunction was issued against you by this superior court, that you went up to Forward's mill to get water, wasn't it? A. I did. Q. And because of that injunction, wasn't it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Subsequent to the entry of that judgment, Mr. Hunceker, which you remember, and when you went to take Mr. Forward's waste water from his sawdust pile, you considered that you were not adversely taking away from these defendants who had an injunction against you, any water that belonged to them, didn't you? A. Oh, I didn't consider I was hurting anybody, Mr. Kennedy. Q. You didn't consider you were taking their water, is that it? A. No, sir; I was not taking their water at all. Q. You didn't consider then that you were invading their right to any water, did you? A. I did. Q. You did consider you were or you weren't? A. I didn't consider that I was invading their rights at all. Q. And you didn't claim to be? A. I didn't claim to invade their rights. Q. At all times after that when you took water either from Forward's mill or directly from Rock creek, you didn't consider you were invading their rights established by that decree? A. I didn't think I was interfering with their rights at all. * * * Q. And for the year 1913 where did you get your water? A. Same source. Q. That is, from the flume? A. From the mill. Q. And how long was water diverted through that flume? A. Till about the—the rainy season, about the first of October. Q. Now, Mr. Hunceker, when did the mill close down? A. Some time in the first of October. Q. October? A. Yes, the rainy season. Q. What was done with the water that continued to run in the flume? A. Well, I don't know, I wasn't there. Because we was getting water from other sources, from the hills then; the hills was saturated with rain."

[4] There is no question, and there can be no question, but that during all the period now being considered the plaintiff was using waste or abandoned water coming from the Forward mill and gathered up by him at the point known as the sawdust pile. Upon this it was first sought to base the plaintiff's claim to said waters. This claim, however, was abandoned during the course of the trial. The authorities are without conflict that no prescriptive right can be based upon a permissive use or upon what is generally known and called waste waters. Davis v. Martin, 157 Cal. 657, 108 Pac. 866; Dannenbrink v. Burger, 23 Cal. App. 587, 596, 38 Pac. 751; Kinney on Water Rights (2d Ed.) § 661; Wiel on Water Rights, § 57.

The undisputed testimony hereinbefore set forth shows conclusively that the plaintiff's right, if any, begins at a date subsequent to the year 1913. The testimony also shows that the use of the water by the Forward mill was a permissive use and for which compensation was agreed to be made and was not a nonuser or abandonment of the water so as to forfeit title thereto by the owners of the same.

[5] Has the plaintiff acquired any adverse rights to the use of said waters since the year 1913? The testimony is undisputed that the 30-rod ditch constructed by the plaintiff was built during the month of January, 1914, and that on the 11th day of March he filed a notice of appropriation of 120 inches of the waters of Rock creek and on that day began diverting through said ditch the waters claimed by him. The notice is as follows:

"Notice is hereby given that I claim the flowing waters of Rock creek to the extent of 120 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure; that the purpose for which I claim the said waters is for stock water, domestic purposes and irrigation (a description of the 40 acres of land owned by the plaintiff is herein set forth). The point of intended diversion is on the south bank of said Rock creek at a point near the east line of the southeast quarter of section 17, township 30 north, range 2 east, M. D. M. * * * Dated this, the 11th day of March, 1914."

This notice was thereafter recorded in the office of the county recorder of Shasta county. Upon this basis the respondent makes the following claims:

"This action was commenced by filing of the complaint on February 13, 1919, more than five full years after respondent had commenced the construction of his ditch out of Rock creek, where he made his present diversion. It is our contention, therefore, that the respondent's right was initiated at the time he commenced the construction of his ditch and that the five-year period would start to run from the time he openly and notoriously entered upon the creek and performed acts which unequivocally showed his intention of diverting the water from Rock creek, and his subsequent diversion and use of the water continuously and without interruption would, after the expiration of five years, ripen into a prescriptive right to the use of the water."

To sustain this contention the respondent relies upon the case of Haight v. Costanich, 184 Cal. 426, 194 Pac. 26. We will quote therefrom as follows:

"However, the quantity of water to which a person may become entitled by diversion is not necessarily limited to the amount of water actually used at the time of the original diversion. Inasmuch as plaintiff's diversion was not made under the modes prescribed by the California statutes, it is governed solely by the California law of possessory rights as it existed prior to the adoption of such statutory methods. The cases involving water rights acquired under this law lay down the rule that a right to the use of running water does not vest in possession at common law, until there has been an actual diversion and beneficial use of the water. But they all recognize, and some of them declare, that, before any actual diversion or use of the water, a claimant may acquire an incipient, incomplete, and conditional right to the future use of the water, by beginning the construction of the works necessary for such diversion and use, and, in good faith, diligently prosecuting the same toward completion. * * * There is no case, arising prior to the enactment of the code, which holds that the party who thus in good faith began and diligently prosecuted the work on a dam and ditch for the diversion and use of water, could not protect his incipient right to the water against the hostile diversions and claims of others by an appropriate suit for that purpose. * * * Such visible act and avowed intent gave him a conditional right to the future use of the water, prior to its actual use, the condition being that he should thereafter diligently continue the work to completion and then divert the water and apply it to a useful purpose, failing which his right would cease. Upon the performance of these conditions his title to such use would become complete and perfect. In the meantime, however, he had an existing conditional right, manifested by actual visible possession of the works.'"

The facts of that case, however, are so dissimilar from the one at bar that a short analysis suffices to show the inapplicability of that case to the one now being considered. In the case of Haight v. Costanich, supra, the court was considering the right of an appropriator to refer an increase of irrigation back to the construction of his works, as against the intervening riparian owner. In the case at bar the rights of appellants were established prior to the time when plaintiff undertook to make an appropriation of the waters of Rock creek and thus could be divested only by an actual diversion and use of the waters of said stream in the manner and for the time required by the statute of limitations. The appellants' rights were not invaded until the actual diversion and use of the waters by the plaintiff herein. The question before the court is one of adverse use and has nothing to do with the doctrine of relation. As stated by appellants:

"Until the water was diverted into plaintiff's ditch the defendants had no cause of action against him; he did not commence such diversion until March 11, 1914, and until March 11, 1919, plaintiffs could bring an action for the trespass and toll the statute of limitations. Before this time expired respondent filed the present action, and he cannot now bolster up an insufficient claim of adverse use by the doctrine of relation."

[6] We do not deem it necessary to discuss the riparian rights of the appellant, Northern California Power Company, Cons., further than to refer to the cases of Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674, and Gallatin v. Corning Irr. Co., 163 Cal. 405, 126 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 74, which set forth fully the law relating to riparian rights and from which it follows that those rights cannot be divested by an adverse user unless such adverse use has continued for the full period of five years under such circumstances as the law requires to establish title in that manner. The appellants also contend that there is no testimony to support the findings as to the right of the plaintiff to a continuous use of the waters of Rock creek and that there is no showing as to the period of time during the each 24 hours the plaintiff made use of the waters claimed by him, but from what has been heretofore said these questions become immaterial, because, if the plaintiff has not established title by five years' adverse use of the waters involved, then and in that case all such questions become of no importance. From what has been said in this opinion it is evident that there is no testimony supporting the finding of the trial court of five years' adverse use by the plaintiff to the waters of Rock creek as claimed by him and that the court was in error in applying the doctrine of relation in this case and in counting a period of time anterior to the actual diversion of the water by the plaintiff in order to make up such five years.

This necessitates the reversal of the judgments herein, and it is so ordered.

THE DAILY TELEGRAM v. OCEAN VIEW OIL CO. (Civ. 3945.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division One, California. Feb. 18, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 15, 1924.)

1. Licenses ⇐39—Fiscal agent's contract for advertising held not void though expenditure would exceed percentage allowed by permit under Corporate Securities Act.

A stipulation in a permit to sell stock, issued by corporation commissioner to corporation under the Corporate Securities Act, allowing the expenditure of not to exceed 20 per cent. in effecting the sale of the stock, held not to invalidate a contract for advertising entered into between the corporation's fiscal agent and a newspaper on the theory that the contract called for an expenditure exceeding in amount the percentage allowed by the permit.

2. Corporations ⇐79—Fiscal agent authorized to sell corporation's stock held empowered to employ expert assistance in planning, writing, and placing advertising.

Under Civ. Code, § 2349, a fiscal agent who had a contract with the corporation for the sale of its stock, empowering the fiscal agent to incur indebtedness on behalf of the corporation to a certain amount, could employ expert assistance to plan, write, and place advertising under the fiscal agent's supervision, such employment not constituting an unlawful delegation by the fiscal agent of his powers to an agent.

3. Corporations ⇐79—Evidence held to prove that newspaper relied on credit of corporation in extending credit for advertising ordered by fiscal agent.

In newspaper publisher's action against a corporation for amount due under advertising contract entered into by fiscal agent authorized by corporation to sell its stock under a contract authorizing the fiscal agent to incur indebtedness on behalf of the corporation, evidence held to show that the newspaper relied on the credit of the corporation in extending credit for the advertising.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge pro tem.

Action by The Daily Telegram against the Ocean View Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George W. Bush, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Daly, Daly & Todd, of Long Beach, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant, Ocean View Oil Company, on a cause of action arising out of certain advertising in the newspaper of plaintiff and its assignor, alleged to have been done at the instance and request of said defendant.

In accordance with certain provisions of the Corporate Securities Act defendant procured a permit to sell 100,000 shares of its stock on the condition that not more than 20 per cent. of the selling price thereof should be paid as a commission for its sale. The defendant then entered into a contract with one C. F. Martin by which it was agreed, among other things, in substance, that Martin, party of the second part, was appointed the "fiscal agent" of the defendant, party of the first part, to sell the said 100,000 shares of stock for a compensation of 20 per cent. commission, "wholly in accordance with the permit." Also:

"In addition to the above commission, the party of the first part agrees to raise by subscription not to exceed 5,000 shares of the capital stock of said corporation which shall be sold by the party of the second part without commission.

"Said party of the second part shall make an accounting to the party of the first part for all moneys expended by him in overhead and should said overhead be less than said $5,000, then said money remaining shall be and belong to the party of the first part. In the event that the overhead shall exceed said $5,000, said expense shall be borne by said party of the second part.

"It is further agreed that the party of the first part shall immediately advance towards said overhead expense the sum of $600 which shall be credited by the said party of the second part as a credit on said $5,000.

"It is further stipulated and agreed that the party of second part shall have the use free of expense of two of the offices in the Stock Exchange Building now being occupied by the party of the first part, for the uses in this agreement set forth."

For the purpose of carrying on the sale of the stock on behalf of defendant, Martin entered into a contract with a publicity agency to "plan, write and place advertising campaign as may be directed." The advertising was done by plaintiff and its assignor, and no payment having been made therefor, an action was commenced which resulted in a judgment being rendered against defendant for the sum of $712.16.

While the contract is not entirely free from ambiguity, the testimony of Mr. Martin which was offered for the purpose of explaining the ambiguity, and which testimony was evidently believed by the trial court, was to the effect that up to the sum of $5,000 the defendant was to pay the necessary expenses of making the sale of the stock; that copy of the advertising was mailed to the office of appellant; that the president of the corporation had knowledge of all the facts in connection with the advertising while it was being done; and after the advertising bills were due and demand had been made for the payment the president of the defendant corporation had asked Martin "to stall them off a little longer." He also said that if no stock could be sold it would be necessary to declare an "Irish dividend" and pay the bills. The interpretation placed upon the contract by the parties thereto clearly appears to have been that such expenditures as are here in question were to be included in the agreement, with the necessary agency in Martin to incur indebtedness on behalf of the corporation therefor.

[1] Appellant contends that because the permit issued by the corporation commissioner allowed the expenditure of not to exceed 20 per cent. in effecting the sale of the stock, any contract by which that percentage was to be exceeded is void as against public policy. Such a contention might possibly avail as between the parties to the contract, but it would seem inequitable that innocent third persons should be made to suffer pecuniary loss for such a reason. Even assuming plaintiff's knowledge of a limitation upon expenditures, plaintiff very properly might have assumed that the corporation had resources arising from the operation of its business and had an independent right to order advertising to be done without reference to the terms of the permit.

[2] The third point raised by appellant is to the effect that, assuming that Martin personally was authorized to incur an indebtedness for newspaper advertising, he had no authority to delegate his powers to an agent. The evidence showed that Martin supervised the advertising, and the fact that it was thought necessary or advisable to employ expert assistance to "plan, write and place" it does not constitute a delegation of powers by an agent. There was nothing within the terms of the contract between plaintiff and defendant specially forbidding the employment of such an assistant for such purpose, and consequently the right to do so would seem to fall within the regulation of such matters as is provided by section 2349 of the Civil Code.

[3] It is also urged that neither plaintiff nor its assignor relied upon the credit of the appellant in extending credit for the advertising. The evidence, however, shows to the contrary, in that the various items in the account are charged to the Ocean View Oil Company. The credit manager for plaintiff's assignor testified that he went to see Martin regarding the proposed credit to be advanced to the Ocean View Oil Company, and that Martin said, "Yes; I am the agent here in Long Beach, but I am merely the tool of the Ocean View Oil Company itself. I fully believe that they are solid and that they will pay their bills." Apparently acting on such statement, plaintiff extended credit to appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

WHYTE et al. v. CITY OF SACRAMENTO et al. (Civ. 2616.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 9, 1924.)

1. Pleading ⚡18, 19—Averment as to impossibility of streets held demurrable for uncertainty and ambiguity.

In a suit to enjoin enforcement of a municipal traffic ordinance restricting use of trucks over a certain weight to certain streets in a designated district, an averment in the complaint, that the streets on which trucks were permitted were in an "unpaved condition," and for that reason it was "virtually impossible for plaintiff's trucks to be operated" on such streets, held demurrable as unintelligible, uncertain, and ambiguous.

2. Appeal and error ⚡195—In absence of request below refusal to allow amendment cannot first be raised on appeal.

Where a demurrer to a complaint was sustained without leave to amend, the point that plaintiffs were not allowed to amend cannot first be raised on appeal, they having made no request or motion therefor.

3. Municipal corporations ⚡703(1)—Designation of territory affected by traffic ordinance held sufficient.

In a suit to restrain enforcement of a traffic ordinance regulating the use of motor trucks in a certain district described in the ordinance as the "old city limits," held, that such description was sufficient, particularly in view of designation of the streets affected by name.

4. Municipal corporations ⚡626—Police power may not be applied so as to be discriminatory.

The police power conferred on cities, towns, and townships by Const. art. 11, § 11, must be fairly and reasonably applied, and can never be invoked and applied so as to discriminate in favor of or against particular classes of persons as to whom no reasonable basis of discrimination can be said to exist.

5. Municipal corporations ⚡63(2) — Courts may determine reasonableness of ordinance.

The question of reasonableness of a municipal ordinance, whether, in enacting it, the governing board of the city proceed under the police power conferred by Const. art. 11, § 11, or that conferred directly by the city charter, is open to inquiry by the courts.

6. Municipal corporations ⚡57—Under freeholders' charter municipality cannot without express authority pass ordinance outside of "municipal affairs."

A municipal corporation governed by a freeholders' charter passed under Const. 11, § 8, cannot pass any ordinance or adopt any regulation with respect to any subject or matter which does not come peculiarly within the legal description of "municipal affairs" unless the authority is expressly delegated to it by the Legislature either through its charter or some general law.

7. Municipal corporations ⚡703(1)—Streets may be used by citizens subject to legislative control.

The streets of a city belong to the people of a state, and the use thereof is an inalienable right of every citizen of the state, subject to legislative control of such reasonable regulations as to the traffic thereon or the manner of using them as the Legislature may deem wise or proper.

8. Municipal corporations ⚡703(5)—City held not authorized by charter to regulate use of street by trucks.

The Legislature has not, through the charter of the city of San Francisco passed under Const. art. 11, § 8, granted to the city or its governing board the authority to enact an ordinance forbidding trucks of a carrying capacity of one ton or more to use certain streets within a designated area of the city.

9. Municipal corporations ⚡703(5)—City held authorized by general law to regulate use of streets by trucks.

St. 1917, p. 406, § 22, vesting freeholders' chartered city with full control over and right to regulate the use of streets within their limits, held to confer authority on the city of San Francisco to pass a traffic ordinance restricting the use of trucks of a carrying capacity of more than one ton to certain streets within a designated area of the city.

10. Municipal corporations ⚡703(1) — Right to regulate use of streets may be conferred by general law.

The power to adopt a traffic ordinance limiting the use of motor trucks of a certain carrying capacity to certain streets may be delegated to a city by the Legislature by general law as well as by express charter grant.

11. Evidence ⚡5(2)—Judicial notice taken of use of automobile for freight and business purposes.

The courts will take cognizance of the fact that the automobile has become a method for transportation, locally, of freight and passengers, and for business purposes generally, as well as for the purpose of pleasure, and that an unrestricted use of them in large cities would render the streets practically useless for other purposes.

12. Municipal corporations ☞703(1)—Regulation of automobile traffic within police power.

It is within the police power to regulate the use of streets by automobiles so as to reduce to the lowest possible minimum the dangers and inconveniences which naturally are the consequences thereof.

13. Constitutional law ☞81—Limits of police power may be extended to include changes incident to progress of science and invention.

The limits of the police power cannot be defined, and may be extended to meet the exigencies or new conditions arising from time to time as essential incidents of the progress of science and invention.

14. Constitutional law ☞81—What is reasonable exercise of police power depends on conditions.

What is a reasonable exercise of the police power depends on the character or nature of the conditions to be met or overcome.

15. Municipal corporations ☞703(5)—Ordinance regulating motor trucks held not discriminatory.

A municipal traffic ordinance restricting the use of motor trucks of a carrying capacity of one ton or over to certain streets within a designated territory in a city, passed in accordance with Motor Vehicle Act 1917, § 22, and applicable to all persons engaged in use of vehicles of such capacity, is not void as discriminatory; the classification on the basis of weight, the load carried, and injurious effect on the streets involving a real and substantial distinction.

16. Constitutional law ☞235—Ordinance regulating motor trucks held not to deny equal protection of law.

A municipal ordinance passed in accordance with Motor Vehicle Act 1917, § 22, forbidding the use of motor trucks of a carrying capacity of one ton or over on certain streets in a designated area of a city, held not void as denying the equal protection of the law within Const. U. S. art. 14, § 1, it being based upon a reasonable classification.

17. Municipal corporations ☞703(1)—Incidental and necessary burdens held not to make regulation unreasonable.

The incidental and necessary burdens and inconveniences of traffic regulations do not of themselves render the regulations unreasonable.

18. Municipal corporations ☞703(5) — Ordinance held not to discriminate between users of motor trucks according to nature of load carried.

A traffic ordinance restricting the use of motor trucks of a capacity of one ton or over to certain streets held not discriminatory on the ground that trucks of the same capacity carrying freight other than rock, sand, or gravel were not restricted to the same extent, the ordinance when properly construed making no such distinction.

19. Municipal corporations ☞592(1)—Municipal ordinance held repealed by Motor Vehicle Act.

A municipal traffic ordinance restricting the use of motor trucks of a carrying capacity of one ton or over to certain streets within a designated area of the city held repealed by Motor Vehicle Act 1923, known as the Breed Motor Vehicle Act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Suit by J. P. Whyte, etc., and others against the City of Sacramento and others, to enjoin the enforcement of a traffic ordinance. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellants.

R. L. Shinn, City Atty., of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiffs, five in number, are either copartnerships or corporations, and are engaged in the general trucking business in the city of Sacramento, carrying and hauling, by means of motor trucks, articles of merchandise, commodities, materials, and other personal property of every kind and description, "which may be offered to plaintiffs generally to be carried and hauled" over, upon, and across the streets of said city, "both to and from points entirely within the territorial limits of said city and to and from points outside of the territorial limits of said city to and from points therein," and for that purpose the plaintiffs own and operate over, upon, and across the streets of said city motor trucks "having a carrying capacity of one ton and of more than one ton." In other words, the plaintiffs are, and for several years last past have been, engaged in the business of transporting freight from point to point within the limits of said city and from points outside of said limits to points within said limits, and vice versa, and for that purpose have used and are now using motor trucks of a ton and of more than a ton carrying capacity.

The defendants, other than the city of Sacramento, are members of the city council or governing board of said city, and certain other city officials directly charged with the duty of enforcing the local ordinances and regulations adopted or passed by said governing board.

On the 22d day of June, 1922, said city council regularly passed an ordinance for said city, known as "Ordinance No. 80, Fourth Series," the object of which is, as its title indicates, to regulate "travel, traffic and parking upon the streets and other public places laid out for the use of vehicles and pedestrians in the city of Sacramento," etc.; also prescribing a penalty for the violation of the provisions thereof. Said ordinance, among others, contains the following provisions:

"Sec. 2. All vehicles having a carrying capacity of one ton or over, when engaged in the business of hauling or conveying goods, wares, freight or merchandise of any description to any place in traffic districts Nos. 2 and 3, must travel either on I street or on L street to the cross street nearest the destination of such load; and such vehicles must depart from a place within said traffic districts Nos. 2 and 3 after loading, by the nearest intersecting street running in a northerly or southerly direction.

"Sec. 3. It shall be unlawful for any truck of more than one ton capacity to travel on J or K streets in traffic districts Nos. 2 and 3 for more than one block consecutively, and then only for the purpose of loading or unloading in the block traversed.

"Sec. 4. All motor trucks of over one ton capacity operating as carriers of freight, rock, sand, gravel, asphaltic mixtures or other dead weight materials to and from points within or within and without the city of Sacramento, whether operating on a regular schedule or intermittently or occasionally, shall enter and leave and while within the old city limits use the following streets and routes only:

"West of Thirty-First and south of the center line of M street all east and west traffic shall be upon Q street or Y street only, except within such single block upon any other east and west streets upon which such truck may have freight to deliver or receive, and any traffic entering or leaving the old city limits south of the center line of M street shall proceed to or from the line of such old city limits by the most direct route to or from Q or Y street, or, if stops are to be made on any other streets in the old city limits other than Q or Y street, trucks shall proceed to or from the line of the old city limits or Q or Y street to or from the point of such loading or unloading by the most direct north and south street.

"Such trucks shall cross traffic district No. 2 only upon Sixth street.

"In like manner, west of Thirty-First street and north of the center line of M street all east and west motor truck traffic of the kind in this section above defined shall be upon E street or H street only."

The penal clause of the ordinance makes the violation of the above provisions a misdemeanor, punishable by fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment in the city jail for not more than six months or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The complaint is a lengthy document and many of its averments involve (and in the nature of the case necessarily so) legal conclusions. The complaint, however, first admitting that the plaintiffs herein, in the conduct of their trucking businesses within the limits of the city of Sacramento use and operate trucks of more than one ton capacity, proceeds to set out in detail the character and extent of the carrying business of each of the plaintiffs, and in effect alleges that it is necessary to the convenient, proper, and successful carrying on of said businesses that the plaintiffs should have the free, unrestricted, and unobstructed use of all the streets of said city over, upon, and across which to operate their motor trucks, subject, of course, to such reasonable regulations of such use as are general and uniform or applicable to all persons of the same class or making like use of said streets. It is alleged that sections 2, 3, and 4 of article 9 of said ordinance, as hereinabove set forth, are unreasonable in that they are discriminatory against the plaintiffs, for the reason that the latter are prohibited from making use of their motor trucks of more than a ton capacity "over and upon the same streets and highways and in the same method, manner and under the same circumstances that is permitted other persons, copartnerships, firms and corporations similarly situated and using said streets and highways for similar purposes and imposing upon said streets and highways traffic of similar weight and character; that said sections are unreasonable and invalid in that said sections or parts thereof make, or attempt to make, it unlawful for plaintiffs to exercise and pursue a lawful business, to wit, the operation of their said motor trucks in a lawful manner, and to make legitimate use of their property; * * * and also in that said sections restrict, or attempt to restrict and burden, the operation of said motor trucks by plaintiffs so as to compel said trucks to be operated over and along a circuitous route to and from their destinations within said city of Sacramento and unnecessarily and unreasonably increases the distance necessary to be traveled in the operation of said motor trucks in the conduct of the respective businesses of plaintiffs in said city," etc.; that said sections are invalid because they place a greater burden upon motor trucks of over one ton capacity operating as carriers of rock, sand, gravel, asphaltic mixtures or other dead weight materials while entering, leaving, and operating within "the so-called old city limits of said city of Sacramento" than is placed upon vehicles of the same carrying capacity by section 2 of said article 9. It is further alleged that section 4 of article 9 of said ordinance is also unreasonable and invalid "in that said section arbitrarily and without reason divides that portion of said city of Sacramento west of Thirty-First street into two districts and likewise arbitrarily and without reason fixes the center line of M street in said city as the dividing line between said districts, the effect thereof being to restrict any and all motor trucks of over one ton capacity entering or leaving said so-called old city limits west of Thirty-First street to the use of only two east and west streets within said respective districts so arbitrarily created, that is to say, all traffic of such character south of the center line of M street is restricted to

Q and Y streets only, and all such traffic north of said center line of M street is restricted to E and H streets only, for the purpose of traveling in an easterly or westerly direction; that said provisions of said section 4 were and are unreasonable and invalid for the reason that, because of the present unpaved condition of Q street and H street in said city of Sacramento, it is virtually impossible for plaintiffs' trucks to be operated over or upon either said H street or said Q street, and that said provisions of said section 4, therefore, virtually restrict plaintiffs' trucks to the use of but one street in each of said districts so created west of Thirty-First street, that is to say, E street while traveling north of the center line of M street and Y street while traveling south of the said center line of M street."

The other allegations of the complaint need not be referred to herein. The gist of the whole complaint is that the ordinance discriminates against persons of the same class, that the city council of said city, in enacting said ordinance, transcended its legal authority, and that for certain reasons stated in the complaint the provisions of said ordinance contained in sections 2, 3, and 4 of article 9 are in contravention of the mandates of the state and federal Constitutions.

The prayer was for a decree perpetually enjoining and restraining the defendants from enforcing or attempting to enforce the provisions of said ordinance, and from in any way preventing and interfering with plaintiffs, or either of them, etc., "from or in the use or operation of any motor truck or trucks of more than one ton capacity while operating as carriers within the territorial limits of said city, * * * and that sections 2, 3, and 4 of article 9 of said Ordinance No. 80, Fourth Series, be adjudged and decreed to be wholly invalid, void and of no effect."

The defendants demurred to the complaint on general and special grounds, and the same was sustained without leave to amend. The defendants also interposed and filed an answer specifically denying the allegations. Judgment was entered in favor of defendants after demurrer sustained, and the injunctive relief called for thereby denied. The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and the order denying a temporary injunction.

Considering the ordinance in connection with the official map of the city of Sacramento, which is referred to in the complaint, and which it was stipulated at the hearing of the appeal might be used in passing upon and determining the points urged for a reversal of the judgment—that is, in considering the grounds upon which it is insisted that the ordinance in question is at variance with certain provisions of the Constitution—the districts within the limits of which the ordinance prohibits the use of the streets in said city by the persons mentioned therein may thus be explained: In the first place, it should be stated that the streets of the city of Sacramento, while not directly running north and south and east and west, substantially or practically run in those directions, those running east and west being alphabetically named, and including all such streets from B on the north to Y street on the south, and those running north and south being designated by numbers, and including all such streets from First on the west to Thirty-First street on the east. The north and south streets are what may be called "cross streets." Traffic district No. 2, as established by the ordinance in question, extends, north and south from I street to L street, and east and west from Fourth street to Twelfth street. In this district, "cross-town" traffic is restricted to Sixth street, except that the trucks mentioned in section 2 are permitted to use any cross streets in said district from I or L street nearest to the destination of any load which is to be delivered within the district. The use of all the cross or north and south streets west of Fourth street and east of Twelfth street for any purpose is not limited or restricted. In other words, any truck over one ton capacity entering said city either from the north or the south is at liberty, so far as the ordinance in question is concerned, to cross the city in that direction upon or over any of the north and south streets between Twelfth and Thirty-First streets, and between First and Fourth streets.

Thus it will be seen that when delivery of a load in traffic district No. 2 is to be made the truck may enter the district either on I or L street, traverse either of those streets to the street running north and south which is nearest to the point of delivery, thence over that street to the street running east and west where the point of delivery is situated, and then follow the east and west street to said point. From the complaint, aided by the map of the city showing the several traffic districts, it is clear that, on entering the city from any point on the north side thereof where such entrance can be made, a truck, wherever in the city its point of destination may be, may travel from said point on the north and south street either to E or H street, and then turn east or west on either one of those streets, according to the direction in which the point of destination is situated to the cross or north and south street leading to its destination. In entering the city from the south by way of any entrance into said city from that direction, such truck would be required to proceed from its point of entrance to Y or Q street and then turn east or west to the nearest cross street to the point of its destination. According to the map, as well as to the complaint, M and I streets at First street are the only streets in the city whereby entrance thereto may be made from the west.

Likewise it appears that entrances into the city from the east at Thirty-First street may be made by several different east and west streets, including Y, H, and E streets.

It will be observed from the foregoing explanation of the traffic plan and regulations devised and prescribed by the ordinance that there are only certain occasions on which the trucks referred to therein may be required to travel more than two blocks out of their way to reach their destination, and they are when the starting point or point of destination of such trucks is from or to the termini of one of the east and west streets—either M or J or K street—in which case a detour of six or eight blocks from a direct course would perhaps be necessary to reach the point of destination.

The foregoing is a sufficient explanation of the scheme involved in the ordinance under attack to subserve the purposes of this decision.

There are several points, rather subsidiary and subordinate to the main contentions of the appellants, which may first be considered and disposed of.

[1] The complaint, it will be seen, alleges that Q and H streets, two of the streets to the use of which for their trucking business the plaintiffs are restricted by the ordinance, are in an "unpaved condition," and for that reason "it is virtually impossible for plaintiffs' trucks to be operated over or upon either of said" streets. As to that averment, the grounds of the demurrer are that it is unintelligible, uncertain, and ambiguous. We think the demurrer as to said averment was good. A street unpaved may be in as good a condition for use by all kinds of vehicles as a paved street. A street which has merely been graveled and rolled is very often as useful and convenient for all practical purposes as a street paved according to the modern idea of street and highway improvement. If it is not practicable to use the streets complained of by motor trucks or other vehicles because of their bad condition—that is, because they are uneven or filled with chuck holes or for any other reason—that fact should have been pleaded in a direct and specific manner so as clearly to indicate or show that they cannot be used by the plaintiffs in their freight and carrying business by means of motor trucks with safety or reasonable convenience. In other words, the complaint should have given some description of the condition of the streets in order to show that they are "virtually impassable," as the complaint alleges, which allegation, by the way, involves merely a conclusion from the preceding indefinite allegation that they were in an "unpaved condition."

[2] But an unanswerable reply to the consideration of the point here is that, since the record does not show that a request or motion was made by the plaintiffs in the court below for leave to amend the complaint in any particular, said point cannot be raised for the first time on appeal. As is said in Buckley v. Howe, 86 Cal. 596, 605, 25 Pac. 132, 134:

"The privilege of amending, after trial of the issue of law raised by demurrer is not one of right, but one resting in the discretion of the trial court. Code Civ. Proc. § 472. If the plaintiff desired again to amend, she should have applied to the court below, and if refused, exception should have been taken. It is too late to make the point for the first time in this court, when nothing appears on the record to show an abuse of discretion."

See, also, Durrell v. Dooner, 119 Cal. 411, 413, 51 Pac. 628; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 120, 60 Pac. 689; Williamson v. Joyce, 140 Cal. 669, 74 Pac. 290; Murphy v. Murphy, 57 Cal. App. 182, 186, 207 Pac. 43, 44.

[3] The next of the points above referred to is this: That the ordinance confines the operative effect of its provisions to a territory in the city of Sacramento whose boundaries are described as the "old city limits," and that that description is vague and indefinite, or bears no such meaning as to convey to the understanding what particular districts or parts of the city of Sacramento the ordinance has reference to or within which its provisions are intended to apply or have force. The reply to that proposition is, though, that the description of the several traffic districts by specific reference to the streets and parts of the streets by which they are bound or limited and the specific mention of those streets or parts of streets which may be used and not used make the ordinance in those particulars certain and definite. No one reading the ordinance can fall into any misapprehension as to the particular streets or parts of streets that may be used by the trucks mentioned in the ordinance or the streets or parts of streets which may not thus be used.

Counsel for the respondent further contends that the restrictions as to the use of the streets as prescribed by section 4 of the ordinance apply not only to Q and Y streets but all cross or north and south streets east of Twelfth street. We do not so understand the language of the ordinance. Section 4 specifically refers to traffic on east and west streets west of Thirty-First, and the omission of north and south streets from said section necessarily excludes those streets from within the purview of the restrictions, except such north and south streets as are within the other two traffic districts.

We are now brought to the consideration of the grounds upon which the contention is based that the passage of the ordinance was in excess of any authority conferred upon the city council either by the Constitution or the Legislature; that the measure is discriminatory as against the plaintiffs and in favor of other persons engaged in like businesses; that it imposes upon those upon whom its provisions, if enforced, will operate, unreasonable, onerous, and oppressive burdens; that it is in contravention of the provision of section 1 of article 14 of the federal Constitution, guaranteeing to every citizen within the jurisdiction of every state the equal protection of the laws.

[4, 5] The ordinance under attack represents the exercise of the police power, with the right to employ and enforce which, within their respective limits, the Constitution has expressly invested every county, city, town, and township, in the state, provided that the ordinance or regulations passed or adopted for that purpose do not conflict with general laws. Art. 11, § 11, Const. Of course, the power thus conferred upon cities, counties, towns, and townships must be fairly and reasonably applied, or not invoked or exercised in such manner as to result in imposing upon the inhabitants of any of those political subdivisions unreasonably burdensome duties or obligations. The power vested by said section of the Constitution is essential to the full and proper functioning, and consequently the complete accomplishment of the ends and purposes, of municipal corporations, and the other political subdivisions therein mentioned; but it can never be so invoked and applied as to discriminate in favor of or against particular classes or persons as to whom no reasonable basis of discrimination can be said to exist. See Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642; In re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 Pac. 180; Ex parte Dickey, 144 Cal. 234, 77 Pac. 924, 66 L. R. A. 928, 103 Am. St. Rep. 82, 1 Ann. Cas. 428; Ex parte Hayden, 147 Cal. 649, 82 Pac. 315, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 184, 109 Am. St. Rep. 183; In re Foley, 172 Cal. 744, 158 Pac. 1034; In re Hines, 33 Cal. App. 45, 164 Pac. 339. And, it may be added, the question of the reasonableness of an ordinance passed by a municipal corporation, whether, in enacting the ordinance, the governing board of the city proceed under authority conferred by said section of the Constitution or that conferred directly by its charter, is open to inquiry by the courts. In re Smith, 143 Cal. 368, 77 Pac. 180; Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133 et seq., 14 Sup. Ct. 499, 38 L. Ed. 385; In re Junqua, 10 Cal. App. 602, 103 Pac. 159; Ex parte Throop, 169 Cal. 93, 145 Pac. 1029; Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 25 Sup. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169.

[6] While the Legislature cannot impair or limit the exercise of the power vested in municipalities by said section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, the exercise of such power is by section 8, of article 11, of the Constitution, as construed by the courts, limited to certain particular subjects. The last-mentioned section declares that when a freeholders' charter of a city or a city and county (and the city of Sacramento is governed by and operates under such a charter) has been approved by the Legislature, "it shall become the organic law of such city or city and county and supersede all laws inconsistent therewith." The language of said section which is in italics has been, and, in the very nature of the case, should be, held to apply exclusively to "municipal affairs," and, consistently therewith, it has further been held that a freeholders' charter does not supersede any general law which affects and applies to or involves matters involving the welfare of the people of the state as a whole. It follows, therefore, that a municipal corporation governed by a freeholders' charter cannot pass any ordinance or adopt any regulation with respect to any subject or matter which does not come peculiarly within the legal description of "municipal affairs"—that is, any subject which concerns and affects the people of the state generally or as a whole—unless the authority to do so is expressly delegated to it by the Legislature either through its charter or some general law. This proposition is so well settled and has been declared so often in the cases that authorities need not here be cited to prove its soundness.

[7] Among those subjects which are of general concern to the people of the state or which do not come within the purview of "municipal affairs," but in the regulation of which the inhabitants of a city have a peculiarly direct interest, are the streets of such city. It is settled that the streets of a city belong to the people of a state, and the use thereof is an inalienable right of every citizen of the state, subject to legislative control or such reasonable regulations as to the traffic thereon or the manner of using them as the Legislature of the state may deem wise or proper to adopt and impose. Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 639, 192 Pac. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172.

[8] The Legislature has not, through the charter of the city of Sacramento, granted to said city or the governing body thereof the authority to enact the legislation involved in the ordinance under attack.

There is, however, or was at the time of the enactment of the ordinance in question, a general law vesting freeholders' chartered cities with full control over and the right to regulate the use of the streets within their respective limits. Section 22, Stats. 1917, pp. 406, 407. Said section reads in part as follows:

"Provided, further, that local authorities may by general rule, ordinance or regulation, exclude vehicles from any cemetery or ground used for the burial of the dead, or exclude vehicles used solely or principally for commercial purposes from any park or part of a park system where such general rule, ordinance, or regulation is applicable equally and generally to all other vehicles used for the same purpose; provided, that at the entrance, or at each entrance if there be more than one, to such cemetery or park from which vehicles are so excluded, there shall have been posted a sign plainly legible from the middle of the public highway on which such cemetery or park opens, plainly indicating such exclusion and prohibition; and provided, further, that the local authorities of any city, town, or city and county may impose additional restrictions to those herein contained applicable to vehicles exclusively used in the carrying of merchandise or articles of freight and of a capacity in excess of one ton in weight and may designate certain streets whereon heavy laden vehicles may be excluded or declared to be 'one way' streets, may further, restrict, or prohibit, the use of trailers."

[9,10] It cannot be doubted that the foregoing provision confers upon municipalities, governed by freeholders' charters, plenary authority to adopt such regulations as to the use of the streets of such municipalities by the motor vehicle trucks therein referred to as are prescribed by the ordinance in question. It is, however, suggested in the reply brief of appellants that the power to adopt local regulations can be delegated by the Legislature to such municipalities only by express grant in their charters. In re Galusha, 184 Cal. 697, 193 Pac. 406, is cited as lending some support to this suggestion. But the proposition is obviously untenable and the case cited does not support it. We can conceive of no theory upon which it can for a moment be maintained that the force of a general law is not equal to that of a city charter or any other special act. The Constitution does not expressly declare, nor does it contain language which is susceptible of such a construction, that the Legislature can delegate power to a municipal corporation through its charter only or that power cannot be so delegated through the instrumentality of a general law.

We perceive no ground upon which the ordinance under attack may be held to be unreasonable in that it is discriminatory as against the plaintiffs or any other class of persons or that it imposes oppressive burdens upon the plaintiffs or that it is violative of the mandate of section 1 of article 14 of the federal Constitution that no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

[11-13] The conditions surrounding the use of the streets and highways of the state are vastly different now from what they were prior to the invention and the introduction of the automobile as a factor in the world's economy. It is so well known, as a matter of common and current knowledge, that the courts are forced to take cognizance of the fact, that the automobile has become a common method for the transportation, locally, of freight and passengers and for business purposes generally, as well as for the purposes of pleasure. Likewise, it is known that in cities of large populations the streets thereof often become, or would so become if the traffic thereon were left to the unrestrained liberty of those using such machines, so obstructed and congested as to render those thoroughfares practically useless for any other purpose than that to which they are put by the owners or drivers of such vehicles. In fact, even under proper regulations by the authorities, the use of those machines on the streets and highways of the state is a constant menace to the life and the limbs of the people, as well as injurious to the streets and highways. If they were to be permitted to be used upon and over the public streets of the cities in the absence of any compulsory reasonable restraint whatsoever as to the manner of so using them it is readily to be seen that the result would be that the traffic thereon would be such as to impair, if not in some instances actually to prevent, the orderly and convenient transaction of the usual or ordinary business maintained and conducted in the business districts of such city. It is therefore proper that the legislative department of the government should take notice of that fact to the end that it may regulate such traffic so as to reduce to the lowest possible minimum the dangers and the inconveniences which naturally are the consequences thereof. Indeed it is safe to conjecture that the time will come and not in the far distant future when even a more drastic regulation of automotive traffic may be required than now and that the power of police may be drawn on by the state, of whose sovereignty it is an attribute, to accomplish such a result, cannot be doubted. The police power is elastic. Its precise limits cannot be defined. It may be so extended as to meet the exigencies or new conditions arising from time to time as essential incidents of the incessant and seemingly illimitable progress of science and invention.

[14] As before stated, the exercise of the power is subject to no restraint other than that its crystallization into practical or concrete application must be reasonable. But what is a "reasonable" exercise of the power is relative. It is dependent upon the character or nature of the conditions to be met or overcome. What may be a perfectly reasonable police regulation under certain particular conditions might be unreasonable under other and different conditions. The regulation, at the present time, of traffic on streets and highways requisite for the safety of the people and the protection against injury of their property, while reasonable under conditions now prevailing would undoubtedly have justly been regarded as unreasonable before the automobile became a prominent part of the industrial system and other activities of the world.

The controlling consideration prompting the enactment of the ordinance in question is, as we apprehend, to remove from the principal business districts of the city of Sacramento the inconveniences which would necessarily follow from the prosecution of a motor truck freight business by means of large, heavily loaded and cumbersome trucks over and through said districts, thereby obstructing the convenient and orderly course of business and the ordinary traffic therein. We assume, from the description in the ordinance of the division of the city into traffic districts, that the specific object sought to be attained by this ordinance was to keep the traffic referred to therein from certain business blocks in J and K streets of said city for the reason suggested, as well as for the purpose of preserving those streets over which the traffic is not permitted to be carried on except in those instances in which portions thereof are necessary so to be traversed to reach the points of destination of such trucks.

[15] The ordinance before us, as will be observed, is strictly in accord with the authority vested in municipal corporations by section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1917. The ordinance applies to all persons in the city of Sacramento engaged in using vehicles of a capacity in excess of one ton in weight and exclusively used in the carrying of merchandise or articles of freight. Thus it is readily to be noted that the ordinance does not discriminate against any particular person. All of the class engaged in the business mentioned within the limits of the city of Sacramento are subject to the terms of the ordinance. In other words, the ordinance imposes no greater burdens upon one of the class mentioned than are laid upon others of the same class or engaged in the same calling under the same conditions. It is settled that when a regulatory ordinance applies equally to all engaged in one kind of business there is no discrimination. Powell v. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 8 Sup. Ct. 992, 1257, 32 L. Ed. 253. The classification made by the ordinance, to wit, upon the basis of the weight of the vehicle, the load it carries, and the injurious effect thereof upon the streets, involves a real and substantial distinction, "having a reasonable and just relation to the things in respect to which such classification is imposed." Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 31, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923.

[16, 17] The foregoing views answer the proposition that the ordinance denies to the plaintiffs the "equal protection of the law" within the meaning of that mandate of the federal Constitution. See In re Kotta, 187 Cal. 27, 31, 200 Pac. 957. It is true that the plaintiffs and all others whose motor truck freight business comes within the terms of the ordinance will, by reason thereof, be subjected to more or less inconvenience and perhaps some extra expense. But in the enforcement of nearly all regulatory provisions of police enactments there are added burdens or inconveniences. To these, when not so unreasonable as to be unnecessarily burdensome, all citizens must yield for the general or common good. The incidental and necessary burdens and inconveniences of the regulations do not of themselves render the regulation unreasonable. Nor will the extra expense which obedience to the terms of the ordinance may entail upon those whose business falls within the purview thereof itself stamp the ordinance as unreasonable.

The cases of Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Hot Springs, 85 Ark. 509, 109 S. W. 293, Clausen v. De Medina, 82 N. J. Law, 491, 81 Atl. 924, and Lossing v. Hughes (Tex. Civ. App.) 244 S. W. 556, are not in point in this case.

The case of Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Hot Springs, involved an ordinance requiring fees of owners of vehicles for the privilege of using the city streets, and embraced a classification of vehicles "based upon no difference in kind, size, capacity, or weight, or of their relative tendency to injure the streets, and arbitrarily fixes a tax of $50 on vehicles used for transporting oils, and a tax of $10 or less on vehicles of the same kind, size, and capacity used for other purposes." The court held that the ordinance was unreasonable because it was discriminatory against the owners of vehicles used for transporting oil, also holding that there was no substantial grounds for a distinction between such vehicles used for transporting oil and those of the same kind and character not used for that purpose.

In Clausen v. De Medina, supra, a board of boulevard commissioners to whom the control of the roads in the county was committed adopted a rule excluding from the use of a certain boulevard any motor vehicle used for business purposes, except to deliver and receive its load, in which case it was required to leave the boulevard east and west at the nearest traveled cross street. The Supreme Court of New Jersey held that the rule was beyond the power of the board of commissioners and in conflict with the state statute, since the test for exclusion adopted by the commissioners was the use to which the boulevard was put, while the test prescribed by the statute was the weight and not the use.

In Lossing v. Hughes the statute required license fees and registration of motor trucks and tractors used by all private owners, except farmers, and prohibiting commercial motor vehicles with a greater capacity than 8,000 pounds to be used by any one except for agricultural purposes. The court of appeals of Texas held that the statute was discriminatory in that it was not based upon a proper classification, and that it was therefore repugnant to section 1 of article 14 of the federal Constitution, guaranteeing the equal protection of the laws to the citizens of every state.

We think it is quite plain that there is no analogy between the cases last considered and the case at bar. The ordinance here does no more than what the statute expressly declares that municipal corporations may do with respect to the regulation of motor trucks of more than a ton carrying capacity used in such municipalities for the purpose of transporting as a business freight, merchandise, or other articles from point to point therein. We do not think that any one would undertake to maintain that the statute vesting the city with this power violates any provisions of our own Constitution or any mandate of the federal Constitution. Indeed, in view of the fact that the large auto machines are being constantly employed for all purposes in the cities and towns, as well as over the public highways generally in the state, it would well be regarded as evidence of marked impotency in the legislative department of the government if it was in the least degree hamshackled so as to prevent proper and reasonable control and regulation of the use of such dangerous business and pleasure instrumentalities. It has never been doubted that the local governments of the state, having that power vested in them by the Legislature, may establish parking zones in the cities and towns and otherwise regulate the use of the ordinary automobiles.

[18] But it is further contended by the plaintiffs that there is a discrimination as between the trucks that may be used for freight transportation purposes. It is said that there is a heavier burden imposed by section 4 of article 9 on motor trucks of one-ton capacity or over which carry rock, sand, gravel, etc., than is imposed upon the motor vehicles of the same carrying capacity by section 2 of said article. We do not think the ordinance intends any such discrimination. Section 2, it will be noted, refers to such trucks as are engaged in the hauling of "goods, wares, freight or merchandise of any description." Section 4 specifically refers to such trucks as are engaged in hauling "rock, sand, gravel, asphaltic mixtures or other dead weight materials." We think under a reasonable construction of the ordinance the articles which section 4 refers to may be regarded as articles of "freight" just as much as the "freight" referred to in section 2. In this view the trucks mentioned in section 4 would not be excluded from the right to use the streets which the trucks mentioned in section 2 are at liberty to use under the terms of the ordinance.

Our conclusion is that the ordinance involves a reasonable and just regulation of street traffic in the city of Sacramento.

[19] In justice to ourselves it should be stated that, although the proposition is not adverted to in any of the briefs on file herein, or was not mentioned by either of the attorneys for the parties when the case was called for oral argument, it occurred to the court, after this opinion had been almost completed, that the Motor Vehicle Act of 1923, known as the "Breed Motor Vehicle Act" (St. 1923, p. 517), might have had the effect of repealing the ordinance under review. On examining the statute of 1923, it appeared to us that such was the effect thereof. Upon calling the attention of the city attorney to the proposition, that officer conceded that the ordinance had been wiped out by the said statute, but insisted that a decision of the case was required because of the large amount of costs involved. The question upon whom that burden must fall is, of course, dependent upon the result herein arrived at.

The judgment is affirmed.

MCCARTHY et al. v. KURKJIAN et al.
(Civ. 4762.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 13, 1924. Rehearing Denied March 13, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 10, 1924.)

1. Mortgages $\S$ 283(1), 298(4)—Subrogation $\S$ 14(1)—Second mortgage held not entitled to be subrogated to collateral security held by first mortgagee; purchaser of mortgaged premises is surety; payment by one primarily liable extinguishes mortgage.

Where the owner of an apartment building mortgaged it and as a further security for the debt pledged certain Liberty and Victory bonds, and then sold the realty to purchaser, who assumed the mortgage debt and who executed a second mortgage on the realty, second mortgagee was not entitled to pay the first mortgage and to be subrogated to the rights of first mortgagee in the bonds, since the purchaser through whom the second mortgagee claimed was principal and the mortgagor a surety, and a payment of the first mortgage by purchaser would extinguish it.

2. Marshaling assets and securities $\S$ 5—Second mortgagee not entitled to marshaling of assets where not in privity with original mortgagor.

Where the owner of an apartment building mortgaged it and as a further security for the debt pledged certain Liberty and Victory bonds, and then sold the realty to purchaser, who assumed the mortgage debt, and executed a second mortgage on the realty, the second mortgagee was not entitled to a marshaling of assets and to have the bonds held by first mortgagee applied on the mortgage assumed by purchaser before resorting to the land, since there was no privity of contract between second mortgagee and mortgagor, and, he not being a debtor of second mortgagee, one of the necessary elements of the marshaling of assets was wanting, and Civ. Code, $\S$ 2845 to 2850, relative to rights of sureties, had no application.

3. Marshaling assets and securities $\S$ 1—When equity will marshal securities between two persons.

Before equity will marshal securities between two persons, it must appear that they are creditors of the same debtor, that there are two funds belonging to that debtor, and that one of them alone has the right to resort to both funds.

4. Mortgages §581(5)—Court may exercise discretion as to amount of attorney's fees.

The matter of attorney's fees, in suit to foreclose mortgage, is within the discretion of the trial court, and he may fix such an amount as in his judgment is reasonable and just.

5. Appeal and error §880(3) — Judgment against another defendant cannot be questioned by appealing defendant.

A judgment against a defendant who has not appealed cannot be questioned by another defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by George H. McCarthy and others against Arakel Kurkjian and others. Judgment for plaintiffs and defendant J. M. Urrutia appeals. Affirmed.

Goldman, Nye & Surr, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter H. Robinson, of San Francisco, for defendant Gorman.

SHORT, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of foreclosure of a first mortgage on certain real property situate in San Francisco. Judgment was entered decreeing foreclosure and sale of the said realty. The appeal is from the judgment by defendant J. M. Urrutia, a second mortgagee. Review is herein sought of said judgment and certain orders and rulings made by the trial court.

The following facts appear from the record: On January 15, 1921, A. F. Rosseau was the owner of the real property described in the complaint, known as the Kenilworth Apartments, located in San Francisco; and on that date leased the same to one Mrs. E. F. Gorman for five years at a rental of $1,325 per month, and to secure said rental took a chattel mortgage covering her furniture. On January 18, 1921, defendant Rosseau mortgaged said realty for the sum of $100,000 to the Banco Popolare Fugazi, and as further security for the payment of this debt Rosseau pledged to the mortgagee certain Liberty and Victory bonds of the face value of $30,000; said mortgage being a first lien on said realty and bonds. The note secured by said mortgage contained the following clause:

"This note is secured by a mortgage bearing even date herewith, and pledge of certain Liberty and Victory bonds."

On March 17, 1921, Rosseau sold the realty, but not the bonds, to J. B. Frinchaboy, and the said Frinchaboy, in the deed of conveyance, assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage debt, and signed the original note given to the bank. At the same time Rosseau assigned to Frinchaboy the lease and chattel mortgage securing the lease.

Frinchaboy immediately assigned said lease and chattel mortgage to Urrutia and also executed a second mortgage on the realty to Urrutia for the sum of $50,500 to secure an antecedent debt. On August 22, 1922, Frinchaboy conveyed his interest in the realty to the defendants Kurkjian. On May 4, 1922, Banca Popolare Fugazi assigned the first mortgage on the Kenilworth Apartments and bonds to George H. McCarthy and Mabel E. McCarthy, his wife. Later they hypothecated their interest in the note and mortgage to the Bank of Alameda for a loan of $67,500. On April 24, 1922, appellant brought suit to foreclose his second mortgage, plaintiffs' first mortgage, the chattel mortgage of defendant Gorman, and for an accounting between himself and Frinchaboy.

[1] On June 14, 1922, the plaintiffs commenced this action to foreclose the first mortgage.

The provision of the first mortgage relative to the liability of the bonds under this proceeding is as follows:

"In the event that the mortgagor shall make default in any of the covenants of this mortgage, the mortgagee shall, however, have the option of foreclosing this mortgage upon the real property herein described, and, in the event of a deficiency shall be entered in its favor, after the sale of said real property by sheriff or commissioner, it may then sell said bonds in open market without notice to mortgagor and apply the proceeds towards the satisfaction of such deficiency judgment."

On January 30, 1923, Urrutia filed his bill to redeem in a separate action, numbered 133193, in the same court.

Appellant claims the right to pay the plaintiffs their debt and be subrogated to all the rights and securities under the first mortgage; every proposal to pay being accompanied by the specific condition that the bonds should be applied thereupon, or, in lieu thereof, if and provided said bonds be also delivered to this (appellant) defendant.

Relying upon the foregoing facts, the appellant contends that he was entitled to pay the first mortgage and thereby be subrogated to the security of realty and bonds, or be subrogated to have a marshaling of securities and have the bonds as well as the realty applied to the payment of the mortgage.

Respondents do not deny appellant's right to redeem by paying the mortgage, but contend that the payment thereof would give appellant no greater right to the security covered by it than Frinchaboy had, under whom he claims; that as Frinchaboy assumed and agreed to pay the debt of $100,000, when the real property was conveyed to him, and thereby, as between him and Rosseau, his grantor, he became the principal debtor and Rosseau became the surety. Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 438, 440, 37 Pac. 411; Fielding v. Iler, 39 Cal. App. 559, 563, 179 Pac. 519; Beach v. Waite, 21 Cal. App. 304, 306, 307, 131 Pac. 880; Braun v. Crew, 183 Cal. 728, 731, 192 Pac. 531. That the real property then became the primary fund for the payment of the debt; that Rosseau did not sell the bonds to Frinchaboy, but the realty only; that Urrutia, having received his mortgage from Frinchaboy and claiming under him, was entitled to no greater rights than he (Frinchaboy) possessed; that as Frinchaboy had agreed to pay the mortgage debt when he received title to the realty, a payment by Frinchaboy, who had assumed the entire mortgage debt, would completely extinguish the mortgage; and as Frinchaboy could not be subrogated to the right of the mortgagee and keep the mortgage alive for any purpose, neither could Urrutia, who claimed under and through him, and that Rosseau's property, the bonds, could not be taken to pay Frinchaboy's debt to Urrutia.

In support of their contention respondents cite a number of authorities, among which are the following: Cook v. Kane et al., 101 Misc. Rep. 97, 166 N. Y. Supp. 453, and Miller v. Fasler, 42 Minn. 366, 44 N. W. 256.

In Cook v. Kane, supra, one Bridget C. Kane, who was the owner of a parcel of land, mortgaged it for the sum of $18,000, after which she conveyed it to one Matthew A. Kane, subject to that mortgage; thereafter Matthew A. Kane gave a second mortgage on the same land to one Herman Roth for $3,500. The first mortgage was foreclosed and a deficiency judgment entered; the second mortgagee, Ford, asked the court to charge the Bridget C. Kane estate with the payment of said deficiency and pay the money in the hands of the receiver to him, to apply upon his second mortgage, or to assign the deficiency judgment to him; the court denied the request and held:

"That when Matthew A. Kane took the property by deed from Bridget C. Kane, subject to the first mortgage of $18,000, Bridget C. Kane became entitled, as against Matthew A. Kane and any one claiming under him, as the defendant Roth, the second mortgagee, necessarily does in this case, to have the mortgaged property held primarily liable for the payment of the $18,000 mortgage."

In Miller v. Fasler, supra, one F—, the owner of three several blocks of land which were incumbered by a mortgage, conveyed one block to Mrs. Schurch, subject to the payment of the whole mortgage debt, which by the terms of the deed was assumed by the grantee, who also subsequently executed a second mortgage upon the block so conveyed.

"Held, that the effect of the stipulation in the deed was to charge the block in question with the payment of such prior mortgage, and the second mortgagee and his assigns are affected with notice of such charge or encumbrance upon the land mortgaged to them, and are bound by it; and they can acquire no title to the other blocks, under a redemption of the first mortgage from a sale upon foreclosure, which equity will permit them to assert against the first named grantor, F. * * *

"The effect of the stipulation in the deed * * * was to make the land thereby conveyed (block 4) the primary and exclusive fund for the payment of the mortgage as against her [the grantee], and as to her grantees and mortgagees of the same block, with notice, actual or constructive.

"That block thereby became charged with the payment of the debt by her contract as effectually as if she had given a new mortgage therefor upon it. And the plaintiff, as holder of the second mortgage, was bound by the equities appearing upon her title, as the same appeared of record. * * * He could not, therefore, contrary to the stipulation in the deed to his mortgagor, acquire or assert any rights to block 2 and 3 under the prior mortgage, as against the grantor in that deed, the defendant or his assigns."

And the following principles are laid down in regard to subsequent purchasers and successors in interest where the debt has been assumed by their grantor:

In Pom. Eq. Jur. vol. 3 (4th Ed.) § 1206, p. 2882, we find the following:

"As between the mortgagor and the grantee, the grantee becomes the principal debtor primarily liable for the debt, and the mortgagor becomes a surety, with all the consequences flowing from the relation of suretyship. As between these two and the mortgagee, although he may treat them both as debtors and may enforce the liability against either, still, after receiving notice of the assumption, he is bound to recognize the condition of suretyship, and to respect the rights of the surety in all of his subsequent dealings with them. Payment, therefore, by a grantee who has assumed the entire mortgage debt completely extinguishes the mortgage; he cannot be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, and keep the mortgage alive for any purpose."

See, also, section 1213, p. 2907.

The above principles are approved in the following cases cited, to wit: Lamoille County Sav. Bank & Trust Co. v. Belden, 90 Vt. 535, 98 Atl. 1002; Northwestern Nat. Bank v. Stone et al., 97 Iowa, 183, 66 N. W. 91, 92; Irvine v. Perry, 119 Cal. 352, 356, 51 Pac. 544, 949; Crenshaw v. Thackston (1880) 14 S. C. 437; Haas v. Dudley et al., 34 Or. 355, 48 Pac. 168; Poice v. Coffeen, 158 Iowa, 705, 138 N. W. 857.

From the foregoing authorities it appears that Frinchaboy is in the position of the principal debtor and Rosseau stood as his surety to the extent of the bonds, in which case neither Frinchaboy nor those claiming under him would have any interest in the bonds given as security by the surety; and it would be Frinchaboy's duty to protect the bonds, and those claiming under Frinchaboy would have notice of the liability. And as Frinchaboy was the principal debtor, a payment of the mortgage by him would extinguish it, so a payment by Urrutia, who claims under and through Frinchaboy, would not entitle him to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, nor could it be kept alive for any purpose in his hands.

[2] The next contention of appellant is that he is entitled to a marshaling of assets, and to have the bonds held by original mortgagee first sold or applied on the mortgage of $100,000 assumed by Frinchaboy, before resorting to the land upon which appellant has his second mortgage.

Replying to this, respondents claim that no marshaling of assets could be had in this case, since marshaling only occurs where both creditors who seek to marshal are creditors of the same person, and have demands against funds, the property of the same person; and that there was no privity of contract between appellant and respondent Rosseau and he not being a debtor of Urrutia one of the necessary elements of the marshaling of assets is wanting.

[3] That before a court of equity will marshal securities between two persons it must appear: (1) That they are creditors of the same debtor; (2) that there are two funds belonging to that debtor; (3) that one of them alone has the right to resort to both funds. These principles are sustained by the following authorities: Quinnipiac Brewing Co. v. Fitzgibbons, 73 Conn. 191, 47 Atl. 128, 130; Robinson v. Lehman, 72 Ala. 401, 404; Stevens v. Church, 41 Conn. 369; Brooks v. Rice, 56 Cal. 428; Kent v. Williams, 114 Cal. 537, 46 Pac. 462; Blair v. Ward, 10 N. J. Eq. 125.

In Savings Bank v. Middlekauff, 113 Cal. 466, 45 Pac. 841, the court say regarding section 3433, Civil Code:

"* * * That section applies only to a case where one creditor is entitled to resort to each of several funds of a debtor, and another creditor of said debtor is entitled to resort to some, but not all, the same funds."

Sections 2845 to 2850, Civil Code, cited by appellant, refer to rights of sureties and do not apply to appellant in this case.

It is clearly evident from the foregoing authorities that appellant is not entitled to a marshaling of assets.

Having heretofore determined that the appellant is not entitled to pay the first mortgage and thereby be subrogated to the security of both the realty and the bonds; and having further determined that said appellant is not entitled to a marshaling of securities, it follows that the court did not err in striking out the second defense in appellants' amended answer; nor in denying appellant's motion to file an amendment to the amended answer; nor in denying appellant's motion to file a cross-complaint; nor in denying appellant's motion for a continuance until such time as action No. 133193 should be disposed of, as each and all of said matters had reference to redemption and subrogation or marshaling of securities.

The complaint stated a cause of action and was sufficiently certain and unambiguous to apprise the appellant of the fact that they were foreclosing the land only by said action.

The evidence is sufficient to support the findings and the findings support the judgment.

The rents were applied as payments on the first mortgage in accordance with the stipulation of July 12, 1922, except the rent of the last three months, which was applied as payment on order of the court, and the amount found due was reduced by the amount of said three months' rent, and it does not appear that appellant has been injured by said order.

[4] The matter of attorney's fees was within the discretion of the trial court, who was familiar with the nature and extent of the services performed, and he could fix such an amount as in his judgment was reasonable and just, and we cannot say that there was an abuse of discretion.

[5] Defendant Gorman not having appealed from the judgment, we are of the opinion that appellant cannot question the correctness of the judgment against her.

From the foregoing conclusions it appears that there were no errors and that the judgment and orders should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

REALTY & REBUILDING CO. v. REA et al.
(Civ. 4656.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 23, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 21, 1924.)

1. Corporations ¶129 — Statute requiring transfer of shares entered on books of company is mandatory.

Civ. Code, § 324, making a transfer of shares of stock invalid as between the parties thereto unless the same is entered on the books so as to show by whom and to whom the transfer was made, the number of the certificate, the number or designation of the shares, and date of the transfer, is mandatory, and not a mere rule for guidance of the corporation and stockholders.

2. Corporations ¶136—Creditors have right to rely on corporation books as showing who stockholders are.

Creditors of a corporation have a right to rely on the books as showing who the stockholders are, and the amount of stock held by each, and the failure to make a transfer on the corporation books requires that such transfer be disregarded in considering the rights of creditors.

3. Corporations ¶269(3)—Evidence held not to show transfer of stock so as to relieve owner from liability.

Where the owner of shares of stock delivered a certificate thereof duly indorsed to his sister, but had no knowledge that the certificate was ever subsequently delivered for transfer by the transferee or any other person to the secretary of the corporation and owner having it within his power to acquire such knowledge, held not to show that owner effected such a transfer of the stock as would relieve him from liability as a shareholder and to place him in a position of a mere involuntary record holder.

4. Appeal and error ¶1011(1) — Appellate court bound by findings of trial court where evidence is conflicting.

Where the evidence upon a subject is conflicting, appellate court is bound by the conclusion of the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the Realty & Rebuilding Company against L. A. Rea and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. E. Shaw, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Moran & Heer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal by defendant Ruef from a judgment for $2,490 upon a stockholder's liability. The alleged liability arose as follows:

In the month of June, 1906, Rudolph Spreckels was the owner of certain real property situated on the west side of Fillmore street, in this city and county, and he leased the same to defendants Rea, Kehrlein, and Sullivan. On December 14 following the lessees assigned and transferred their leasehold interest in the same to defendant Fillmore Arcade Company, a corporation. This company accepted the transfer and entered into possession of the leased premises. Thereafter, on April 28, 1908, Rudolph Spreckels, as owner and lessor, conveyed the premises to plaintiff corporation. At the time of the transfer of the lease to the Fillmore Arcade Company Ruef was a stockholder in the latter corporation. Such corporation subsequently became indebted to plaintiff on account of certain rents due under the lease, and this indebtedness became the subject of this action.

The count upon which the cause of action is based is one to recover certain accrued rents which were alleged to be due from the Fillmore Arcade Company to plaintiff for the months of June, July, and August, 1911; and defendant Ruef was sued with other stockholders for his proportion of this alleged indebtedness.

The case has previously been before the Supreme Court, and the facts are fully set forth in the opinion rendered therein. Realty & Rebuilding Co. v. Rea, 184 Cal. 565, 194 Pac. 1024. One of the contentions relied upon by Ruef upon the former trial was that he had indorsed and delivered his certificate of shares in defendant Fillmore Arcade Company to his sister, Mrs. Henrietta Sittenfeld, in December, 1908, and was therefore not the owner of any stock in such corporation at the time when the indebtedness here sued upon was incurred or had accrued. The trial court had so found, but upon appeal it was held that the evidence concerning the transfer was insufficient to relieve Ruef from liability to the creditors of the corporation for the reason that it failed to show that Ruef had made proper or diligent effort to procure the removal of his name as stockholder from the corporate books, and the judgment rendered in his favor was accordingly reversed.

Upon the cause again coming on for trial after such reversal defendant Ruef testified to further facts surrounding the transfer. Judgment as above indicated was rendered against him, and this is an appeal from such judgment.

The sole question presented by the appeal is whether the additional testimony shows that Ruef effected such a transfer of his stock as would relieve him from liability and place him in the position of a mere involuntary record holder, it being conceded that his name still appears upon the books of defendant Fillmore Arcade Company as a stockholder therein. The testimony of Ruef is the only evidence in the case on the subject of the ownership of the stock and the circumstances surrounding its transfer. It is here claimed that such evidence shows without conflict that he had done everything in his power to cause the transfer of his certificates of stock to be made upon the books of the corporation, for which reason the judgment rendered against him should be reversed. Upon the former trial Ruef testified "that he had delivered a duly indorsed certificate representing his shares of stock to Henrietta Sittenfeld, and had requested the secretary of the corporation to issue the stock to the transferee." He further testified on that occasion that he had no knowledge as to whether the certificate was ever subsequently delivered by the transferee or any other person to the secretary of the corporation. It was this evidence that the Supreme Court held upon the former appeal to be insufficient to relieve Ruef of his personal liability. Upon the present trial this evidence was supplemented by further testimony on the part of Ruef to the effect that at the time he transferred his certificate he was incarcerated in the county jail, expecting within five days to be sent to the state prison for a term of 14 years, and, being refused permission to personally attend to his affairs outside of the jail he was compelled to rely upon others to properly effect a transfer for him. In this connection Ruef testified upon the present trial that he had been assured by the transferee shortly after the assignment of the stock that the certificate had been left by her with the secretary of the corporation for transfer, and that he had further been assured by the president and secretary, and also by the attorney of the corporation, that the transfer had been made.

Respondent claims that this additional testimony on the part of Ruef is highly improbable and at variance with his testimony given at the former trial, wherein he had stated that he had no knowledge as to whether or not the certificate was ever delivered by the transferee or any other person to the secretary. Accordingly it is insisted that the judgment should be affirmed. We are of a like opinion.

[1, 2] When shares of stock are transferred from one owner to another, it at once becomes an important matter to determine who is liable upon a stockholder's liability when such question is called into issue. The general rule is that a transferor is not released from this imposed burden until his transfer is duly registered upon the corporate books. Our Code provides in substance that a transfer is not valid, except as to the parties thereto, until the same is entered upon the books of the corporation so as to show the name of the parties by whom and to whom the transfer was made, the number of the certificate, the number or designation of the shares, and the date of the transfer. Civ. Code, § 324. This statute is mandatory, and not directory, and is not a mere rule for guidance of the corporation and stockholder. The section makes the transfer invalid, except as between the parties thereto, unless it is made in conformity with this statutory requirement. The transfer of shares of stock, therefore, to become effectual between transferor and creditors of the corporation, must be entered on the corporate books. Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 45 Pac. 329, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348. A provision of this character is a formality intended for the protection and security of the corporation and of third persons dealing with the same. Creditors of a corporation have a right to rely upon the books as showing who the stockholders are and the amount of stock held by each, and failure to make a transfer on the books of the corporation requires that such transfer must be disregarded in considering the rights of creditors. Sherman v. S. K. D. Oil Co., 185 Cal. 534, 548, 197 Pac. 799, and cases cited.

It is conceded in the present case that no such transfer was ever made, and that the name of Ruef still remains on the books of the corporation as a stockholder. It is claimed, however, that, where a stockholder has made a bona fide transfer of his stock, and has done everything in his power to comply with all the statutory requirements regarding stock transfers, he ceases to be liable as a stockholder, either to the corporation or its creditors, where, through the fault or omission of the corporation, the transfer is not entered on the books.

[3, 4] Admitting this to be true, the evidence upon this subject is not without conflict. In this connection it appears therefrom that at or about the time of the transfer the officers of the corporation, who were the friends of Ruef, visited him in the jail where he was incarcerated. The secretary of the corporation was his personal employee. It was possible for him to have delivered the stock to any one of these officers with instructions to make the transfer. Ruef at this time, so the evidence shows, was chiefly concerned with transferring most if not all his possessions to members of his family, as he was sick, and of the opinion that he would not survive his term of imprisonment. The transfer of the stock to his sister was as between them perfectly valid by reason of his indorsement and delivery. There was nothing in the transaction which in any manner indicated anxiety on Ruef's part as to any future liability to creditors of the corporation by reason of his mode of transfer. The testimony given by him upon the former trial was read into the record wherein he had stated that he had no knowledge that the certificate was ever subsequently delivered for transfer by his sister, the trans-ferree, or by any other person, to the secretary. This was a circumstance which the trial court was justified in considering when determining the question as to whether or not he had done all that a prudent man could do to effect a transfer. In other words, the evidence upon the subject as to whether or not Ruef was the legal owner of the shares in contemplation of law is conflicting; and, this being so, we are bound by the conclusion of the trial court.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

STEPHENS et al. v. BEAN. (Civ. 2699.)*

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 26, 1924. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 24, 1924.)

1. Contracts ⇨117(5)—Contract to sell undertaking business and covenant not to compete held enforceable notwithstanding statutes.

One contracting to sell to his partners his "one-half interest in their named undertaking firm located" in a named city and county, and covenanting not to enter into business in competition to the above-mentioned firm "at any time in the future," could be restrained from thereafter competing, notwithstanding Civ. Code, §§ 1673 and 1674, prohibiting contracts restraining any one from exercising a lawful profession except within a specified county, city, or part thereof, since undertaking is essentially local business and the restriction of location should be implied from the initial reference to city and county.

2. Injunction ⇨61(2)—One entering competing local undertaking business in higher position than clerk restrained for breach of covenant not to compete.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1673, 1674, prohibiting contracts in restraint of trade except agreements to refrain from carrying on "similar business within specified county, city, or part thereof, one employed in a higher position than clerk or servant in a local competing undertaking company, could be restrained for breach of a covenant not to compete with his former partners.

3. Good will ⇨6(2)—Contract broken by managing business for competitor.

A contract against engaging in a similar business is broken by conducting or controlling such business for another as manager or in similar capacity, but not if employed as clerk or servant, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1673, 1674, prohibiting contracts in restraint of trade.

4. Injunction ⇨128—Evidence held to show defendant, covenanting not to compete, employed by competitor in higher position than clerk.

In a suit by vendees of an undertaking business to enjoin vendor, covenanting not to Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Suit by L. O. Stephens and another, doing business as Stephens & Bean, against W. A. Bean. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and Jas. Gallagher, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Harris & Hayhurst and Harris, Johnson, Willey & Griffith, all of Fresno, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant has appealed from a judgment restraining him—

"from further engaging in the undertaking business, or business similar thereto, in the city of Fresno, so long as plaintiffs, or any person deriving title to the good will of said business from plaintiffs, carry on said or like business in said city of Fresno."

There is no substantial conflict in the evidence. For many years the plaintiffs and defendant were partners in the business of general undertakers and funeral directors in the city of Fresno, under the firm name of Stephens & Bean. On the 31st day of May, 1919, the defendant sold his interest in the business and property of the firm to the plaintiffs for the sum of $35,000 and executed the following instrument of transfer:

"State of California, County of Fresno—ss.:
"Know all men by these presents: That I, W. A. Bean, of the city of Fresno, county of Fresno, state of California, am the owner of one-half (½) interest in the undertaking firm of Stephens & Bean, located and doing business in the said city and county.

"Be it further known: That for, and in consideration of the sum of one hundred and no/100 ($100.00) dollars, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, I do sell, assign and transfer to L. O. Stephens and J. D. Stephens of the same place, my undivided one-half (½) interest in the aforesaid undertaking firm of Stephens & Bean, together with my interest in all stock, furniture, fixtures, securities, notes, book accounts, etc., now due said firm.

"Signed, sealed, and dated at Fresno, this thirty-first day of May, 1919. W. A. Bean.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 31st day of May, 1919. Gladys G. Watson, Notary Public in and for the County of Fresno, State of California.

"I further agree to not at any time in the future enter into business in competition to the above-mentioned firm of Stephens & Bean.

"[Signed] W. A. Bean."

The defendant testified that he had been in the undertaking business with the firm of Stephens & Bean for 25 or 30 years; that at the time of the trial, November 15, 1922, he was in the employ of the Mission Undertaking Company, a corporation, undertakers and funeral directors in the city of Fresno, and had been in the employ of such corporation since the 1st of April, 1922; that he assists in cleaning up, in making death calls, and in conducting funerals, and, in the absence of the manager, he sometimes takes charge of funerals; that the business is transacted by the manager, a lady attendant, and defendant, all of whom are paid salaries and receive commissions on the amount of business transacted; and that defendant was consulted in the preparation of advertising matter which was published in the newspapers of Fresno. These advertisements may be said to "feature" the defendant. A description of one of them will serve to illustrate their nature. It contained pictures of the undertaking parlors, the defendant, the manager, and the lady attendant, underneath which appeared the following:

"Mission Undertaking Parlors, Announcing a Change in Name of the Powell Undertaking Company, to the Mission Undertaking Company. Mr. R. A. Powell having severed his connection with this undertaking concern, the directors wish to announce to the public that in the future it will be known as the Mission Undertaking Parlors, and associated with it are William A. Bean, J. Herman Kennedy and Mrs. Anna (Erickson) McIntyre, all of whom are licensed embalmers and experienced funeral directors.

"Wm. A. Bean: Mr. Bean was formerly with Stephen & Bean, and has had over 30 years' experience in the business, 28 years of which have been in the city of Fresno, having served as coroner of Fresno county for 12 years. During his 30 years' experience in the undertaking business he has established a reputation for himself as being one of the leading funeral directors of the state, having arranged and directed some of the largest funerals ever held in the city of Fresno."

This is followed by similar statements concerning the experience and standing of Mr. Kennedy and Mrs. McIntyre.

[1] Appellant contends that his covenant not to engage in the undertaking business is void because in restraint of trade, and, further, that he is not engaged in such business. Section 1673 of the Civil Code provides:

"Every contract by which any one is restrained from exercising a lawful profession, trade, or business of any kind, otherwise than is provided by the next two sections, is to that extent void."

Section 1674 provides:

"One who sells the good will of a business may agree with the buyer to refrain from carrying on a similar business within a specified county, city, or a part thereof, so long as the buyer, or any person deriving title to the good will from him, carries on a like business therein."

Defendant's covenant does not expressly contain the limitations of section 1674 as to time, territory, or the nature of the business which defendant agrees not to carry on.

In Brown v. Kling, 101 Cal. 295, 35 Pac. 995, the defendant had agreed not to carry on a butcher business, without limiting the agreement to the time the plaintiff or his assigns might conduct a like business. In holding the contract valid for the time during which plaintiff and his assigns might continue in a like business, the court said:

"The statute does not provide that such contracts, though not in accordance with the Code, shall be wholly void. It says that they shall be 'to that extent void.' It may be said, and perhaps that is the correct construction, that the restraint which is other than that prescribed shall be void. But it is a familiar rule of law that where there is a statute upon a certain subject it enters into and becomes a part of such contract upon such subject, if the contract can be so construed. The contracting parties are presumed to have had the law in view. Sometimes the terms of the contract will rebut this presumption, but in the present case it does not. One rule at common law applicable to this matter was that the restraint shall be no greater than is necessary to protect the purchaser. This rule would limit the restraint to the time during which the purchaser or his assignee is in business, for beyond that time there is nothing to protect."

The following cases are to the same effect: City Carpet, etc., Works v. Jones, 102 Cal. 506, 36 Pac. 841; Gregory v. Spieker, 110 Cal. 150, 42 Pac. 576, 52 Am. St. Rep. 70.

Defendant's covenant is not expressly limited to the city or county in which the business sold was being conducted. No sound reason appears, however, why the intention of the parties may not be ascertained, as in other agreements, from a consideration of the terms of the contract as a whole, viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances. The contract recites that the defendant, "of the city of Fresno, county of Fresno," is the owner of a one-half interest in the undertaking firm of Stephens & Bean, "located and doing business in the said city and county." The business, in its nature, is local. Any business other than local, therefore, in which defendant might engage, would not be in competition with that of plaintiffs. The case is unlike those of manufacturing concerns and wholesale merchants whose goods are sold and distributed over large territories. The court was justified in concluding that it was the intention of the parties that the restraint imposed upon defendant was applicable only to the city of Fresno. In Brown v. Kling, supra, it is said:

"In Moore, etc., Co. v. Towers, etc., Co., 87 Ala. 206, 13 Am. St. Rep. 23, defendants sold their business to plaintiffs, and agreed not to handle any more plowstocks or plowblades. There was no restriction as to time or place. It was objected to as unreasonable because unlimited. The court said, however, in substance, that a contract was to be construed with reference to the circumstances of the parties and the object sought to be attained by the contract. That in fact the firm was dealing only within a limited territory, and the evident purpose was to protect the plaintiff in his business. The contract was, therefore, to be construed as limited to the territory covered by plaintiff's business. I think this case an advance upon former precedents upon the subject."

In Grogan v. Chafee, 156 Cal. 611, 615, 105 Pac. 745, 747 (27 L. R. A. [N. S.] 395), it is said:

"The tendency of the modern decisions has been to view with greater liberality contracts claimed to be in restraint of trade."

In the case of City Carpet, etc., Works v. Jones, supra, the defendant had agreed not to enter into any business of the kind sold to plaintiff in the city and county of San Francisco or in the counties of Alameda and San Mateo. The court said:

"In this case three counties are named in the contract, and I see no difficulty in upholding it as to the county in which the business was conducted, and declaring it void as to the other two counties. The boundaries of each are definite, and fixed by law. Neither includes any part of the others. If the city and county of San Francisco had alone been named the contract would have been good. * * * It is only to the 'extent' that the contract departs from the provisions of the Code that it is declared void."

Appellant contends that the contract considered in the case last cited differs from that in the instant case in that the former was divisible while the latter "is not divisible. It has not a divisible limitation." Even if it be assumed that the parties intended that the defendant should refrain from engaging in the undertaking business, without limitation as to territory, the question of divisibility of the covenant would be no different than that in the case of Franz v. Bieler, 126 Cal. 176, 56 Pac. 249, 58 Pac. 466, where the covenant was to refrain from carrying on a business within a radius of ten miles from a point in the city of Oakland. The territory to which the restriction applied thus included a part of Contra Costa county and a part of the city and county of San Francisco, as well as a portion of Alameda county. It was there argued that the contract was not divisible. At page 181 of the decision (56 Pac. 250) it is said:

"I think, however, that the description of the territory is good as to all of it that lies within Alameda county, such boundaries being capable of exact ascertainment, the Code permitting the restriction to extend to 'a specified county, city, or a part thereof.'"

Defendant's covenant is that he will not "enter into business in competition to the above-mentioned firm," without limitation as to the kind of business restricted. Since the firm is mentioned in the contract as an "undertaking firm," the covenant may reasonably be construed as an agreement not to engage in the undertaking business, but in any event the statute limits the restriction to a "similar business." In Shafer v. Sloan, 3 Cal. App. 335, 337, 85 Pac. 162, 163, it is said:

"It is true the contract is in excess of the rights conferred by section 1674, Civil Code, in that it undertakes to restrict the right to engage in business so long as the party of the first part may continue in business, omitting the words 'similar business' found in the section. This, however, would not render the contract thereby void, but only to the extent to which it attempted to enlarge the rights beyond the statute."

Since the foregoing decisions of this state are decisive of the questions thus far discussed, it is not deemed necessary to review the decisions of other jurisdictions cited in the briefs.

[2-4] Appellant's contention that he is not engaged in the undertaking business is so manifestly without merit that it requires but little consideration. "The provisions of the Code authorize the execution of a contract by which one agrees not 'to carry on' a similar business. It is too narrow a construction to say that this is limited to the carrying on of a business as owner or proprietor. To conduct, manage or operate it wholly or in part, as the agent of another, is equally within the purpose and language of the Code." 6 Cal. Jur. 142; Meyers v. Merillion, 118 Cal. 352, 50 Pac. 662; Johnston v. Blanchard, 16 Cal. App. 321, 116 Pac. 973. "As a general rule a contract against engaging in a similar business is broken by conducting or controlling such a business for another as manager or in a similar capacity, but it is not broken by merely entering into the employ of one conducting such a business in the capacity of a clerk or servant." 13 C. J. 557. It certainly is clear that defendant's employment by the Mission Undertaking Company was not merely in the capacity of clerk or servant.

The judgment is affirmed.
